The chances of Warren entering the presidential campaign remain small, and not for the usual reasons (she's relatively unknown and is only a freshman senator - a description that also fits Ted Cruz, Marco Rubio and Rand Paul, and it was no impediment to Obama). She's reluctant to challenge another female who is, by every poll, a prohibitive favorite for the nomination. At the moment, Clinton's support among Democrats is seven times as great as that of the Massachusetts senator, according to the latest CNN poll.

The Republicans began as a party of rights but ended up being a party of economic opportunity - precisely the opposite 20th-century passage of the Democrats - and so now the wealth gap is a peculiarly perplexing challenge for them. In the waning years of the Great Society, Ronald Reagan began questioning the Democrats' prescriptions for economic opportunity, an effort that through four presidential campaigns (1968, 1976, 1980 and 1984) he developed into a new ethos with its own catchphrase ("opportunity society"). So deep did that catchphrase penetrate that, nearly a year before the 2012 election, former Gov. Mitt Romney of Massachusetts, who would eventually win the GOP presidential nomination, framed his campaign as a choice between the "opportunity society" of the Republicans and the "entitlement society" of the Democrats.

Democrats for a few tantalizing weeks may have luxuriated in portraying Romney, who until Friday afternoon considered a 2016 presidential campaign, as a Harvey Comics figure (Richie Rich redux), but he actually has been supporting an increase in the minimum wage for eight months. He did so with the pointed aside that, as he put it, "I part company with many of the conservatives in my party on the issue."

Now many of those same conservatives are struggling to find ways to address the wealth gap. The new Republicans - and not only those affiliated with the Tea Party insurgents - are loath to associate themselves with figures of great wealth like Romney, whose possible appearance in the 2016 race was for them a disturbing symbol of the resilience of the East Coast establishment that GOP rebels have remonstrated against since the Barry Goldwater campaign of 1964.

But just as Democrats have adopted many of the characteristics of the Republicans they once reviled - this began as early as 1982, when the party cozied up to big-money interests with fresh but awkward ardor - the Republicans are adopting many of the characteristics of the Democrats. Since 1988 and the presidential candidacy of Rep. Jack F. Kemp of New York, Republicans have become increasingly comfortable with populist rhetoric. Before he died in 2009, Kemp, who was the Republicans' vice presidential nominee in 1996, teamed up with an unlikely ally, former Senate Majority Leader George Mitchell of Maine, a Democrat and liberal. "The gap between rich and poor has grown worrisome to many of us," they wrote, adding: "A cherished piece of the American Dream - the notion that individuals have the opportunity to rise beyond their parent's economic status - is not standing up to scrutiny."

Kemp was the mentor to Rep.

Paul Ryan of Wisconsin, who followed him 16 years later as the GOP vice presidential nominee, on the Romney ticket. Ryan, who has said he would not run for president in 2016, moved last month from the chairmanship of the House Budget

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Committee to the head of the House Ways and Means Committee. In those committee chambers, as on the campaign trail in Iowa and New Hampshire, the new Republican response to the wealth gap will be shaped.

It may be the most important policy debate either party will have in the two years leading to the election. The Democratic debate will be a discussion around Clinton's Wall Street ties and will produce some heat but no light, much emotion but little thoughtful analysis. The Republican debate will be far more difficult, far more intellectual and far more nuanced.

This is where the enduring significance of the Republican struggle will lie. It will be a horse race, to be sure. Not only is the entire field open; the policy debate is wide open, too. The Republicans will talk of an opportunity society, but their debate will be an opportunity for our society.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Flew Private for Peanuts, and You Can Too (Vanity Fair)

By Bruce Feirstein

February 6, 2015

Vanity Fair

Word comes to us from the newly redesigned Bloomberg Business site that during her years in the senate, Hillary Clinton hitched rides on lots of corporate jets, and reimbursed companies like Coca Cola and Abbot Pharmaceuticals only a tiny fraction of the actual operating costs.

Most of the reported data in the January 30 article, "Hillary Clinton Faces Scrutiny for Use of Private Jets", comes courtesy of an anonymous "Republican operative," who is clearly trying to paint the presumed presidential candidate as being out of touch with those of us who fly coach. (A more accurate headline might be "The G.O.P. Hopes Hillary Clinton Will Face Scrutiny for Use of Private Jets.")

Now, truly, we have no truck with Mrs. Clinton's supposed air-transportation preferences. We're not going to criticize her for taking private planes. Especially since the Bloomberg Business piece exonerates her of any wrongdoing. (Note to the G.O.P.: if you're trying to clip Hillary's wings, you're going to have to do better than this.) But even without Mrs. Clinton's security requirements—which no rational person can dispute—who among us wouldn't jump at the chance to avoid the boarding lines at J.F.K., praying for an upgrade, worried about whether there'll be space in the overhead bin for the roller bag, all while mourning the devastating loss of the SkyMall catalogue?

So the question, then, is: How do you and I get Hillary's airfare deals? How do we close the pernicious Gulfstream-inequality gap? How do we manage to snag 200 flights for only $225,000? Or, more specifically, how do any of us get to pay only $475.93 for a window seat on a private plane from Chicago to Washington, D.C., when air-charter companies like JetSuite.com have priced the trip closer to $10,000?

The answer lies in knowing where to look, and, above all, being flexible in your preferred destination.

It turns out that charter operators like JetSuite.com and Jets.com offer hugely discounted deals on empty flights. Some for as low as $536. JetSuite.com posts their empty legs daily; PrivateFly has a downloadable app. BlueStarJets sends out a monthly e-mail, and currently lists more than 1,200 empty flights on their site.

In the end, your prices, and your mileage may vary.

A few words of advice: if you ever find yourself hitching a ride on one of these planes, here are the three inviolate rules to fly by:

1) Show up on time, and don't start posting selfies. It's the most obnoxious way to humble-brag.

2) Even if you're flying from Colorado, don't break out the pot and hotbox the cabin. As Justin Bieber learned, private pilots don't enjoy having to put on oxygen masks in order to avoid landing stoned.

3) No matter what, don't start throwing phrases around like, "We go wheels up at 10:30." It makes you sound like a poseur. And needless to say, that's something no Vanity Fair reader ever wants to be accused of.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Of course, another solution to the high price of c-suite flying would be to spend a million dollars buying a seat in Congress, whereupon you get to enjoy all the air perks of our elected officials. The pricing is all about optics, and corporate donors avoiding the appearance of buying favors. Pre-2007, congressmen were only required to reimburse corporations for the price of a first-class ticket when flying on a Fortune 500 Gulfstream. Nowadays, they pay for the actual cost of the jet, divided by the number of passengers.

And the ultimate, albeit more expensive route, would be to spend a billion dollars winning a presidential campaign. In this case, you get to tool around in the ultimate private jet, Air Force One, arranging your social schedule (read: fundraising events) around your official duties, so that the taxpayers pick up most of the $210,877–per hour operating costs. According to the New York Daily News, political operatives are supposed to reimburse the government for the price of a first-class ticket on these quasi-official jaunts. Perhaps Hillary will be able to fill them in on the intricacies come 2017.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Report: Pakistan aid plans hit snag after political promise by Hillary Clinton (Washington Examiner)

By Sarah Westwood

February 6, 2015

The Washington Examiner

Officials with a State Department agency scrapped plans to renovate a failing Pakistani hospital after a political promise from then-Secretary of State Hillary Clinton forced the agency to build an entirely new facility instead, according to USAID's watchdog.

The resulting hospital, which cost the U.S. $17 million, was so poorly planned that it faces the risk of falling into the same state of disrepair as the crumbling facility USAID declined to rehabilitate, the inspector general said in a report made public Jan. 29.

But an agency official told the Washington Examiner that USAID only abandoned plans to revamp the hospital in Jacobabad — an impoverished, crime-ridden city 300 miles north of Karachi — after finding its conditions so deplorable that building an entirely new facility emerged as the more economic option.

"The U.S. government made a commitment to renovate the hospital in Jacobabad in July 2010. However, after an assessment of the condition of the existing hospital, our engineers determined that it was in such poor condition that it would be more cost effective and practical to build a new hospital instead," said the USAID official spoke to the Examiner on condition they would not be named.

Under pressure "to fulfill a commitment that a senior Department of State official made in 2010," USAID initially ignored the fact that the institute would one day depend on faulty infrastructure and would struggle to attract qualified staff due to its remote location, the inspector general's report said. The document did not identify the senior official, but a USAID spokesman confirmed it was Clinton.

The Pakistani government and USAID "focused instead on building the institute" because the agency "felt compelled to fulfill that commitment," the report said.

"Details other than facility design and construction, including funding, were ironed out piecemeal," the report continued.

In remarks at the U.S.-Pakistan Strategic Dialogue in July 2010, Clinton announced she was "pleased to announce we will either renovate or build three medical facilities" in the country. She also mentioned the ultimately foregone plans to renovate the hospital in Jacobabad.

Water and sewage systems in Jacobabad are "substandard," yet the new facility, the Jacobabad Institute of Medical Sciences, must rely on them to operate. The water supply there is so unclean that it must be treated for "biological impurities" before it can be used, and the district doesn't even have a functioning sewage system.

USAID is funding an effort to improve the water systems there, but the watchdog said the project isn't slated for completion until this September — a full year after construction on the institute ended.

Among other problems was the fact that "excessive political influence" has threatened to derail the hiring of competent staff.

What's more, Pakistani operators were incapable of running the backup solar power systems USAID purchased because the technology was unfamiliar and, even if they did have the ability to maintain the systems, the country's atmosphere is too "dusty" to allow efficient use of solar energy. The need for a backup system is made dire by the widespread and prolonged power outages that plague the district.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"The institute may struggle to remain financially and operationally viable and may devolve into the same condition as the Jacobabad hospital," the watchdog said.

USAID officials called conditions at that hospital "horrific" in a 2011 report.

The inspector general's findings raised questions as to why USAID would abandon a struggling hospital in order to build a new one that could soon devolve into the same conditions as the first.

"If the institute degenerates into a facility that cannot provide the quality of health care planned, the U.S. Government's image will be damaged, and a large U.S. Government investment will be wasted," the watchdog said in its report.

The Jacobabad construction project was part of a $180.5 million five-year contract to build schools and healthcare facilities in Pakistan's earthquake zones, although the medical facilities discussed in the watchdog report had no earthquake damage.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

After a decade building trust, one wrong move (NYT)

By Alessandra Stanley
February 7, 2015
The New York Times

It is a "thing that you build slowly, over time," according to grandiloquent promos last fall that extolled Brian Williams's 10th anniversary as anchor of "NBC Nightly News." Over shots of Mr. Williams talking to soldiers and small children in war zones and disaster areas, the narrator, Michael Douglas, adds, "And what you build, if you work hard enough, if you respect it, is a powerful thing called trust."

It may take 10 years to earn it, but trust in news anchors can be shaken in less than 10 minutes.

And that's the hard lesson of Mr. Williams's brush with scandal for telling a tale — more than once — about being under fire in a helicopter in Iraq in 2003 that turned out not to be true. When a recent NBC News segment repeated the false version, veterans who witnessed the event complained on Facebook, and the military newspaper Stars and Stripes published an article about the fudged facts.

On the NBC evening newscast on Thursday, Mr. Williams looked a little subdued but said nothing more about the disputed event.

On Wednesday, he had apologized for what he described as a "bungled attempt by me to thank one special veteran and by extension our brave military men and women veterans everywhere."

What's interesting, of course, is why he twisted the facts in the first place.

Public figures have differing reasons for embellishing their bona fides, but it most often is in the service of compensating for a perceived inadequacy or vulnerability. And television is a double-edged enabler; the camera can aggrandize normal people, but it can also undo grandiosity.

Senator Richard Blumenthal of Connecticut stumbled during his 2010 campaign when The New York Times found a videotape of him telling a veterans group in 2008 that he had served in Vietnam. He hadn't. Mr. Blumenthal sought multiple deferments, and when he ran out of them in 1970, he won a coveted niche in the Marine Reserve in Washington.

Mr. Blumenthal did serve in the military at the time of the Vietnam War, but he led people to believe he had been in harm's way.

Hillary Rodham Clinton made a similar gaffe during her bid for the Democratic presidential nomination in 2008. She described having dashed across the tarmac to dodge sniper fire during a 1996 visit to Bosnia when she was first lady. Video of the event quickly surfaced that showed Mrs. Clinton and her daughter, Chelsea, calmly and safely shaking hands with local dignitaries. Mrs. Clinton had to admit she misspoke.

Mrs. Clinton at the time was running on her experience and knowledge of the world. Bosnia wasn't a safe place to be in 1996. It's just that the airport tarmac on that day wasn't nearly as dangerous as Mrs. Clinton preferred to remember it.

Mr. Williams has been NBC's chief anchor for a decade, and the truth about television news is that the higher you rise, the less real reporting you do. Anchors mostly travel to war zones and disaster areas to show the flag and signal the story's magnitude; wars, disasters and presidential visits serve as backdrops. Anchors aren't there to ask questions and take notes; they are there to bolster network prestige and project their own journalistic derring-do, donning work shirts, flak jackets and helmets to look the part.

But they also take risks and experience fear and discomfort and far worse: The NBC reporter David Bloom died covering the Iraq war in 2003; in 2006, ABC's anchor, Bob Woodruff, suffered a brain injury and almost died in Iraq. Mr. Williams wasn't in the helicopter that took RPG fire — he was in a different one behind it. But he was in a front-line zone in 2003, and he and his crew were grounded for several days in a sandstorm.

His experience was not as perilous as he painted it to be, but it was certainly dangerous and scary. This was a year before he became the chief anchor, two years before he made his bones covering Hurricane Katrina, and Mr. Williams back then was still seen by many as a television star whose rise had more to do with his suave manner and good looks (he was one of GQ's men of the year in 2001) than hardship posts overseas.

War stories get more polished in the retelling, and the temptation to self-aggrandize is all the greater, and easier, for people who are puffed up by the camera lens and the cult of celebrity. By the time Mr. Williams told the story to David Letterman in 2013, he sounded like Sergeant York.

A public apology is just the first step, and Mr. Williams's mea culpa was not very humble. He made his fib sound like a one-time misguided effort to pay homage to veterans. This time Mr. Williams really is under fire: He must now endure days of media scrutiny, schadenfreude from his rivals and an overflow of social media scorn, snark and satire. He has been at the top of his field and the ratings for a decade, but time has shown that these kinds of disgraces linger, not so much forgotten as sometimes subsumed by the next celebrity misstep.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The weirdest thing about the scandal is that Mr. Williams didn't make a journalistic blunder — as, say, the former CBS anchor Dan Rather did in 2004 with a flawed "60 Minutes" report on President George W. Bush's service in the National Guard. (As a result, Mr. Rather was forced to step down as "CBS Evening News" anchor.) But these days, network newscasts are so personality-driven that the anchor's personal life — and in Mr. Williams's case, that includes his daughter's acting career — is flaunted on the air and treated like news. And by that equation, a personal failing looms almost as large as a professional one.

Those puffy NBC promos that promote Mr. Williams's "battle scars" and "integrity" don't help. As one of them puts it, "You can't see experience, but you know it when it's there."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Trust the dissidents, not the diplomats (WAPO)

By Natan Sharansky and David Keyes
February 7, 2015
The Washington Post

Recently leaders of the free world flocked to Saudi Arabia to meet with the new king , where they praised the country as a partner for peace and center of stability. But many dissidents disagreed. As Mansour Al-Hadj, a liberal activist who lived in Saudi Arabia for 20 years, said: "Saudi Arabia is not stable. Deep down, people are not happy. Sooner or later, the winds of change will come to Saudi Arabia. The regime will fall."

If history is any judge, the world should bet on the dissidents, not the diplomats.

On Jan. 25, 2011, just two weeks before the fall of Hosni Mubarak in Egypt, then-U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton gave her assessment "that the Egyptian government is stable." That March, Clinton's successor, John F. Kerry, praised "good-faith" measures taken by Syria's Bashar al-Assad and predicted that his regime would change for the better "as it embraces a legitimate relationship with the United States and the West."

Clinton and Kerry were certainly not alone in assessing that these dictators were securely in power. Former Amnesty International USA executive director Larry Cox later said that "nobody that I know of predicted it, no experts, no pundits, no politicians saw the revolution coming."

After the Arab Spring, many of the same experts and policymakers who had insisted that the region was stable claimed that no one could have foreseen the uprisings. But this is untrue. A chorus of uniquely insightful individuals predicted exactly what would happen: the democratic dissidents who languished in prison cells in Tunisia, Libya, Syria and Egypt.

Witnesses to unimaginable injustice, these men and women felt viscerally that the dictators' days were limited. They were the soldiers on the front line of the historical drama about to unfold. The experts simply chose not to listen.

In 2006, for example, from the depths of his torture chamber, Syrian dissident Kamal Labwani — jailed for a decade under the Assad regime — predicted that without democratic change, Syria would end up in a situation "no less terrifying than what happened in Iraq, Lebanon and Somalia." He presaged the rise of radicalism, arguing that "the alternative to democracy is inevitably civil war and fundamentalism."

Likewise, in 2007, from his prison cell in Egypt, blogger Kareem Amer declared to the region's tyrants and authoritarians that their "attempts to shut our mouths and restrict our freedom" would eventually fail. "You should be very worried about us," he wrote. "Your days are numbered and your dark nights are approaching their end."

There were many such prophetic voices, dissidents who foresaw what would happen in their countries but whose warnings fell on deaf ears abroad. What did they know or understand that our experts and leaders did not? The answer is the power of inner freedom. Having crossed the line from living in fear to questioning and then actively fighting against their regimes, dissidents know how difficult it is to suppress the longing to live freely. As more of their fellow citizens cross this line, dissidents see how much additional energy the regime has to expend to keep its population in check. As Soviet dissident Andrei Amalrik observed, any system that has to spend all of its energy controlling the thoughts of its citizens must break down eventually.

Anyone who remembers the fall of the Soviet Union ought to understand the importance of listening to dissidents. Throughout the 1970s and '80s and until the last days of the Evil Empire, leading Western politicians and Sovietologists repeatedly diagnosed the regime as stable. In 1992, then-CIA Director Robert M. Gates admitted that it was not until 1989 that the intelligence agency began to think that the Soviet Union might collapse. Amalrik, by contrast, had predicted this years earlier, in his aptly titled 1969 book, "Will the Soviet Union Survive until 1984?" He, together with generations of Soviet dissidents led by Andrei Sakharov, paid a heavy price for explaining to the West that the regime's downfall was inevitable.

Those dissidents were admired, loved and even defended, but they were not listened to. Western experts, blinded by the power of Soviet weapons and the delusory self-confidence of Soviet parades and leaders, dismissed their predictions. Thus, when Mikhail Gorbachev began dismantling the Soviet system and the dissidents' prophecies came true, these same experts were caught by surprise.

Only a few decades later, the leaders of the free world have all but forgotten this lesson. If they had listened more closely to the Middle East's dissidents, they might have been better prepared for the 2011 revolutions. Perhaps they would have spent less money arming and funding dictators and more time supporting moderates in their quest for civil society and freedom.

To make matters worse, today we are witnessing a full-fledged return to the policy of supporting dictators. The White House has all but dropped the demand that Assad step down, hinting that he could be a partner in the fight against the Islamic State. U.S. and European diplomats are pursuing deals with the Iranian regime and regard Egypt's Gen. Abdel Fatah al-Sissi as a bulwark of stability. The new Saudi king has been touted as a robust ally.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

There may be tactical advantages to partnering with these regimes against the growing threat of fundamentalist terror. But we must not ignore the insights of dissidents who remind us that dictators are not our strategic allies and are certainly not guarantors of long-term stability.

The current propensity to neglect dissidents and prop up dictators guarantees that there will be many more surprises in the Middle East. When coups and revolutions once again upend the region, our experts will surely ask: "But who could have seen it coming?"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "S. Daniel Abraham Center for Middle East Peace" <info@centerpeace.org>
To: podesta@law.georgetown.edu
Date: 6/26/2015 12:31:43 AM
Subject: News Update - June 26, 2015

S. DANIEL ABRAHAM
CENTER FOR MIDDLE EAST PEACE

Israel and the Middle East News Update

Friday, June 26

Click here for a printer-friendly version.

Headlines:

- Netanyahu Sends Implicit Threat to Iran Ahead of Deadline
- PA Presents Claims of Israeli Crimes to ICC
- US Slams Palestinians' Israel War Crimes Suit
- US Congress Passes Anti-BDS Legislation, Key Trade Bill
- Israel Supporters to Rally in Geneva against UNHRC Report
- Jordanian Press Slam 'enemy' Israel for Protesting Terror Praise
- Economy Minister Dery Refuses to Use Authority on Gas Deal
- Hapoel Jerusalem won Israel's basketball championship

Commentary:

- Ha'aretz: "Why are Israelis so Afraid of a Culture War?" "
  - By Amos Oz
- Yedioth Ahronoth: "Being Right about Gaza War Report isn't enough"
  - By Giora Eiland

Ha'aretz

Netanyahu Sends Implicit Threat to Iran

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu hinted Thursday that Israel may attack Iran's nuclear facilities, even if Tehran and the powers nail down a historic deal to curtail Iran's nuclear program next week. "Whatever happens, Israel will always defend itself, and the Air Force plays a major role in this," Netanyahu said at a pilots' course graduation ceremony. U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry and Iranian Foreign Minister Mohammad Javad Zarif will head for Vienna on Friday to take part in a final phase of the talks aimed at sealing a comprehensive international agreement on Iran's nuclear program.

See also, "Nearly half of Israelis see Iran deal as existential threat" (Jerusalem Post)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Ynet News

PA Presents Claims of Israeli Crimes to ICC

The Palestinian Authority presented the International Criminal Court on Thursday with its first documents claiming Israeli crimes under international law in regards to settlement construction, Israel's policy in the Gaza Strip, and Palestinian prisoners in Israeli jails. While the information presented by PA representatives does not constitute an official complaint against Israel, the Palestinians hope that the documents will convince ICC Chief Prosecutor Fatou Bensouda to open an investigation against Israel. Foreign Minister Spokesperson responded to the step by the Palestinians saying, "This step is nothing more than provocation. We hope that the attorney won't fall for this trap."

Times of Israel

US Slams Palestinians' Israel War Crimes Suit

The White House on Thursday said efforts to have Israel charged with war crimes at the International Criminal Court were "counterproductive" and would be opposed by Washington. The United States has "made clear that we oppose actions against Israel at the ICC as counterproductive," National Security Council spokesman Alistair Baskey said after the Palestinians submitted their evidence in The Hague. The move comes just days after a separate investigation by the UN Human Rights Council accused both sides of committing possible war crimes in last summer's Gaza War. The council's report is also being studied by investigators at the ICC.

Ynet News

US Congress Passes Anti-BDS Legislation, Key Trade Bill

After weeks of political wrangling, President Barack Obama scored a key victory Wednesday with Congress passing legislation that allows him to swiftly negotiate a Pacific trade accord. Two amendments in the bill had also opposed the BDS campaign against Israel, particularly by European countries. The anti-BDS provisions require US negotiators to make the rejection of the BDS campaign a principal trade objective in negotiations with the European Union, making the incentive of free trade with the US a leverage against cooperation with the BDS campaign. It is the first legislation by the US Congress in four decades which pushed back against efforts to boycott Israel.

Jerusalem Post

Israel Supporters to Rally against UNHRC Report

Pro-Israel activists and human rights groups plan to rally in Geneva on Monday against the presentation of a UN Human Rights Council report that day, which charges that both Israel and armed Palestinian groups may have committed war crimes in Gaza last summer. The report was published earlier this week, but this coming Monday its coauthors, former New York Supreme Court judge Mary McGowan Davis and legal expert Doudou Diène of Senegal, plan to present the document to the UNHRC that is holding its 29th session in Geneva this month. Opponents of the report, including the State of Israel, are upset that it appears to equate the IDF with the Hamas terrorist group. They see it as one more biased report by the UNHRC against Israel.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Jerusalem Post

Jordanian Press Slam Israel for Protesting Terror

Jordanian journalists angrily rebuked Israel's "enemy embassy" in Amman on Thursday after the Israeli mission in the Hashemite kingdom protested the media's praise of Palestinian terrorist attacks. The row was triggered by a June 24 article in the daily newspaper Al-Dustur glorifying the Palestinian attacks which left one Israeli dead in the West Bank and another Border Police officer wounded by stabbing in Jerusalem's Old City. The Israeli embassy protested the article, deeming it "ugly and shameful...incitement to kill Israelis." Al-Dustur rejected the embassy's protestations, calling the Palestinian actions "martyrdom operations...[in] heroic defense of their land and rights." "Just as [Israel] rejects these operations, we reject the killing of unarmed innocents...in Palestine and their displacement from their land and the desecration of their holy places," the newspaper wrote.

Ha'aretz

Economy Minister Dery Refuses to Use Authority on Gas Deal

The security cabinet meeting on the government's pending deal with Israel's natural gas monopoly fell apart on Thursday after Economy Minister Arye Dery declared that he refuses to use his authority to bypass the Antitrust Authority on the matter. The ministers voted on approving the security and diplomatic justifications for the plan - and voted unanimously in favor. The next stage was supposed to have been a vote by the members of the security cabinet to authorize Economy Minister Arye Dery to sign off on invoking Section 52a of the Restrictive Trade Practices Law, which would allow the government to sidestep the Antitrust Authority. But Dery them shocked those present - and especially Netanyahu - and announced that he was not willing to sign and give up his authority.

See also, " Adelson encouraged Netanyahu to streamline Israel's gas regulations" (Ha'aretz)

Channel 2 News

Hapoel Jlm' won Israel's basketball championship

More than 70 years Jerusalem waited for this moment and now it finally happened: Yesterday, for the first time in its history, Hapoel Jerusalem won Israel's basketball championship. In order to win this championship, it had to defeat Hapoel Eilat twice. Jerusalem's Mayor Nir Barkat said in this regard that "This is a historic night, memorable for years to come."Hapoel Eilat caused a sensation last week after it defeated Maccabi Tel Aviv in the semi-finals 79-76, in the fifth match between the two. Following that game Maccabi Tel Aviv did not participate in the finals for the first time in 22 years.

Ha'aretz – June 26, 2015

Why are Israelis so Afraid of a Culture War?

A culture war creates a wonderful climate for the blossoming of culture, of creativity, of free thought. Societies in which there is no inkling of a culture war look more or less like North Korea.

By Amos Oz

If every creative work that can be used as a weapon by Jew haters deserves to be censored – or at least not be supported by public funds – the place to start is the Hebrew Bible. For example, that whole story about the prophet Nathan and King David has to go. Thousands of years ago, foreign media were already exploiting that narrative against us: "Look what those Jews say about themselves." And not just about themselves: about King David – David from whom the messiah is destined to spring; the prophet said of him that he committed a sin punishable by death. No less. That has to be yanked from the Bible. We can't raise our children on that. It deals a mortal blow to our legitimacy.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This week, I heard that a member of the Jerusalem Municipality is demanding that a play called "Ezekiel" be banned because it mentions the intifada and the Holocaust in the same breath. I haven't seen the play, I don't have an opinion on it. But if we deprive the play "Ezekiel" of public funding, we have to stop teaching the Book of Ezekiel in our schools. The prophet Ezekiel says terrible things about the people of Israel, verging almost on pornography. He calls the people of Israel a "harlot" that spread its legs for "every one that passed by" – and even more disgusting things. Utterances like that cause tremendous damage to our image internationally. Every anti-Semite will delight in quoting them.

If it's necessary to ban every work of art that portrays a murderer – and even portrays him with a measure of sympathy – then Euripides must be banned because of "Medea"; Shakespeare has to be dumped because of "Hamlet," "Macbeth" and "Julius Caesar," all plays that revolve around regicide; Dostoyevsky is out because of "Crime and Punishment," and so forth.

Is it permitted to stage a play about a Palestinian murderer in the Israeli theater? Or to screen a film about a Jewish assassin? Of course it is. What is not permitted? If a court determines that a work incites to violence, it must not be staged. If a court determines that a work is libelous, it must not be staged. A court of law – not ministers and not deputy ministers.

I haven't seen the documentary ["Beyond the Fear"] about the person who assassinated Yitzhak Rabin. If the film incites to murder or encourages murder, it must not be screened. But if it tries to penetrate to the depths of the assassin's mind, it's in the company of Shakespeare and Dostoyevsky. Possibly it's not superb like Shakespeare, but why disqualify it if it does not incite to violence?

Another question: Should such works be supported by public budgets and taxpayers' funds? That is definitely a legitimate question. In an ideal world, every work of value would merit the support of taxpayers' funds. But not even the most enlightened and most culture-loving government in the world is capable of supporting every deserving work. Public funds should not necessarily be used to support a play about the murderer of [IDF soldier] Moshe Tamam or the assassin of Yitzhak Rabin. But the criterion should not be whether the work is infuriating or outrageous. The criterion needs to be whether the work possesses artistic value or not. That decision must be taken by a public, professional committee, which will undoubtedly err many times and will certainly be controversial.

If what the committee decides is unreasonable in the extreme, it is always possible to go to court and appeal its decision. If that, too, does not help, if public committees are going to be appointed here whose members are one-sided or extremist censors, then a far-reaching step must be considered: to shut down the life of art in Israel. That will generate huge international resonance. It will not be a problem of the minister; it will be a problem of the State of Israel, whose image in the enlightened world is not so wonderful even without a general strike by most of its creative artists.

Some say: "But certain works offend the public's sensibilities." The truth is, almost every artistic work of value offends the public's sensibilities in one way or another. One of the things a good book does is to jolt the reader's sensibilities. In what way? That differs from book to book and from reader to reader. Marvelous wine songs are liable to offend the sensibilities of some Muslims. Charming songs of passion are liable to offend the sensibilities of some Jews and Christians. The prophet Amos seriously offends the sensibilities of the rich, the sensibilities of the rulers and also a few neighboring peoples. It is perhaps extremely desirable to jolt public sensibilities as well as individual sensibilities from time to time.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Are we on the brink of a culture war? I say: if only. There is nothing wrong with a culture war, as long as it is not violent. On the contrary: a culture war gets the creative juices flowing. The great civilizations in history sprang from internal strife and internal tensions. In fact, we have been caught up in a culture war since the onset of Zionism, and long before that: Since the days of the prophets, since the period of the Houses of Shammai and Hillel, Hasidim and Mitnagdim, Zionists and Bundists, Hebrew and Yiddish and Ladino. All of those were welcome culture wars. A culture war is still underway between Zionists and the ultra-Orthodox. What's bad about that? Indeed, it's better for culture wars to be fought with exchanges of candor and not of slander.

As long as people are not being beaten in the streets, stabbed with knives or shot at – and if possible also not being slandered – why should we be afraid of a culture war? A culture war creates a wonderful climate for the blossoming of culture, of creativity, of free thought. Societies in which there is no inkling of a culture war look more or less like North Korea.

The whole culture of Israel since the great argument at Sodom – when Abraham assails God with the shocking words, "Shall not the Judge of all the earth do justly?" – the whole of our culture, at least in good times, has been a culture of dispute and a fierce clash between different interpretations, different values and different worldviews. Shelo yigamer le'olam – may it never end.

Yedioth Ahronoth – June 26, 2015

Being Right about Gaza War Report isn't enough

Instead of reiterating UN report is biased and political and anti-Semitic, Israel should attack its fundamental weaknesses; it's a shallow and unprofessional report, and that's not hard to prove.

By Giora Eiland

Israel is rightfully slamming the conclusions of the United Nations commission of inquiry into Operation Protective Edge, but being right is not enough. We must also act more wisely.

Our resentment over the fact that the UN is treating us, a civilized country, with the same standards that it treats a terror organization like Hamas is understandable. But getting insulted in this case is the wrong approach. The right thing to do is to actually demand equal standards.

Gaza has been a de facto state for a long time now. It has all the characteristics of a state: A defined area, a central government, an independent foreign policy, and of course an army. The world understands that terror organizations like al-Qaeda, the Islamic States and others have poor norms. If they treat Hamas as a terror organization, they will not expect it to talk and will not put any pressure on it. It would be better if they treat Gaza as a state and demand the responsibility of a state from it.

The analogy between Israel and Hamas is a desirable thing which will actually emphasize our standards as a law-abiding state compared to the state of Gaza, where the government executes dozens of people on the streets without a trial.

The counter report prepared and published by the State of Israel does not contribute a thing and only creates damage. Naturally, it is filled with praise for ourselves, and is therefore not seen as credible by the world, even if the facts contained it in are true.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

We should have (and we should still) wait for the official report expected to be published by senior generals from European countries, the United States and Australia, who visited Israel recently and investigated Protective Edge themselves. As opposed to the rumors, they have yet to publish anything official. It's always better to "let another person praise you, and not your own mouth."

Instead of reiterating that the UN report is political and biased and anti-Semitic, we should attack its fundamental weaknesses. It is a shallow and unprofessional report, and that is not hard to prove. It says, for example, that Israel used excessive force, or that many civilians were killed. The necessary question is: "Exaggerated" or "many" compared to what?

The report's authors, like the authors of the Goldstone Report before them, did not bother checking operations conducted by other countries in population-saturated areas. The average ratio between civilian casualties and fighters in the allies' operations in Iraq was about 1:5 (five times more civilians). In Protective Edge the ratio was about 1:1. Any professional and objective source should have praised Israel.

The report's authors settled for describing the results (casualties, building destruction, etc) and completely ignored a number of parameters which can explain the results). The first parameter is the circumstances and conditions (including the population size, density, etc).

The second is the enemy's power. Clearly, the stronger the enemy – more fighters, more anti-tank weapons and more rockets, alongside a network of offensive and terror tunnels – the stronger the force that has to be used in order to achieve the desirable result. In such a case, there will necessarily be more casualties and destruction. Any professional comparison aimed at examining whether excessive or proportional force was used must therefore consider the enemy's strength in order to receive normalized results (in other words, "comparing apples to apples"). That wasn't done.

The third parameter is the enemy's code of conduct. When the enemy intentionally operates out of schools and hospitals, when it uses its citizens as a human shield and prevents them from abandoning threatened places, the result is more dead civilians.

The report's authors ignored any professional military standard which allows a comparison between Operation Protective Edge to other events, and wrote conclusions which are based on nothing.

We prefer to use explanations which mainly convince ourselves, that the UN Human Rights Council is an anti-Israel body. While that is true, it has to be the necessary conclusion following a professional refutation of the report's content, rather than the claim itself. This requires us to work vis-à-vis relatively objective elements, like the security establishment in Western countries or the American Congress. It's harder work, but it's necessary.

Major-General (res.) Giora Eiland is a former head of Israel's National Security Council.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

S. Daniel Abraham Center for Middle East Peace
633 Pennsylvania Ave. NW, 5th Floor, Washington, DC 20004
www.centerpeace.org

2015 S. Daniel Abraham Center for Middle East Peace, All rights reserved.
YOU ARE RECEIVING THIS EMAIL BECAUSE YOU SIGNED UP FOR OUR NEWS UPDATES.

unsubscribe from this list update subscription preferences

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Stephen Hadley" <stephenjhadley@me.com>
To:	"Autumn A Brewington" <autumn.brewington@washpost.com> "Autumn Brewington" <BrewingtonA@washpost.com>
Date:	1/14/2014 6:26:33 AM
Subject:	Re: An Op Ed on Afghanistan if you want it

Autumn --

Very nice job, as usual. Just a few points of mine and then responses to your questions.

1. The Loya Jirga approved the deal in November, 2013.

2. Karzai's request was not for a "pledge" of non-interference in the election but actual non-interference -- and that was one reason he gave for waiting till after the election, to see whether the United States actually interfered or not. So I would go back to the original: "non-interference in the April presidential election that will determine Karzai's successor."

3. As to Obama's statement giving Karzai "a face-saving way out," I think the reader will not understand what we are saying if we don't follow with the original phrase "if he really wishes to sign the BSA."

4. On the paragraph on which Obama fixes the troop numbers, the introductory word should not be "Alternatively" but "Secondly." This is all one statement, given at one time. This is the second point Obama must make in the speech. For we won't know for some time after the speech is given whether Obama's statements in the prior paragraph are enough to move Karzai to sign the BSA. And even if he signs it, Obama will still need to announce the troop number in this statement since the number is NOT in the BSA. So "Secondly" was right.

5. The results of the poll on public support for the U.S. operations in Afghanistan and for leaving a residual force was published in your paper. I am forwarding the site (which Aysha found) to you separately.

6. In the second to last paragraph, it's not just that the zero option would "threaten the safety of the presidential election" but would "threaten the outcome" (as I original wrote) in many ways: as you suggest, threaten the safety, but if the zero option did collapse the Afghan security forces, the election might not even be held -- or the turn out (especially in Sunni areas) would be so low that the outcome would have no legitimacy. This is why "threaten the outcome" seemed the right term.

Let me know if there is anything else you need from us.

And please confirm that you received these comments.

Thanks again for your great work on this piece.

Steve

Stephen J. Hadley
(202) 220-5061

> On Jan 14, 2014, at 12:07 PM, "Brewington, Autumn A" <autumn.brewington@washpost.com> wrote:
>
> Thanks so much for your patience, and I apologize for the delay. Can you let me know, please, how this looks?
>
> Best regards,

> Autumn
>
> U.S. officials are struggling again with Afghan President Hamid Karzai. After painful and prolonged negotiations, they concluded a draft bilateral security agreement last year that lays the foundation for leaving U.S military forces in Afghanistan after 2014. It is expected to involve 8,000 to 10,000 U.S. troops with counterterrorism, training and other responsibilities in support of Afghan forces.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

>
> Most U.S. experts on Afghanistan believe that such a residual force is critical if Afghan forces are to continue to professionalize. Only with such help will they have a reasonable chance of containing the Taliban and giving Afghan authorities the space to negotiate a political settlement that includes the Taliban. Some NATO forces would also remain, but only if U.S. troops stay.
>
> Most experts also believe that without such residual forces, the billions of dollars in financial support promised for Afghan security forces and for Afghanistan's economic development will not materialize. Few believe that any Afghan government would survive long without this assistance. So the stakes are high — for Afghanistan and for preserving the investment of lives and treasure that the United States and its coalition allies have made over the past 12 years.
>
> Initially Karzai said he would sign the agreement after a loya jirga, or traditional congregation of Afghan leaders, approved the pact. The loya jirga approved the deal in XXX, but Karzai soon demanded further concessions: an end to counterterrorism raids into Afghan homes at night, active U.S. support for the peace process with the Taliban, and a pledge of? non-interference in the April presidential election that will determine Karzai's successor. Lately he has threatened to leave the matter to his successor.
>
> U.S. officials have responded by pressuring Karzai directly and indirectly. They have set a succession of deadlines and said the agreement must be signed in "weeks, not months." So far, nothing has worked. U.S. officials need an alternative approach.
>
> One option would be for President Obama to make a public statement praising Afghanistan's progress in assuming responsibility for its security; improving the education, health and well-being of its citizens; and preparing for the April election. To support that progress, Obama would say, he has directed U.S. forces to curtail all but essential night raids. He is committed to facilitating the peace process, he would note, and pledges full support for an election free from all outside influences.
>
> These statements would not represent a major U.S. policy change, but together they would offer Karzai a face-saving out.
>
> Alternatively, Obama could announce the number of troops that he is prepared to leave in Afghanistan post-2014 and direct the Pentagon to develop plans on that basis. He would call on our NATO allies to announce similar force commitments.
>
> This step would go a long way toward reassuring Afghan presidential candidates, and the Afghan people, of America's post-2014 presence. The lack of such reassurance has become a source of serious instability, threatening the election and the morale of Afghan security forces. For similar reasons, Obama should at this point resist any pressure to set a date for the termination of the post-2014 U.S. deployment.
>
> Third, Obama could state that while he is willing to sign the bilateral security agreement with Karzai he is also willing to sign it with the next Afghan president. U.S. officials should then stop pressuring Karzai — or anyone else — for a signature before the April election. Such pressure only strengthens Karzai's hand, encourages further delay and makes the United States look desperate.
>
> Obama should make clear that his commitment of troops is dependent, ultimately, on the bilateral security agreement being signed. But a post-election signing by a new Afghan president would give more than enough time to complete the necessary U.S. military planning before year's end. Indeed, experts say that even without the deal, U.S. forces could remain in Afghanistan after 2014 under the existing status-of-forces agreement, though our allies would have to negotiate a new agreement for their forces with the new Afghan government.
>
> Recent polling suggests that more than 60 percent of Americans believe the Afghan war was not worth fighting. [DO YOU HAVE A LINK FOR THIS?] But the same poll also found that 55 percent support leaving some U.S. forces for training and "anti-insurgency" operations. And lawmakers' public statements suggest that a post-

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

2014 deployment would have bipartisan support in Congress.
>
> Obama should avoid any suggestion that he might embrace a “zero option” and leave no U.S. troops in Afghanistan after 2014. Almost every Afghan expert believes it would destabilize Afghanistan, threaten the safety of the presidential election and ultimately risk the collapse of Afghan security forces. This would profoundly affect U.S. security interests. Afghanistan would once again become a haven for terrorists — who, history shows, would ultimately attack U.S. interests and territory. Afghanistan would contribute to destabilizing a nuclear-armed Pakistan. And the Afghan people would forfeit all the progress they have made, with our help, in building a more tolerant, inclusive, secure and prosperous society.
>
> Afghanistan’s presidential election is less than three months away. U.S. policy must not be based on frustration with Karzai’s mercurial behavior but on ensuring the election of a legitimate successor to Karzai with whom the United States can sign a security agreement that is overwhelmingly in the interests of both countries.
>
> The writer was national security adviser in the George W. Bush administration.
>
>
>
>
> _____
> Autumn Brewington
> Op-Ed Page Editor
> Autumn.Brewington@washpost.com
> 202-334-5120
>
> _____
> From: Stephen Hadley <stephenjhadley@me.com>
> Sent: Tuesday, January 14, 2014 10:54 AM
> To: Brewington, Autumn A
> Cc: Aysha Chowdhry; Catherine Eng
> Subject: Re: An Op Ed on Afghanistan if you want it
>
> Autumn --
>
> Great. Standing by and will turn to it promptly.
>
> Steve
>
> Stephen J. Hadley
> (202) 220-5061
>
>> On Jan 14, 2014, at 10:30 AM, "Brewington, Autumn A" <autumn.brewington@washpost.com> wrote:
>>
>> I will have an edited draft back to you in the next hour; and thanks for e-mailing all of us. The e-mail was somehow delayed in getting to my inbox, so I'm glad Fred saw it right away.
>>
>> Cheers,
>>
>> Autumn
>>
>> _____
>> Autumn Brewington
>> Op-Ed Page Editor
>> Autumn.Brewington@washpost.com
>> 202-334-5120
>>
>> _____

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

>> From: Stephen Hadley <stephenjhadley@me.com>
>> Sent: Monday, January 13, 2014 10:37 PM
>> To: Hiatt, Fred; Hiatt, Fred; Diehl, Jackson K; Diehl, Jackson K; Brewington, Autumn A; Brewington, Autumn A
>> Cc: Aysha Chowdhry; Catherine Eng
>> Subject: An Op Ed on Afghanistan if you want it
>>
>> All --
>>
>> The purpose is to help the Administration out of the box on the signature of the BSA. The op ed reflects a lot of input from U.S. experts on the subject, some key Afghan leaders, and from some Administration officials. I believe that the Administration would find it helpful -- and this is a problem that certainly needs solving.
>>
>> Let me know what you think.
>>
>>
>> "U.S. officials are struggling again with Afghan President Hamid Karzai. After painful and prolonged negotiations, they reached agreement on a draft "bilateral security agreement" or BSA. The draft BSA lays the foundation for leaving U.S military forces in Afghanistan after the end of 2014. It is expected to involve 8,000 to 10,000 U.S. troops with counterterrorism, training, and other responsibilities in support of Afghan forces.
>>
>> Most U.S. Afghanistan experts believe such a residual force is critical if Afghan forces are to continue to improve and professionalize. Only with such help will they have a reasonable chance of containing the Taliban and giving Afghan authorities the space to negotiate an inclusive political settlement including the Taliban. Some of our NATO allies will also leave forces but only if we do.
>>
>> Most experts also believe that without such residual forces, the billions of dollars in financial support promised for the Afghan security forces and for Afghanistan's economic development simply will not materialize. Without this assistance, few believe any Afghan government can survive for very long. So the stakes are high -- for Afghanistan, and for preserving the investment of lives and treasure that the United States and its coalition allies have made over the last twelve years.
>>
>> Initially President Karzai said he would sign the BSA after its approval by a traditional convocation of Afghan leaders called a Loya Jirga. The BSA received overwhelming approval, But Karzai nonetheless declined to sign. He has required further concessions: an end to counterterrorism raids into Afghan homes at night, active U.S. support for the peace process with the Taliban, and non-interference in the April election to choose President Karzai's successor. Lately he has threatened not to sign at all and to leave it to his successor.
>>
>> U.S. officials have responded by pressuring President Karzai directly and indirectly and setting a succession of missed deadlines, most recently saying that the BSA must be signed in "weeks, not months." So far, nothing has worked. U.S. officials need an alternative approach.
>>
>> One option would be for President Obama to make a public statement along the following lines.
>>
>> First, he would praise Afghanistan's progress in assuming greater responsibility for its security, in improving the education, health, and well-being of its citizens, and in preparing for the upcoming Presidential election. He would state that, to support that progress, he has directed U.S. forces to curtail all but essential night raids, he is committed to facilitating the peace process, and pledges full support for an April election free from all outside influences.
>>
>> These statements would not represent a major U.S. policy change, but together they would offer President Karzai a face saver if in fact he wishes to sign the BSA.
>>
>> Second, President Obama would announce the specific number of troops that he is prepared to leave in Afghanistan post-2014 and direct the Pentagon to develop plans on that basis. He would call on our NATO allies to announce similar force commitments.
>>
>> This step would go a long way to reassuring the candidates for the Afghan Presidency and the Afghan people of America's post-2014 presence. The lack of such reassurance has become a source of serious instability, threatening the success of the Afghan election and the morale of the Afghan security forces. For similar reasons, President Obama should resist any pressure to set at this point a date for the termination of the U.S. post-2014 deployment.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

>>
>> Third, President Obama would state that while he is willing to sign the BSA with President Karzai, he is also willing to sign it post-April with a new Afghan President. U.S. officials should then stop pressuring President Karzai -- or anyone else -- for a signature before the April election. Such pressure only strengthens President Karzai's hand, encourages further delay, and makes the United States look weak and desperate.
>>
>> President Obama should make clear in his statement that his troop commitment is dependent upon the ultimate signature of the BSA. But a post-election April or May signing by a new Afghan president would give more than enough time to complete the necessary U.S. military planning before the end of the year. Indeed, informed experts say that even without the BSA, U.S. forces could remain in Afghanistan after 2014 under the existing Status of Forces Agreement (SOFA) (although our allies would have to negotiate a new SOFA for their forces with the new Afghan government).
>>
>> Recent polling suggests that over 60% of the American people believe the Afghan war was not worth fighting. But the same poll suggests that 55% support leaving some U.S. forces for training and "anti-insurgency" operations. And public statements by members suggest that a post-2014 deployment would have bipartisan Congressional support.
>>
>> President Obama should avoid any suggestion that he might embrace a "zero option" and leave no U.S. troops post-2014. Almost every Afghan expert believes it would destabilize Afghanistan, place the Presidential election in doubt, and ultimately risk the collapse of the Afghan security forces. It would profoundly affect U.S. security interests. Afghanistan would become once again a safe haven for terrorists -- who, history shows, would ultimately attack U.S. interests and territory. Afghanistan would contribute to destabilizing a nuclear-armed Pakistan. And the Afghan people would forfeit all the progress they have made (with our help) in building a more tolerant, inclusive, secure, and prosperous society.
>>
>> There are less than three months to go before elections to replace President Karzai. U.S. policy must not be based on frustration with Karzai's mercurial behavior. It must be based on ensuring the election of a legitimate successor to President Karzai with whom the United States can sign a BSA that is overwhelmingly in the interests of both countries."
>>
>>
>> All -- That's it. May be a little long for you but Autumn has shown great skill in helping to shrink my stuff without losing the substance. And I will help. At the same time, the subject is important enough to warrant an extended treatment.
>>
>> Thank you for your consideration.
>>
>> Steve
>>
>>
>>
>> Stephen J. Hadley
>> (202) 431-9797

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Burns Strider" <burns.strider@americanbridge.org>
To:	CTRFriendsFamily <CTRFriendsFamily@americanbridge.org>
Date:	10/28/2014 1:17:17 AM
Subject:	Correct The Record Tuesday October 28, 2014 Morning Roundup

Correct The Record Tuesday October 28, 2014 Morning Roundup:

Headlines:

National Memo opinion: Joe Conason: "Stop Hillary? Not With These Mistakes (Or The Wisdom Of Dick Morris)"

"Assuming that Hillary Clinton indeed runs for president, I expect to write and say more as the 2016 campaign unfolds. For now, however, my friend and co-author Gene Lyons and I believe it is worth correcting the flagrant errors and misrepresentations set down by Doug Henwood, author of the Harper's article."

New Republic: "The GOP's Obsession With Hillary Clinton's Latest 'Gaffe' Is Great News for Hillary"

"They [Republicans] haven't considered the possibility that voters will instead hear Clinton's 15 words ['Don't let anybody tell you that, you know, it's corporations and businesses that create jobs…'] and think she makes a decent point."

U.S. News & World Report opinion: Matthew Dickinson: "She Didn't Fumble That"

[Subtitle:] "Hillary Clinton's comment about corporations and jobs isn't a gaffe and might help her."

BuzzFeed: "Hillary Clinton Corrects Fumbled 'Jobs' Line"

"At the Maloney event in a club in Westchester County, Clinton cleaned up the stumble toward the middle of her 20-minute speech for Maloney, praising businesses that are 'showing what it means to be responsible corporate citizens.'"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Media Matters For America: "Right-Wing Media Praise Failed Theory Of Trickle-Down Economics Myth To Condemn Hillary Clinton"

"Conservative media praised the failed theory of trickle-down economics in response to Hillary Clinton's remark that the middle class, not tax cuts for corporations, spurs economic growth, a position backed by economists."

Media Matters For America: "Media Forget Context In Effort To Scandalize Hillary Clinton's Assessment Of Trickle-Down Economics"

"Mainstream media figures, following in the footsteps of conservative media, are trying to manufacture a scandal out of former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton's recent argument against trickle-down economics by stripping her comments of context to falsely cast them as a controversial gaffe or a flip-flop on previous statements about trade."

Politico: "Hillary Clinton tries to clarify jobs comment"

"Hillary Clinton on Monday mopped up her botched statement from a rally in Massachusetts last week, making it clear she'd misspoken and hadn't intended to deliver a fresh economic policy message."

Bloomberg: "Clinton: 'Trickle-Down Economics Has Failed'"

[Subtitle:] "Her remarks boil down to one message: She's for the little guy."

New York Times blog: DealBook: "Hillary Clinton's Comment About Corporations and Job Creation Raises Wall St.'s Eyebrows"

"'Our economy grows when businesses and entrepreneurs create good-paying jobs here in an America where workers and families are empowered to build from the bottom up and the middle out — not when we hand out tax breaks for corporations that outsource jobs or stash their profits overseas,' she said."

Defense News opinion: retired Adm. Stuart Platt: "Climate Change Increases Instability for All"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“And so when Clinton says climate change is ‘the most consequential, urgent, sweeping collection of challenges’ facing us today, she does so with the knowledge that it feeds into other serious global issues.”

Associated Press: “Bill Clinton Stumps for Colorado Democrats”

“[Pres.] Clinton talked about the improving economy and said conservatives see the midterm elections as a change to revive ‘trickle-down economics.’”

BuzzFeed: “Back To The ’90s: Hillary Clinton Campaigns With ‘Clinton Democrat’”

“This month on the campaign trail, where she has tweaked and honed a stump speech at rallies across about a dozen states, Clinton has found a window into the debate over economic inequality through issues like equal pay for women and a minimum-wage increase.”

Politico: “Reince Priebus: Hillary Clinton ‘not really good at politics’”

“Republican National Committee Chairman Reince Priebus says Hillary Clinton is ‘becoming sort of a caricature’ and that ‘she’s not really good at politics.’”

National Journal: “Republican 2016 Contenders Have Taken Positions on NSA Reform. Where Does Hillary Clinton Stand?”

“If Hillary Clinton has a position on the government's domestic spying, she's doing a good job of hiding it.”

CNN: “Hillary Clinton's 7 favorite midterm campaign lines”

“Like most politicians have some formula of commonly used phrases and lines of attack, the former secretary of state has started to shape a stump speech with similar expressions.”

New York Daily News column: Richard Cohen: “The old hands vs. the shaky newbies”

“For the Democrats, there’s no one more mainstream than Hillary Clinton, practically an incumbent. Warren is virtually Clinton’s opposite: a neophyte who has been in the Senate only since 2013 and has never run a company or state. We have learned — have we not? — that the presidency requires some executive experience.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Hill: “Warren vs. Clinton: Dems say 'Why not?'”

“The Democratic field in 2016 has more than enough room for two women competing to be the nation’s first female president, according to liberal activists.”

Mediaite: “Chris Matthews: Clinton-Warren 2016 Ticket Not ‘Smart’”

“Liberal Democrats looking to MSNBC’s Chris Matthews to keep hope alive that Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.) could still in some way be involved with the 2016 presidential election had it all squashed Monday.”

The Atlantic: “The Jeb Bush Effect”

[Subtitle:] “A presidential bid by the former Florida governor would complicate the party's case against Hillary Clinton.”

Salon: “Hillary Clinton’s populism problem: What her awkward campaign trail comments reveal about her biggest weakness”

[Subtitle:] “As the former secretary of state eyes a 2016 bid, she's struggling to come to terms with the new Democratic Party”

Articles:

National Memo opinion: Joe Conason: “Stop Hillary? Not With These Mistakes (Or The Wisdom Of Dick Morris)”

By Joe Conason

October 27, 2014, 11:15 a.m. EDT

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Expectations that Hillary Rodham Clinton will run for president in 2016 have, predictably enough, revived a variety of attacks promoted by her political adversaries over the past two decades – in particular, the story of the $50 million prosecutorial fiasco known as “Whitewater.” America Rising, the Republican opposition research SuperPAC, has announced already that it plans to inform voters about the “Clinton scandals” of the 1990s, just as the right-wing propaganda machine did then. And they’re already enjoying assistance from certain thinkers on the left who consider the former Secretary of State too moderate politically, notably in a current Harper’s magazine cover essay headlined “STOP HILLARY!”

Assuming that Hillary Clinton indeed runs for president, I expect to write and say more as the 2016 campaign unfolds. For now, however, my friend and co-author Gene Lyons and I believe it is worth correcting the flagrant errors and misrepresentations set down by Doug Henwood, author of the Harper’s article. (Clinton’s supporters have posted a painstaking rebuttal of Henwood’s dismissive assessment of her career in the U.S. Senate and the State Department.)

While conceding that Whitewater was never quite the “diabolical conspiracy” imagined by Republicans, Henwood insists “it was not nothing” (his emphasis). Yet he never says precisely what he thinks it was, except to imply that it demonstrates Hillary’s bad character and personal dishonesty. With that mindset, the actual history of the ill-fated real-estate investment eludes him again and again.

Henwood grudgingly acknowledges that the Whitewater investment undertaken by the Clintons with James McDougal — who later acquired a small savings-and-loan institution called Madison Guaranty — “seems to have” lost money for them. But while admitting that they were “never convicted of any criminal behavior,” he neglects to mention that they were never even indicted, and that the Resolution Trust Corporation’s three-volume report on Madison Guaranty Savings & Loan – written by a Republican lawyer who had previously been fired as United States Attorney by Bill Clinton — fully exonerated them both on all aspects of the probe.

Instead, he complains that McDougal hired the Rose Law Firm, where Hillary Clinton was a partner, to represent Madison Guaranty, which he says represented a “farcical round robin” of conflicts of interest, because she was the governor’s wife and the state government regulated the S&L industry. He also suggests that Madison Guaranty—not acquired by McDougal until five years after the Whitewater investment was made—financed the deal. But that’s simply wrong; the Clintons’ investment cost the bank nothing.

To heighten the alleged ethical conflict, Henwood adds that “the Clintons, of course, were also investors in McDougal’s schemes.” This too is categorically false. The Clintons had no other business ties with Jim McDougal whatsoever. The RTC report states unequivocally that “there is no basis to charge the Clintons with any kind of primary liability for fraud or intentional misconduct.”

Moreover, neither Hillary Clinton nor the state banking department did anything to protect Madison from regulatory authorities. Far from protecting McDougal, the RTC report found that “if anything, Arkansas regulators took a more aggressive position toward Madison Guaranty than the FHLBB [Federal Home Loan Bank Board].” The report also noted that in December 1987, Arkansas securities commissioner Beverly Bassett Schaffer (a Clinton appointee) had written the FSLIC (Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation) urging that it declare Madison Guaranty insolvent and shut the bank down at once. The Feds waited until 1989 to comply.

For all of Henwood’s dark imaginings, his research left him insufficiently aware of well-documented facts. Like many a conspiracy theorist before him, he makes much of the lost-and-found Rose Law Firm billing records, an old red herring.

Ominously, he writes that Hillary “claimed the Rose billing records for the Madison case, which were under multiple subpoenas, had disappeared. Then they suddenly reappeared, discovered by a personal assistant in a room in the residential quarters of the White House. When asked about this mysterious turn of events, Hillary responded as if she, too, were an injured party: 'I, like everyone else, would like to know the answer about how those documents showed up after all these years.' The records showed that far from having a trivial role in representing Madison, she had actually billed for sixty hours of work."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

What Henwood seems not to grasp is that the billing records found in the White House on January 5, 1996, were merely photocopies of computer printouts from the Rose Law Firm's data system. Independent counsel Kenneth Starr and the congressional committees that subpoenaed those records already had all of the same information. The independent counsel's hope seemed to be that Hillary Clinton's own printouts would somehow show alterations or inculpatory handwritten marginalia, but those suspicions proved unfounded.

The idea that she would hide those photocopies, only to "find" them at the beginning of her husband's re-election campaign, makes no sense at all — particularly in view of the fact that the documents vindicated her previous testimony in great detail.

Elsewhere Henwood makes a glancing reference to the Southern Development Bancorp, as if the Rose Law Firm's representation of that bank was another sinister fact that Hillary Clinton sought to conceal. What he doesn't mention is that Southern Bancorp began as a development initiative founded by the Winthrop Rockefeller Foundation and the state government under Bill Clinton. Hillary Clinton sat on its board, without compensation. Far from raking in illicit profits, the bank provides much-needed credit and financing for hundreds of worthwhile projects, from low-income housing, home repairs, farms, and small businesses to Boys & Girls clubs in neglected rural Arkansas. Its first CEO was the late Tom McRae, Bill Clinton's idealistic rival for the 1990 Arkansas Democratic gubernatorial nomination.

Finally, in a footnote, Henwood hints at guilt by association when he writes that the Clintons somehow "escaped" the "Whitewater morass," while others went to prison, notably James and Susan McDougal and Jim Guy Tucker, who succeeded Bill Clinton as governor. But again he gets the facts and timeline wrong.

Tucker was not, as Henwood writes, convicted of "Whitewater-related" charges. A longtime political rival, Tucker had no business ties to the Clintons whatsoever. Kenneth Starr prosecuted him on totally unrelated fraud charges, in the apparent hope that Tucker could provide damning testimony against the Clintons. But he could not and did not. With this kind of error, Henwood not only reveals his own ignorance but parrots the misinformation about Whitewater usually offered by Starr and his far-right defenders.

Jim McDougal went to prison for swindling the Clintons, among others, as the prosecutor who convicted the mentally ill banker pointed out in his closing argument. For her part, Susan McDougal was jailed for 18 months for refusing to provide false grand jury testimony against Bill Clinton at Starr's behest. In a subsequent criminal contempt trial, she testified in open court for several days, and was acquitted. Bill Clinton awarded her a presidential pardon a couple of years after the fact. (Clinton did not pardon Tucker, which many Arkansas observers thought small of him.)

In short, Henwood simply doesn't know what he's talking about (and his reliance on former Fox News personality Dick Morris for guidance is mindboggling). What's most disappointing is that a magazine of Harper's' reputation – which first exposed Whitewater as a political hoax – would provide a platform for his baseless speculations.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

New Republic: “The GOP's Obsession With Hillary Clinton's Latest ‘Gaffe’ Is Great News for Hillary”

By Brian Beutler

October 27, 2014

High on the long list of things Republicans decided not to change after the 2012 election—below opposition to immigration reform, but above the belief that Democrats buy elections by showering the poor with generous welfare benefits—is an abiding faith that the fundamental unit of politics is the decontextualized “gaffe.”

As a demonstration of that faith, Republicans are leaning heavily into 15 words Hillary Clinton uttered late last week while stumping for Martha Coakley in the Massachusetts gubernatorial race.

“Don't let anybody tell you that, you know, it's corporations and businesses that create jobs.” Throw in the context and it’s clear that Clinton was reciting a standard Democratic denunciation of the view that liberating the wealthy from taxes and regulations is the key to economic growth. "You know, that old theory, trickle-down economics,” she added. “That has been tried. That has failed. That has failed rather spectacularly.”

But shear off the surrounding language and you’re left with a game-changing soundbite that will propel a Republican into the White House two years from now.

Right?

I think the opposite is true. Republicans are no less obsessed with gaffes today than they were in October 2012. Just last week, Republicans were riding high on President Obama’s gaffetastic observation that Democrats in the Senate vote with him most of the time, and before that, his admission that the policies he supports are on the ballot in November. But what makes their obsession with this gaffe particularly revealing is that it’s substantively identical to a gaffe they seized upon two years ago, weeks before they went on to lose the election—to their great astonishment—by a pretty wide margin.

In 2012, Republicans made “you didn’t build that”—a decontextualized comment Obama made about the fact that the wealthy depend on and must contribute to the public space—the unifying theme of their party convention in Tampa, Florida. They were certain that it would cause, or at least contribute, to Obama’s demise. But in hindsight, many conservatives acknowledged that the GOP’s obsession with that gaffe revealed more damaging truths about the Republican Party than the gaffe itself said about Obama.

“One after another, [Republican businessowners] talked about the business they had built. But not a single—not a single—factory worker went out there,” Rick Santorum told activists at the Faith & Freedom Coalition conference last year. “Not a single janitor, waitress or person who worked in that company! We didn’t care about them. You know what? They built that company too! And we should have had them on that stage.”

After the election, conservative writer Ramesh Ponnuru lamented that “the Republican story about how societies prosper—not just the Romney story—dwelt on the heroic entrepreneur stifled by taxes and regulations: an important story with which most people do not identify. The ordinary person does not see himself as a great innovator." Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell aped this analysis when he admitted in a speech at the American Enterprise Institute that Republicans "have often lost sight of the fact that our average voter is not John Galt."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

None of the Republicans pushing the “corporations and businesses” line actually thinks Hillary Clinton meant to say that investment isn’t a component of economic growth, just as they know from their perches in congressional offices and at donor-dependent non-profits that the entrepreneur isn’t the solitary engine of job creation.

But it’s clear they all still believe that riling up business elites by selectively quoting Democrats is a key to political success. The fixation on this gaffe foreshadows another Republican presidential campaign centered on the preeminence of the entrepreneur, to the exclusion of the wage worker and the trade unionist and the unemployed. It suggests an unwavering faith that a majority of voters will support the other guy when they hear “don’t let anybody tell you that … it’s corporations and businesses that create jobs.” They haven’t considered the possibility that voters will instead hear Clinton’s 15 words and think she makes a decent point.

U.S. News & World Report opinion: Matthew Dickinson: “She Didn't Fumble That”

By Matthew Dickinson

October 27, 2014, 4:20 p.m. EDT

[Subtitle:] Hillary Clinton's comment about corporations and jobs isn't a gaffe and might help her.

With the midterms elections less than nine days away, it is easy to forget that there’s another national contest underway: the race for the presidency in 2016. While no politician has formally announced their presidential candidacy, a number of them are actively running in what political scientists call “the invisible primary” – the period before the nominating process formally begins, when potential candidates start to measure their likely support among party activists, including potential campaign donors. Candidates-to-be are particularly interested in gauging their potential support in those states like Iowa and New Hampshire that hold early nominating contests.

It is also a period when the media begin vetting the potential candidates. Because of their interest in creating the perception of a horse race, their initial coverage tends to be more critical of potential frontrunners. Not surprising, Hillary Clinton – who polls show outpacing her potential Democratic rivals by a large margin – has received unwanted attention for a series of media-labeled “wealth gaffes” she has made in recent months that purportedly show that because of her wealth she cannot related to “average” people. If initial media reports are to be believed, Clinton has just committed another wealth-related gaffe, this time as she was stumping for Massachusetts Democratic gubernatorial candidate Martha Coakley, who is in a tough race in that state against Republican Charles Baker. According to news reports, in her speech on Coakley’s behalf Clinton – while criticizing Republicans who support “trickle down” economics based on not raising the minimum wage, cutting taxes and reducing business regulations – added: “Don’t let anybody tell you that it’s corporations and businesses that create jobs. You know that old theory, trickle-down economics. That has been tried, that has failed. It has failed rather spectacularly. One of the things my husband says when people say, ‘What did you bring to Washington?’ He says, ‘I brought arithmetic.’”

Critics, initially primarily those writing on right-leaning blogs and columns, immediately pounced on Clinton’s remarks, likening it to Barack Obama’s widely publicized “you didn’t build that” comment in July 2012 that was immediately incorporated into attack ads on behalf of Republican presidential candidate Mitt Romney. Conservative columnist S.E. Cupp tweeted, “Hillary's ‘businesses don't create jobs’ quote is honestly inexplicable. Like, cannot be explained.” A Forbes columnist chimed in: “[T]his attitude shocked many people in the trenches, those pulling the economic wagon, those looking for work. The condescension in the way Clinton articulated it was noteworthy also…" As is often the case, the tempest on social media spilled over into the mainstream media. USA Today's Paul Singer predicted that "If the former secretary of State runs for president in 2016, as she is widely expected to do, there is no doubt Republicans will make hay out of this comment."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

These pundits are undoubtedly correct. Clinton's Republican opponents will almost certainly use these and other "gaffes" by her as part of a broader attempt to paint Clinton as a wealthy elitist who doesn't understand how the economy provides opportunity for the middle class. However, political scientists have found little evidence that candidate gaffes by themselves – even widely publicized ones such as Obama's "you didn't build that" or Romney's equally infamous "47 percent" comment – have a lasting impact on campaign dynamics or that they influence the eventual presidential vote. This is both because the gaffes tend to have a short-half life in public consciousness – if the public hears of them at all – and because their impact is dissipated in the ongoing give-and-take of a presidential campaign in which both sides are engaged in a continual effort to "win the issue moment." This makes it hard for any single gaffe to move public opinion as much as pundits covering these stories would have one believe. And, if gaffes in the heat of a campaign don't seem to matter, it is hard to believe that a misstatement from 2014 is going to have much staying power two years later.

But there is a more fundamental reason to doubt that Clinton's latest "misstatement" will have much lasting impact – it probably wasn't a gaffe in the first place. Instead, it is likely she knew exactly what she was saying, and how to say it. If so, her remarks provide an early clue to how Clinton might seek to frame her presidential candidacy in 2016. In her book "The Message Matters", political scientist Lynn Vavreck shows that presidential candidates generally run one of two types of campaign, which Vavreck labels "clarifying" and "insurgent." Clarifying campaigns typically focus on the economy, and do so in a way that advantages one's own candidacy while hurting their opponents'. That means incumbents take ownership of strong economic performances, while opponents will attack an incumbent's weak economic record. In 2012 both Obama and Romney ran versions of clarifying campaigns, with Obama asking for more time to continue healing the economic mess he inherited, while Romney argued that the president hadn't done nearly enough to mend the economy and should be replaced. Insurgent candidates, in contrast, try to shift the campaign dialogue to another issue that differentiates the candidates and on which the insurgent can count on favorable public support.

In Clinton's case, because she will run as the incumbent party's flag bearer, she will likely have to run a clarifying campaign that defends her party's economic record over the previous eight years. While she can't be sure of her opponent as yet, she does know that Democrats are generally viewed as stronger advocates for policies promoting economic "fairness" and government-based protection of the most economically vulnerable. It makes sense, then, as Clinton did in her speech, to try to link opposition to raising the minimum wage with "trickle down" economics. This is exactly the clarifying strategy pursued by Barack Obama in 2012, when he sought to portray Romney as a plutocrat whose free-market oriented economic policies would disadvantage the less wealthy in favor of the "one percent." Moreover, by staking out this more economically populist ideological ground, Clinton also presumably hopes to protect herself from a possible challenge within her own party on her left from someone like Massachusetts Sen. Elizabeth Warren or Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders, an independent who caucuses with Democrats and is considering running for the party's nomination.

It is understandable that pundits, particularly those on the right, would paint Clinton's recent remarks as the latest in a series of wealth-related misstatements she has made. But Clinton's strategy is to make sure the last gaffe is on them.

BuzzFeed: "Hillary Clinton Corrects Fumbled 'Jobs' Line"

By Ruby Cramer

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

October 27, 2014, 3:08 p.m. EDT

[Subtitle:] “I short-handed this point the other day.”

SOMERS, N.Y. — When Hillary Clinton fumbled a line at a rally last Friday — “Don’t let anybody tell you that corporations and businesses create jobs” — the comment caused a minor outrage among political observers. Republicans said she’d been pandering to liberals. Democrats wondered if she’d been trying too hard to channel Elizabeth Warren, the populist senator who also spoke at the event.

On Monday, Clinton went out of her way to correct the comment at a rally for Rep. Sean Patrick Maloney, the Democrat up for reelection in this Hudson Valley district.

Clinton said in her speech that corporations that outsource jobs or move profits overseas should not be granted tax breaks. The clarification made clear that the remark was a botched line — not new messaging from Clinton, who has honed a new stump speech during a series of rallies ahead the election next month.

“The Republican alternative is a discredited economic theory that will hurt middle class families,” Clinton said. “So-called trickle-down economics has failed.”

“I short-handed this point the other day, so let me be absolutely clear about what I’ve been saying for a couple of decades.”

“Our economy grows when businesses and entrepreneurs create good-paying jobs here in America and workers and families are empowered to build from the bottom up and the middle out — not when we hand out tax breaks for corporations that outsource jobs or stash their profits overseas.”

Clinton voted a number of times for tax cuts for businesses when she was a U.S. senator from New York. But a Clinton aide said on Monday afternoon that she has not supported the tax breaks when they benefit top earners.

At the event with Warren on Friday, a rally for Martha Coakley, the Democrat running for governor in Massachusetts, Clinton made her initial remark in the lead-up to her case against “trickle-down economics” — an argument she’s long made.

Her original line — that “corporations and businesses” don’t “create jobs” — doesn’t make much sense as a concept. An aide initially said on Friday that she’d meant to refer to “tax cuts” for corporations.

Clinton in particular has also more often been accused of being too friendly to corporations. But she didn’t clarify the remark in speeches at her next two public events: a rally for Mike Michaud, the Democrat running for governor in Maine, and one for Kay Hagan, the U.S. senator in North Carolina up for reelection.

At the Maloney event in a club in Westchester County, Clinton cleaned up the stumble toward the middle of her 20-minute speech for Maloney, praising businesses that are “showing what it means to be responsible corporate citizens.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“They’re paying workers a living wage instead of a poverty wage. They are investing in communities instead of hollowing them out. They are empowering workers instead of preventing them from organizing and joining unions to represent them.”

“But we still don’t have enough who are doing all of that,” Clinton said.

Asked about the “jobs” comment after the event, Clinton glanced at her press secretary, Nick Merrill, and said, “You can talk to Nick about that.”

Media Matters For America: “Right-Wing Media Praise Failed Theory Of Trickle-Down Economics Myth To Condemn Hillary Clinton”

By Craig Harrington & Olivia Marshall

October 27, 2014, 5:59 p.m. EDT

Conservative media praised the failed theory of trickle-down economics in response to Hillary Clinton's remark that the middle class, not tax cuts for corporations, spurs economic growth, a position backed by economists.

Hillary Clinton Warns Against Myth That Trickle-Down Economics Creates Jobs

Hillary Clinton Criticized Failed Theory Of Trickle-Down Economics At Martha Coakley Campaign Event. Hillary Clinton appeared at a campaign event for Massachusetts Democratic gubernatorial candidate Martha Coakley on October 24, where she pushed for a minimum wage increase and warned against the myth that businesses create jobs through trickle-down economics (emphasis added):

CLINTON: Don't let anybody tell you that raising the minimum wage will kill jobs. They always say that. I've been through this. My husband gave working families a raise in the 1990s. I voted to raise the minimum wage and guess what? Millions of jobs were created or paid better and more families were more secure. That's what we want to see here, and that's what we want to see across the country.

And don't let anybody tell you, that, you know, it's corporations and businesses that create jobs. You know, that old theory, trickle-down economics. That has been tried. That has failed. That has failed rather spectacularly.

One of the things my husband says, when people say, what did you bring to Washington? He says, well I brought arithmetic. And part of it was he demonstrated why trickle down should be consigned to the trash bin of history. More tax cuts for the top and for companies that ship jobs over seas while taxpayers and voters are stuck paying the freight just doesn't add up. Now that kind of thinking might win you an award for outsourcing excellence, but Massachusetts can do better than that. Martha understands it. She knows you have to create jobs from everyone working together and taking the advantages of this great state and putting them to work. [Associated Press, 10/24/14]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Right-Wing Media Hail Trickle-Down Economics, Lash Out At Clinton For "Stupid" Remarks

Washington Free Beacon: Clinton Will Likely Be Attacked "As Another Big Government Democrat" For Criticism Of Trickle-Down Economics. In an October 24 blog post, the Washington Free Beacon claimed that Clinton's criticism of trickle-down economic theory "will likely be used to attack her as another big government Democrat," writing that the soundbite could follow her into a "widely assumed presidential bid." [Washington Free Beacon, 10/24/14]

Rush Limbaugh: Belief That Trickle-Down Economics Doesn't Work Is "Genuinely Stupid." On the October 27 edition of his radio show, Rush Limbaugh declared that despite Clinton's remarks, trickle-down economics "works," and "if it weren't for trickle-down, [Bill Clinton] would not have had a roaring economy in the 1990s." Later in the show, Limbaugh claimed Clinton is part of a "marauding band aiming at every private sector business they can get their hands on." [Premiere Radio Networks, The Rush Limbaugh Show, 10/27/14 ,10/27/14]

Fox Business' Bartiromo: Trickle-Down Economics Works, "Business And Corporations Do In Fact Create Jobs." On the October 27 edition of Fox News' Fox & Friends, Fox Business host Maria Bartiromo claimed that trickle-down economic principles work because "business and corporations do, in fact, create jobs. That is where the job creation comes from." Bartiromo argued that Clinton was merely making a divisive "political statement." [Fox News, Fox & Friends, 10/27/14]

Fox Business Host: Clinton's "Outrageous" Criticism Of Trickle-Down Theory "Sound[s] Like The Mafia." On the October 27 edition of Fox News' America's Newsroom, Fox Business host Melissa Francis alleged that Clinton's criticism of the conservative economic theory sounded "like the mafia" before claiming that the remarks were "outrageous." [Fox News, America's Newsroom, 10/27/14]

Outnumbered* Hosts Deemed Clinton's Criticism Of Trickle-Down "Factually Incorrect" And "Stupid, Idiotic." The hosts of the October 27 edition of Outnumbered mocked and attacked Clinton for her condemnation of trickle-down economics. Co-host Sandra Smith said Clinton's comments were "barely worth a response," and "factually incorrect," while guest co-host Bo Dietl called Clinton a "disgrace." Co-host Jedediah Bila blasted Clinton's remark as a "dumb, stupid, idiotic statement." [Fox News, Outnumbered, 10/27/14]

Economists Back Clinton: Job Growth Tied To Economic Security Of Middle Class, Not Trickle-Down Economics

Nobel Prize Winning Economist: Middle Class Consumers Are The "True Job Creators." In The New York Times, Nobel Prize winning economist Joseph Stiglitz explained how middle class consumer spending has "historically driven our economic growth":

There are four major reasons inequality is squelching our recovery. The most immediate is that our middle class is too weak to support the consumer spending that has historically driven our economic growth. While the top 1 percent of income earners took home 93 percent of the growth in incomes in 2010, the households in the middle -- who are most likely to spend their incomes rather than save them and who are, in a sense, the true job creators -- have lower household incomes, adjusted for inflation, than they did in 1996. The growth in the decade before the crisis was unsustainable -- it was reliant on the bottom 80 percent consuming about 110 percent of their income. [The New York Times, 1/19/13]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Economist Heather Boushey: Consumer Demand Drives Economic Growth. In testimony before the Senate Committee on Health, Education, Labor, and Pensions, economist Heather Boushey pointed out that, "It is demand for goods and services, backed up by an ability to pay for them, which drives economic growth." Boushey noted that, "The hollowing out of our middle class limits our nation's capacity to grow unless firms can find new customers." [Center for American Progress, 5/12/11]

UC Berkeley Economist Robert Reich: "Businesses Don't Need More Financial Incentives." Robert Reich, professor at UC Berkeley and former Secretary of Labor, wrote that economically "the problem isn't on the supply side. It's on the demand side":

Can we get real for a moment? Businesses don't need more financial incentives. They're already sitting on a vast cash horde estimated to be upwards of $1.6 trillion. Besides, large and middle-sized companies are having no difficulty getting loans at bargain-basement rates, courtesy of the Fed.

In consequence, businesses are already spending as much as they can justify economically. Almost two-thirds of the measly growth in the economy so far this year has come from businesses rebuilding their inventories. But without more consumer spending, there's they won't spend more. A robust economy can't be built on inventory replacements.

The problem isn't on the supply side. It's on the demand side. Businesses are reluctant to spend more and create more jobs because there aren't enough consumers out there able and willing to buy what businesses have to sell.

The reason consumers aren't buying is because consumers' paychecks are dropping, adjusted for inflation. [Huffington Post, 6/9/11]

Media Matters For America: “Media Forget Context In Effort To Scandalize Hillary Clinton's Assessment Of Trickle-Down Economics”

By Ellie Sandmeyer

October 26, 2014, 3:41 p.m. EDT

Mainstream media figures, following in the footsteps of conservative media, are trying to manufacture a scandal out of former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton's recent argument against trickle-down economics by stripping her comments of context to falsely cast them as a controversial gaffe or a flip-flop on previous statements about trade.

Conservative media outlets rushed to vilify Clinton's stance after she pushed for a minimum wage increase and warned against the myth that businesses create jobs through trickle-down economics at an October 24 campaign event for Massachusetts gubernatorial candidate Martha Coakley (D). Breitbart.com complained, "Clinton told the crowd ... not to listen to anybody who says that 'businesses create jobs,'" conservative radio host Howie Carr said the comments showed Clinton's "true moonbat colors," while FoxNews.com promoted the

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Washington Free Beacon's accusation that she said "businesses and corporations are not the job creators of America."

Mainstream media soon jumped on the bandwagon.

CNN host John King presented Clinton's comments as a fumble "a little reminiscent there of Mitt Romney saying corporations are people, too," and USA Today called the comments "An odd moment from Hillary Clinton on the campaign trail Friday - and one she may regret." In an article egregiously headlined, "Hillary Clinton No Longer Believes That Companies Create Jobs," Bloomberg's Jonathan Allen stripped away any context from Clinton's words in order to accuse her of having "flip-flopped on whether companies create jobs," because she has previously discussed the need to keep American companies competitive abroad.

Taken in context, Clinton's comments are almost entirely unremarkable -- and certainly don't conflict with the philosophy that trade can contribute to job growth, as Allen suggests. The full transcript of her remarks shows she was making the established observation that minimum wage increases can boost a sluggish economy by generating demand, and that tax breaks for the rich don't necessarily move companies to create jobs:

CLINTON: “Don't let anybody tell you that raising the minimum wage will kill jobs. They always say that. I've been through this. My husband gave working families a raise in the 1990s. I voted to raise the minimum wage and guess what? Millions of jobs were created or paid better and more families were more secure. That's what we want to see here, and that's what we want to see across the country.

“And don't let anybody tell you, that, you know, it's corporations and businesses that create jobs. You know, that old theory, trickle-down economics. That has been tried. That has failed. That has failed rather spectacularly.

“One of the things my husband says, when people say, what did you bring to Washington? He says, well I brought arithmetic. And part of it was he demonstrated why trickle down should be consigned to the trash bin of history. More tax cuts for the top and for companies that ship jobs over seas while taxpayers and voters are stuck paying the freight just doesn't add up. Now that kind of thinking might win you an award for outsourcing excellence, but Massachusetts can do better than that. Martha understands it. She knows you have to create jobs from everyone working together and taking the advantages of this great state and putting them to work.”

Economic experts agree that job growth is tied to the economic security of the middle class.

U.S. economic growth has historically relied on consumer spending, and middle class consumers are "the true job creators," Nobel Prize winning economist Joseph Stiglitz points out. Right now, the U.S. economy is "demand-starved," as Economic Policy Institute's (EPI) Joshua Smith puts it. Steiglitz says that, of all the problems facing the U.S. economy, "The most immediate is that our middle class is too weak to support the consumer spending that has historically driven our economic growth."

In a testimony before the Senate Committee on Health, Education, Labor, and Pensions, Economist Heather Boushey noted that "It is demand for goods and services, backed up by an ability to pay for them, which drives economic growth" and "The hollowing out of our middle class limits our nation's capacity to grow unless firms can find new customers."

UC Berkeley economist Robert Reich agrees that the problem in the U.S. economy is demand. "Businesses are reluctant to spend more and create more jobs because there aren't enough consumers out there able and willing to buy what businesses have to sell," he writes, and places the blame on low paychecks and growing inequality:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"The reason consumers aren't buying is because consumers' paychecks are dropping... Consumers can't and won't buy more." He says the key to job growth is "reigniting demand" by "putting more money in consumers' pockets." From The Huffington Post:

“Can we get real for a moment? Businesses don't need more financial incentives. They're already sitting on a vast cash horde estimated to be upwards of $1.6 trillion. Besides, large and middle-sized companies are having no difficulty getting loans at bargain-basement rates, courtesy of the Fed.

“In consequence, businesses are already spending as much as they can justify economically. Almost two-thirds of the measly growth in the economy so far this year has come from businesses rebuilding their inventories. But without more consumer spending, there's they won't spend more. A robust economy can't be built on inventory replacements.

“The problem isn't on the supply side. It's on the demand side. Businesses are reluctant to spend more and create more jobs because there aren't enough consumers out there able and willing to buy what businesses have to sell.

“The reason consumers aren't buying is because consumers' paychecks are dropping, adjusted for inflation.”

Clinton's emphasis on the minimum wage is supported by economic experts as well. Reich says that raising the minimum wage is an effective way to generate the consumer demand that would spur job growth. It "would put money in the pockets of millions of low-wage workers who will spend it -- thereby giving working families and the overall economy a boost, and creating jobs." He also rejected critics' claims that giving low income-earners a raise hurts job growth: "When I was Labor Secretary in 1996 and we raised the minimum wage, business predicted millions of job losses; in fact, we had more job gains over the next four years than in any comparable period in American history."

EPI called the minimum wage a "critically important issue" that "would provide a modest stimulus to the entire economy, as increased wages would lead to increased consumer spending, which would contribute to GDP growth and modest employment gains" (emphasis added):

“The immediate benefits of a minimum-wage increase are in the boosted earnings of the lowest-paid workers, but its positive effects would far exceed this extra income. Recent research reveals that, despite skeptics' claims, raising the minimum wage does not cause job loss. In fact, throughout the nation, a minimum-wage increase under current labor market conditions would create jobs. Like unemployment insurance benefits or tax breaks for low- and middle-income workers, raising the minimum wage puts more money in the pockets of working families when they need it most, thereby augmenting their spending power. Economists generally recognize that low-wage workers are more likely than any other income group to spend any extra earnings immediately on previously unaffordable basic needs or services.

“Increasing the federal minimum wage to $10.10 by July 1, 2015, would give an additional $51.5 billion over the phase-in period to directly and indirectly affected workers, who would, in turn, spend those extra earnings. Indirectly affected workers--those earning close to, but still above, the proposed new minimum wage--would likely receive a boost in earnings due to the "spillover" effect (Shierholz 2009), giving them more to spend on necessities.

“This projected rise in consumer spending is critical to any recovery, especially when weak consumer demand is one of the most significant factors holding back new hiring (Izzo 2011). Though the stimulus from a minimum-wage increase is smaller than the boost created by, for example, unemployment insurance benefits, it has the crucial advantage of not imposing costs on the public sector.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The economic benefits of a minimum wage increase are widely accepted. Over 600 economists signed a recent letter supporting an increase, arguing, "Research suggests that a minimum-wage increase could have a small stimulative effect on the economy as low-wage workers spend their additional earnings, raising demand and job growth, and providing some help on the jobs front."

Politico: “Hillary Clinton tries to clarify jobs comment”

By Maggie Haberman

October 27, 2014, 1:15 p.m. EDT

Hillary Clinton on Monday mopped up her botched statement from a rally in Massachusetts last week, making it clear she’d misspoken and hadn’t intended to deliver a fresh economic policy message.

Clinton’s clean-up came as she campaigned with Rep. Sean Patrick Maloney in Somers, about 90 minutes north of New York City, after two days in which Republicans bandied the likely White House candidate’s Friday comment on social media and it began gaining broader attention.

“Don’t let anybody tell you that corporations and businesses create jobs,” Clinton had said at the rally in Boston, where she appeared on behalf of gubernatorial candidate Martha Coakley along with Democratic Sen. Elizabeth Warren, a populist, anti-Big Banks crusader who has become the wished-for candidate from some progressives for 2016.

A Clinton aide later said the former secretary of state had meant to talk about tax breaks in that sentence, which led into a line about how trickle-down economics had “failed spectacularly” – a sentiment she has long held. The overall context was clear that she had left words out of a sentence; the comment made little sense without it.

But some Democrats who back Clinton said privately she appeared to be trying too hard to capture the Warren rhetoric and adjust to the modern economic progressive language – much in the way President Barack Obama did during a campaign rally in 2012, when, discussing businesses relationships to the infrastructure of cities, he said, “You didn’t build that.”

In Somers on Monday, Clinton called for a raise in the minimum wage and said, “Look, I know the Republicans will tell you raising wages kill jobs except for wages at the very top, so trickle-down can create jobs.”

But she noted that when her husband was president the minimum wage was raised, and that she voted for its increase when she served as a senator from New York.

“We are supposed to be about upward mobility,” she said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Nan Hayworth, Maloney's rival, represents "a discredited economic theory that will hurt middle class families," Clinton said. "I shorthanded this point the other day so let me be absolutely clear on what [I've been saying for decades].

"Our economy grows when businesses and entrepreneurs create good-paying jobs here in America and workers and families are empowered to build from the bottom up. … Not when we hand out tax breaks for corporations that outsource jobs or stash their profits overseas."

Maloney, who talked extensively about getting his start in national politics by working on Bill Clinton's 1992 presidential run, is one of the only House candidates Hillary Clinton is individually helping with a public rally.

The event, at Heritage Hills, a housing complex, was attended primarily by senior citizens.

In addition to the mop-up, Clinton tried out a few new lines, describing Maloney as part of the ongoing bridge to the 21st Century.

He's part of "a new political mission to make our government work again for the people of the country that we love," said Clinton – another sentence that could end up as part of her own stump speech.

Bloomberg: "Clinton: 'Trickle-Down Economics Has Failed'"

By Jonathan Allen

October 27, 2014, 3:49 p.m. EDT

[Subtitle:] Her remarks boil down to one message: She's for the little guy.

Days after Republicans feasted on her claim that corporations don't create jobs, Hillary Clinton tried Monday to "be absolutely clear about what I've been saying for a couple of decades."

"So-called trickle-down economics has failed," Clinton said as she stumped for Representative Sean Patrick Maloney in New York. "Our economy grows when businesses and entrepreneurs create good-paying jobs here in an America where workers and families are empowered to build from the bottom up and the middle out–not when we hand out tax breaks for corporations that outsource jobs or stash their profits overseas."

While campaigning Friday for Massachusetts gubernatorial candidate Martha Coakley, Clinton created a stir–and drew criticism from Republicans–by saying, "Don't let anybody tell you that it's corporations and businesses that create jobs."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

She followed that with a line about President Ronald Reagan's pet economic concept: “You know that old theory, trickle-down economics. That has been tried, that has failed. It has failed rather spectacularly."

The cleaned-up message, though, hits at the same theme: Clinton's for the little guy.

She has been sounding more populist notes of late as a campaign-trail advocate for Democratic candidates who are on the ballot next week. That's an important turn as she contemplates a run for president in 2016 because Clinton's biggest weakness among Democrats, and some Republicans, is the perception that she's too close to Wall Street and corporate America. One Clinton confidant told Bloomberg Politics he'd rather have her make mistakes like Friday's than say she's for Wall Street banks.

And the more anti-corporate tone is pleasing to the ears of liberals who have pined for Senator Elizabeth Warren, a scourge of Wall Street banks, to challenge Clinton for the Democratic nomination. And, they say, it's a message Clinton can use against Republicans because many in the GOP have turned wary of Wall Street and big corporations since the 2008 financial crash.

"Warren's economic populist agenda offers a pathway to success for Democrats in 2014 and 2016 –if they choose to take it," said Adam Green, co-founder of the Progressive Change Campaign Committee. "Hillary Clinton may be realizing that Elizabeth Warren's economic populist positions are the path to electoral success in 2016–both in the primary and general election."

In the 2008 campaign, Clinton rolled out a $7 billion plan to create incentives, including tax breaks for corporations, to create jobs in the U.S. As a senator from New York, she supported targeted tax cuts or credits for a variety of industries and businesses.

New York Times blog: DealBook: “Hillary Clinton’s Comment About Corporations and Job Creation Raises Wall St.’s Eyebrows”

By Andrew Ross Sorkin

October 27, 2014, 9:33 p.m. EDT

“Hillary said what?”

That was the question whispered among some of Wall Street’s most prominent Democratic supporters over the weekend after Hillary Rodham Clinton spoke on the campaign trail for Martha Coakley, the Democratic candidate for governor of Massachusetts.

“Don’t let anybody tell you that it’s corporations and businesses that create jobs,” Mrs. Clinton said on Friday in Boston. “You know that old theory, trickle-down economics. That has been tried, that has failed. It has failed rather spectacularly. One of the things my husband says when people say, ‘What did you bring to Washington?’ He says, ‘I brought arithmetic.’ ”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It was the first part of the quotation that some on Wall Street focused on, comparing it to a phrase uttered by President Obama in 2012 — “If you’ve got a business, you didn’t build that” — that, similarly stripped of its context, provided Republicans with fodder to rally their base.

On Monday, Mrs. Clinton seemed to backpedal on her earlier comment, perhaps after some of her Wall Street supporters had telephoned.

She made her initial remarks at a rally on Friday, where Senator Elizabeth Warren of Massachusetts appeared as well. She also declared at the time, “I love watching Elizabeth give it to those who deserve to get it.”

Mrs. Clinton didn’t explicitly say who deserved to get it, but she appeared to be directing her ire at Ms. Warren’s favorite target, Wall Street banks. Within the world of finance, Mrs. Clinton has long been seen as a friend of Wall Street — or at least not an enemy. She has rarely engaged in the kind of vitriol that has made Senator Warren a hero of the progressive left. She has accepted $200,000 fees for speeches and has spoken at firms like Goldman Sachs and JPMorgan Chase. In some cases she has praised and defended firms like these.

Ms. Warren has criticized Mrs. Clinton in the past for being too cozy with Wall Street.

So Mrs. Clinton’s harsh words about the business world had tongues wagging, especially among some of her supporters who seemed nervous that someone perceived as a friend might be moving away from them.

Some on Wall Street had already noticed that Mrs. Clinton, while campaigning for Senator Al Franken of Minnesota last week, had singled out the financial industry. “Al has pushed for more and better oversight of the big banks and risky financial activity, and there’s more work for him to do,” she said. “There’s a lot of unfinished business to make sure we don’t end up once again with big banks taking big risks and leaving taxpayers holding the bag.”

The main question was whether Mrs. Clinton’s words were more about political maneuvering than reshaping her beliefs.

One senior banker, who has long supported Mrs. Clinton, said: “The reality is that she might have to tack left a little for the party. What I don’t know is whether she will stay there or double back.”

Another banker said of her comment: “I doubt she meant that.”

Ari Fleischer, a press secretary for President George W. Bush, took to Twitter: “Sometimes you have to wonder if Hillary really believes in anything, except appealing to whatever is current. Iraq war? Yes. Business? No.”

While Mrs. Clinton has yet to declare that she is running for president in 2016, she is widely seen as the presumptive Democratic nominee, and an army of Wall Street bankers has been angling for roles in her campaign in hopes of clinching spots in her administration. (Another set of bankers is cozying up to Jeb Bush in hopes that he runs on the Republican ticket.)

A series of right-leaning blogs trumpeted Mrs. Clinton’s comments over the weekend, seemingly as a way of highlighting the inconsistency in some of her positions.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

What Mrs. Clinton's supporters within the business world want to know is whether she plans to govern the way her husband did as a moderate, center-left president or whether she will be pressed to take more so-called progressive stances — code for anti-business within the business world — as the Democratic Party, in the wake of the financial crisis, appears to have shifted leftward since Mr. Clinton left office.

Mr. Clinton, whose Clinton Global Initiative and other ties to business have made him appear friendlier to the financial world, found himself offending some of the Democratic base when he appeared to sympathize with corporations seeking to reincorporate overseas to lower their tax rates in so-called inversion deals. "Like it or not, this inversion, this is their money," he said.

On Monday at a campaign rally in New York, Mrs. Clinton said she had misspoken.

"I shorthanded this point the other day, so let me be absolutely clear about what I've been saying for a couple of decades," Mrs. Clinton said.

"Our economy grows when businesses and entrepreneurs create good-paying jobs here in an America where workers and families are empowered to build from the bottom up and the middle out — not when we hand out tax breaks for corporations that outsource jobs or stash their profits overseas," she said.

Still, whatever position Mrs. Clinton takes on Wall Street, she will most likely face a continuing struggle to win over the most progressive members of her party: "The neo-liberal capture of the Democratic Party narrowed the range of policy alternatives available to American voters, and what excites voters about Warren is that she represents a break from that sordid history," Luke Brinker, deputy politics editor at Salon, wrote. "And Clinton's inextricable link with that history — not some clumsy campaign stump gaffe — is the real problem," he added.

That view takes for granted that it is not a good idea for a Democrat to be a friend of Wall Street. But certainly there is a place for a candidate at the crossroads of Wall Street and Main Street.

Defense News opinion: retired Adm. Stuart Platt: "Climate Change Increases Instability for All"

By retired Adm. Stuart Platt

October 27, 2014 1:24 p.m. EDT

Recently, former US Secretary of State Hillary Clinton spoke at Sen. Harry Reid's Clean Energy Summit in Nevada, where she announced that climate change is "the most consequential, urgent, sweeping collection of challenges" facing us today. She is right on point. It was a strong statement, in line with her past actions. But what many people might not know is that climate change isn't just an issue for environmentalists. It is also an important one for the armed forces and national security communities.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In March, the Pentagon published the latest quadrennial defense review, a standard-bearing report for military strategy, security threats and defense spending. It reads in part:

“The pressures caused by climate change will influence resource competition while placing additional burdens on economies, societies, and governance institutions around the world. These effects are threat multipliers that will aggravate stressors abroad such as poverty, environmental degradation, political instability, and social tensions — conditions that can enable terrorist activity and other forms of violence.”

In other words, climate change exacerbates global unrest and worsens conditions in already unstable countries. Specifically:

■ When droughts and severe storms damage crops, it puts stress on the global food supply in regions where there is already too little to go around.

■ When unexpected severe storms sweep through countries and destroy infrastructure, governments struggle to provide social services for their people.

■ When people have too few resources, they migrate across borders, leading to land disputes and ethnic or religious confrontations

■ When crops are the backbone of your economy, crop failures lead to trade disputes and economic struggles

Like many other complicated ills, climate change knows no barriers. The US is not immune, especially to potential flooding problems. A large portion of the American population lives in coastal areas.

In Virginia, for example, the mission readiness of Naval Base Norfolk could be threatened if major investments are not made to adapt to already rising sea levels. The Department of Defense has begun work on this, but if serious actions aren’t taken to curb CO2 emissions and mitigate the effects of climate change, we will be fighting a losing battle.

Some regions of the world are at higher risk for conflict than others. Syria is an unfortunate example. The country suffered an extreme and unusually long drought between 2006 and 2011. Three-fourths of farmers suffered total crop losses, and President Bashar al-Assad mismanaged water resources, ultimately displacing 1.5 million Syrians. Many believe that these circumstances, understood by scientists to be partially the result of climate change, contributed to the country’s civil war.

Military experts also are greatly concerned about the impending national security challenges beginning to present themselves as Arctic ice melts (not to mention how it’s contributing to sea level rise). The melting ice is opening up the polar region, creating new and uncharted operating areas for all the world’s navies and commercial vessels — not just for the US.

As shipping routes through the Arctic waters increase, we must be prepared to defend our interests. Greater access to the Arctic will require more US naval engagement in the region.

And no matter where a conflict occurs, we are often called upon to bring prompt relief to at-risk populations, because America is a global leader. It is a responsibility in which our brave men and women in uniform take pride.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In short, fighting climate change is about much more than warmer temperatures. It's about famine, borders, the economy and yes, terrorism. Fighting climate change is one of many critical components to stabilizing the rest of the world. Instability breeds conflicts.

This is why Clinton prioritized addressing climate change at the State Department. As secretary of state, she appointed a special envoy for climate change to serve as an adviser on international climate change policy. She also established the Bureau of Energy Resources, which addresses the threat of climate change posed by the world's energy consumption. These are both important steps for a healthier environment, but they're also steps towards a safer world.

And so when Clinton says climate change is "the most consequential, urgent, sweeping collection of challenges" facing us today, she does so with the knowledge that it feeds into other serious global issues. The military understands that it's not just about warmer temperatures. It's about America's basic national security.

Associated Press: "Bill Clinton Stumps for Colorado Democrats"

By Kristen Wyatt

October 27, 2014, 10:53 p.m. EDT

AURORA, Colo. (AP) -- Former President Bill Clinton urged Democrats to ignore polls showing their party is unlikely to retain control of the U.S. Senate, telling a suburban Denver crowd Monday to resist cynicism and redouble their efforts to get out the vote.

Clinton said midterm elections in a president's second term are dominated by appeals to vent frustration at the president by voting out others in his party. He accused Republicans of trying to get people to "just vote your fears and your anger."

Clinton talked up Democratic Sen. Mark Udall, who is locked in a tough re-election contest against Republican Rep. Cory Gardner.

Clinton said Republican Senate hopefuls are asking voters to give them a six-year job as a way of showing dislike for a president who will be gone in two. Gardner, who has a narrow lead on Udall in many recent polls, frequently criticizes Udall for how often he sides with President Barack Obama.

"It's a pretty slick deal," Clinton joked. "He wants to take Mark Udall off the ballot and put the president on the ballot."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Democrats have sent their biggest names in recent weeks to rally support for Udall. Just last week, former first lady and Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, and first lady Michelle Obama traveled to Colorado to campaign for Udall.

Colorado's race could decide whether Republicans or Democrats control the Senate.

"Control of the U.S. Senate hangs in the balance when it comes to this race right here," Udall told the crowd. "This race is going to be close right through Nov. 4."

Clinton also talked up Democratic Gov. John Hickenlooper, locked in a tough re-election battle of his own against Republican Bob Beauprez, and congressional hopeful Andrew Romanoff. Romanoff is trying to unseat three-term incumbent Republican Rep. Mike Coffman, who represents Aurora, just east of Denver.

Clinton talked about the improving economy and said conservatives see the midterm elections as a change to revive "trickle-down economics."

"I don't care what they tell you, that is what's going to be on the ballot," Clinton said.

BuzzFeed: “Back To The ’90s: Hillary Clinton Campaigns With ‘Clinton Democrat’”

By Ruby Cramer

October 27, 2014, 10:55 p.m. EDT

[Subtitle:] Campaigning for a former employee on Monday, Clinton smoothly folded ’90s themes into her fast-developing stump speech. A more comfortable atmosphere.

SOMERS, N.Y. — When Sean Patrick Maloney took the stage on Monday at a Westchester County rally with his old boss, Fleetwood Mac’s “Don’t Stop,” the theme song for Bill Clinton’s first presidential campaign, filled the banquet hall.

Don’t stop, thinking about tomorrow.

Don’t stop, it’ll soon be here.

When the crowd greeted him in Heritage Hills, a complex of condos in this mid-sized New York town, they raised signs that read, “Clinton Democrat for Congress.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And when Maloney, running for a second term in Congress, wrapped up his speech here, he invoked a string of legendary lines from that 1992 race. “I believe in a place called Hope,” Maloney said. “I believe in walking across that bridge to the 21st century. And we won’t stop thinking about tomorrow.”

By the time Maloney introduced his headliner, Hillary Clinton, he’d made the point clear enough: “I’ve said it before, and I’ll say it again. I’m a Clinton Democrat.”

Maloney, a former Clinton campaign staffer and senior White House aide, rallied the crowd in Somers with repeated references to the former first family and the distinct political brand they brought to the Democratic Party in the early ’90s.

The speech was a bit of a time-warp. But it also proved that the ideas behind the 1992 campaign, which Maloney outlined in his speech, could still translate more than two decades years later on the stump for him and Clinton both. Even as the former secretary and New York senator has moved toward embracing a more explicitly progressive message than the mix of centrism and populism that defined her husband’s first White House bid, she knitted together the speech she’s been using on the trail this month with a handful of themes from that first campaign.

Maloney, for example, closed his speech with language Bill Clinton took national in 1991 — the troika of “basic, enduring” values: “opportunity for all, responsibility from all, in a community of all.”

When she took the stage, Clinton came back to the line. “I loved what you said at the end,” she said during the 20-minute speech.

“When we crisscrossed our country in 1992, that’s exactly the message that Bill Clinton took forth: opportunity, responsibility, community. And just like Sean, I was blessed to have parents who worked hard and gave me the opportunities and expected the responsibilities in the community that I grew up in.”

Clinton added that she wanted to make sure her “precious granddaughter, Charlotte,” who was born late last month, would enjoy those same rights, too.

During his speech, Maloney recalled his move to Arkansas in early 1992 to work for Hillary Clinton on the campaign. He packed everything he owned into his pick-up truck — “Everything,” he stressed. “I didn’t have any future” — and drove the 1,300 miles to Little Rock, where he set up his mattress on the floor of another aide, Susan Thomases. “I was part of what they called Hillaryland.”

The Clintons, Maloney said, “spoke about a dream of a prosperous America where the middle class would do well, where the middle class would thrive.”

“And folks, they made that dream a reality.”

Clinton said she remembered meeting Maloney in New Hampshire one night in 1992. He joined the campaign, she said, because he believed, “as Bill and I did, that we needed changes in America and we needed to be putting people first.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“I’m proud of how hard Sean has worked since then — in the White House, in other important positions, now in the Congress — to continuing that idea.”

This month on the campaign trail, where she has tweaked and honed a stump speech at rallies across about a dozen states, Clinton has found a window into the debate over economic inequality through issues like equal pay for women and a minimum-wage increase. And she has more consciously embraced some of the populist language associated with Sen. Elizabeth Warren, a progressive figurehead.

That appeared to go awry last Friday when Clinton fumbled a line saying that “corporations and businesses” don’t create jobs. She clarified during her speech in Somers that she had “short-handed” the point. Corporations that “outsource jobs or stash their profits overseas” shouldn’t be handed tax breaks, she said.

On Monday, Clinton’s economic arguments seemed much more natural, framed through the lens of middle-class families. She also returned to a familiar line about “trickle-down economics,” a theory she and her husband have long denounced. He first campaigned against the idea in 1992.

“The Republican alternative is a discredited economic theory that will hurt middle-class families.” Maloney, Clinton added, “stands for equality, equality of opportunity.”

“We are supposed to be about upward mobility. If you work hard and do your part, you and your family are supposed to be able to have a better life.”

Maloney, one of the few openly gay members of Congress, is in a competitive race against Nan Hayworth, the Republican he beat two years ago to win his seat in New York’s 18th district.

About 150 people, many elderly residents of the housing complex, packed the event at the restaurant hall in Heritage Hills. (Attendees couldn’t leave until Clinton had vacated the venue, and two people passed out waiting for her departure, according to a security officer staffing the event.)

Clinton is scheduled to continue her tour on behalf of Democrats on Wednesday, with two campaign events for Rep. Bruce Braley, the U.S. senate candidate in Iowa. On Thursday, she heads to Maryland for Lt. Gov. Anthony Brown, the gubernatorial nominee there. And on Saturday, she will return to Kentucky to stump at two events with Alison Lundergan Grimes, another longtime friend of the Clintons.

Maloney is the only individual candidate in the House of Representatives that Clinton has campaigned for this fall.

Asked later by reporters to define “Clinton Democrat,” Maloney said, “Fighting for the middle class, reaching across the aisle, and getting bipartisan results.”

Grimes, running against Sen. Mitch McConnell in Kentucky, has also called herself a “Clinton Democrat.” Her family has been close to the Clintons for years.

Maloney and his old bosses have remained close. The Clintons were invited to his wedding. And Bill Clinton campaigned for Maloney two years ago.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The congressman's campaign said on Monday that they planned to roll out a new television ad featuring tape of that event with the 42nd president.

Before closing his speech on Monday, Maloney said that when people ask him why he wants to work in government, he often replies, "Because I've seen it work."

"I've seen the Clintons work."

Politico: "Reince Priebus: Hillary Clinton 'not really good at politics'"

By Lucy McCalmont

October 27, 2014, 7:09 p.m. EDT

Republican National Committee Chairman Reince Priebus says Hillary Clinton is "becoming sort of a caricature" and that "she's not really good at politics."

"I think she's trying too hard and she's not really good at this stuff," Priebus told NewsmaxTV in a interview posted Monday.

Priebus' comments follow a Clinton remark about businesses and jobs that drew GOP taunts on social media.

During an appearance last week at a Boston rally for Democrat Martha Coakley's gubernatorial bid. Clinton said, "Don't let anybody tell you that corporations and businesses create jobs." Her aides and Clinton herself have since sought to clarify that statement, saying that the likely White House candidate simply misspoke and that she was referring to tax breaks for corporations and businesses.

In his interview, Priebus said Clinton was trying to be like Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.) who also was present at the Boston rally and who some liberals hope will challenge Clinton from the left for the party's presidential nomination.

"I don't know if she was a little off-script on that particular moment, but it clearly wasn't natural and it was certainly awkward," the RNC chairman said. "And if it was serious, then obviously she doesn't understand capitalism and democracy in a way that business and jobs operate."

However, the Priebus added that Clinton "is bordering on becoming sort of a caricature," adding for the GOP, there's nobody better to run against in 2016.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“There’d be no one you would want more to run against than Hillary Clinton, and on top of it, she’s not really good at politics,” Priebus said, pointing to her recent book tour, which he called a “disaster.”

“She talks off the cuff; it doesn’t work,” he said. “She makes one mistake after the next.”

National Journal: “Republican 2016 Contenders Have Taken Positions on NSA Reform. Where Does Hillary Clinton Stand?”

By Dustin Volz

October 27, 2014

If Hillary Clinton has a position on the government's domestic spying, she's doing a good job of hiding it.

More than a year after Edward Snowden's leaks, the former secretary of State has yet to offer a meaningful assessment of the National Security Agency's mass-surveillance programs. She's had plenty of chances, but in interviews, speeches, and even her new book, Clinton has repeatedly ducked the issue with vagaries and clichés.

The possible 2016 candidate rarely discusses NSA spying unprompted. And when she does, her remarks are often couched in opaque platitudes about the need to balance privacy and national security concerns.

Last week, for example, Clinton heaped praise on Sen. Mark Udall for "leading the Senate in asking the hard questions about intelligence and the trade-off between liberty and security." Her remarks came during a campaign rally for the Colorado Democrat, who is locked in a fierce reelection battle with GOP challenger Rep. Cory Gardner.

Udall has been among the Democrats leading a push for tighter reins on the NSA, but Clinton hasn't endorsed any of his proposals to pull back the agency. At times, she has appeared to fall on the other end of the spectrum.

The push for surveillance reform largely stems from NSA secrets spilled by Snowden, the former agency contractor who now lives under asylum in Russia. Yet during his globe-trotting quest for asylum last summer, Clinton condemned Snowden's leaks as "outrageous behavior" and said that Hong Kong's decision to let him flee would "unquestionably [have] a negative impact on the U.S.-China relationship." In April of this year, Clinton went further, suggesting Snowden's leaks helped terrorists.

But Clinton has said that "some changes" must be made.

In June, Fox News journalist Greta Van Susteren tried asking Clinton three consecutive times whether she thought warrantless spying on Americans violated the Constitution. Clinton largely demurred. "The Congress is trying to square Americans' constitutional right under the Fourth Amendment and the necessity for information that can be connected to terrorist activity here at home or abroad. It's a really difficult balancing act," Clinton said in the interview. "But you are 100 percent right, that we have to make some changes in order to secure that privacy, that constitutional right to privacy that Americans are due."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And what changes are those? Clinton hasn't elaborated.

Ready for Hillary, a pro-Clinton PAC, did not reply to a request for comment on Clinton's NSA views, and a pair of former Clinton advisers could not be reached.

The best clues to Clinton's NSA views come from her Senate voting record, but her history reveals no clear pattern.

Clinton voted in favor of the post-9/11 Patriot Act, which greatly expanded the intelligence community's surveillance authority and is the legal underpinning for the NSA's bulk collection of nearly all American phone records. But that was a vote taken at a time when a shell-shocked American public was much more sympathetic to surveillance than it is in 2014. Ninety-six other senators also voted for the Patriot Act, but a significant portion have since walked back their support for broad spying powers. The legislation's author in the House—Republican Rep. Jim Sensenbrenner of Wisconsin—is now crusading to pull back surveillance programs ushered in under the bill.

Perhaps more instructive is when Clinton, just a month after dropping out of her protracted presidential primary battle with then-Sen. Barack Obama, joined 27 Democrats in voting against an amended version of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act.

The measure was fiercely opposed by civil-liberties groups, which assailed a controversial provision granting immunity to telecom companies that complied with President George W. Bush's warrantless-wiretapping program. It also secretly provided the authority for the NSA's PRISM program, which was exposed by Snowden and allows the government to collect Internet communications from U.S. companies, including Google and Facebook. Clinton's opposition was especially notable given that Obama voted for the bill, a decision that enraged many of his most ardent supporters.

"Any surveillance program must contain safeguards to protect the rights of Americans against abuse, and to preserve clear lines of oversight and accountability over this administration," Clinton said in a statement at the time. "While this legislation does strengthen oversight of the administration's surveillance activities over previous drafts, in many respects, the oversight in the bill continues to come up short."

Quiet Clinton, Loud Republicans

Clinton's relative quiet on NSA reform stands in contrast to Republicans' 2016 field, whose likely members have taken public—and opposing—stands on the issue.

Assuming that Sen. Rand Paul officially declares his intention to run for president, a central plank of his platform will be dismantling the government's mass-surveillance programs. The Kentucky Republican has been among the loudest critics of the NSA, going as far as to file a class-action lawsuit accusing the agency of violating the Fourth Amendment with its bulk collection of American phone records.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And when Sen. Ted Cruz joins the 2016 fray, it's clear he also would campaign on reigning in the intelligence community's snooping. The tea-party Texan has attached his name to Senate legislation that would curtail several key parts of NSA spying.

Marco Rubio? Florida's defense-hawk senator has flown a different course, cautioning that limits to the NSA could hamper our fight against the Islamic State of Iraq and Syria. New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie, meanwhile, has also defended government spying, instructing its critics to reevaulate their stance by sitting down with the families of victims lost in the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

Clinton's relative quiet on the issue compared with Republicans likely stems from the fact that—unlike Paul, Rubio, Cruz, and Christie—she currently doesn't hold elected office, leaving her free from making any decisions on the issue. But if she does run for president, ducking the question will become near impossible.

Sooner or later, Clinton will need to articulate a firm stance on government snooping if she wants to return to the White House, said Neema Guliani, legislative counsel with the American Civil Liberties Union.

"Candidates are going to have to answer questions about specific programs, and they won't be able to hide from issues the way they could six, seven years ago," Guliani said. "People are going to keep asking. There is no hiding from this question."

CNN: “Hillary Clinton's 7 favorite midterm campaign lines”

By Dan Merica

October 28, 2014, 6:45 a.m. EDT

By Election Day in November, Hillary Clinton will have stumped for candidates in over 15 states, with sometimes multiple events at each destination.

What does this mean: Lots of speeches.

Like most politicians have some formula of commonly used phrases and lines of attack, the former secretary of state has started to shape a stump speech with similar expressions.

The lines are more than just cliches, however. They shed light on the type of campaign Clinton would have if she decided to run for president in 2016, and highlight what she will focus on and how she has learned from many of the mistakes that caused her to lose to Barack Obama in 2008.

Here are Hillary Clinton's seven most used lines on the 2014 stump:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

1.) [Insert candidate's name] is the "right leader at the right time with the right plan"

This is Clinton's go-to endorsement line and she's used it regularly this fall.

"There is no doubt the governor is the right leader at the right time with the right plan," Clinton said during an event with Gov. Andrew Cuomo in New York last week.

Clinton used the same line -- almost exactly -- for Democratic candidate Tom Wolf in Pennsylvania and Sen. Mark Udall in Colorado this month.

"You are convinced as I am convinced that Tom Wolf is the right leader and the right time for Pennsylvania hard working people," Clinton said of Wolf.

2.) "It's as though the other side wants to cast an air of amnesia"

Clinton, who spent four years separated from politics as America's top diplomat, has stepped up her Republican attack lines on the stump, and she seems extremely fond of linking the "other side" with "amnesia."

"It appears to me that the campaigns being run against them are depending on the voters of Colorado having a mass case of amnesia," Clinton said in her endorsement of Udall and Colorado Gov. John Hickenlooper. They want voters to "somehow just forget the accomplishments."

Clinton made a similar argument for Martha Coakley, Massachusetts' Democratic governor nominee, earlier this month.

Republicans are counting on "amnesia in this midterm election," Clinton said, adding they were hoping "people will forget what they have done and what they could do. We have been down the road. That is what is happening."

At a fundraiser in California earlier this year, she said this: "It's as though the other side wants to cast an air of amnesia."

The line appears to be borrowed from her husband, former President Bill Clinton, who while stumping for candidates in 2010 accused Republicans of "amnesia."

"The Republicans are trying to make this a referendum on people's anger ... with a good dose of amnesia," Clinton said while endorsing Sen. Richard Blumenthal in 2010, according to reports.

3.) "You can't take anything for granted."

Clinton usually employs this line when she is stumping for Democrats who are way up in the polls.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"If you don't show up, you don't know what is going to happen," Clinton said in Minnesota earlier this month where she endorsed Gov. Mark Dayton and Sen. Al Franken, two Democrats who look likely to win. "You can't take anything for granted."

The line is more than just a call for voters to activate, however. In 2008, Clinton found herself with a sizable lead over then-Sen. Barack Obama. Clinton went on to lose the nomination fight and some critics of the campaign said it was because Clinton's top advisers saw her win as a forgone conclusion.

But as much at it is a call to voters, the line is a nod to what Clinton has learned about campaigning.

"I want you to promise yourselves before you leave here tonight that you won't just come to this beautiful Constitution Center and listen to the speeches and the music then go home feeling good," Clinton said in Pennsylvania where she endorsed frontrunner Wolf for governor. "You need to resolve to do everything you can to make sure you don't take this election for granted."

4.) "Everyone deserves a second chance, a third chance..."

Clinton has focused a great deal on economic populism on the stump, an issue other Democrats thinking about seeking the presidency in 2016 have started to tweak Clinton on.

"Everyone deserves a second chance, a third chance to keep going and to make something of themselves," Clinton said in Iowa earlier this year. "That was one of the most important lessons of my life."

Clinton usually uses the line to encourage compassion from a crowd, and to show that she has compassion, too.

"The only direction that matters in life is forward," Clinton said in Minnesota. "Never quit. Never lose faith. When you get knocked down get right back up, recognize there is worth and dignity in every human being and that everyone — everyone — deserves not just a chance but a second chance and even a third chance and a better life for themselves and their families."

5.) "Women hold a majority of minimum wage jobs in our country."

This is a double whammy for Clinton: In one line, she nods to women and the economic struggles that many women -- and men -- are experiencing.

Clinton's many appearances have focused a great deal on women and this line has become a staple.

"Women hold a majority of minimum wage jobs in our country," Clinton said in San Francisco earlier this month. "When women succeed, America succeeds."

Clinton used a similar line in North Carolina while stumping for Sen. Kay Hagan, at an event for the Democratic National Committee earlier this year at an event with other female politicians in Washington, D.C in September.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"If we had been able to close the gap between men and women participating in the work force, our Gross Domestic Product would be 10 percent higher," Clinton said at the event. "Why are we leaving 10% on the table because we don't do enough to give women the support that they need to be empowered, to take care of themselves and their families?"

6.) "Grandmother glow"

Hillary Clinton recently became a grandmother, and those who attend her stump speeches get reminded of that pretty quickly.

Clinton has made her new granddaughter -- Charlotte Clinton Mezvinsky -- a staple of her stump speech and usually uses the one month old to pivot to her vision for the future and the world she and other Democrats want to leave for their children and grandchildren.

Clinton unveiled the line during an October paid speech in Miami, Florida.

"You look beautiful," said the moderator of a question and answer with Clinton.

"I think it is a grandmother glow," she responded.

Since then, the line has been regularly repeated.

She took the line a step further in Charlotte, North Carolina on Saturday, giving a nod to the city's name within the first two minutes of her speech.

"It is pretty excited being here in Charlotte," Clinton said. "I mean, it is true that I am a new grandmother, a month tomorrow. I still have that grandmother glow."

She added, "But I just can't tell you how much we love the name."

7.) "Fear is the last resort of those who have run out of hope"

This is another way Clinton hits Republicans. She accuses the party of peddling fear because, as she says, that is what people do when they have "run out of gas."

The line is regularly used when she is endorsing candidates who are facing stiff opposition and a sizable amount of outside spending and ads.

"Elections come down often to who's got more money, who's peddling more fear and who turns out," Clinton told the audience in North Carolina. "We want leaders like Kay Hagan, who appeal to our hopes, not our fears," she later added.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

So far, $80 million has been spent in Hagan's race against Tillis and local voters have complained about the number of negative ads.

"There is a reason that the senators and the governor's opponents are running campaigns based on fear," Clinton said in Colorado. "Fear is the last resort of those who have run out of hope... run out of gas."

New York Daily News column: Richard Cohen: "The old hands vs. the shaky newbies"

By Richard Cohen

October 27, 2014, 8:00 p.m. EDT

[Subtitle:] Experience without passion or the opposite?

At dinner the other night with a collection of political consultants, pollsters, some journalists and a few civilians, we went around the table giving our predictions of the presidential nominees for 2016. Some interesting names popped up.

One of them was Bill de Blasio, the lefty mayor of New York, and another was Rand Paul, the Kentucky senator who seems to be running for President on a platform of discovering who he is. Elizabeth Warren was also mentioned, and so, in a weary sort of way, was Hillary Clinton. Like Paul, she's looking for a message.

Jeb Bush was, of course, mentioned, with some insiders confiding that they knew he would run while others said he would not. Gov. Rick Perry of Texas was also mentioned, but his state's bungling of the Ebola crisis did not enhance his image any. Mitt Romney was ruled out because his wife is dead set against another campaign.

Absent Jeb Bush, the Republican field is so wide open I almost jumped in myself. All I lack is the necessary funds and the appropriate ideological convictions. Still . . .

OK, let's clear away some brush. The consensus was that the left and the right wings of the two parties are in furious turmoil and very unhappy with the mainstream candidates. For the Democrats, there's no one more mainstream than Hillary Clinton, practically an incumbent. Warren is virtually Clinton's opposite: a neophyte who has been in the Senate only since 2013 and has never run a company or state. We have learned — have we not? — that the presidency requires some executive experience.

Clinton has plenty of experience. What she lacks — and what she has lacked for some time — is a rousing theme. Warren would be the authentic champion of the besieged middle class and make the banks pay for their sins. Hillary would do . . . what? Invite them to yet another meeting of the Clinton Global Initiative? At the moment, Clinton's main appeal is to women. Trouble is, Warren happens to be a woman, too. Clinton needs more — something else. In an anti-incumbent period, she's an easy target.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Jeb Bush has a similar problem. No one could be more of an incumbent without actually holding the office. He is the son of one President, the brother of another and the former governor of Florida. He has adopted mainstream positions on education and immigration, but he, too, lacks a clear message, and he certainly is not going to criticize Bush programs that helped trigger the creation of the Tea Party. Bush is the very soul of conservatism. 'Tis a pity. What the party wants is spleen.

So we get to Paul. He is the son of Ron Paul, the unabashed libertarian, and he started out as one, too. Of late though, he has been amending and revising his positions, Botoxing some of his strange views — such as his now-retracted objection to a crucial part of the Civil Rights Act — and making an effort to appeal to black voters.

The trouble with Paul is that he is running ahead of his views, revising as he goes along. He has the process backward: First find out who you are, and then run for President. Paul is taking foreign policy tutorials, but there is a lot to learn, and he has made some rookie errors. Last month, he accused John McCain of having his picture taken with Islamic State rebels in Syria — swallowing whole a ridiculous Internet rumor.

Rand Paul is not ready — never mind his cockamamie ideology. The same holds for Warren, although she makes abundant sense. As for the establishment front-runners, they are safe but unexciting. Almost a century after he wrote it, we now have a political version of William Butler Yeats' poem "The Second Coming": "The best lack all conviction, while the worst are full of passionate intensity."

Oh, yes, my prediction: The center will not hold.

The Hill: "Warren vs. Clinton: Dems say 'Why not?'"

By Kevin Cirilli

October 28, 2014, 6:00 a.m. EDT

The Democratic field in 2016 has more than enough room for two women competing to be the nation's first female president, according to liberal activists.

They pour scorn on the notion that Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.), or any other woman, ought to step aside if former secretary of State Hillary Clinton launches a second quest for the White House.

"The idea that you can't run because there's somebody else who looks like you running? Oh my God, what would all the white men do?" quipped Terry O'Neill, president of the National Organization for Women (NOW).

"I think the argument that two women shouldn't compete in a primary is insulting to voters — both women and men," said Robert Borosage, the director and co-founder of the progressive Campaign For America's Future "This isn't a gender contest. This is a race to determine the best leader for our country. Anyone making that argument in public would be hooted off the stage."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A former senior Democratic staffer who supports Clinton also decried the notion.

"I'm sick of the political boys' club," said the former staffer, who is female. "We always have several men running at the same time. The more women who run for public office, the better. I want nothing more than to have Hillary as the first female president... [but] people don't become president because they deserve it — who becomes president is up to the voters."

Spokespeople for Clinton and Warren did not respond to requests for comment.

Clinton's 2008 presidential campaign was largely perceived as shying away — at least in its initial stages — from highlighting that she'd be the first female president, said Debbie Walsh, director of the Center for American Women and Politics at Rutgers University.

Walsh said that Clinton had fully embraced the historic nature of her candidacy by the end of her campaign, perhaps most notably in her June 2008 concession speech.

Clinton referred in that address to the numbers of cracks her campaign had put in the "glass ceiling" that restricts women's ascent.

She also said, "I am a woman and like millions of women I know there are still barriers and biases out there, often unconscious, and I want to build an America that respects and embraces the potential of every last one of us."

Walsh said that if Warren and Clinton were to both run, it would likely "reshape and change the nature of the conversation" for Democrats during the primary.

"[Clinton] could talk about the importance and historic nature of her candidacy," Walsh said, "but she'd likely have to run more on her experience, too."

That reflects one potential worry for the Clinton campaign – that a Warren candidacy would provide voters with a chance to get behind another Democratic woman with a credible shot at making it to the White House.

Maybe that simply won't happen. Warren joined all the other female Democratic senators in October 2013 in a letter encouraging Clinton to run for president.

But Warren has signaled in recent weeks that she could indeed run, despite having previously insisted she wasn't interested.

"I don't think so," Warren first told People magazine when asked if she'd run for president recently. But she then added, "If there's any lesson I've learned in the last five years, it's don't be so sure about what lies ahead. There are amazing doors that could open."

Other prominent female Democrats have also indicated that they're ready to rally behind Clinton, who holds a dominant lead in early 2016 polls.

Sen. Kirsten Gillibrand (D-N.Y.) told TIME Magazine in March that "Hillary Clinton will be our first female president."

Sen. Claire McCaskill (D-Mo.) backed the pro-Clinton super-PAC Ready For Hillary in June 2013.

And Democratic National Committee chairwoman Debbie Wasserman Schultz (D-Fla.) said at a Washington forum in May that Americans would elect a female president "in a couple of cycles" if Clinton didn't run for president, as reported by the The Christian Science Monitor, which sponsored the event.

When asked to clarify her remarks, Schultz appeared to back off through a spokeswoman.

"Right now, there is no shortage of Democratic women who are ready to run and win at every level – from the state house the White House," said DNC spokeswoman Lily Adams.

NOW endorsed Clinton early in the 2008 Democratic primary when Clinton was battling then-Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) for the nomination.

But O'Neill, who called both Warren and Clinton "fabulous," pushed back against the notion that Warren would have to step aside for the Clinton candidacy.

"Sen. Warren is entitled to run for president if she wants and I think she's a great candidate," O'Neill said. "There's no reason she shouldn't run for president. We need to have a conversation about where we want this country to go. Do we really want the .01 percent controlling everything?"

O'Neill added that, “more women need to run against each other in all races to show it's not a big deal. That says to other women on the sidelines, 'Well, maybe I could jump in, too.'"

Mediaite: “Chris Matthews: Clinton-Warren 2016 Ticket Not ‘Smart’”

By Eddie Scarry

October 27, 2014, 3:01 p.m. EDT

Liberal Democrats looking to MSNBC’s Chris Matthews to keep hope alive that Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.) could still in some way be involved with the 2016 presidential election had it all squashed Monday.

Since her election to the Senate in 2012, Warren has risen as a voice for the progressive wing of her party, gaining fans who want her to run in 2016 as a challenger to former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, who is considering a run herself. Warren has said she isn't running but that hasn't kept her supporters from pushing her toward the White House in one way or another.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Asked by one follower during a Twitter Q&A whether Matthews thought a hypothetical Clinton-Warren 2016 ticket would be "smart," he said no.

"No I don't think that is a smart ticket," Matthews aid. "I think a smart ticket would be Clinton/Sherrod Brown. Brown is the two-term Democratic senator from Ohio.

What about a cabinet position for Warren in a potential Clinton administration, another person asked Matthews. Still no.

"I think she'll stay in the Senate," he said.

Of course, Matthews is an open supporter of Clinton's. And his contentious summer interview with Warren was notable for their constant cross-talking and his telling her that Democrats have failed to enact policies that help middle class Americans.

The Atlantic: "The Jeb Bush Effect"

By Russell Berman

October 27, 2014, 4:33 p.m. EDT

[Subtitle:] A presidential bid by the former Florida governor would complicate the party's case against Hillary Clinton.

It has been clear for some time that a significant portion of the Republican establishment in Washington wants Jeb Bush to run for president in 2016. Speaker John Boehner of Ohio, the party's senior-most elected official, has even departed from his formal posture of neutrality to openly pine for the former Florida governor to enter the race. Bush's family name notwithstanding, Boehner and other top Republicans see him as the candidate with the gravitas and fundraising potential to overcome a flawed field, unite the party, and stand on equal footing with Hillary Clinton, the prohibitive Democratic favorite.

If this weekend's headlines are an indication, the GOP pooh-bahs may get their wish. Bush's eldest son, George P. Bush, told ABC News that his father was "more than likely" to run next year, and The New York Times reported Sunday night that Jeb Bush's family–save his famously reluctant mother–was urging him to do so.

Bush would be something of a elder statesman in a Republican presidential field expected to feature several relative newcomers to the national stage, including Senators Rand Paul, Ted Cruz, Marco Rubio, and Governor Chris Christie. Governor Rick Perry ran in 2012 and led Texas for the same two terms as Bush ruled Florida, while another potential contender, Representative Paul Ryan, was the GOP vice presidential nominee two years ago.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Yet more than the other candidates, Bush's presence in the race would force many Republicans to recalibrate their attacks on Clinton. So far, party officials have targeted her on a range of issues, from criticizing her handling of the Benghazi terrorist attacks in 2012 to lampooning her comment that the Clintons were "dead broke" after they left the White House. When Clinton went on her book tour over the summer, the Republican National Committee sent a intern dressed as a squirrel to trail her while wearing a T-shirt that said, "Another Clinton in the White House is Nuts."

The undercurrent of the GOP's argument is that the 67-year-old Clinton is a relic whose wealth and cloistered life in the government for the last three decades has put her out of touch with ordinary Americans.

“People are kind of tired of this show, quite frankly. There’s Hillary fatigue out there. It’s setting in,” RNC chairman Reince Priebus said on NBC's Meet the Press at the end of June.

Jeb Bush, of course, is no fresh face either, and the fact that a Bush or a Clinton has occupied the White House for 20 of the last 26 years is exactly what his mother, former First Lady Barbara Bush, had in mind when she spoke out in opposition to his candidacy in 2013.

"If you're planning to make a legacy argument, having Jeb Bush as the nominee would complicate that," said Doug Heye, a Republican strategist and former RNC spokesman. "But I don't think that's the best argument to make against Hillary Clinton." Heye said Republicans would be better off focusing on Clinton's record as New York senator and then secretary of state.

Bush would face his own obstacles in a Republican primary, particularly on the issues of immigration and education, where the party's base has moved to the right in the years since he served as governor and his brother, George W. Bush, served as president. And there is little doubt that Bush's opponents–particularly the more libertarian Paul–would argue that the country needed to move on from the Bush family just as it should leave the Clintons in the past.

Democrats would probably relish a Bush candidacy, even if some in the party would fear his strength with Hispanic voters who have been alienated by just about everyone else in the GOP in recent years. If both Bush and Clinton made it to the general election, a battle for nostalgia between the Clinton era of 1990s and the George W. Bush era of the 2000s would undoubtedly favor Democrats.

That in itself is a big reason why Republicans are now trying to link Hillary Clinton closer to her one-time rival, the unpopular President Obama, than to her more widely-admired husband. Jeb Bush, they point out, has his own stellar record as governor of Florida.

"She is so tied to this administration," a Republican strategist in Iowa, Tim Albrecht, said of Clinton on Monday. "Jeb Bush was part of one administration, and that was his own in Florida."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Salon: "Hillary Clinton's populism problem: What her awkward campaign trail comments reveal about her biggest weakness"

By Luke Brinker

October 27, 2014, 1:32 p.m. EDT

[Subtitle:] As the former secretary of state eyes a 2016 bid, she's struggling to come to terms with the new Democratic Party

Such is the absurdity of American politics that Hillary Clinton — who voted for the financial industry's bankruptcy "reform" bill as a U.S. senator, graced the cover of Fortune magazine in 2007 as corporate America's presidential candidate of choice, and has spent her post-diplomatic career giving paid speeches to the likes of Goldman Sachs and the medical device industry – is now the subject of Republican attacks that she's an anti-business radical.

The impetus for this rather disingenuous claim came Friday, as Clinton campaigned in Boston for Democratic gubernatorial candidate Martha Coakley. Channeling the Massachusetts' senior senator, Elizabeth Warren — a potential 2016 presidential rival — Clinton struck a populist chord in her speech, assailing trickle-down economics and championing an increase in the minimum wage. But the former secretary of state ignited a political firestorm with her remarks about businesses and job creation.

"And don't let anybody tell you, that, you know, it's corporations and businesses that create jobs," Clinton told the crowd. "You know, that old theory, trickle-down economics. That has been tried. That has failed. That has failed rather spectacularly."

Gleeful at the chance to seize another "you didn't build that" moment, Republicans pounced. "How then did private sector people get jobs?" former Bush press secretary Ari Fleischer asked on Twitter. Meanwhile, the right-wing blog HotAir asserted that Clinton's comments reflected "Hillarynomics." But just as President Barack Obama wasn't actually saying that entrepreneurs"didn't build" their businesses, it's unlikely that Clinton truly believes that businesses don't create jobs. Instead, her remarks likely represented what Tim Miller of the conservative super PAC America Rising called "a ham-handed attempt to pander to liberal voters."

Emphasis on "ham-handed." Clinton's clumsy language reveals a politician woefully out of sync with her party's progressive populist base. Her awkward attempt to relate to the Elizabeth Warren wing of the Democratic Party calls to mind Mitt Romney's cringe-inducing efforts to woo GOP conservatives during his last presidential bid. Michael Kinsley aptly compared Romney's rhetorical red meat to serving haggis to your Scottish cousins when they're in for a visit. "You can't stand the stuff, but they're supposed to like it," Kinsley wrote. Likewise, it was hard not to get the sense that Clinton, so unable to relate to the progressive strain of Democratic thinking, simply thought that this is the kind of talk Warren Democrats like to hear.

Compare Clinton's inartful populist pandering with Warren's extemporaneous paean to the social contract in 2011, just as Warren launched her campaign for the U.S. Senate against Scott Brown.

"You built a factory out there? Good for you," Warren told a Massachusetts house party. "But I want to be clear: you moved your goods to market on the roads the rest of us paid for; you hired workers the rest of us paid to educate; you were safe in your factory because of police forces and fire forces that the rest of us paid for. You didn't have to worry that marauding bands would come and seize everything at your factory, and hire someone to protect against this, because of the work the rest of us did."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Now look,” Warren went on, “you built a factory and it turned into something terrific, or a great idea? God bless. Keep a big hunk of it. But part of the underlying social contract is you take a hunk of that and pay forward for the next kid who comes along.”

Recognizing that that message has resonated in the party, Clinton paid tribute to Warren in her Boston appearance on Friday.

“I am so pleased to be here with your senior senator, the passionate champion for working people and middle class families, Elizabeth Warren!” Clinton roared. “I love watching Elizabeth, you know, give it to those who deserve to get it,” she added. And who might “those who deserve to get it” be? Clinton, whose family foundation has collected up to half a million dollars from Goldman Sachs and whom many Wall Street Republicans are already prepared to support in 2016, didn’t elaborate.

It’s telling that just after she lauded Warren’s principled liberalism on Friday, Clinton ventured to neighboring Rhode Island, where she hailed gubernatorial nominee Gina Raimondo as a key part of the Democratic Party’s future. Last year, Raimondo earned the enmity of public workers in Rhode Island when she gutted their pensions in her role as state treasurer. Very Serious centrists and the right-wing Wall Street Journal editorial board applauded Raimondo’s move, while party progressives decried her so-called pension reform. In September’s gubernatorial primary, 58 percent of Rhode Island Democrats voted for a candidate other than Raimondo.

Democrats like Warren — who spends as much time excoriating Wall Street Democrats like Robert Rubin as she does launching broadsides against Republicans — recognize that Democrats like Raimondo pose an even more dire threat to a progressive economic agenda than conservative Republicans do. The neoliberal capture of the Democratic Party narrowed the range of policy alternatives available to American voters, and what excites voters about Warren is that she represents a break from that sordid history. And Clinton’s inextricable link with that history — not some clumsy campaign stump gaffe — is the real problem.

Calendar:

Sec. Clinton's upcoming appearances as reported online. Not an official schedule.

· October 29 – IA: Sec. Clinton campaigns for Iowa Senate candidate Bruce Braley (Quad-City Times)

· October 30 – Washington, DC: Sec. Clinton honored by The Executive Leadership Foundation (CNN)

· October 30 – Washington, DC: Sec. Clinton will speak on ‘The Power of Women’s Economic Participation’ at Georgetown (Georgetown)

· October 30 – Washington, DC: Sec. Clinton speaks at the launch of The International Council on Women’s Business Leadership (CNN)

· October 30 – College Park, MD: Sec. Clinton appears at a rally for Maryland gubernatorial candidate Anthony Brown (WaPo)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

· November 1 – KY: Sec. Clinton campaigns in Northern Kentucky and Lexington with Alison Lundergan Grimes (BuzzFeed)

· November 2 – NH: Sec. Clinton appears at a GOTV rally for Gov. Hassan and Sen. Shaheen (AP)

· December 1 – New York, NY: Sec. Clinton keynotes a League of Conservation Voters dinner (Politico)

· December 4 – Boston, MA: Sec. Clinton speaks at the Massachusetts Conference for Women (MCFW)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Traci Blunt" <tblunt@hillaryclinton.com>
To: "Clips Distro" <Clips@hillaryclinton.com>
Date: 12/24/2007 4:36:23 AM
Subject:

IN THE NEWS:

Congressional Black Caucus Split Between Clinton and Obama

by Hazel Trice Edney; NNPA Editor-in-Chief
Originally posted 12/23/2007
WASHINGTON (NNPA) – As America prepares for a string of primaries and caucuses to determine who will be its next Democratic and Republican nominees for president, the majority of the 42-member Congressional Black Caucus who have chosen to endorse in the race is split 15-15 between CBC member Illinois Sen. Barack Obama and New York Sen. Hillary Clinton. In interviews this week, CBC members pointed mainly to the candidates' stances on specific issues as the reasons for their endorsements.

"He is the most likely to actually produce change in areas that make a difference – home ownership, education, health care, crime policy," says U. S. Rep. Bobby Scott (D-Va.), explaining his endorsement of Obama.

Scott, who chairs the House Crime Subcommittee, says, "For years we've concentrated on and focused more on codifying… sound bites rather than seriously addressing crime.''

He adds that he is impressed with Obama's record on health care and the war in Iraq.

"He led the charge to get more people health insurance in the Illinois legislature…He also had the strength of character and courage to stand up against the Iraqi war."

U. S Rep. Sheila Jackson-Lee (D-Texas), who has announced her endorsement of Clinton, says she believes Clinton's long record of service to children shows where her heart really is.

She says she is especially impressed that Clinton, as a young lawyer, served as a staff attorney for Marian Wright Edelman's Children's Defense Fund during her post graduate studies and that she served as a consultant to the Carnegie Council on Children.

"This is a very important election and I do think that as people begin to know Sen. Clinton and they know her personally and they know her story, she has an enormously convincing story of someone who has empathy and out of empathy, one can act upon the pain of others and the joy of others," says Jackson-Lee.

While Scott says his endorsement of Obama has nothing to do with the fact that he is Black, Jackson-Lee made no bones about what she sees as an opportunity to raise the ceiling for women in America.

"I do think that as women, whether it is minority women or majority women, we have a long way to go. Now, it is frankly innovative and inspiring that America would find its way to possibly selecting someone who has both talent and experience who happens to be a woman, which would make us move to where countries around the world have already gone in selecting women as heads of state," Jackson-Lee says.

John Edwards, a former North Carolina senator, has three endorsements from CBC members.

''Too many women are not getting the health care they need,'' said U. S. Rep. Eddie Bernice Johnson (D-Texas) in a statement posted on the Edwards campaign website. ''John Edwards is the only candidate to outline a specific plan to provide universal coverage and I'm proud to be part of a campaign—the only campaign—with a detailed plan to cover all Americans.''

Eight CBC members had not made public endorsements by NNPA deadline.
The 15-15 Clinton-Obama split among the CBC members closely reflects the dividing lines among Black voters, according to polls.

A poll taken between Oct. 5 and Nov. 2 by the Joint Center for Political and Economic Studies showed Clinton with 83 percent of Black votes, compared to Obama, who then had 74 percent. About 10 percent of those surveyed viewed them both negatively.

Voters must decide between two Democratic front-runners in a heated race for the White House, which has been run by

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Republican President George Bush for eight years. Most Bush performance approval ratings are under 40 percent. Plus, about 160,000 troops are still stationed in Iraq in a war that more than half of Americans want ended, according to Pew Research opinion polls. Democrats are banking on these facts to win back the White House.

Leading Republican candidates are former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani, former Tennesee Sen. Thompson, Sen. John McCain and former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney.

In recent history, Blacks have overwhelmingly supported Democratic candidates for president.

The split between the all-Democratic members of the CBC is as follows:
Endorsing Hillary Clinton are Lee, Stephanie Tubbs Jones of Ohio; Kendrick Meek, Corrine Brown and Alcee Hastings of Florida; Yvette Clarke, Charles Rangel, Gregory Meeks and Edolphus Towns of New York; Emanuel Cleaver of Missouri; Dianne Watson and Laura Richardson of California; David Scott and John Lewis of Georgia; and Donna Christian-Christensen (V.I.).

Endorsing Barack Obama are Scott, Danny Davis, Bobby Rush and Jesse Jackson Jr. of Illinois; Barbara Lee of California; Artur Davis of Alabama; Gwen Moore of Wisconsin; Lacy Clay of Missouri; Elijah Cummings of Maryland; Sanford Bishop and Hank Johnson of Georgia; John Conyers of Michigan; Keith Ellison of Minnesota; Chaka Fattah of Pennsylvania; and Al Green of Texas.

Endorsing John Edwards are: Johnson of Texas; Mel Watt and G. K. Butterfield of North Carolina.

Those who had not endorsed by NNPA deadline were: Eleanor Holmes Norton of D.C.; Jim Clyburn of South Carolina; Bennie Thompson of Mississippi; Al Wynn of Maryland; William Jefferson of Louisiana; Donald Payne of New Jersey, Maxine Waters of California and CBC Chairwoman Carolyn Cheeks Kilpatrick of Michigan.

The Clinton-Obama choice is complicated by questions over whether America will really elect Clinton as its first woman or Obama as its first African-American president while both race and gender – specifically the Black race and the female gender - have historically been excuses for prejudice and discrimination in America. However, poll readings show both Democratic front-runners as being well ahead of their Republican opponents.

The focus is currently on the state of Iowa and its early Democratic Presidential Primary Jan. 3 and the New Hampshire primary Jan. 8. Obama leads slightly in Iowa and Clinton in New Hampshire.

But, pundits predict that Super Tuesday, Feb. 5 will be the deciding factor for who will likely win enough delegates for the Democratic nomination in Denver, Colo. Aug. 25-28. Super Tuesday is when 22 states will hold primaries and caucuses. Scott says he believes Obama could win a general election despite racial prejudices.

“If he wins Iowa, he would be favored in New Hampshire and if he wins New Hampshire, he’ll have a lock on South Carolina, which would put him well-postured to compete on Super Tuesday and he’ll have enough money,” Scott says.

It’ll be easier for Obama to win a national election than a Republican, Scott predicts.

“You have the worst job performance since Herbert Hoover. You’ve got the foreclosures at record highs. You’ve got the median income significantly lower,” he says. “By the time the year is out, if people have a chance to look at the Republican administration, I think any Republican candidate will be hard-pressed to do well.”

http://www.amsterdamnews.com/News/article/article.asp?NewsID=14868&sID=3

* * *

As Holiday Break Nears, Obama and Edwards Spar Over Outside Groups

By Anne E. Kornblut and Perry Bacon Jr.
Washington Post Staff Writers
Monday, December 24, 2007; A04
MARSHALLTOWN, Iowa, Dec. 23 -- In a final day of campaigning before suspending their campaigns for Christmas, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) encouraged voters here Sunday to view the holiday as a time to become "instruments of peace and change," while Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) accused former senator John Edwards (D-N.C.) of using outside groups to shape an intense three-way race.

Obama continued his attempt to undercut Edwards over the use of independent "527" groups, which are playing an increasing role in the campaign. Such outside Democratic groups are backing Edwards and Clinton and have bought sizable blocks of broadcast advertising in the early-voting states, including Iowa.

Obama cited one such group that is running ads on Edwards's behalf and is being operated, in part, by his former campaign manager and political director. By law, Edwards cannot coordinate with the group, but Obama said his rival should block it from participating in the process.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"My attitude is that if you can't get your former campaign manager and political director to do what you'd like, then it's going to be hard to get the insurance companies and drug companies to do what you want," Obama said.

Edwards aides struck back by noting that their candidate, unlike Obama, has never taken money from lobbyists or PACs. "John Edwards is the only candidate with the courage and the backbone to urge the Democratic Party to stop taking lobbyist contributions," said Jennifer O'Malley, Edwards's Iowa state director. "If Senator Obama is serious about reform, he should join John Edwards in this challenge."

For her part, Clinton pushed through blinding snow to a sparsely attended church service in Waterloo, bringing her husband to introduce her to an African American congregation in one of the state's largest minority communities. She later visited a veterans home.

All three Democrats will resume their campaigns in Iowa on Wednesday, eight days before the first votes of the 2008 election season are cast in the state's caucuses.

Clinton is planning to restart her campaign with a new slogan, "Big Challenges, Real Solutions -- Time to Pick a President." She hopes it will convince undecided voters that she is more experienced than Obama. He is launching a "Stand for Change" tour in the final days, and aides said he will also focus on the question of electability.

Even with the caucuses on the immediate horizon, Clinton and Edwards will make at least one more stop in New Hampshire before Jan. 3, with an eye toward that state's first-in-the-nation primary on Jan. 8.

Black churches are not typically a mainstay of Iowa politics, but the Clintons sought one out on Sunday morning. Waterloo has five Democratic precincts with significant African American populations and, even though they will elect only 40 delegates, this pocket of the state was considered important enough for both Clintons to penetrate stormy weather for one final visit a few days before Christmas.

Flying in from their home in Chappaqua, N.Y., the Clintons arrived shortly after noon at Mount Carmel Missionary Baptist Church, with the service already begun. They were joined by former Iowa governor Tom Vilsack and his wife, Christie; former Denver mayor Wellington Webb; and Bob Nash, a Clinton administration official and current campaign official. The church was more than half-empty, with only a few dozen people in the pews.

Hailing Christmas as "the birth of the God of second chances," Bill Clinton introduced his wife as a "giver" and encouraged congregants to vote. He cited the Book of Romans, saying the Bible instructs people to "be good citizens as well as good followers of the Lord."

"For as long as I have known Hillary, she has been giving of herself to benefit others. I think we want that sort of giver to lead our country," he said.

Hillary Clinton has drawn women steadily to her events, holding female-focused appearances in New Hampshire on Saturday and referencing her gender on Sunday. "We've never had a woman president before," she told veterans.

"We need it," an elderly woman shouted from the audience.

Obama braved the storm to attend three town-hall meetings, after five events on Saturday, and also appeared on CBS's "Face the Nation."

Speaking before crowds in central and western Iowa, where at least one-third said they were undecided, Obama added to his stump speech lines intended to address concerns about his candidacy. He repeatedly emphasized that voters should not consider his race a barrier to his being elected, an issue that he has begun discussing publicly in the past week. He also explained why he is running for president now, rather than waiting for more seasoning, by invoking a Martin Luther King Jr. quote about the "fierce urgency of now."

In the past week, a late but extremely muscular effort by independent expenditure groups emerged in Iowa. The issue-oriented groups, known as 527s because of their designation in the federal tax code, are influential because they can raise and spend unlimited amounts of money. The only restrictions are that they cannot explicitly urge people to vote for or against a candidate, and they cannot coordinate their efforts with any active campaign.

Three organizations, including two labor unions, have spent more than $2.1 million over the past month in Iowa and New Hampshire to help support Clinton's candidacy. Three more groups, all backed by labor, have spent nearly $1.3 million on Edwards's behalf.

By contrast, there appears to be little independent expenditure activity in Iowa from groups backing Obama. The issue flared over the weekend as Obama criticized efforts of the Alliance for a New America, a group formed by the Service Employees International Union and run by Nick Baldick, who served this year as a top adviser to Edwards.

Last week, the group spent $769,610 to reserve television ads that help promote Edwards's candidacy. Obama aides have questioned how the group could be operating without the inside knowledge that Baldick must have soaked up from his former boss.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Baldick said Sunday that his work for the group has been thoroughly vetted by SEIU's lawyers.

"This is an issue advocacy organization with its own agenda," Baldick said. "There is nothing inappropriate about a former adviser leaving a campaign and later working with an organization that is not about any campaign but about raising issues."

The ease with which political operatives moved between campaigns and independent expenditure groups prompted several legal challenges four years ago, and some are still moving through the courts.

Staff writer Matthew Mosk contributed to this report from Washington.
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2007/12/23/AR2007122302443_pf.html

* * *

Obama reaches deep into S.C. -- His political machine could break through the state's longtime barrier to black candidates.

By WES ALLISON, Times Staff Writer; Published December 23, 2007

COLUMBIA, S.C. - On one of those steamy days in the middle of summer when even the flies seem to buzz slowly, a tall young white man pulled into the sand parking lot and knocked on the door of Styles of Distinction Beautique.

He told the owner, Latrice Lewis, that he worked for Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, the Democratic presidential candidate, and he wanted to leave some literature for her customers. But more than that, he wanted Lewis to help spread Obama's vision of hope for America, and to get her permission to check back every now and then.

Lewis, 37, whose shop serves about 200 customers each week, was flattered to be asked. No candidate ever had. So Styles of Distinction joined scores of African-American barber shops and beauty salons across South Carolina serving as mini-campaign offices in Obama's quest to become president of the United States.

"One thing about the African-American community, you're going to get your hair done," Lewis, a statuesque woman wearing white and black boots, said Wednesday. "While they're sitting in our chairs, we're giving them some of the points."

In the race for the Democratic nomination, it is hard to overstate the importance of South Carolina, the first primary state with a large population of African-American voters. About 30 percent of the state's residents are black, as are about half the voters in its Democratic presidential primaries.

Buoyed by the affection that her husband, former President Bill Clinton, enjoys among many African-Americans, by the strength of her national campaign, and by the support of the state's black political establishment, polls showed Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton leading Obama among black voters here by 10 percentage points as recently as August.

Now, several polls show them tied, or give Obama a slight edge. Campaign workers, Democratic activists and independent analysts cite two main reasons for his surge. First is a strong grass roots organizing effort, like the beauty salons and barber shop initiative - known in the campaign as B-and-B - that is now bearing fruit.

Second is his recent success in the polls in lily-white New Hampshire and Iowa, where just 2 percent of residents are black. Contrary to the initial feelings of many African-Americans here, it now appears that white people just might vote for him.

"If Obama demonstrates in Iowa that he's a winner, he's going to run away with South Carolina," said House Majority Whip James Clyburn, D-Sumter, South Carolina's top black politician, who isn't taking sides. "There's no question about that. He will run away with South Carolina."

- - -

Prominent lawyer Steve Benjamin adores former President Clinton and had discussed his wife's candidacy with him earlier this year. He had also met with Hillary Clinton, New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, Obama and their surrogates.

Benjamin, 37, is a Democratic activist who ran for state attorney general in 2002. He lost with 44 percent of the vote, a drubbing by almost any measure, but it was a record draw for a black candidate in a statewide race.

Now he is chairman of the Democratic Party in Richland County, which includes Columbia, the state capital. Nearly half the county's residents are black, and it delivered about 17 percent of the total votes in the Democratic presidential primary back in 2004.

But when the former president called again while in town for a banquet Monday night, Benjamin declined to meet with him. "I thought it would be somewhat disingenuous," he said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The next day, Benjamin and a dozen other attorneys gathered outside a courthouse named for the first black federal judge from the Deep South and pledged their allegiance to Barack Obama.

"To not be part of it, I think I'd regret to my dying day," explained Benjamin, the father of two young girls. "The consistency of Barack Obama's message of hope, and America's better days being ahead of her, just won me over."

He added, "I think the world of Bill Clinton. Hillary Clinton is bright and tough ... and I like the thought of a woman in charge."

But Benjamin says he chose Obama in part because of his campaign's focus on reaching voters directly.

He, Clyburn and other South Carolina operatives said Obama is far less dependent than Clinton on traditional conduits of black politics here, the preachers and elected leaders.

"It's staff- and volunteer-driven, with a huge number of volunteers, not the old-school street politics," Benjamin said. "He's challenging the way politics have been done in this state for the last 50 years."

Dick Harpootlian, a former state Democratic Party chairman who campaigned for Bill Clinton in 1992 and 1996, said Obama's grass roots machine is the most sophisticated he has seen in 40 years, and it's one reason he's backing him.

The campaign boasts seven offices around the state, vs. six for Clinton, and has teams of volunteers contacting potential voters in each of the 46 counties, including several poor, largely black counties that are rarely courted except on election day.

Earlier this month in Columbia, an Obama rally with talk show host Oprah Winfrey drew nearly 30,000 people, most of them black, the largest crowd for a political event in state history.

"It was awesome," gushed Nicole Dubose, 22, who attended and plans to vote for Obama. "He seemed so down to earth." But the event was more than just another rally.

As the crowd passed through the stadium gates, everyone was handed the names and phone numbers of four likely Democratic voters to call during the program. The campaign rented mobile towers to handle the extra wireless traffic.

And at the start of the show, the crowd was told to send a text message to a special number to register for an instant drawing. Three winners and their guests got to sit down front and meet Oprah and Obama. More than a sweet door prize, the drawing provided Obama's strategists with the cell phone numbers for thousands of likely supporters.

"If they missed anything, I don't know what it was," Harpootlian said. "I've never seen anything like this, the scope of it, the scale of it, and the ability to squeeze every drop out of the effort they make."

Clinton, of course, has a formidable machine as well, and she has won the backing of prominent black activists and politicians in every corner of the state. Her husband has visited several times in the past month on her behalf, as has Georgia Rep. John Lewis, an icon of the civil rights movement.

Katie Catalon of Charleston, president of the National Beauty Cultural League, which represents black salons, is campaigning for her as well, and several Obama supporters say they expect Clinton to win the endorsement of the state chapter of the National Baptist Convention, the main association of black Baptist churches.

Last week, she was endorsed by Don Fowler, a former chairman of the Democratic National Committee and the state Democratic Party whose wife, Carol, is the state party chairman.

Fowler and other Clinton supporters say they aren't surprised that Obama is threatening Clinton in South Carolina and that her aura of inevitability was bound to fade as the Jan. 26 primary date neared and more voters began paying attention.

"This is a close race," Fowler said. "Anyone who ever thought this was a done deal is a bit mistaken and perhaps naive."

- - -

Former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards, who was born in Seneca, S.C., won South Carolina in 2004 but is running a distant third now, despite aggressive advertising. Polls put his support among black voters in the single digits.

As they weigh Obama and Clinton, African-American voters sound a lot like all Democratic voters: Obama's backers see him as a fresh voice and an agent of change, and someone who could unite America, rather than deepen the fissures between Democrats and Republicans. Invariably, they say they fear Clinton is too polarizing to win nationwide.

Clinton's supporters cite the New York senator's experience and her perceived toughness, and invariably say they believe she has the best chance to win nationwide.

But in a state that hasn't elected an African-American to statewide office since Reconstruction, despite the large black population, and where at times it seems as if the Confederacy has somehow retained an embassy, a little poking easily brings Obama's race to the surface.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In February, state Sen. Robert Ford of Charleston, a longtime political leader and organizer in the black community, threw his heft behind Clinton, saying that putting Obama atop the ballot next November would sink the entire Democratic ticket.

Having a black leader suggest that a black candidate would "doom" the party caused quite a ruckus, and Ford later apologized. But he still believes Clinton is the Democrats' best hope. "I'm not willing to take any chance and experiment," Ford said Thursday.

Benjamin, the Columbia lawyer who rebuffed Bill Clinton to ally with Obama, said his own campaign for state attorney general convinced him otherwise, and he has faith that South Carolina will put him on track toward the White House.

"For the naysayers out there - and they come in every stripe - who say he can't win, this country is better than we think it is," Benjamin said. "The country and the state aren't where we ought to be, but we're a lot closer ... than we give ourselves credit for."

Wes Allison can be reached at allison@sptimes.com or (202) 463-0577.

http://www.sptimes.com/2007/12/23/news_pf/Worldandnation/Obama_reaches_deep_in.shtml

* * *

History creates 'place of fear' for some

By JASON CLAYWORTH; REGISTER STAFF WRITER
Mildred Otis won't caucus for Barack Obama for president largely for one reason: She wants to save his life.

Otis, 87, remembers America's violent civil rights movement 40 years ago when Martin Luther King Jr. was assassinated.

And, having lived through those events, the Des Moines woman and others fear that Obama's nomination could end in tragedy. "I think there's a lot of people not ready for an African-American to be a president," said Otis, a black woman.

With less than two weeks remaining before the Iowa caucuses, the Democratic party could be poised to embark on a historic nominating process. Democrats could wind up with the first African-American or first woman nominated for president on a major ticket as Obama and Hillary Clinton rank first and second, in either order, in most Iowa polls.

Obama and Clinton both travel in caravans that include Secret Service protection. Neither staff discusses campaign security, but Obama's wife, Michelle, addressed the topic in speeches, and his half-sister, Maya Soetoro-Ng, has recently encouraged voters to set aside any apprehensions.

"We can't work from a place of fear," Soetoro-Ng said. "This is a critical juncture in our nation's history, and we have to press forward with courage. ... I see so much love and affection from such a wide range of individuals. I think we are certainly ready for a man like Barack."

Michelle Obama last month urged supporters to confront their own doubts, acknowledging that people want to protect themselves and her family from disappointment and failure but saying the right action is to show bravery and move ahead.

"That veil of impossibility that keeps us down and keeps our children down - keeps us waiting and hoping for a turn that may never come," she said in a speech titled "A Challenge to Overcome," according to text provided by campaign staff. "It's the bitter legacy of racism and discrimination and oppression in this country. A legacy that hurts us all."

Obama has had Secret Service protection since May. Neither national security nor campaign officials have disclosed the reason for the protection.

The vast majority of Iowa's presidential campaign stops take place at small businesses or public places. Only on rare occasions are bomb-sniffing dogs or metal detectors used.

For the most part - even at Obama campaign stops - people simply write their name on a sign-in sheet and walk into the venue without requests for identification. At some events, staffs of candidates don't even bother with sign-in sheets.

Campaign security breaches are rare, but an event last month provided the nation with an example of how serious they can become. The incident occurred when a man walked into a Clinton campaign office in New Hampshire wearing what appeared to be a bomb, demanding to speak about mental health care. The event ended without injury when the man surrendered to police after nearly six hours.

Mark Daley, a spokesman for Clinton's campaign, declined to comment for this article, noting that the campaign generally does not discuss security measures. The former first lady's campaign stops in Iowa after the incident appeared to have the same level of security as before.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Abraham Funchess, who heads Iowa's Commission on the Status of African Americans, said those who chose to vote differently as a safety precaution have been disabled by fear.

"We have to get away from that self-defeating attitude," Funchess said. "I would hope we would not allow that to keep people from participating in democracy. ... There are possibilities that something like that could happen, but there are possibilities at the same time that Hillary Clinton or Bill Richardson could deal with the same type of challenges."

Valeria Sinclair-Chapman, an assistant professor of political science at the University of Rochester, said she's careful not to dismiss such fears because many times they're grounded in relevant history that is central in the African-American experience.

"The strength of the Obama candidacy, I think, is an indication of how far the country has come," said Sinclair-Chapman. "If, in fact, voters are sincere when they say that they won't support a candidate because they fear for his or her life if they win the nomination, then that really completely undermines the progress that we think we see."

http://www.desmoinesregister.com/apps/pbcs.dll/article?AID=/20071222/NEWS09/712220338/-1/SPORTS12

* * *

The American Debate | A look at what Democrats will say
Clinton will dominate the party's presidential debates. Which Clinton? Read on and find out.

By Dick Polman; For The Philadelphia Inquirer

Here's an exclusive advance transcript of the next Democratic presidential debate:

Host: My first question goes to . . . excuse me, sir, this is highly irregular.
Bill Clinton: Y'all had this extra lectern backstage, so I thought I'd bring it out, make myself at home. Hey, throw that spotlight over this way!

Host: Sir, this stage is reserved -
Bill: I'll just be a moment. Got a little gift here for my wife. Here, honey, open it up.
Hillary: Awww, how precious! It's an itty-bitty kitten! Look how warm and fuzzy it is. I've got real tears in my eyes, just thinking about how, when I was a girl, I petted every kitty in my neighborhood each and every day, and the boys all flirted with me because I had so much human empathy for those kitties. They flirted with me even though I wore thick glasses, which I refused to remove as a matter of principle -

Bill: Exactly, because you were fighting for change. A change agent. An agent for positive change. A lifetime advocate for a change agenda -

Joe Biden: For Pete's sake, can anyone else talk around here?
Host: Mr. President, please return that lectern to the stagehands. Sen. Obama, a question. In the upcoming South Carolina primary, nearly half the electorate will be African American. What will you say to them?

Barack Obama: Well, I -
Bill [bellowing]: I have a dream today! I have a dream that my four little children will one day live in a nation where they will not be judged by the color of their skin but by the content of their character! I have a dream today!

Host: Mr. President, I thought you were leaving.
Bill: That was from Martin Luther King's '63 speech at the Lincoln Memorial. Can Sen. Obama do that? You want to hear me do the whole speech?

Hillary: Maybe later, dear. Thank you, goodbye.
Obama: Let me speak to the larger issue here. I believe Americans want to reject the dynasty of the '90s. They're tired of the old, they yearn to hope anew. Those of you in the audience will find the song sheet for "Kumbaya" on page three of your Obama campaign brochure -

John Edwards: As the son of a mill worker, I was too poor to have a kitten. Every day, a child in poverty wakes up without a kitten. You know, I learned a lot about poverty last year while earning half a million dollars for a hedge fund, and I believe that poor people opposed the Iraq war from the beginning. I was, too, except for when I voted for it. Mrs. Clinton also voted for it. She and her rich lobbyist pals marched us to war and sent poor people to fight it.

Hillary: John, you don't want this warm and fuzzy kitten to bare its claws.
Host: Seems like a good time for audience questions. What do we have here . . . a citizen dressed as a snowman! Didn't you show up at the Democratic debate sponsored by YouTube? Welcome back, snowman.

Snowman: How are y'all tonight?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Host: Mr. President? C'mon, you're not playing fair.
Bill [removing snowman head]: My wife is being Swift-boated up there, and she needs my help. Honey, isn't it true that you and I were both against that war from the very beginning, despite what I'm on record as saying at the time?

Hillary: Bill, let me handle this, since I am running on my own. It's true I voted yes on the Iraq war, but that doesn't mean I thought it was a good idea, any more than I saw it as a good idea to give drivers' licenses to illegal immigrants when I voiced support for the idea. With respect to the war vote, it's true I didn't read the National Intelligence Estimate, with all the footnotes that argued against war, but that's because I was so busy reminiscing about childhood. Did you know I was a crossing guard in sixth grade? And all the boys -

Biden: Did that "snowman" leave? Good. Let's get some equal time around here. I'm the only one on this stage who can out-talk Bill Clinton -

Chris Dodd: Speaking of warm and fuzzy, I'm the only sixtysomething on this stage with two kids under the age of 7.
Dennis Kucinich: I'm the only one on this stage who would sit down with space aliens, and negotiate with no preconditions -

Bill Richardson: I'm the only one on this stage who served as U.N. ambassador, and, in that capacity, offered Monica Lewinsky a job. . . . No, let me amend that. There was much I didn't know at the time. . . . No, let me amend that. I love the Clintons, the vice presidency is open, and I -

Obama: Let me speak to the larger issue here. What we've seen tonight is a demonstration of why we need a different kind of politics. I'll give you an example. Hundreds of thousands of donors are financing President Clinton's library, but we don't know who most of them are or whether they'd expect favors in a Hillary presidency. They'd get none from me. All special interests would be automatically in thrall to my unique life story.

Host: I have a follow-up question. . . . Wait, give me back that microphone! Guards, remove the president from the premises!

Bill: Y'all keep your hands offa me. I just have one question as guest host. Sen. Obama, would you agree there's no truth to the rumor that you were snorting coke in kindergarten while you were writing your essay about wanting to be president?

Hillary: C'mon, Bill, I'm running a positive campaign. I once painted my kitchen orange, my mom loves me, I love this kitty -

Host: Sir, you're being removed. I know this is not your last interruption.
Bill [being carried off]: It all depends on what the meaning of the word is is!
http://www.philly.com/inquirer/opinion/20071223_The_American_Debate___A_look_at_what_Democrats_will_say.html

* * *

*Dallas Morning News (DMN) editorial board recommends Barack Obama for the Democratic nomination*

Sunday, December 23, 2007

America is at a historic crossroads as a woman, a Hispanic and an African-American vie for the Democratic Party's presidential nomination. Two of those candidates, Sens. Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama, were finalists for our recommendation – not because of ethnicity or gender but because they most closely aligned with our positions on major domestic and international issues.

Mr. Obama is our choice because of his consistently solid judgment, poise under pressure and ability to campaign effectively without resorting to the divisive politics of the past.

Race is not an overriding factor for us. But it is undeniable that America has failed to heal its racial wounds, including here in Dallas. We need a motivated leader capable of confronting the problem, and no candidate is better equipped than Mr. Obama. His message isn't about anger and retribution. It's about moving forward.

There's been lots of noise about his lack of experience. It is a legitimate concern, considering he's a 46-year-old first-term senator. But Mr. Obama's experience in elective office matches that of Abraham Lincoln before he became president. And he has served more time on Capitol Hill than four of the past five White House occupants.

If youthful inexperience were such a liability, it has failed to resonate despite his opponents' best efforts. Mrs. Clinton, by contrast, flip-flopped over a plan to give driver's licenses to illegal immigrants. Her campaign accepted donations from questionable sources. When Mr. Obama's support recently surged in early primary states, her campaign tried to smear him over drug use in his youth.

It's a tired ploy that has failed in four previous presidential elections. Bill Clinton twice won election after admitting he'd smoked (but not inhaled) marijuana. George W. Bush won despite an alcohol problem and drunken-driving conviction at age 30.

Mrs. Clinton called Mr. Obama "irresponsible" and "naive" for saying he would talk to leaders of rogue nations like Syria and Iran. Considering the current failed strategy of confrontation and diplomatic isolation, we think Mr. Obama is wise to include direct negotiations among his tools to reduce regional tensions.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mr. Obama drew criticism for saying he would pursue terrorists, if necessary, by sending troops into Pakistan. The fact is, U.S. troops have been going into Pakistan for years in pursuit of terrorists. All Mr. Obama did, in effect, was to keep that option open for the future. To say otherwise is to declare Pakistan a sanctuary for America's enemies.

Mr. Obama, the son of a white American mother and black Kenyan father, spent part of his childhood in Indonesia, the world's most populous Muslim country.

His life experience gives him a unique perspective and a greater ability to build diplomatic bridges.
We don't always agree with his positions, but we recognize his potential to unite disparate political factions and restore cooperation between the White House and Capitol Hill.

Americans are tired of divisive, hard-edged politics. Democrats would inspire a refreshingly new approach by choosing Mr. Obama as their 2008 candidate.

http://www.dallasnews.com/sharedcontent/dws/dn/opinion/editorials/stories/DN-demprezrec_23edi.ART.State.Edition1.36adeae.html

* * *

Racial Undercurrent Is Seen in Clinton Campaign

By Chris Cillizza And Shailagh Murray PLAYERS and PLAYERS
Sunday, December 23, 2007; A02

It has unfolded mostly under the radar. But an important development in the 2008 Democratic battle may be the building backlash among African Americans over comments from associates of Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton that could be construed as jabs at Sen. Barack Obama 's race.

These officials, including Clinton aides and prominent surrogates, have raised questions or dropped references about Obama's position on sentencing guidelines for crack vs. powder cocaine offenses; on his handgun control record; and on his admitted use of drugs as a youth. The context was always Obama's "electability." But the Illinois senator's campaign advisers said some African American leaders detect a pattern, and they believe it could erode Clinton's strong base of black support.

Here's a sample of how the issue is playing out:

From the "Tom Joyner Morning Show," Dec. 14:
Tom Joyner: "Yeah, man, they are coming after you now. So the story about the Clinton campaign putting out this statement not to vote for Barack Obama because he used drugs, and then yesterday I understand that she apologized and the campaign worker quit."

Obama: "Well, I think everybody knows, because I wrote about it in a book 10 years ago. . . . and part of the reason I wrote about it and I talk about it in schools is because I want young people out there to know that if they make the same kinds of mistakes that I made that they can get over it and that they can move on. . . ."

From columnist Derrick Z. Jackson of the Boston Globe, Dec. 15:
"That leaves open as to how far the Clinton campaign, whose poll leads have evaporated in Iowa, New Hampshire, and South Carolina, will go to stereotype Obama as not only naive, but cast him in a sinister light in a nation where black drug use and criminality is exaggerated in the media . . . ."

" 'I don't think these strategies are very subtle,' Obama said. 'I won't speak to the racial element of it because I think, you know, if I were a white candidate, obviously, somebody suggesting falsely they were a drug dealer, it's never good.' But in sum, Obama, who has written about his teenage drug use in his memoirs, said, 'There's been a series of these kinds of tactics that at some point we've just got to send a clear signal this is not what we're about.' "

From Black Star News of New York, Dec. 19:
"So the Clinton campaign decided to use the race card. A senior campaign official, Billy Shaheen, the co-chairman of Hillary Clinton's campaign in New Hampshire, warned voters that Obama might not be the suitable candidate because were he to win the Democratic nomination, those nasty Republicans could bring up the fact that Obama has admitted to using marijuana and cocaine in his youth. Might the Republicans not even ask whether Obama had also been a drug dealer? This was clearly playing to the deep seated stereotype that some white people harbor -- of Blacks as natural born criminals and drug dealers."

Huckabee's Message Simple for Christmas
Practically every candidate running for president is up with some sort of Christmas commercial ranging from the serious (Sen. John McCain's retelling of Christmas in a POW camp) to the humorous (Rudy Giuliani's appearance with Santa.)

The Fix chose three of the ads -- Giuliani's, as well as the commercial by Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton in which she is wrapping a variety of presents corresponding to the issues of her campaign and former governor Mike Huckabee's "reason for the season" spot -- and asked a variety of unaffiliated political operatives for their takes.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Here's what they had to say:

The favorite, by far, of our informal panel was Huckabee's ad. "Huckabee's ad is the most effective because it was first, it is simple, and, in case there was any doubt, it reminds viewers of his singular strength -- that he's a Christian," said Democratic consultant Stephanie Cutter. "He is just so genuine that it really does give you a good feeling," said Democratic pollster John Anzalone, a sentiment echoed by Republican pollster Glen Bolger: "Huckabee's is the best, because it is not political and shows a sense of genuineness about the guy."

Reviews were more mixed for the ads by Giuliani and Clinton.

Of Giuliani's "Santa" commercial, Democratic pollster Dave Beattie said: "It attempts to use humor to makes promises and criticize the process, but unlike Huckabee's and even Hillary's ad, it is more about the process of politics rather than political belief and motivation." Jennifer Burton, a Democratic media consultant, was more complimentary -- arguing that Giuliani's ad "succeeds in hitting his message points and using humor to make Rudy two-dimensional."

Not surprisingly the Clinton ad, like everything in her campaign, provoked strong feelings on both sides. "Hillary's ad is a clever treatment," said Republican media consultant Erik Potholm. "The spot does a good job of bringing the viewer in -- as if they are watching the latest ads for Macy's last-minute, holiday sale -- while reminding voters of her agenda." Beattie was far less sanguine about the ad's impact. "It treats the holidays as a prop, which probably does little to move voters and does little to keep expanding her image as a person rather than a politician."

http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2007/12/22/AR2007122201762_pf.html
* * *

Obama, Clinton spar on foreign policy; Both say they have greater backing

By Marcella Bombardieri, Globe Staff | December 23, 2007
MILFORD, N.H. - Barack Obama and Hillary Clinton have opened a new front in their battle over who is best equipped to lead American foreign policy.

The latest skirmish started when Obama boasted that he has more support than Clinton does from foreign policy specialists who served in President Bill Clinton's administration.

"Why is the national security adviser, the secretary of the Navy for Bill Clinton, the assistant secretary of state for Bill Clinton, why are all these people endorsing me?" Obama asked in Iowa on Friday. "It's not just because I give a good speech. They apparently believe that my vision of foreign policy is better suited for the 21st century, and is not caught up in the politics of fear that we've been seeing out of George Bush for the last seven years."

Visiting a diner here yesterday, Hillary Clinton waved away that assertion as something that "was easily disproved," and said she had far more support in the foreign policy community. But more fundamentally, she tried to turn the issue around and use it against Obama, suggesting his crowing about his advisers was a way to mask a personal lack of experience on the issue.

"I'm not holding myself out by leaning on advisers. I'm saying, here I am, here's what I believe, here's what I've done for 35 years," she said in response to reporters' questions. "When the door closes, and when you're having to make those difficult decisions that presidents confront every day, ultimately there is no adviser."

Both Hillary Clinton and Obama have cadres of highly respected foreign policy officials who served in Bill Clinton's administration. Hillary Clinton's kitchen cabinet includes former secretary of state Madeleine Albright, former ambassador to the United Nations Richard Holbrooke, and General Wesley Clark, former supreme allied commander of NATO.

Obama's brain trust includes former national security adviser Anthony Lake, Richard Danzig, former secretary of the Navy, and Susan Rice, former assistant secretary of state for African affairs.

On the question of who has more Bill Clinton foreign policy veterans, both sides could be accused of fudging. The Obama campaign said his assertion was based on a New York Times Magazine article that described an enormous reservoir of support for Obama in foreign policy circles, but that story was based in part on anonymous sources and did not say it represented a specific count.

In response, the Clinton campaign offered a list of 83 foreign policy advisers. But some of them were minor ambassadors or people who made their names primarily in other arenas or other eras, such as Walter Mondale, former vice president.

After Hillary Clinton's remarks yesterday, Obama spokeswoman Jen Psaki shot back again, saying, "If Senator Clinton wants to make this election about who's made the best decisions on foreign policy, that's a comparison we're happy to make since Barack Obama is the only major candidate who opposed the war in Iraq and refused to give George Bush the benefit of the doubt on Iran."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Marcella Bombardieri can be reached at bombardieri@globe.com .
* * *

Wayne Ford Endorsement Gives Obama Legislative Lead

by: John Deeth - Sunday (12/23) at 09:38 AM

With Sunday's endorsement from Rep. Wayne Ford of Des Moines, Barack Obama takes the lead in endorsements from Iowa Legislators with 20 to Hillary Clinton's 19.

Clinton still leads the Iowa Senate with 10, while Joe Biden has the most House endorsements with 14.
Rumors had abounded that Ford was planning to endorse Clinton immediately after the Dec. 1 Brown and Black Forum in Des Moines, but on Dec. 4 Ford issued a non-endorsement, saying, "In my opinion, none of the candidates aggressively dealt with the problems in the urban communities." In Sunday's Obama press release, Ford said Obama will be "a President who can successfully expand economic opportunity and access to affordable housing for every American - including those who live in urban communities."

The release also noted that Ford's endorsement gives Obama support from all four of Iowa's African-American legislators.

In addition to Ford, Obama recently picked up support from Council Bluffs Rep. Paul Shomshor, while Biden added Reps. Eric Palmer of Oskaloosa and Dennis Cohoon of Burlington.

Only 14 of the 83 Democratic legislators remain uncommitted, including House Speaker Pat Murphy and Senate Majority Leader Mike Gronstal (whose family members are backing Clinton.)

Below the fold, the roll call.
TotalSenateHouse
Obama20713
Clinton19109
Biden16214
Edwards1028
Dodd321
Richardson101
Kucinich000
Gravel000
Uncommitted1477
Total833053

NameDistrictHome CountyEndorsement2004 Endorsement
Sen. Herman C. QuirmbachSenate District 23StoryBidennone
Sen. Dr. Joe M. SengSenate District 43ScottBidennone
Rep. McKinley BaileyHouse District 9HamiltonBidennew
Rep. Doris KelleyHouse District 20Black HawkBidennew
Rep. Roger ThomasHouse District 24ClaytonBidenKerry
Rep. Polly BuktaHouse District 26ClintonBidenDean
Rep. Dick TaylorHouse District 33LinnBidenKerry
Rep. Lisa HeddensHouse District 46StoryBidenKerry
Rep. Bruce HunterHouse District 62PolkBidenDean
Rep. Kevin McCarthyHouse District 67PolkBidenLieberman
Rep. Jim LykamHouse District 85ScottBidennone
Rep. Mary GaskillHouse District 93WapelloBidenKerry
Rep. John WhitakerHouse District 90Van BurenBidenGephardt
Rep. Mike ReasonerHouse District 95UnionBidenLieberman
Rep. Eric PalmerHouse District 75MahaskaBidennew
Rep. Dennis CohoonHouse District 88Des MoinesBidenEdwards
Sen. William A. Dotzler, Jr.Senate District 11Black HawkClintonGephardt
Sen. Roger StewartSenate District 13JacksonClintonKerry
Sen. Michael ConnollySenate District 14DubuqueClintonKerry
Sen. Wally E. HornSenate District 17LinnClintonnone
Sen. Rob HoggSenate District 19LinnClintonnone
Sen. Dennis H. BlackSenate District 21JasperClintonKerry
Sen. Dick L. DeardenSenate District 34PolkClintonGephardt
Sen. Staci AppelSenate District 37WarrenClintonnew
Sen. Becky SchmitzSenate District 45JeffersonClintonnew
Sen. Gene FraiseSenate District 46LeeClintonnone

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Rep. Roger WendtHouse District 2WoodburyClintonKerry
Rep. Mark KuhnHouse District 14FloydClintonGephardt
Rep. Todd TaylorHouse District 34LinnClintonnone
Rep. Swati DandekarHouse District 36LinnClintonKerry
Rep. Paul BellHouse District 41JasperClintonKerry
Rep. Beth Wessel-KroeschellHouse District 45StoryClintonnew
Rep. Mary MascherHouse District 77JohnsonClintonKerry
Rep. Vicki LensingHouse District 78JohnsonClintonnone
Rep. Cindy WincklerHouse District 86ScottClintonDean
Sen. Jeff DanielsonSenate District 10Black HawkDoddnew
Sen. Tom HancockSenate District 16DubuqueDoddnew
Rep. Ray ZirkelbachHouse District 31JonesDoddnew
Rep. Bob KressigHouse District 19Black HawkEdwardsnew
Sen. Daryl BeallSenate District 25WebsterEdwardsDean
Sen. Keith A. KreimanSenate District 47DavisEdwardsEdwards
Rep. Wes WhiteadHouse District 1WoodburyEdwardsGephardt
Rep. Andrew WentheHouse District 18FayetteEdwardsnew
Rep. Ro FoegeHouse District 29LinnEdwardsEdwards
Rep. Art StaedHouse District 37LinnEdwardsnew
Rep. Geri HuserHouse District 42PolkEdwardsEdwards
Rep. Nathan ReichertHouse District 80MuscatineEdwardsnew
Rep. Kurt SwaimHouse District 94DavisEdwardsEdwards
Sen. Steve WarnstadtSenate District 1WoodburyObamaKerry
Sen. Rich OliveSenate District 5StoryObamanew
Sen. Bill HeckrothSenate District 9BremerObamanew
Sen. Robert E. DvorskySenate District 15JohnsonObamaGephardt
Sen. Tom RiellySenate District 38MahaskaObamanew
Sen. Joe BolkcomSenate District 39JohnsonObamaDean
Sen. Frank WoodSenate District 42ScottObamanew
Rep. Brian QuirkHouse District 15ChickasawObamaKerry
Rep. Deborah BerryHouse District 22Black HawkObamaKerry
Rep. Pam JochumHouse District 27DubuqueObamaKerry
Rep. David JacobyHouse District 30JohnsonObamaKerry
Rep. Tyler OlsonHouse District 38LinnObamanew
Rep. Mark SmithHouse District 43MarshallObamaKerry
Rep. Donovan OlsonHouse District 48BooneObamaKerry
Rep. Helen MillerHouse District 49WebsterObama</TD<Gephardt
Rep. Janet PetersenHouse District 64PolkObamaKerry
Rep. Ako Abdul-SamadHouse District 66PolkObamanew
Rep. Elesha GaymanHouse District 84ScottObamanew
Rep. Wayne FordHouse District 65PolkObamaEdwards
Rep. Paul ShomshorHouse District 100PottawattamieObamaLieberman
Rep. Marcella FrevertHouse District 7Palo AltoRichardsonDean
Sen. John P. "Jack" KibbieSenate District 4Palo Alto Kerry
Sen. Amanda RaganSenate District 7Cerro Gordo none
Sen. Brian SchoenjahnSenate District 12Fayette new
Sen. Matt McCoySenate District 31Polk Kerry
Sen. Jack HatchSenate District 33Polk Kerry
Sen. Thomas G. CourtneySenate District 44Des Moines Gephardt
Sen. Michael E. GronstalSenate District 50Pottawattamie none
Rep. Dolores MertzHouse District 8Kossuth none
Rep. Tom SchuellerHouse District 25Jackson new
Rep. Pat MurphyHouse District 28Dubuque none
Rep. Jo OldsonHouse District 61Polk Kerry
Rep. Rick OlsonHouse District 68Polk new
Rep. Mark DavittHouse District 74Warren Kerry
Rep. Philip L. WiseHouse District 92Lee Lieberman

http://www.iowaindependent.com/showDiary.do?diaryId=1711
* * *

Paul B. Hertneky: Let's compare the public accomplishments of Clinton and Obama

By PAUL B. HERTNEKY – Union Leader (NH)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

INSTEAD OF COMPARING Hillary Clinton's and Barack Obama's experience -- a vague set of claims -- I turned my attention toward accomplishments. Not what they've accomplished for themselves, but what they've accomplished for others.

In doing so, I excluded purely personal gains. I also eliminated all distinctions or honors. For similar reasons, I ignored the elections they've won. These credentials are well-known.

Also, like any alert prospective employer, I am informed by what they support, worked on, worked toward and fought for, but I am more interested in what they have accomplished for their constituents.

After graduating from Columbia, Obama went to work with churches that organized job training and other programs for residents of a massive housing project in Chicago. He persuaded the city to provide summer jobs, remove asbestos, repair toilets, pipes and ceilings. He went door to door, offering help for three years, then went to Harvard Law School.

Upon graduating from Wellesley, Hillary Rodham made a commencement speech that moved her audience. She went immediately to Yale Law School.

Obama returned to Chicago to lead Project Vote, which signed up about 150,000 new African-American voters. He also joined a big law firm.

Following Yale, and a year in Washington, Rodham moved to Arkansas and married Bill Clinton. She taught at the University of Arkansas and joined a big law firm.

Clinton established a legal aid clinic at the university, where she taught for two years. Obama began teaching at the University of Chicago, where he would continue to lecture for 11 years. I mention teaching because I consider it an accomplishment in the service of others.

During her time as an attorney in Arkansas, Clinton gave birth to Chelsea. Her husband ran unsuccessfully for Congress, successfully for attorney general, and governor. During Obama's time as an attorney in Chicago, he became a husband and father of two daughters. He entered the Illinois Senate in 1994.

As a member of the minority party of the Senate for six of his eight years there, Obama wrote a health insurance law that covered an additional 20,000 children, a welfare reform law, an earned-income-tax-credit law for working-poor families, and death penalty reform that passed unanimously. During his last two years in the majority, he sponsored 780 bills, 280 of which became law.

As first lady of Arkansas, and of the United States, Clinton served on many boards. She chaired only one: the Task Force on National Health Care Reform, which failed, accomplishing only political traction for Republicans and a setback for her husband.

She fended off prosecution involving the White House Travel Office and her investments with Whitewater. Although these are personal accomplishments, they also served constituents by protecting her husband.

A year after Clinton became a senator, she secured $20 billion for New York City in the wake of 9/11. Among other funding measures she directed toward her state, she prevented the closing of a military base there. Although she is considered to be one of the most influential Democrats in the Senate, most of her sponsored legislation has been symbolic -- naming two post offices, two courthouses, honoring and congratulating sports teams and historic figures from New York.

Since Obama entered the U.S. Senate in 2004, he has joined Republican Richard Lugar in writing a law that funds the destruction or securing of loose nuclear and conventional weapons (shoulder-fired anti-aircraft missiles, for example) throughout the world. He also introduced the first bill, that soon became law, to fund and address pandemic flu preparedness.

In one inspiring discovery, Obama and Clinton teamed up to pass a law that helps hospitals disclose medical errors. It goes a long way toward serving patients while reducing malpractice claims.

There is no way to assess the value of each candidate's participation in collective efforts to serve our country. Clinton has given time to many efforts and lived approximately 5,000 more days than Obama, amassing supporters, money and fame. But time spent achieving such goals can hardly be seen as accomplishments for the good of the people.

Obama's accomplishments show greater efficiency and clarity of purpose, forming productive alliances, making the most of his comparatively short career.

People talk about his charisma, but give me that skill and focus, trained on a four-year term, and we could see unprecedented results.

Paul B. Hertneky is a freelance writer who teaches at Antioch University New England in Keene.
Opinions expressed in this weekly column aren't necessarily those of the New Hampshire Union Leader. All readers are welcome to submit essays of up to 750 words for the editors consideration. Please include a word or two about yourself, along with name, address, phone number and, if possible, a photograph. Mail to: Your Turn, c/o New Hampshire Union Leader, P.O.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Box 9555, Manchester, NH 03108, or by e-mail to opinion@unionleader.com. All submissions become property of the Union Leader and can't be returned.

http://www.unionleader.com/article.aspx?headline=Paul+B.+Hertneky%3A+Let's+compare+the+public+accomplishments+of+Clinton+and+Obama&articleId=11dc4bb6-bc19-4f73-97a4-400fbd3dad27

* * *

FROM THE BLOGS

On CNN, Donahue claimed Penn repeated "drug issue ... over and over and over" -- but Matthews first asked about drugs http://mediamatters.org/items/200712220004

* * *

Clinton Launches Obama Attack Web Sites

Clinton Campaign Registered Names of Two Web Sites to Attack Ill. Senator http://abcnews.go.com/print?id=4032659

* * *

JOHN BRACKEN BLOG:

"I Want Some Obama Republicans"

http://bracken.wordpress.com/2007/12/21/i-want-some-obama-republicans-obamamedia-posts-for-1221/

* * *

THE COFFEE HOUSE Blog:

USING HIS RACE AGAINST OBAMA

http://www.tpmcafe.com/blog/coffeehouse/2007/dec/23/using_his_race_against_obama

* * *

VDARE Blog:

Hillary, Obama, and the Press

http://blog.vdare.com/archives/2007/12/23/hillary-obama-and-the-press/

* * *

THE SWAMP:

Jackson stumps for Obama, history

by Christi Parsons

SUMTER, S.C. — Jesse Jackson Jr. was bound and determined to get some unregistered voters on the rolls. If only he could find them. But the first door the young congressman knocked on belonged to an elderly man who already had a valid voter card.

Next door lived a retiree who had done better than simply register herself. She had a sheaf of her own registration forms handy in case there were any stragglers among her holiday visitors.

Eventually, Jackson just decided to give a rousing pep talk for his fellow canvassers, fifteen volunteers who paused on a street curb to listen.

"This is God's work in the vineyard," Jackson said. "You are on the winning side."
A high rate of registration on his call list was good political news for Jackson, in town over the weekend to promote his friend and fellow Chicagoan Barack Obama for the Democratic presidential nomination. Most of those he visited were fully registered, Obama-friendly voters.

But as he worked his way around the state in the final days before the Wednesday registration deadline, Jackson — son of the civil rights leader Rev. Jesse Jackson, who twice sought the presidency — couldn't help but see things in more sweeping terms.

In a region with a history of disenfranchising its black voters, African-Americans are poised to play a critical role in the selection of the Democratic nominee.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"People on the South Side of Chicago are waiting to hear from the state of South Carolina," Jackson told one gathering in Columbia. "People in Harlem are waiting to hear from the state of South Carolina . . . They are waiting for you to write a new chapter."

That arguably happens even before the first vote is cast. Democratic officials deliberately set the early primary in South Carolina to give a greater voice to African-Americans, who account for roughly half the Democratic voters here.

Democrats are competing hard for their support and addressing the things they care about. Hillary Clinton, John Edwards and Obama especially have been working to identify supporters and to make sure they're eligible to vote.

Republican candidates also worked to reach their voters before the registration deadline for their Jan. 19 primary passed last week. The rise of the South Carolina primary for the GOP likely gives more influence to the state's heavy concentration of social conservatives, who have traditionally had a strong say in the Iowa caucuses.

But for Democrats, this is an unprecedented opportunity. Their last big voter registration push took place in the past few days and weeks, in advance of the day-after-Christmas deadline. The Edwards team say they registered more than 900 high school seniors one recent day.

Clinton's volunteers worked the phones and went door-to-door over the weekend, and also made a few final stops at the barbershops and beauty salons that have become a point of competition for Democrats this year.

And for Obama, Jackson flew down from Chicago to campaign, participating in one canvass in a multi-racial neighborhood of large brick ranch-style homes and tidy lawns.

Angela Willis came from just a few blocks away to help him out. The Saraf-Tulsky family drove down from Durham, N.C., in their SUV.

Danny Kim arrived in a car full of volunteers from Atlanta, and kicked off the afternoon canvass with the familiar Obama call-and-response: "Fire it up!" and "Ready to go!"

"You'll be able to tell your high school classmates you were out here for Barack Obama," Jackson told Noah and Zeke Tulsky, both young teenagers, as they set out. The boys and their parents ended up registering three voters.

Jackson wasn't so lucky. His first stop was at the home of Caroline Bohanon, a retired radiologist and Air Force colonel who didn't need to be registered.

She had papers in her kitchen, and had already signed up eight voters of her own — including a granddaughter home from college at North Carolina's High Point University.

"Is she going back to campus . . . " Jackson started to ask, but Bohanon was way ahead of him.

"She's already voting absentee," she said.

Next door, Edward Porter also turned out to be a registered voter of long standing. As long as Jackson was on his doorstep, though, Porter wanted to express his concern about Obama's safety as a fellow African-American seeking such a high station.

Jackson paused by a white rocking chair on Porter's front porch for a few minutes. He talked about Martin Luther King's speech "I've Been to the Mountaintop," in which the civil rights leader told a Memphis crowd that he cared less about dying than about working for freedom and equality.

King was assassinated the next day, he reminded Porter.

"In a sense, it was his last will and testament for us," Jackson said. "We have to move beyond fear."
Jackson was 3 years old at the time of that speech, the same age as the Voting Rights Act passed in 1965 to protect poll access for minority voters in South Carolina and other Southern states.

As he headed toward his car to go to a town hall meeting nearby, Jackson said he thinks of the current effort in the same terms.

"This is not a generation of Americans that is separate and apart from any other struggle that women have undertaken that led to the 19th Amendment, or that African-Americans have undertaken that led to the 13th, 14th and 15th Amendments," he said. "These are profound historical revelations and times."

As the congressman left his doorstep, Porter asked the name of the young man to whom he'd been speaking.

"That was Rev. Jackson's son?" Porter said. "Wish I could have let him sign me up."

http://www.swamppolitics.com/news/politics/blog/2007/12/jackson_stumps_for_obama_histo.html

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Traci Otey Blunt
Hillary Clinton for President
Press Office -- African American Media
4420 N. Fairfax Drive
Arlington, VA 22203
direct dial: 703.875.1282
cell: 202.315.8117

Contributions to Hillary Clinton for President
are not deductible for federal income tax purposes.

Paid for by Hillary Clinton for President

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Brent Budowsky" <brentbbi@webtv.net>
To:	"John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
Date:	4/24/2015 8:37:54 AM
Subject:	The Hill: Is Peter Schweizer part of a vast right-wing conspiracy? | TheHill

http://thehill.com/blogs/pundits-blog/presidential-campaign/240004-is-peter-schweizer-part-of-a-vast-right-wing

Sent from my iPad

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Jake Sullivan" <jake.sullivan@gmail.com>
To:	"Eizenstat, Stuart" <seizenstat@cov.com>
	"Corey Ciorciari" <cciorciari@hillaryclinton.com>
Date:	7/26/2015 10:00:25 AM
Subject:	Re: Iran

Stu -- I'm copying Corey to find a time for us to talk tomorrow. I have a hunch I know what troubled you.

On Sun, Jul 26, 2015 at 4:52 PM, Eizenstat, Stuart <seizenstat@cov.com > wrote:

> Dear Jake,
>
> At our offices tomorrow, I am hosting the. Geo-Political Group for the Jewish People's Policy Institute (JPPI) of Jerusalem, which Dennis and I co-chair. We will have the heads of ADL, AIPAC, The Conference of Presidents of Major Jewish Organizations, and the leadership of major UJA Federations (e.g. NY and Chicago), along with several of our security experts from Jerusalem (e.g. former general Michael Herzog, Avi Gill, and Einat Wilf).
>
> Secretary Kerry's remark Friday that the international community might blame Israel if Congress blocked the Iran deal and Israel might "wind up being more isolated", is truly outrageous. While Hillary obviously cannot take him on directly, she could stress the following, building on her Iran statement:
>
> 1. While she supports the Iran agreement, she understands and the American people need to understand the depth of feeling across party lines in Israel, and that 70 years after the Holocaust, they believe an Iranian nuclear weapon is a genuine existential threat to Israel.
>
> 2. As she said in her statement, she will give all our allies in the region all the means, including military means, to defend themselves.
>
> 3. The US will be willing to discuss a public pledge with Israel and our Arab allies, in which Iran would be told any attack against them would be seen as an attack against the US, and as with Article 5 of NATO and our commitment to Japan, we would act accordingly with the full force of our resources.
>
> Jake, at his initiative, Secretary of Energy Moniz gave me a 35 minute telephonic briefing on the agreement, and invited me to meet with him personally this week. There is one element of the briefing about which I was deeply troubled. I do not want to put it in writing. Please call (202-549-4454 or 202-549-5776) when you have a minute.
>
> Best wishes,
>
> Stu

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Global Europe Program" <ionratiu-award@wilsoncenter.org>
To: podesta@law.georgetown.edu
Date: 2/5/2016 4:32:01 AM
Subject: 2016 Ion Ratiu Democracy Award - Call for Nominations

To view this email as a web page, click here

2016 Ion Ratiu Democracy Award - Call for Nominations

Deadline: June 1, 2016

The Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars welcomes nominations for the 2016 Ion Ratiu Democracy Award. The purpose of the Ion Ratiu Democracy Award (IRDA) is to bring visibility and international recognition to the ideas, ideals and accomplishments of individuals around the world who are working on behalf of democracy. The award expresses the deep commitment to democracy of the late Ion Ratiu through his contributions as a Romanian politician as well as his interest in democratic change worldwide.

Previous awardees include Jamil Hasanli (Azerbaijan, 2015), Mustafa Nayyem (Ukraine, 2014), Angela Kocze (Hungary, 2013), Aung San Suu Kyi (Myanmar, 2012), Nabeel Rajab (Bahrain, 2011), Oleg Kozlovsky (Russia, 2010), Adam Michnik (Poland, 2009), Eleonora Cercavschi (Moldova, 2008), Anatoli Mikhailov (Belarus, 2007), Saad Ibrahim (Egypt, 2006), and Sergio Aguayo (Mexico, 2005).

Read Now

© Copyright 2016, The Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars , All Rights Reserved.

Ronald Reagan Building and International Trade Center
One Woodrow Wilson Plaza | 1300 Pennsylvania, Ave., NW | Washington, D.C. 20004 | 202.451.4000
Subscriber: podesta@law.georgetown.edu | Manage your Subscriptions | Unsubscribe from All

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Christopher Chase" <cchase@hillaryclinton.com>
To:	"Christopher Chase" <cchase@hillaryclinton.com>
Date:	12/23/2007 2:43:32 AM
Subject:	HRC IA Clips 12.23.07
Attachments:	HRC IA Clips 12.23.07.doc

HRC Iowa Campaign Clips
Sunday, December 23, 2007

I. MUST READS

BEAUMONT

Democrats ratchet up message of electability, DM Register, 12-23
http://www.desmoinesregister.com/apps/pbcs.dll/article?AID=/20071223/NEWS/712230332

GLOVER

Obama Criticizes Edwards' Record, AP/Quad City Times, 12-23
http://www.qctimes.com/articles/2007/12/23//ap/politics/d8tmrls00.txt

Obama focuses on Edwards' track record, trade issues, AP: WCF Courier, Muscatine Journal, 12-22
http://www.muscatinejournal.com/articles/2007/12/22/ap-state-ia/d8tmkh082.txt

Edwards says 'my people will be there', AP: WCF Courier, Dubuque Telegraph Herald, Marshalltown Times Republican, Muscatine Journal, 12-22 http://www.muscatinejournal.com/articles/2007/12/22/ap-state-ia/d8tm28f03.txt

TIBBETTS

Thompson not bothered by campaign criticism, WCF Courier,The Ames Tribune, 12-22
http://www.midiowanews.com/site/tab1.cfm?newsid=19137731&BRD=2700&PAG=461&dept_id=554432&rfi=6

MISC./OF NOTE

Times Democratic caucus endorsement: Hillary Clinton passes the test, QC Times, 12-23
http://www.qctimes.com/articles/2007/12/23/opinion/opinion/doc476dbeaa93608338096560.txt

II. CLIPS

HRC

Hillary is 'polarizing' only because of what rivals say, Bill Clinton says, Des Moines Register, 12-22
http://www.desmoinesregister.com/apps/pbcs.dll/article?AID=/20071222/NEWS09/71222002/1001/NEWS

Bill Clinton stresses Hillary's 'vision' in Des Moines speech, CR Gazette, 12-23

http://cedarrapidsgazette.ia.newsmemory.com/eebrowser/frame/3_0f.ver/php-script/fullpage.php?pSetup=cedarrapidsgazette&file=0@/cedarrapidsgazette/20071223/crb_23surfp003.pdf.0/&section=B%3A%20Iowa%20Today&edition=The%20Gazette&pageNum=B03#

Clinton: We Don't Vote for Advisers, AP/Quad City Times, 12-23

http://www.qctimes.com/ap/politics/d8tmp5ng0.txt

Clinton Makes Closing Argument to Women, AP/Quad City Times, 12-23
http://www.qctimes.com/articles/2007/12/23//ap/politics/d8tmvic80.txt

Clinton appearance set for Sunday night, Dubuque Telegraph Herald, 12-22
http://www.thonline.com/article.cfm?id=184637

Fog makes Bill Clinton a no-show, Burlington Hawk Eye, 12-22
http://www.thehawkeye.com/Story/vote_Bill_Clinton_122207

Political understudies stand in for absent political star: Former Iowa governor and Oregon governor fill in for President Clinton in Columbus Junction, Muscatine Journal, 12-22 http://www.muscatinejournal.com/articles/2007/12/22/news/doc476c84aded6f8708278871.txt

Vilsack said Iowans can make history by backing Clinton, AP: WCF Courier, Muscatine Journal, 12-22
http://www.muscatinejournal.com/articles/2007/12/22/ap-state-ia/d8tm2mfg0.txt

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Blog Post: Union members plan to disavow themselves from Obama/Edwards attack ad, Des Moines Register, 12-22
http://www.desmoinesregister.com/apps/pbcs.dll/section?category=PluckPersona&U=0c5cd9bc447140cb9acb4966e5e98b1d&plckPersonaPage=BlogViewPost&plckUserId=0c5cd9bc447140cb9acb4966e5e98b1d&plckPostId=Blog%3a0c5cd9bc447140cb9acb4966e5e98b1dPost%3a702a2954-9391-416f-a802-739f88cce87d&plckController=PersonaBlog&plckScript=personaScript&plckElementId=personaDest

Blog Post: Bill Clinton Woos Iowa Undecideds, Iowa Politics, 12-22
http://www.iowapolitics.com/index.iml?Article=113969

Biden

Biden hopes late "Mo-Joe" pushes him to 4th, maybe higher in Iowa, AP: WCF Courier, Burlington Hawk Eye, Muscatine Journal, 12-22
http://www.muscatinejournal.com/articles/2007/12/22/ap-state-ia/d8tm18vo0.txt

Biden says election is about security, Carroll Times Herald, 12-21
http://www.carrollspaper.com/main.asp?SectionID=1&SubSectionID=1&ArticleID=5148&TM=45520.71

LTE: Biden has necessary foreign policy experience, CR Gazette, 12-23
http://cedarrapidsgazette.ia.newsmemory.com/eebrowser/frame/3_0f.ver/php-script/fullpage.php?pSetup=cedarrapidsgazette&file=0@/cedarrapidsgazette/20071223/cra_23surfm010.pdf.0/&section=%20%20%20%20%20Opinion&edition=The%20Gazette&pageNum=A10#

Blog Post: IowaPolitics.com: Biden Asks Caucus-goers To Focus on Credentials, Iowa Politics, 12-23
http://www.iowapolitics.com/index.iml?Article=113971

Blog Post: Biden picks up two more legislator endorsements, Bleeding Heartland, 12- 22
http://www.bleedingheartland.com/showDiary.do?diaryId=814

Blog Post: Biden picks up two more legislator endorsements, Bleeding Iowa, 12-22 http://www.bleedingheartland.com/showDiary.do?diaryId=814

DODD

Dodd asks for 'good look' in Coralville, CR Gazette, 12-23
http://cedarrapidsgazette.ia.newsmemory.com/eebrowser/frame/3_0f.ver/php- script/fullpage.php?pSetup=cedarrapidsgazette&file=0@/cedarrapidsgazette/20071223/c rb_23surfp003.pdf.0/&section=B%3A%20Iowa%20Today&edition=The%20Gazette&pag eNum=B03#

Blog Post: Dodd Hopes for Third or Fourth in Iowa, Contrasts on FISA, Iowa Independent, 12-22
http://www.iowaindependent.com/showDiary.do?diaryId=1704

Blog Post: Dodd: "Third, Fourth, First Is Best" in Iowa , Iowa Independent, 12-22
http://www.iowaindependent.com/showDiary.do?diaryId=1704

EDWARDS

Edwards tells '527s' to stop ads, Des Moines Register, 12-22
http://www.desmoinesregister.com/apps/pbcs.dll/article?AID=/20071222/NEWS/71222010/1001/NEWS

Edwards tells Lisbon he feels momentum again, CR Gazette, 12-23
http://cedarrapidsgazette.ia.newsmemory.com/eebrowser/frame/3_0f.ver/php- script/fullpage.php?pSetup=cedarrapidsgazette&file=0@/cedarrapidsgazette/20071223/c rb_23surfp003.pdf.0/&section=B%3A%20Iowa%20Today&edition=The%20Gazette&pag eNum=B03#

Edwards doesn't 'walk the walk,' Obama says, Omaha World Herald, 12-23
http://omahaworldherald.ne.newsmemory.com/eebrowser/frame/3_0f.ver/php- script/fullpage.php?pSetup=omahaworldherald&file=0@/omahaworldherald/20071223/23 _dec.su03iaa.pdf.0/&section=A%3A%20Main&edition=Metro%20Morning&pageNum=A0 3#

Edwards: Industry won't solve health care crisis, Iowa City Press-Citizen, 12-23
http://www.press- citizen.com/apps/pbcs.dll/article?AID=/20071223/NEWS01/712230320/1079

Edwards wants Congress to create $100 billion economic cushion, AP/Globe Gazette, Quad City Times, 12-22

http://hosted.ap.org/dynamic/stories/I/IA_EDWARDS_ECONOMY_IAOL- ?SITE=IAMAS&SECTION=AMERICAS

Edwards: Greed created health crisis, WCF Courier, 12-22
http://www.wcfcourier.com/articles/2007/12/22/business/local/doc476d10b7343ed273557546.txt

Edwards steps up rhetoric against health insurance, drug companies, WCF Courier, 12-22
http://www.wcfcourier.com/articles/2007/12/22/news/politics/bc0f5cb0cf2531bf862573b9001eb20e.txt

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Edwards in Northeast Iowa late next week, WCF Courier, 12-22
http://www.wcfcourier.com/articles/2007/12/22/news/metro/8504f7ebeb2deb9b862573b9001e066f.txt

Edwards rails against corporate influence, Ames Tribune, 12-22
http://www.midiowanews.com/site/tab1.cfm?newsid=19138176&BRD=2700&PAG=461&dept_id=554432&rfi=6

Edwards wants Congress to create $100 billion economic cushion, AP: WCF Courier, Muscatine Journal, 12-22
http://www.muscatinejournal.com/articles/2007/12/22/ap-state-ia/d8tmhn201.txt

Edwards brings his 'Fighting for America' tour to Le Mars, Le Mars Daily Sentinel, 12-21
http://www.lemarssentinel.com/story/1299274.html

LTE: Man of integrity, Burlington Hawk Eye, 12-22
http://www.thehawkeye.com/Story/Buddy_Howard_122007

LTE: What I believe in, The Burlington Hawk Eye, 12-22
http://www.thehawkeye.com/Story/Carrie_Duncan_121107

LTE: Edwards has a plan to end war, health care, Muscatine Journal, 12-22 http://www.muscatinejournal.com/articles/2007/12/22/opinion/letters/doc476c0a9f196b4663949185.txt

LTE: Edwards will put nation on new course, Muscatine Journal, 12-22
http://www.muscatinejournal.com/articles/2007/12/22/opinion/letters/doc476c0ae273fe7296905108.txt

Blog Post: What Edwards has going for Him in Iowa, 12-22
http://commoniowan.blogspot.com/2007/12/what-edwards-has-going-for-him-in-iowa.html

OBAMA

History creates 'place of fear' for some, DM Register, 12-23
http://www.desmoinesregister.com/apps/pbcs.dll/article?AID=/20071222/NEWS09/7 12220338/-1/caucus

Obama vows strong trade agreements, DM Register, 12-23
http://www.desmoinesregister.com/apps/pbcs.dll/article?AID=/20071223/NEWS10/7 12230337/-1/caucus

Obama criticizes Edwards on new ads, CR Gazette, 12-23
http://cedarrapidsgazette.ia.newsmemory.com/eebrowser/frame/3_0f.ver/php- script/fullpage.php?pSetup=cedarrapidsgazette&file=0@/cedarrapidsgazette/20071 223/crb_23surfp003.pdf.0/&section=B%3A%20Iowa%20Today&edition=The%20Gaz ette&pageNum=B03#

Obama's Views Have Changed With Time, Quad City Times, 12-23

http://www.qctimes.com/articles/2007/12/23/ap/politics/d8tmo15o2.prt

Obama rakes Edwards over indie groups' ads, Radio Iowa, 12-23
http://www.radioiowa.com/gestalt/go.cfm?objectid=03C66CC3-D0D5-D31C- C89CA0FF30B696B1

Obama sees energy as new frontier, Burlington Hawk Eye, 12-22
http://www.thehawkeye.com/Story/vote_obama_122207

Obama touts foreign affairs judgment, Ft. Dodge Messenger, 12-22
http://www.messengernews.net/page/content.detail/id/501974.html?nav=5010

Obama to visit the Bluffs Sunday, Council Bluffs Nonpareil, 12-22
http://www.zwire.com/site/news.cfm?newsid=19137999&BRD=2703&PAG=461&dept_id=555107&rfi=6

LTE: JFK to Obama, Burlington Hawk Eye, 12-22
http://www.thehawkeye.com/Story/Virginia_Riddle_121707

Blog Post: Obama rakes Edwards over indie groups' ads, Radio Iowa, 12-22
http://www.radioiowa.com/gestalt/go.cfm?objectid=03C66CC3-D0D5-D31C-C89CA0FF30B696B1

Blog Post: Obama says Edwards "inconsistent", Radio Iowa, 12-22
http://learfield.typepad.com/radioiowa/2007/12/obama-says-edwa.html

Blog Post: Obama: Government should Lift Barrier, Century of the Common Iowan, 12-22
http://commoniowan.blogspot.com/2007/12/obama-government-should-lift-barriers.html

Blog Post: Will Latino caucus-goers break for Obama? , Bleeding Heartland, 12-22, http://

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

www.bleedingheartland.com/showDiary.do?diaryId=815

Blog Post: Obama's Health Care Plan: 'Not Behind Closed Doors' , Iowa Independent, 12-22
http://www.iowaindependent.com/showDiary.do?diaryId=1706

RICHARDSON

Richardson volunteers to stream into Iowa from New Mexico, Des Moines Register, 12-22
http://www.desmoinesregister.com/apps/pbcs.dll/article?AID=/20071222/NEWS09/71222008/1001/NEWS

Richardson calls out Congress, CR Gazette, 12-23
http://cedarrapidsgazette.ia.newsmemory.com/eebrowser/frame/3_0f.ver/php-script/fullpage.php?pSetup=cedarrapidsgazette&file=0@/cedarrapidsgazette/20071223/crb_23surfp003.pdf.0/&section=B%3A%20Iowa%20Today&edition=The%20Gazette&pageNum=B03#

Caucus Digest: Richardson health plan, WCF Courier, 12-22
http://www.wcfcourier.com/articles/2007/12/22/news/politics/7216c148c52c7fe1862573b9001df8e9.txt

Richardson: War still big issue, Muscatine Journal, 12-22
http://www.midiowanews.com/site/tab1.cfm?newsid=19138156&BRD=2700&PAG=461&dept_id=554432&rfi=6

Blog Post: Richardson says Iowans Can Deliver Win over "Smarty Pants Set in Washington," Iowa Politics, 12-22, http://www.iowapolitics.com/index.iml?Article=113970

GOP

Huckabee: Caucus clout stays - if you support me, Des Moines Register, 12-23
http://www.desmoinesregister.com/apps/pbcs.dll/article?AID=/20071223/NEWS/712230343/-1/caucus

Analysis: Can Thompson's late effort pay off?, Des Moines Register, 12-23
http://www.desmoinesregister.com/apps/pbcs.dll/article?AID=/20071223/NEWS/71222023

Huckabee: My campaign proves it's not about the money, Des Moines Register, 12-22
http://www.desmoinesregister.com/apps/pbcs.dll/article?AID=/20071222/NEWS09/71222004/-1/caucus

Huckabee: My campaign proves it's not about the money, Des Moines Register, 12-22
http://www.desmoinesregister.com/apps/pbcs.dll/article?AID=/20071222/NEWS09/71222004/1001/NEWS

Fred Thompson events canceled, Des Moines Register, 12-22
http://www.desmoinesregister.com/apps/pbcs.dll/article?AID=/20071222/NEWS/71222007/1001/NEWS

Romney says McCain flunked 'Reagan 101', Omaha World Herald, 12-23

http://omahaworldherald.ne.newsmemory.com/eebrowser/frame/3_0f.ver/php-script/fullpage.php?pSetup=omahaworldherald&file=0@/omahaworldherald/20071223/23_dec.su03iaa.pdf.0/&section=A%3A%20Main&edition=Metro%20Morning&pageNum=A03#

Huckabee: Stronger Military, Families, AP/Quad City Times, 12-23

http://www.qctimes.com/ap/politics/d8tmnuhg0.txt

Romney Takes on McCain Over Taxes, AP/Quad City Times, 12-23

http://www.qctimes.com/ap/politics/d8tmmcrg2.txt

Rivals: Huckabee Another Bill Clinton, AP/Quad City Times, 12-23
http://www.qctimes.com/articles/2007/12/23//ap/politics/d8tn3ld00.txt

Huckabee returns to city, now with front-runner status, Sioux City Journal, 12-23
http://www.siouxcityjournal.com/articles/2007/12/23/news/top/4b5f2a2c24dad6d2862573ba000fca24.txt

Huckabee Delivers Populist Message in Iowa's Democratic Stronghold, Iowa Independent, 12-22, http://www.iowaindependent.com/showDiary.do?diaryId=1705

Huckabee Disavows Anti-Catholic Sentiments At Church Where He Will Speak, Iowa Independent, 12-22, http://www.iowaindependent.com/showDiary.do?diaryId=1708

Huckabee touts poll climb, Dubuque Telegraph Herald, 12-22
http://www.thonline.com/article.cfm?id=184692

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

'I dance to no man's tune', Ft. Dodge Messenger, 12-22
http://www.messengernews.net/page/content.detail/id/501976.html?nav=5010

In Iowa, barnstorming Thompson aims to keep campaign alive, Muscatine Journal, 12-22
http://www.muscatinejournal.com/articles/2007/12/22/ap-state-ia/d8tm4bpo0.txt

A Rendezvous with Huckabee: Republicans' rising star lands in Muscatine for campaign appearance, Muscatine Journal, 12-21
http://www.muscatinejournal.com/articles/2007/12/22/news/doc476c822ed9b6c514230349.txt

Q&A: Inside the bus with Fred Thompson, Carroll Times Herald, 12-21
http://www.carrollspaper.com/main.asp?SectionID=1&SubSectionID=1&ArticleID=5147&TM=45520.71

Republicans, Le Mars Daily Sentinel, 12-21
http://www.lemarssentinel.com/story/1299267.html

LTE: As candidate, Thompson is refreshingly honest, CR Gazette, 12-23
http://cedarrapidsgazette.ia.newsmemory.com/eebrowser/frame/3_0f.ver/php-script/fullpage.php?pSetup=cedarrapidsgazette&file=0@/cedarrapidsgazette/20071223/cra_23surfm010.pdf.0/&section=%20%20%20%20%20Opinion&edition=The%20Gazette&pageNum=A10#

LTE: McCain right to speak out about U.S. use of torture, CR Gazette, 12-23
http://cedarrapidsgazette.ia.newsmemory.com/eebrowser/frame/3_0f.ver/php-script/fullpage.php?pSetup=cedarrapidsgazette&file=0@/cedarrapidsgazette/20071223/cra_23surfm010.pdf.0/&section=%20%20%20%20%20Opinion&edition=The%20Gazette&pageNum=A10#

Blog Post: Huckabee Delivers Populist Message in Iowa's Democratic Stronghold, Iowa Independent, 12-22
http://www.iowaindependent.com/showDiary.do?diaryId=1705

Blog Post: Doing Mitt's Bidding in Des Moines, Des Moines Register, 12-22
http://www.desmoinesregister.com/apps/pbcs.dll/section?category=PluckPersona&U=e8d13281d6fa4bb3ad8a0c02ca590dcf&plckPersonaPage=BlogViewPost&plckUserId=e8d13281d6fa4bb3ad8a0c02ca590dcf&plckPostId=Blog%3ae8d13281d6fa4bb3ad8a0c02ca590dcfPost%3a5c7fcc40-4505-4218-a16d-2e2a8444d448&plckController=PersonaBlog&plckScript=personaScript&plckElementId=personaDest

THE FIELD

The Tribune's guide to caucusing. Ames Tribune, 12-21
http://www.midiowanews.com/site/tab1.cfm?newsid=19138148&BRD=2700&PAG=461&dept_id=554432&rfi=6

Together we caucus, ... Divided they can fall. The Iowa caucus, is the first big test of a presidential candidate's viability and popularity, and it's one where every person's involvement can reap big dividends - or losses - for a White House hopeful., Muscatine Journal, 12-21 http://www.muscatinejournal.com/articles/2007/12/22/news/doc476c83c6ebd83976154880.txt

Democrats, Le Mars Daily Sentinel, 12-21
http://www.lemarssentinel.com/story/1299266.html

Iowa Caucus 2008: A how-to guide, Le Mars Daily Sentinel, 12-21
http://www.lemarssentinel.com/story/1299265.html

LTE: Caucus buddy, Burlington Hawk Eye, 12-22
http://www.thehawkeye.com/Story/Celine_Schulte_121607

LTE: Iowa college students are Iowans, DM Register, 12-23
http://www.desmoinesregister.com/apps/pbcs.dll/article?AID=/20071222/OPINION04/712220306/1038/OPINION

III. Op-Eds and Editorials

Voter's voices, DM Register, 12-23
http://www.desmoinesregister.com/apps/pbcs.dll/article?AID=/20071223/OPINION03/712230309/1035/OPINION

Spending must be controlled, CR Gazette, 12-23
http://cedarrapidsgazette.ia.newsmemory.com/eebrowser/frame/3_0f.ver/php-script/fullpage.php?pSetup=cedarrapidsgazette&file=0@/cedarrapidsgazette/20071223/cra_23surfm011.pdf.0/&section=%20%20%20%20%20Opinion&edition=The%20Gazette&pageNum=A11#

A plan to guarantee health care for all, CR Gazette, 12-23
http://cedarrapidsgazette.ia.newsmemory.com/eebrowser/frame/3_0f.ver/php-script/fullpage.php?pSetup=cedarrapidsgazette&file=0@/cedarrapidsgazette/20071223/cra_23surfm011.pdf.0/&section=%20%20%20%20%20Opinion&edition=The%20Gazette&pageNum=A11#

No. 1 duty: Protect nation from our enemies, CR Gazette, 12-23
http://cedarrapidsgazette.ia.newsmemory.com/eebrowser/frame/3_0f.ver/php-script/fullpage.php?pSetup=cedarrapidsgazette&file=0@/cedarrapidsgazette/20071223/cra_23surfm011.pdf.0/

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

&section=%20%20%20%20%20Opinion&edition=The%20Gazette&pageNum=A11#

There's no U.S. military solution for Iraq, CR Gazette, 12-23
http://cedarrapidsgazette.ia.newsmemory.com/eebrowser/frame/3_0f.ver/php-script/fullpage.php?pSetup=cedarrapidsgazette&file=0@/cedarrapidsgazette/20071223/cra_23surfm011.pdf.0/&section=%20%20%20%20%20Opinion&edition=The%20Gazette&pageNum=A11#

Pause the PlayStation; focus on Iowa caucuses, CR Gazette, 12-23
http://cedarrapidsgazette.ia.newsmemory.com/eebrowser/frame/3_0f.ver/php-script/fullpage.php?pSetup=cedarrapidsgazette&file=0@/cedarrapidsgazette/20071223/cra_23surfm010.pdf.0/&section=%20%20%20%20%20Opinion&edition=The%20Gazette&pageNum=A10#

Poll-obsessed media focus on strategy over substance, CR Gazette, 12-23
http://cedarrapidsgazette.ia.newsmemory.com/eebrowser/frame/3_0f.ver/php-script/fullpage.php?pSetup=cedarrapidsgazette&file=0@/cedarrapidsgazette/20071223/cra_23surfm009.pdf.0/&section=%20%20%20%20%20Opinion&edition=The%20Gazette&pageNum=A09#

Who elected Iowa?, CR Gazette, 12-23
http://cedarrapidsgazette.ia.newsmemory.com/eebrowser/frame/3_0f.ver/php-script/fullpage.php?pSetup=cedarrapidsgazette&file=0@/cedarrapidsgazette/20071223/cra_23surfm009.pdf.0/&section=%20%20%20%20%20Opinion&edition=The%20Gazette&pageNum=A09#

The '70s live on in the '08 race through Arkansas connection, Omaha World Herald, 12-23
http://omahaworldherald.ne.newsmemory.com/eebrowser/frame/3_0f.ver/php-script/fullpage.php?pSetup=omahaworldherald&file=0@/omahaworldherald/20071223/23_dec.su07mdb.pdf.0/&section=%20%20%20%20%20Editorial%20Page&edition=Metro%20Morning&pageNum=B07#

Obama, Romney best tap into America's desire for change, Sioux City Journal, 12-23
http://www.siouxcityjournal.com/articles/2007/12/23/news_opinion/editorial/5b54e9808f97e123862573b90065bdd6.txt

OP-ED: Obama vs. Romney, Sioux City Journal, 12-23
http://www.siouxcityjournal.com/articles/2007/12/23/news_opinion/editorial/19ffa0edb447abe8862573b9006549ef.txt

Opinion: Caucus 2008: Our Endorsements, Daily Iowan, 12-23
http://www.dailyiowan.com/

Guest Columnist: A plan to end the war, Council Bluffs Nonpareil, 12-22
http://www.zwire.com/site/news.cfm?newsid=19137028&BRD=2703&PAG=461&dept_id=555110&rfi=6

Columnist: People's Business: Looking for a sure thing? Look elsewhere, Ames Tribune, 12-22
http://www.midiowanews.com/site/tab1.cfm?newsid=19137739&BRD=2700&PAG=461&dept_id=554336&rfi=6

Full Text of Articles

I. MUST READS

BEAUMONT

Democrats ratchet up message of electability, DM Register, 12-23
By THOMAS BEAUMONT and JASON CLAYWORTH

For the past 11 months, Democratic caucusgoers in Iowa have heard two words - "change" and "experience" - over and over.

For the next 11 days, they will hear this one the most: "electability."

Hillary Clinton, Barack Obama and John Edwards are trying to break out of a three-way battle for the lead as they barrel toward Iowa's Jan. 3 caucuses by stressing what they argue are general-election strengths that make them uniquely able to win next year.

Clinton's electability argument relies on a perception that she is the most experienced; questions about Obama's readiness; and her potential to be the nation's first female president.

Obama, like Edwards, says he is the most electable because he represents a starker change. The two are trying to present themselves as more electable than Clinton, whom many Democrats admire but also see as a rallying figure for Republicans.

The Republican field has stressed electability less, in part because the candidates vary more on core issues, observers say.

The leading Democratic candidates' emphasis on strategic instead of policy distinctions in their closing arguments to caucusgoers recognizes what many activists in the leadoff nominating state agree is a strong field of candidates who generally align on key issues.

It's also a sign that the candidates are tapped into Iowa Democrats' intense focus on nominating a general-election winner, after trying and failing in successive campaigns, observers say.

"They know that they don't want to screw up and give the party somebody who ends up not winning," said Elaine Kamarck, a Harvard University political science professor and member of the Democratic National Committee. "I think that a lot of the concern about electability goes to the responsibility Iowans feel about being first and getting it right."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Consider the messages from the campaign trail last week:

• Iowa first lady Mari Culver stamped her endorsement for Edwards, a former North Carolina senator, with, "I think he can really rally Americans in the fall."

• Obama, a U.S. senator from Illinois, enlisted Virginia Gov. Tim Kaine, who told reporters, "Head and shoulders above everyone else, Senator Obama is the most electable candidate we have."

• And a new radio advertisement for Clinton, a U.S. senator from New York, by the American Federation of Teachers ends with a woman's voice proclaiming, "Hillary can win in November."

As Obama has edged ahead in some Iowa polls, Clinton has stepped up her claim that she can survive Republican attacks, framing her well-known public trials over the past 16 years as proof she has been more thoroughly examined than Obama.

"When Republicans come out full-throttle, it is always difficult for someone who's not been through this before even to imagine what the incoming fire is like," Clinton said in a Des Moines Register interview. "So, one thing you know about me is I've been on the receiving end for a long time. You're going to be able to count on me to withstand whatever comes at me."

Obama says that among his chief electability points is that he would not automatically have the Republicans rallied against him the way he argues Clinton would against her.

"My campaign is premised on a different idea, and that is that we can stay true to our progressive ideals, but reach out to Republicans and independents and after the election form a working majority for change," Obama told the Register last week. "And I don't think that there's anybody out there who can do that better than I can."

Recent Iowa polls have shown Obama and Clinton trading a narrow lead in Iowa, with Edwards within striking distance. In all recent surveys, there has been a sizable gap between the top three and the rest of the field.

Few Iowa polls show how electability rates among other perceptions of the candidates, although some national surveys show the factor has become more of a concern among Democrats during the fall campaign.

Democratic strategists say it weighs on Iowa caucusgoers, as it did in 2004. A plurality backed Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry, whose military experience lent to the perception he was more electable.

Joe Trippi, who managed former Vermont Gov. Howard Dean's 2004 campaign through the early contests, said caucusgoers this year are even more concerned about choosing a candidate they believe can win, in light of Kerry's defeat in 2004 and caucus winner Al Gore's general election loss four years earlier.

The caucuses' earlier-than-ever spot at the front of a tightly packed nominating schedule also puts pressure on caucusgoers to choose wisely this time, Trippi said.

"In Iowa, more than anyplace else, it clearly weighs in, and I think that's one of the reasons the caucuses are so unpredictable this time because I think people clearly have doubts about all of these issues, including electability," Trippi said.

It's in the front of undecided Cedar Rapids Democrat Lois Livingston's mind.

"It's very important," Livingston said. "If the Democrats want to get the presidency, get the White House back, it's very important to go with someone who is electable."

A USA Today/Gallup Poll taken two weeks ago showed roughly half of likely Democratic primary voters nationally were almost evenly split between those who prefer a nominee who agrees with them and those who want one with the best chance of beating the GOP nominee. In November, Democrats preferred agreement on issues 3-2 over electability, according to the poll.

The electoral map is a big part of Democrats' electability argument. Most candidates tout a special claim to turning states that voted Republican in 2004 back to the Democrats, who lost the 2000 and 2004 elections by razor-thin electoral margins.

Edwards says his Southern roots and message of economic fairness would appeal to voters in states that have voted Republican in the past two elections.

"We all know that Democratic presidential candidates need to lead in those places to be successful nationally and state-by-state in the Electoral College. I can do that," Edwards told reporters in Des Moines last week. "I'm the only one who's actually won in a red state."

All the candidates point to recent polls showing them receiving more support than the Republican candidates in hypothetical general election matchups, which scholars say have little meaning.

Clinton and Obama, who have won in heavily Democratic states, argue they would grow the Democratic electoral map in their own way.

Clinton says her nomination would boost Democratic support from women in all states.

"There's going to be a tremendous coalition for change that crosses party lines and a lot of excitement about the possibility of the first woman president that will give me a much broader electoral map on which to compete," she said.

Obama, who is black and just 46 years old, says his race could bring back states abandoned by Democrats in recent elections.

"I am absolutely convinced that I have the best chance of any candidate of breaking out of the 50-plus-1 election formula," he said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Electability has not been a top issue coming out of the Republican campaigns, in part because the field of candidates for 2008 is less alike on core GOP issues, such as immigration and abortion rights, party strategists said.

Electability has come up at times during the GOP campaign. Former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney and former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee tout their elections in Democrat-leaning states, for instance.

But the USA Today poll shows Republican voters by about 3-2 preferred a presidential nominee who agrees with them on most issues. It is a sign that ideological differences remain a factor in the Republican race, said GOP strategist John Maxwell, who has advised past presidential candidates.

"There are wider issue differences among the Republicans, making electability less a concern," said Maxwell, a top adviser to Iowa Sen. Charles Grassley.

Electability is subjective, a perception voters include with other factors they attribute to the candidate they prefer, sometimes unconsciously, former Brookings Institution presidential scholar Charles Jones said.

"It's part of what you've decided by way of supporting a candidate, and wrapped up in that is your judgment that the person can win and should win," Jones said.

GLOVER

Obama Criticizes Edwards' Record, AP/Quad City Times, 12-23
By MIKE GLOVER

OSKALOOSA, Iowa - Democrat Barack Obama criticized John Edwards on Saturday as an unconvincing populist who passed up chances in the Senate to curb the power of lobbyists and is tolerating presidential campaign tactics that he claims to oppose.

As an example, Obama pointed to a nearly $800,000 advertising campaign being launched for Iowa voters by Alliance for a New America, a labor-affiliated group that is independent of the Edwards campaign but supportive of him. Such "527" organizations can raise unlimited amounts of money for ads that frame the debate in ways favorable to a candidate without directly advocating how voters should cast their ballots.

"John said yesterday, he didn't believe in these 527s," Obama said. "You can't say yesterday, you don't believe in it and today three-quarters of a million dollars is being spent for you. You can't just talk the talk. Everybody talks change, but how did they act when it was not convenient, when it's hard?"

Edwards said in response that he didn't know anything about the ad buy and has no say in it.

"The way the law operates is we're not allowed to be involved in this _ the campaign's not allowed to be involved, I'm not allowed to be involved," Edwards told reporters after a campaign stop Saturday in Lisbon, Iowa. "I found out about this probably after most of you did through the news media."

He said after campaigning in Coralville, "I would prefer that all the 527s _ not just this one _ that all the 527s stay out of Iowa."

Several presidential candidates in both parties are benefiting and taking hits from independent groups that are only now beginning to make their presence known in the early contest states of Iowa and New Hampshire. These groups can be more targeted and more negative and can coordinate their activities in ways that candidate campaigns cannot.

Former Edwards advisers Nick Baldick and Jeff Link have been advising labor-backed groups that are putting up hundreds of thousands of dollars in issue ads supportive of Edwards. Obama says these efforts amount to "huge, unregulated contributions from special interests" of the kind Edwards talks about bringing under control.

"I've got a track record," Obama said of restraining special interests. "I don't just talk the talk, I walk the walk."

He said that "when we actually had a chance to do something about it, I did something and John didn't" during Edwards' six years as a North Carolina senator.

Edwards attributed the Illinois senator's criticisms to concern about the Iowa race.

"I guess he's seeing the same thing on the ground that we're seeing here, which is why he's started talking about me, which is that we're moving," Edwards said.

Opening his latest Iowa swing, Obama coped later in the day with a driving snowstorm that reduced his motorcade to a crawl on treacherous highways. Still, more than 200 people came to a high school in Winterset to hear his pitch, and one sang him a song.

Late in the day, another 300 braved the wintry weather at a suburban Des Moines school to hear Obama's pitch, a sure sign they are the kind of activists likely to show up on a frigid night next month for precinct caucuses. When asked, virtually all raised their hands to indicate they planned to attend.

"You're here tonight, you're pretty committed," said Obama. "Thank you for braving this weather."

Edwards has generally lagged slightly behind Obama and New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton in polls of likely Democratic caucus-goers in Iowa, although the three-way race is considered tight.

Obama also gave special emphasis Saturday to trade and its impact on workers, which has been a big part of Edwards' campaign.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

On the stump and in new television commercials, Obama called for more training and health coverage for workers whose jobs are shipped overseas.

"We're not going to stop globalization in its track, but what we can do is have a president who's standing up for American farmers and workers," Obama told about 300 people in a middle school gymnasium.

Obama also began broadcasting a commercial in Iowa titled "Enough," in which he says he would end tax breaks for companies sending jobs abroad.

"When I'm president we'll give you training before you lose your job if there's a good chance it will get shipped overseas," he said. "We'll give you an education account that you can use to retrain."

Obama focuses on Edwards' track record, trade issues, AP: Muscatine Journal, 12-22
By MIKE GLOVER

OSKALOOSA, Iowa - Opening his latest presidential campaign swing through Iowa, Democrat Barack Obama singled out rival John Edwards for criticism, arguing that the former North Carolina senator doesn't have a track record to back up the sharply populist themes he sounds on the campaign trail.

"I've got a track record," said Obama. "I don't just talk the talk, I walk the walk. John does not have the same track record."

The Illinois senator and his aides also singled out a new television campaign they said is being launched on Edwards' behalf, accusing him of hypocrisy.

"John said yesterday, he didn't believe in these 527s, those are these independent groups that raise money with no disclosure, nobody knows who is giving them, he said I don't believe in them," said Obama. "We found out today there's a group buying three-quarters of a million dollars worth of television and the individual running the group used to be John Edwards' campaign manager."

Obama used the occasion to suggest that Edwards is guilty of hypocrisy.

"You can't say yesterday, you don't believe in it and today three-quarters of a million dollars is being spent for you," said Obama. "You can't just talk the talk. Everybody talks change, but how did they act when it was not convenient, when it's hard."

Campaign aides distributed to reporters a list of television ad buys in six markets covering Iowa totaling $796,610 that were purchased by the Alliance for a New America, which they described a pro-Edwards group. Focusing on Edwards could signal that Obama views him as a greater threat than previously perceived.

Edwards has generally slightly lagged behind Obama and New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton in polls of likely Democratic caucus-goers in Iowa, although the three-way race is considered tight.

Obama also extended his criticism to Edwards' single term in the Senate.

"During six years in the Senate he wasn't passing laws to reduce the power of lobbyists," said Obama. He contrasted that with his own role in crafting new ethics legislation.

Obama was spending his day seeking to focus on trade policy, an issue Edwards has strongly emphasized.

On the stump and in new television commercials, Obama called for more training and health coverage for workers who find their jobs shipped overseas as well as giving them significantly more time to find another job.

"We're not going to stop globalization in its track, but what we can do is have a president who's standing up for American farmers and workers," said Obama, speaking to about 300 people in a middle school gymnasium.

Obama also began airing a new commercial in Iowa titled "Enough" in which he uses the 30-second spot to vow to end tax breaks for companies shipping jobs overseas, giving them instead "to companies that are investing right here in Iowa."

As the voting season nears, there are signs that voters are beginning to focus on pocketbook economic issues and Obama was responding by seeking to capitalize on the frustration and anger many feel as they watch companies move overseas, leaving workers high and dry.

"When I'm president we'll give you training before you lose your job if there's a good chance it will get shipped overseas," said Obama. "We'll give you an education account that you can use to retrain."

Also, Obama vowed financial aid for workers who find themselves displaced.

"We'll help ensure that losing your job doesn't also mean losing health care by giving you some extra money to pay for it," said Obama. "And we'll make sure employers give you an extra month's notice before letting you go _ so you have 90 days notice instead of just 60."

Obama said he's formulated his economic policy by holding round table meetings with small groups of voters around the state, where he hears stories of working families.

"People are working harder and harder just to keep pace," said Obama. "People have lost faith that their leaders can or will do anything about it."

Edwards says 'my people will be there', AP: Muscatine Journal, 12-22
By MIKE GLOVER

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

JOHNSTON, Iowa - Democrat John Edwards said Friday his experience gives him an edge in the closing days of a tight contest for the state's leadoff precinct caucuses because he knows "what the caucus-goers are looking for."

"They're looking for energy and passion and focus and that's what they're going to get from me," said Edwards.

He took a passing swipe at leading rivals Barack Obama and Hillary Rodham Clinton, suggesting they are running far more cerebral campaigns that don't generate as much energy as his campaign.

"Having been through this before, I know what you have to do. I know what you have to do to close and what Iowa caucus-goers are looking for," Edwards said. "They're not looking for academic, they're not looking for analytical, they're looking for somebody who speaks from right here, from their gut, and who believes deeply and passionately in what they're talking about."

Edwards spoke during a taping of Iowa Public Television's "Iowa Press" program, airing this weekend. He assessed a race that most polls indicate is a dead heat less than two weeks before the caucuses launch the presidential nominating process on Jan. 3.

Roughly 124,000 Democratic activists showed up in 2004, and Edwards declined to predict turnout this time.

"What I know is my people will be at the caucus," said Edwards. "If you come to my events, they look like caucus-goers. My people are strongly for me, that's what I know."

Edwards finished a surprising second in the caucuses in 2004, and he said he's banking on that experience to give him an edge in closing the sale with activists.

As the sniping between Democratic candidates has increased in recent days, Edwards warned that activists are not likely to reward those who launch attacks on opponents.

"What Iowa caucus-goers are looking for is not petty, personal fighting between politicians. They're looking for someone who is actually willing to take on the corporate power and corporate greed," said Edwards.

Edwards noted that he surged late in the 2004 campaign, and told reporters Friday he's feeling the same thing on the ground in this election cycle.

"Things are moving, there's an enormous amount of energy on the ground," said Edwards. "The energy and the momentum has a familiar feel to me."

But he conceded the race remains unsettled.

"I think all three of us, Clinton, Obama and me are in a very tight race here," he said. "They've invested and so have I, very heavily in this contest. I think what that means in practical terms is someone is going to come out of here with momentum."

Many argue that Edwards needs to improve on his second-place showing last time and needs to win.

"I don't think you can say for any of the three of us that you have to win because it depends on how it plays out," said Edwards.

He was also asked about comments Clinton made earlier in the week in which she said she would pull U.S. troops from Iraq within a year.

"I was startled by it, to be honest with you," said Edwards. "Having been on the stage with her so many times at forums and debates and hearing her say something very different from that. She's certainly entitled to change her opinions. There's nothing wrong with that. It certainly is different."

Clinton spokesman Mo Elleithee later said Edwards was misquoting the New York senator and that she had called for withdrawing most troops within a year. Clinton has consistently argued that one to two battalions a month could be withdrawn from Iraq, Elleithee said.

Edwards later headed for a suburban community college, where he continued to sound the sharply populist themes that mark his campaign.

"An America where big corporations are favored over middle class families is not the America I believe in," said Edwards. "That's not the America I see over the horizon."

TIBBETTS

Thompson not bothered by campaign criticism, The Ames Tribune, 12-22
By: Ed Tibbetts, Davenport Quad-City Times

About the nicest adjective some analysts have applied to Republican presidential candidate Fred Thompson is he's laid back.

More often, they're apt to call his campaign lethargic, dull, lazy, sleepy-eyed or, in the words of a conservative columnist, "fizzy as day-old cherry Coke."

Thompson, if he cares, doesn't show it.

In fact, he seems to wear his demeanor and his campaign's pace quite proudly.

Take when he walked into the Thunder Bay Grille restaurant in Davenport this month.

Barely had he begun speaking when he acknowledged the criticism. He said it reminds him of his first run for the Senate in Tennessee in 1994.

"It's kind of funny because the same things I hear about myself today, I heard about then," he told a room of more than 150 people. "Does he want it bad enough? Is he ambitious enough? Did he get in soon enough? All those things that didn't, to me, have anything to do with the future of our country, seemed to consume the attention of the chattering classes a whole lot."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In the end, he tells the crowd, his campaign went from 20 points down to a 20-point win. And in a state that Bill Clinton carried.

"I think I know a little something about winning elections," Thompson said.

With little time left before the Jan. 3 caucuses, Thompson trails in most polls, lagging behind Mike Huckabee, Mitt Romney and, often, Rudy Giuliani.

He's trying to change, though. Thompson's cranked up a bus tour, heavy with stops at local newspapers and town squares. And in perhaps the biggest boost to his Iowa campaign thus far, he won U.S. Rep. Steve King's endorsement.

The conservative Republican from western Iowa is a favorite of the right.

"There is only one candidate who epitomized the full spectrum of our conservative values," King said. He said Thompson was the best candidate when it came to appointments to the Supreme Court, something he called a "destiny issue."

Thompson's entry into the presidential race was much anticipated.

There was speculation he would consolidate conservatives unhappy with the records or prospects of the rest of the field.

It hasn't worked out that way, but what Thompson has done along the way is win plaudits for substantive policy proposals on immigration, taxes and Social Security.

On Social Security, for example, he's said the government needs to change the way it pays out future benefits, tying it to the consumer price index. What that will do is lower the rate of increase, something some economists believe is essential to the retirement program's long-term future.

He's also proposed allowing people to create private accounts.

"There's no reason to run for president of the United States if you can't tell the American people the truth about complex issues like Social Security," Thompson said while rolling out the plan last month.

He's also proposed cutting the corporate tax rate from 35 percent to 27 percent and ending the alternative minimum tax, which was initially instituted to catch rich people who avoided paying taxes but now is threatening to ensnare more middle-class taxpayers.

There have been proposals to fix the tax so it goes back to its original intent, but some conservatives want to get rid of it.

Bill Edmonds, a Davenport man who left a job as a car salesman in Wyoming two years ago to be closer to his grandchildren, said Thompson is the "true conservative" in the race.

He said people who just see Thompson as laid back, miss his strength.

"I come from the state of Wyoming. We're kind of the same way. We're pretty laid back. We don't get real excited about things until somebody excites us. Fred is going to be there," said Edmonds, who is a volunteer leader in the Quad-City area.

Thompson is perhaps best known today for the roles he's played in movies like the "Hunt for Red October" and on television's "Law & Order" where he plays prosecutor Arthur Branch.

Thompson gained initial fame as legal counsel for Republicans during the Watergate hearings. And his career got a big boost in the late 1970s when he represented a woman fired from Tennessee's parole board for failing to help the politically connected.

The case became a movie, in which Thompson starred.

Thompson got to the Senate by winning a special election in 1994, then a full, six-year term in 1996.

He focused on stopping nuclear proliferation and, in 1997, led a Senate investigation into the Clinton White House's fundraising.

Thompson faces long odds in Iowa, though he's performed better in most national polls. Here, he appears to be targeting Mike Huckabee, criticizing his record as governor of Arkansas and frowning on his foreign policy credentials.

Thompson may blame the attention to his demeanor on the "chattering classes," but interviews with Iowans say they, too, are paying attention to how all this is translating in national polls.

"If I don't see national support for Thompson, then I'm going to support the candidate who's the best conservative," George Templer, a conservative activist from Davenport, said earlier this month.

MISC./OF NOTE

Times Democratic caucus endorsement: Hillary Clinton passes the test, QC Times, 12-23
By The Quad-City Times

Hillary Clinton passes test after test after test. This Clinton arrived for the caucus campaign with much, much more experience than the first Clinton to stump across Iowa. In campaign speeches and in an interview with the Times Editorial Board, she spoke passionately of people — specific, real people — whose stories drive her desire to solve problems. “I was brought up to believe we were the problem solvers,” she told the editorial board. “If it was hard, that meant America would do it.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This Clinton hasn't shied away from problems.

As first lady, she stepped far beyond the traditional role and took on a major policy issue: health care. Washington special interests villified her for trying, branding any reform "socialized medicine" and even giving it her name: "Hillarycare."

Regardless, she persevered, becoming an advocate for children worldwide and pioneering the State Children's Health Insurance Program, which has survived Republican and Democrat Congresses.

She passed perhaps the toughest personal test. Many Americans stand up for the sanctity of marriage. Hillary Clinton did something much harder. She very publicly stood up for her own marriage.

She passed the New York voters' tests. Twice. Rudy Giuliani backed away from challenging her to address his own health and marital problems. She went on to win and six years later won again by an even larger margin.

In the Senate, she's worked across party lines to pass test after test and earn this testimonial: "This blue-state senator with a blue-state perspective has managed to build unusual political alliances on a variety of issues with Republicans." That commendation was written for Time magazine by U.S. Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., who led the impeachment prosecution against her husband.

We tested her, too, in our editorial board interview, looking for evidence of the partisan rancor that is destroying our country. We found none. Instead, we found a proven, passionate, intelligent leader with a breadth of legislative and executive experience that is the best of a good bunch.

For Iowa's Democratic caucuses, we support Hillary Clinton.

Read about and listen to excerpts of Sen. Clinton's meeting with the Times Editorial Board.

Democrat candidate notes

Barack Obama

The Obama phenomenon electrifies this caucus campaign and inspires thousands of young people to invest their time and hope in politics. Our conclusion after tough, tough discussions: Not yet.

Joe Biden

The Delaware senator stayed on our short list through the entire process. More than any other legislator, Biden exhudes an aura of a statesman.

John Edwards

The candidate who seemed to invest most in the Iowa caucus process won our heart, but not quite the endorsement. He's ready for a fight in Washington. We'd prefer a less combative approach.

Chris Dodd

Intellect, congressional experience and a rich family tradition of public service encouraged our serious consideration of Dodd. In the end, we believe Dodd is too valuable in the Senate to risk a long-shot presidential run.

Bill Richardson

Richardson's colloquial, candid and clear speech is different from every other candidate and builds instant rapport. His deep experience, however, still falls short of our favored candidate.

II. CLIPS

HRC

Hillary is 'polarizing' only because of what rivals say, Bill Clinton says, Des Moines Register, 12-22
By JENNIFER JACOBS

Republicans may hammer Hillary Clinton for being polarizing, but its simply a strategy to block independent voters from supporting her, former president Bill Clinton said today.

You become polarizing not because of what you do (but) because of what people say about you. Thats all thats going on here. She can win this race.

He continued: I believe, I would draw on todays facts: all of our people could probably win.

On the campaign trail in West Des Moines and Boone today, the former president tossed out words that his wifes campaign staffers dont like to even speak: cold, calculating, polarizing.

But he used them lightly, using humor to try to convince Iowans that his wife is the opposite.

Now when people say how calculating she is and how she had a decades-long strategy to be president, he told an audience in Boone, I thought, If thats true then she ought to get 100 percent of the votes. Because shes the only person in history to ever figure it out, that the best way to become the first woman president is .. not to run for office, but to go to small town in the Arkansas Ozarks, in a state that had never produced a president, and marry a guy who had lost his only election for public office, who was making $26,000 a year and was $42,000 in debt.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

If she was smart enough to figure that out, he said, she deserves to be president.

On a holiday weekend with a looming winter storm, Bill Clinton drew about 460 people in Boone, and about 600 people in the Republican stronghold of West Des Moines, who cheered for so long when he strolled on stage that the former president had to wave them to sit down.

I must say youre like an early Christmas present for me theres so many here and youre in such good humor and its so early in the morning, he told the audience.

Rival Democrat Barack Obamas campaign staff, after reading news reports about Bill Clintons glowing recommendation of his wife he used the word positive multiple times when describing her sent out a statement about outside groups slamming Obama on Hillary Clintons behalf.

Obama spokesman Tommy Vietor said the campaigns for both Hillary Clinton and Democrat John Edwards are having millions of dollars spent on their behalf by powerful Washington insiders.

Three outside groups have spent over $2 million on Clintons campaign - $730,000 by the American Federation of Teachers, $486,000 by the women-friendly political action committee EMILYs List, and $907,000 by the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees, he said. Some of that has been for positive advertising.

But the pro-Clinton AFSCME forked over $34,000 to send negative mail pieces explicitly against Obama, Vietor said. The mailer said Obamas health care plan would leave 15 million Americans without health insurance, and quoted Edwards criticizing Obama.

This deceptive health care attack is exactly the kind of politics Iowans are tired of, Vietor said. Barack Obama is running to change this politics and has a plan to provide affordable health care to every single American.

Clinton campaign spokesman Mo Elleithee responded: Just this week, Barack Obama sent out a misleading and negative mail piece in New Hampshire attacking Senator Clintons character. The truth is, Senator Clinton has a health care plan that covers every American, while experts say the Obama plan would leave 15 million uncovered. His attack mail cant change that fact.

Meanwhile, it is not surprising in the slightest that Bill Clinton is gushing about his wife, but die-hard Hillary Clinton fans and some undecided voters in the room leaned in to hear his strategy of persuasion.

He said grizzly old Republicans in Upstate New York voted for Hillary Clinton in the U.S. Senate race, saying she was the only person whos ever done anything for them.

He said: One area that Hillarys more conservative in than the Republicans is the budget ... and shes got a good economic plan.

He clicked through other points in his wifes stump speech, saying she has a good vision to rebuild the middle class, reclaim the future for children, and restore Americas standing in the world.

After going into detail about one of the topics hes most passionate about - clean energy - Bill Clinton said his wifes plans for health care, job creation, education and also have that level of meat on it.

Everything she proposes to do is fully paid for, he said.

At the end of his talk, Bill Clinton said he hoped Iowans would sign a card pledging to caucus for his wife, otherwise this becomes a highly academic discussion.

Obama supporter Marie James, 54, was in the cafeteria at Valley Southwoods freshman high school in West Des Moines, sitting right below a red-white-and-blue Ready for change! Ready to lead! banner.

Her husband, Leo James, 65, a serious Hillary Clinton fan, convinced her to come. Hes trying to convert me, Marie James said. Weve been together 30 years and weve never, ever been split like we are on this.

The first time Marie James saw Obama, at her church, I was like, Oh, my God, she said. But then her husband told her he thinks the reason Bill Clinton was a successful president was because of Hillary Clinton.

So Im open, said Marie James, who lives in West Des Moines. And so is he.

Leo James intended to go to his first Obama event today.

Afterward, Marie James, who had never been to a Clinton rally before, said: I was very impressed, especially the way he talked about the universal heath care and Hillarys support of the middle class. But Im still on the fence. But Im going to be pursuing more about Hillary. I definitely could be persuaded, I can say that.

West Des Moines is Republican territory by a good margin, said Michael Mauro, the state official who oversees Iowas election system, and who endorsed Hillary Clinton Friday night.

Later in Boone, although his mission was to talk about his wife, Bill Clinton couldnt resist sharing some anecdotes about himself, although he was careful to say she believes or we believe instead of I believe, as he has said on the campaign trail in the past.

Chuckling at the name of the Boone venue, an old grocery store thats being converted into a restaurant called the Gigglin Goat, Bill Clinton told the crowd that when he was six years old he was nearly killed by a ram, and still has the scars on his head.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It gave me a very high pain threshhold, he said. It was probably the best preparation I ever had for becoming president.

Hillary Clinton may not always inspire the rock-star-shrill screams her husband was greeted with by some Iowans today, but her campaign was quick to point out that when she appeared at the same Boone venue in October, the fire marshal had to shut people out of the overcrowded room. The campaign pumped audio into the street so about 200 people could listen.

I could keep you here till tomorrow morning, Bill Clinton told the Boone audience before leaving without taking questions. I left out a bunch of stuff.

Bill Clinton stresses Hillary's 'vision' in Des Moines speech, CR Gazette, 12-23

By Rod Boshart
The Gazette

WEST DES MOINES – New York Sen. Hillary Clinton will make a great president because she has an ability to tackle a challenge and leave it in better shape than she found it – a talent sorely needed in the White House right now, according to the man who knows her best.

Former President Bill Clinton brought his sales pitch for his wife's 2008 Democratic presidential bid to about 300 potential caucus goers at a suburban school Saturday, calling her a "world class" agent for change who offers the best vision for America.

"America needs a president with the right vision, the right plans and the capacity to change other people's lives for the better. On all three of those counts, I think she is your best choice and I hope that you will caucus for her," the former president said. "She's a good person, will be a great president, she can't get there without you." Clinton said his wife has the credentials needed to win in a general election, and brings a solid agenda to rebuild the nation's middle class, restore America's standing in the world and reclaim the future for America's children.

"It's true that she has higher negatives because they (critics and Republicans) have been beating up on her for 15 years," he told the crowded school forum. "I think she is the most electable because national security experience will be far more important in the general election than it is now and because she is not fresh fodder for them." Clinton touted his wife's universal health care plan and said he was not bothered by his administration's failed effort in 1993 that she led, noting a number of significant reforms and improvements for children and others came out of that process.

"If you're not willing to fail, you'll never try to do anything, and it's better to fail struggling in the right direction then succeed in taking the nation in the wrong direction," he said.

Jerry Crawford, the Clinton campaign's Midwest coordinator, called the former president the campaign's "secret weapon down the stretch," saying his Iowa speeches are greeted with a lot of nodding heads that translate into late-deciding caucus supporters.

Along with organization, weather on the evening of Jan. 3 will play a "big, big role" in the Iowa caucus outcome, Crawford predicted.

"I can tell you from Hillary Clinton's perspective, we're hoping for a nice night," he said.

Clinton: We Don't Vote for Advisers, AP/Quad City Times, 12-23

By PHILIP ELLIOTT
MILFORD, N.H. - Hillary Rodham Clinton said Saturday that even if rival Barack Obama's claim that he has more support from her husband's administration was true, the statement was "silly" because voters look at qualifications, not a candidate's brain trust.

"This is not a campaign between lists of advisers," Clinton told reporters in a packed diner. "This is a campaign between real people with experience and qualifications to become president on day one."

In Iowa on Friday, Obama suggested he had the support of more Clinton administration figures than the former first lady. Lists provided by both campaigns quickly showed hers is almost twice as large.

"Why is the national security adviser of Bill Clinton, the secretary of the Navy of Bill Clinton, the assistant secretary of state for Bill Clinton, why are all these people endorsing me?" Obama said. "They apparently believe that my vision of foreign policy is better suited for the 21st century."

Clinton rejected the comment's premise.

"Honestly, it's a silly question. We have hundreds of people's support, not just people who were in my husband's administration, but people from all over the country who have expertise."

She added: "It's important to pick the person who can make the best decision, who is tested and proven as a leader."

Obama's campaign disputed Clinton's proclaimed independence, again citing her support of a 2002 Senate resolution authorizing the use of U.S. force against Iraq.

"If Senator Clinton wants to make this election about who's made the best decisions on foreign policy, that's a comparison we're happy to make since Barack Obama is the only major candidate who opposed the war in Iraq and refused to give George Bush the benefit of the doubt on Iran," Obama spokesman Reid Cherlin said.

Clinton said Obama's opposition to the war in Iraq came while he was a member of the Illinois state Senate.

"He wasn't in the Congress at the time," Clinton told reporters.

Clinton Makes Closing Argument to Women, AP/Quad City Times, 12-23
By PHILIP ELLIOT

MANCHESTER, N.H. - Democrat Hillary Rodham Clinton on Saturday made her closing argument to female voters in a message that could be reduced to three words.

You. Go. Girl.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton, standing in a lobby of a YWCA, told undecided mothers and their daughters that her agenda for families and children is the most aggressive to help them. She touted her family care and child care tax credits designed to lessen the burden on working women.

"We can do a better job in supporting families than we do right now," Clinton said. "We give a lot of lip service to family values, but we've never really valued families in a way that we can."

Clinton, on the last of a two-day trip to this early voting state, tailored her message and appearances to female voters with whom she enjoys a sizable lead in the contest for the Democratic presidential nomination. She bests rival Barack Obama, 42 percent to 25 percent among women in the latest CNN-WMUR poll conducted by the University of New Hampshire. She leads overall in that poll, 38 percent to 26 percent.

A separate New Hampshire poll, released Friday from USA Today and Gallup, showed Clinton and Obama tied at 32 percent each of Democrats overall. Her outreach to women underscores the tightness of the race in this first-in-the-nation presidential primary state and the support she is trying to cement in case she falters in Iowa's three-way race.

Iowa's presidential caucuses are Jan. 3, followed by New Hampshire's primary on Jan. 8.

One voter, a self-described feminist, asked Clinton later in Keene if she thought it was acceptable to support her based solely on her gender.

"Of course I do," Clinton said with laughter. "I'm not asking you to vote for me because I'm a woman. ... But the fact that I am a woman gives this election extra significance."

With daughter Chelsea and mother Dorothy Rodham in tow, Clinton's four-event schedule highlighted what could be a history-making nomination. As her campaign released a list of 3,500 female supporters, she said there are too many challenges facing working mothers.

"We put so many burdens on families trying to do the right thing, trying to take care of their families," Clinton said.

She cited her time as a young mother in Little Rock, Ark.

"When I was a young lawyer and also a mom, I learned how difficult it was for a lot of the other women who worked in the law firm _ the secretaries, the paralegals. At 3 o'clock every day, they'd all be on the phone, whispering to make sure their children were there safely. ... It was just such a time of tension and concern to make sure they got home."

Clinton highlighted her proposals to help working women with young children or who _ like Clinton _ take care of their parents.

"She's going to hit the ground running," said Barbara Marzelli, a mother whose son benefited from a children's health program Clinton supported. "She has the experience, the strength and the commitment _ and above all, a heart _ to lead the country."

Throughout the day, Clinton's supporters invoked history.

"It's been 220 years and we do not have a woman as a leader of this country," state Sen. Molly Kelly said during a mostly women's meeting in Keene. "My mother passed away this past year. She was 80. I think about that. Only seven years before she was born did women have the right to vote and we take that for granted."

The history wasn't avoided by Clinton.

"As the first mom who would ever be president, I want to set an example that, you know, being a mom and being a daughter and taking care of your family is one of the most important obligations any of us have. You shouldn't have these really false choices presented to people: We can either be good workers or you can be a parent. You can be both," Clinton said in Keene.

Clinton also turned back to her book, "It Takes a Village." She said families have to work together to strengthen their relationships.

"It sounds incredibly old-fashioned, but having a meal together really makes a difference. It stabilizes your children during the day. It gives them a chance to interact with the family," she said. "That kind of investment is every parent would like to be able to do, but so many parents can't."

Clinton appearance set for Sunday night, Dubuque Telegraph Herald, 12-22

Former first lady and New York Sen. Hillary Clinton is scheduled to be in Dubuque Sunday night, according to her campaign.

The Democratic presidential candidate will take part in the "Holidays with Hillary" event at 7:30 p.m. at the Grand River Center.

It is likely that her Dubuque event will be Clinton's last before she and other candidates take a two-day Christmas break.

Fog makes Bill Clinton a no-show, Burlington Hawk Eye, 12-22
Former president phones it in to talk to enthusiastic crowd.
By JEFF ABELL
jabell@thehawkeye.com

COLUMBUS JUNCTION -- Bill Clinton knows how to fire up a crowd, even when he isn't able to do so in person.

The former president had planned to appear Friday afternoon at the Columbus Junction Community Schools campus to campaign for his wife, Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Rodham Clinton.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

As the high school choir readied, students and adults packed the gymnasium to listen to the two-term president. Then, the announcement was made that Clinton was unable to attend the event due to dense fog that forced his plane to land in Des Moines.

Some in the crowd left disappointed by the news. The majority, however, waited for Clinton to speak via telephone, which was piped through loud speakers.

Clinton was greeted by thunderous applause as he thanked the crowd for showing up to support his wife's presidential bid. Clinton spoke for about 10 minutes and made his pitch to convince caucusgoers to turn out Jan. 3 for Hillary.

Recent state polls show the two-term senator from New York is in a statistical dead heat with Illinois Sen. Barack Obama and former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina.

Clinton touted his wife as the most experienced candidate and said she would provide bold leadership in a changing world.

"If you will nominate her, I believe she will be elected handily based on everything I know about politics," he said. "This is a big decision that you will have to make. She is ready to make a difference in this country."

Speaking on health care, Clinton defended his wife's unsuccessful attempt in the 1990s to provide universal coverage. If elected, he said, she would reach across the aisle to ensure health care reform is passed.

Under her plan, insurance companies would be required to provide affordable coverage for everyone regardless of a pre-existing condition.

"We had to go back to the drawing board," he said. "If you like the coverage you have, you can keep it. This plan would provide coverage to all Americans."

Former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack and Oregon Gov. Ted Kulongoski, who were standing in for Clinton, both said the senator was the most electable candidate in the Democratic field.

Vilsack recounted how Hillary Clinton's support in his 1998 bid for governor helped to turn around his campaign. Like she did in that campaign, he said, Iowans have a chance to make a significant impact this election.

"This time you have a chance to make history," he said.

Kulongoski discussed the candidate's promise to take care of soldiers returning from Iraq and Afghanistan. He charged President George Bush has turned a blind eye to the health care 'concerns of veterans.

"Hillary Clinton has spoken more on behalf of veterans than any other candidate," he said. "We have to once again invest in these young soldiers, these young men and women who give their lives, give their time and their careers to protect you and me."

A day earlier, Hillary Clinton pressed her case to The Hawk Eye editorial board. She met with the board to seek the newspaper's endorsement.

Clinton dismissed statements made by her rivals that she is a Washington insider. Clinton said her record over the past 35 years is that of an agent for change.

"It's about being able to actually produce results. We don't need more false hopes after the disastrous years of the Bush administration. We actually need to get our country back on the right track."

An hour later at the Port of Burlington, Clinton said Bush administration's foreign policy has damaged the image of America abroad. The country is looking for change tempered by experience, she added.

Her husband agreed.

"Hillary is ready to lead ... I know if you elect her she will be an amazing president," he said.

Political understudies stand in for absent political star: Former Iowa governor and Oregon governor fill in for President Clinton in Columbus Junction, Muscatine Journal, 12-21
By Jennifer Meyer of the Muscatine Journal

COLUMBUS JUNCTION, Iowa — Louisa County residents came to see a president Friday, but got two governors instead.

Former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack and Gov. Ted Kulongoski of Oregon filled in for President Bill Clinton in Columbus Junction to campaign for Clinton's wife, Democratic presidential candidate Sen. Hillary Clinton.

"I thought it would really be something to see a president in a small town like this," said Jim Ingersoll of Fredonia. "It probably never, ever happened before. You don't usually even get a governor here."
Fog delayed the president's flight from landing Friday in Des Moines until shortly before his 1:15 p.m. appearance in the community of about 1,900.

"They wouldn't let my plane land anywhere within the borders of Iowa almost," President Clinton said in a telephone call from Des Moines. The call was broadcast on the speaker system in the Columbus Junction High School gymnasium, where students and about 60 others gathered.

President Clinton was scheduled to visit Louisa County last week, but cancelled an appearance in Wapello on Dec. 11 due to an ice storm in the area.

He delivered an approximately 15-minute speech Friday focused on Sen. Clinton's plans for affordable health care.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Our first job is to try to insure all Americans. The second thing is ... delivering care in a more efficient and more effective way," President Clinton said.

He asked Iowans to caucus for Hillary Clinton on Jan. 3.

"It all starts in Iowa with your responsibility to caucus," he said. "I hope you will caucus for her."

Jane Wolford said she's leaning toward supporting Sen. Clinton at the caucuses, but attended the campaign event because, "Who would miss the opportunity to come two blocks to see a former president?"

High school student Earl Martin, 17, "really looking forward" to seeing Clinton.

Classmate Aaron Allen, 18, said, "I don't really agree with them, but how often do you see a former president?"

Allen said he plans to caucus for caucus for either Republicans Mitt Romney or Rudy Giuliani, both Republicans.

Reporter contact information

Jennifer Meyer: 563-262-0525

Vilsack said Iowans can make history by backing Clinton, AP: Muscatine Journal, 12-22
By DAVID PITT
COLUMBUS JUNCTION, Iowa - Former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack on Friday told a high school gymnasium full of students and local townspeople that January's caucus was about making history.

Asking caucusgoers and the students in this town of 1,900 people to support Hillary Rodham Clinton, he noted the opportunity to elect the nation's first female president.

"This is an opportunity to make a difference," he said. "This time you get to make history by supporting Sen. Clinton."
Vilsack and Oregon Gov. Ted Kulongoski were standing in for former President Bill Clinton, who was prevented from attending the event for his wife by a dense fog that prevented his plane from landing.

Bill Clinton was later able to land about 150 miles away in Des Moines, and he spoke by telephone, which was piped through speakers into the room.

He spoke for about 10 minutes, mostly about his wife's health care plan, which he said is broad and has support from "every sector of the economy."

"If you will nominate her, I believe she will be elected handily based on everything I know about politics," he said. "It all starts in Iowa with your responsibility to caucus and I hope you will caucus for her."

Oregon Gov. Ted Kulongoski discussed health care and Clinton's promise to take care of soldiers returning from Iraq and Afghanistan.

"We have to once again invest in these young soldiers, these young men and women who give their lives, give their time and their careers to protect you and me," he said. "They're entitled to health care and a job when they get back. We have to give them that opportunity."

Blog Post: Union members plan to disavow themselves from Obama/Edwards attack ad, Des Moines Register, 12-22

Iowa members of the American Federation of State, County & Municipal Employees union will formally disavow themselves from a flyer some believe is misleading.

The flyer is paid for by AFSCMEs People Committee, a union that has endorsed Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton.

The flyer says that Barack Obama's "health care plan is not up to the job" and quotes John Edwards, a North Carolina senator, saying it would leave 15 million people uninsured.

Edwards has made such statements as has Clinton.

Edwards staff notes that the flyer does not mention Clinton and, because it uses the Edwards quote, makes it appear as if his staff has gone negative, said Jennifer O'Malley Dillon, the Iowa state director for Edwards' campaign.

A spokesman for Clinton's campaign declined to comment, noting that it was not their mailer.

Today, Iowa AFSCME members Phyllis Thede – a former local president – and Angie Barnes will join Henry Bayer, Executive Director of AFSCME Council 31 on a press conference call at 12:30 p.m.

The Iowa AFSCME members will disavow the paid media campaign being launched by the group's Washington, DC leadership, according to a press release sent by Obama's campaign staff.

Blog Post: Bill Clinton Woos Iowa Undecideds, Iowa Politics, 12-22
By Chris Dorsey

WEST DES MOINES -- Bill Clinton sold at least one caucus-goer Saturday as campaigns around the state spent the long holiday weekend shopping for undecided Iowans.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The former president's pitch focused on his wife's "can do" spirit, especially in the fight for a better health care system. Clinton said he's sick of hearing excuses.

Rachel Rowley must have liked what she heard. She's spent several months trying to determine who to caucus for on Jan. 3. She has been torn between two Democratic senators, Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama. After listening to the former president speak at Valley Southland High School, the Des Moines woman is sold on Hillary Clinton.

The former president has spent significant time in time since November campaigning nearly every week on behalf of his wife, whom he calls the non-incumbent he has ever had the opportunity for vote for in a presidential election.

Though Rowley is a avid admirer of President Clinton, she said she is also impressed with Sen. Clinton, especially after reading her book, "It Takes A Village."

"Coming here reinforced what I was thinking," Rowley said.

The country faces many challenges and obstacles in the next several years, and to marshal that change requires someone with a plan, President Clinton said. He touted his wife's health care, energy and education plans.

"She always leaves things better than she found it," the president said. "You need that as a president. You elected her president, she will do a magnificent job."

Clinton also touted a mindset Hillary boasts -- a can-do spirit -- to make change a reality. He cited health insurance as an example. Sen. Clinton was criticized in 1993 trying to get universal health care passed when she was first lady. But, she never gave up, and that fighting for Americans is vital to the direction the country must go, the president said.

"People still want to come here. You know why, because we are a can-do country, except in health care where we say, 'I"m sorry we're a can't do country,'" Clinton said. "We can' figure out how to insure everybody. Every other rich country has, but we can't do it. The insurance countries won't let us, the drug companies won't let us. It's pitiful; I'm tired of hearing it. Aren't you?"

The president is slated to campaign for Sen. Clinton this afternoon in Boone. Before ending his appearance in West Des Moines, he urged the crowd in excess of 200 to caucus for Clinton on Jan. 3.

"She is a good person and she would make a good president," the former president said

BIDEN

Biden hopes late "Mo-Joe" pushes him to 4th, maybe higher in Iowa, AP: Muscatine Journal, 12-22
By BETH FOUHY

DES MOINES, Iowa - Joe Biden's aides call it "Mo-Joe" _ a last-minute surge of momentum and good luck they hope could power the Delaware senator into a better-than-expected showing in Iowa's leadoff caucuses.

"There's a fingertip instinct that tells me something is going on. I feel like I'm still in the game," Biden said in a telephone interview as he traveled to a campaign event in Cedar Rapids.

Aides acknowledge it remains an uphill trudge for Biden, a Democrat whose distinguished 35-year Senate career has been eclipsed by the star power of rivals Hillary Rodham Clinton and Barack Obama.

But with all eyes on those two candidates and former Sen. John Edwards as they compete for the lead in Iowa, Biden is on a high-energy sprint across the state hoping to catch on with enough voters to make a difference.

He draws enthusiastic crowds to his events and last week began his first sustained TV ad campaign. He was approved for $857,000 in matching funds this week by the Federal Election Commission, helping to ease the financial pressure on his cash-strapped campaign.

Operatives for rival candidates say privately they've detected substantial pockets of support for Biden in some rural areas and in the ethnic, heavily Catholic industrial towns along the Mississippi River in eastern Iowa. Complicated caucus rules mean those pockets could produce enough delegates for Biden to have an impact.

With polls showing Bill Richardson's support appearing to fade and Chris Dodd still struggling to catch on, Biden's advisers are hoping for a strong fourth-place finish and say they can even envision coming in third. Their outside hope is for Biden somehow to overtake Edwards, who draws much of his support from the same blue-collar and rural voters Biden is trying to woo.

While it sounds like a long-shot scenario _ Edwards has a strong organization in Iowa that he began building in his 2004 presidential effort _ the Biden team suggests Edwards could stall before caucus night as voters consider which candidate is best prepared to deal with national security issues such as Iran and Iraq.

"Authenticity and electability matter," Biden Communications Director Larry Rasky said.

However, Edwards' spokeswoman, Colleen Murray, said the former North Carolina senator has strong momentum in the state and is the most electable Democrat in the general election.

"As Iowans are making up their minds, they know that John Edwards can beat the Republicans," she said.

Should Biden get any sort of bounce out of Iowa, his team believes he would fare well in other early voting states such as Nevada, where he would benefit from long ties to organized labor, and South Carolina, where he has the support of several black legislators and community leaders.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It's been a bumpy road for Biden, who spent much of the early part of his campaign explaining why he had called Obama "clean" and "articulate" in a newspaper interview and has often had to fight for air time in nationally televised debates. Still, the debates have generally served him well, allowing him to show off his sense of humor and expertise on national security issues.

He's also thrown a few memorable zingers, like saying the only words Republican Rudy Giuliani uses in a sentence are "A noun, and a verb and 9/11."

Biden said that no matter what happens Jan. 3, he's glad he undertook the adventure.

"I feel more passionately about issues now than when I entered politics," he said. "I'm going out, saying what I believe, laying out what I think should be done, and the response is good. There are an awful lot of people coming to take a look."

Biden says election is about security, Carroll Times Herald, 12-21
By DOUGLAS BURNS
Staff Writer

Saying that western Iowa may hold the key to the Democratic side of the Iowa caucuses, U.S. Sen. Joe Biden Wednesday put in kitchen-table, one-on-one campaign time with Carroll-area residents.

A veteran senator from Delaware, and one of the more powerful figures in Washington, Biden spent 90 minutes in Carroll meeting with about 75 people at the Moose Lodge. The senator listened to concerns about veterans' benefits, teacher salaries and even provided a position-paper-length answer on why he thinks meat-packing operations shouldn't be able to own livestock - all in a style that ranged from intimate to theatrical.

The chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, in a late sprint of Iowa caucuses campaigning, stressed his credentials on national security and international relations.

"The next president has the single greatest opportunity any president has had since President Franklin Roosevelt to literally reshape the world," Biden said.

Biden said he is frustrated that many candidates aren't focusing on Iraq.

"I think this election at the end of the day is going to be about security," Biden said.

For his part, Biden was successful recently in getting a plan passed in the Senate 75-23 that, according to the Baltimore Sun, requires the United States to work to support the division of Iraq into three semi-autonomous regions, each governed locally by its dominant ethnic and religious factions, the Shiites, Sunnis, and Kurds.

The regions would have dominion over police protection, jobs, utilities and other municipal functions, supported by a weaker federal government in Baghdad. All three regions would share in the country's oil revenues, The Sun reported.

"There will be no peace until there is a political settlement," Biden said.

Biden said world leaders are coming around to his viewpoint on Iraq - a war, he says, that will cost the United States between $125 billion and $150 billion.

A strong advocate for better protective gear and equipment for American fighting men and women, Biden said it is an outrage that troops don't have the best available armor in theater and the most sophisticated medical care when they return stateside.

"It's a matter of our honor," Biden said. "Our military has done everything we've asked them."

LTE: Biden has necessary foreign policy experience, CR Gazette, 12-23

Washington pundits and some Democratic candidates mention that Sen. Joe Biden would make an excellent secretary of state. During his 33 years of service on the Foreign Relations Committee, Biden has become one of the country's foremost foreign affairs experts.

Nobody seriously suggests Hillary Clinton, John Edwards or Barack Obama are qualified to be secretary of state. Given the state of the world, supporting a candidate for president who lacks the qualifications to be secretary of state carries inherent risk.

Comparing the two Bush presidencies illustrates the inherent danger in electing a president lacking expertise in foreign affairs. The elder Bush was experienced in foreign affairs and wasn't forced to rely heavily of the judgment of advisers. As a result, in 1991, he wisely ignored pressure from members of his administration advocating a march into Baghdad to overthrow Saddam Hussein. The second President Bush lacked his father's foreign affairs expertise, and his misplaced reliance on the advisers has proved disastrous.

I support Biden for president not only because his record of domestic accomplishments far exceeds that of all other candidates, but more importantly, given the state of the world today, we need a president who knows as least as much about foreign affairs as the next secretary of state.

Ray Havlik Atkins

Blog Post: Biden Asks Caucus-goers To Focus on Credentials, Iowa Politics, 12-23
By Matt Clark

DAVENPORT -- Democratic presidential hopeful Sen. Joe Biden asked potential caucus-goers Saturday to remember his "unparalleled credentials" when deciding which candidate to support on Jan. 3.

"Americans are neither liberal, nor conservative – they're pragmatic," he said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Biden touted his record of achieving results as a key reason voters should be interested in the thought of a Biden presidency. In outlining his health care plan, which would focus on preventative treatment of chronic diseases, Biden compared himself and his plan to the proposals put forth by his Democratic challengers. Barack Obama, Hillary Clinton, and John Edwards are “good people with decent plans,” Biden said, adding his plan was the best because it is the clearest and easiest to understand for Americans.

“I have a history of taking complicated issues and articulating them to the public in a way that can be understood,’ Biden said.

The Delaware senator is hoping his talent for making the often-dense intricacies of public policy clear to caucus-goers will result in support for his candidacy. With just two weeks left until the Iowa caucuses, Biden remains optimistic that if voters hear what he has to say they will make him the Democratic nominee, to the surprise of pollers who consistently put Biden in the second-tier of candidates.

“When we win this election, it will have started here on the Mississippi River, in the Quad Cities,” he said. “With your help, we’re going to shock the devil out of them.”

Anita Ohren of Davenport said she will be caucusing for Biden because of his Iraq exit strategy.

“His experience with world leaders and his knowledge of the warring factions within nations is amazing,” Ohren said. “Americans are being robbed by the flawed foreign and domestic policies of the Bush administration, and Biden is the best guy to turn that around.”

Biden said his administration would “fundamentally change the way Republicans spend money.” He explained that ending the war in Iraq, rolling back tax cuts for wealthy Americans, and cutting funding for out-of-date and unnecessary weapons systems would free up $350 billion from the budget. Biden said his plans for public health care, education reform, and other spending initiatives would cost $170 billion at the most, leaving nearly $200 billion to put toward balancing the budget and reducing the deficit.

Acknowledging his goals were ambitious, Biden explained that while some have accused the Democrats of being timid, “that adjective has never been assigned to me.”

Another Quad Cities resident is sure Biden has what it takes to be the next president. Stephanie Callaway blamed the media for labeling Biden a long shot, saying his message is resounding with voters, but the press is not paying attention.

“Biden is right where John Kerry was in the 2004 race,” Callaway said. “He is set to win over undecided voters and come out strong in the early states. The media decided early on who they wanted, creating a buzz around certain candidates rather than following the progress of people like Joe Biden.”

The senator introduced those in attendance to his two sons who have been campaigning with him, and his niece who recently became part of his staff. He thanked his family for their support, likening the experience of campaigning in Iowa to the expression “if you build it, they will come” from the movie, “Field of Dreams.”

“Hold a caucus, and the Bidens show up,” he said.

Blog Post: Biden picks up two more legislator endorsements, Bleeding Heartland, 12-22
by: Chris Woods

Potential sleeper candidate Joe Biden picked up two more state legislator endorsements this morning. From a Biden for President campaign release:
"Today, Sen. Joe Biden received endorsements from two key Iowa elected officials. State Representatives Dennis Cohoon of Burlington and Eric Palmer of Oskaloosa become the 15th and 16th Iowa State legislators to endorse Sen. Biden.

"I am supporting Sen. Biden because he's the most prepared to be president from Day One," said Rep. Cohoon. "And as a high school special education teacher for thirty years, I know Sen. Biden can accomplish the education reforms we need to get kids in preschool earlier and give them the opportunity to go to college."

Rep. Palmer stressed Sen. Biden's experience in world affairs and his commitment to civil rights: "The Des Moines Register talked about knowledge and experience in their endorsement. To me Joe Biden exhibits real knowledge and experience in foreign affairs and his understanding of the constitution, both qualities not exhibited by this White House. As Vice-Chair of the House Judiciary Committee, I am particularly impressed with Sen. Biden's expertise in constitutional law, which will be critical to getting America back on track.""

Like the release says, that brings his endorsement total to 16. And trust me, that's a lot in the state legislator race and puts him just behind Clinton and Obama. That bodes well for Biden in terms of organization and contacts. State legislators have strong local connections that help them get elected in the first place. Their opinion matters if nothing more than to help Iowans pick a solid second choice.
Now, don't get me wrong, these endorsements aren't going to catapult Joe Biden into the top three. But they could help him a lot. If any of the three front-runners do poorly in terms of rural organizing or see troubles in viability, Joe Biden could see a boost. And with his Iraq policy and seriousness he still captures Iowans' attention to at least listen to him. The question is what kind of crowd will show up to the caucuses on January 3rd.

DODD

Dodd asks for ‘good look’ in Coralville, CR Gazette, 12-23
By Erika Binegar
The Gazette

CORALVILLE — Presidential hopeful Sen. Chris Dodd, D-Conn., expressed confidence Iowa voters will choose the next Democratic Party nominee based on who they believe has the experience to bring about real change, rather than on celebrity endorsements.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Iowans, he added, have the job of weeding the candidate pool.

"I've been impressed over the years here, that you've not been diverted by money, or glitter or celebrities," Dodd said, "that you've cut through all that." Dodd asked a crowd of about 40 in the Old Town Hall, 406 Second Ave., on Saturday to give him the chance to continue making his case. "In the next 11 days, I hope you'll give me a good look." He garnered applause from the crowd after joking his talk Saturday would be much shorter than his 11-hour speech on the Senate floor last Monday. "I'm not going to engage in a filibuster here," he said, referring to his effort last week to block a bill that would have shielded from lawsuits telecommunications companies that helped the government tap American communications after Sept. 11.

Dodd cited the proposed legislation as an example of how President Bush has sacrificed rights in the name of safety. "That is a dangerous, dangerous notion," Dodd said. "We are more secure because we fight and defend those rights." The senator was in town on a "12 Days of Results Tour," during which — as a play on the 12 Days of Christmas — he highlighted his record of results on a particular issue each day. On Saturday, it was democracy and the right to vote.

Dodd pointed to his work on the Help America Vote Act of 2002, which flooded additional resources into communities to improve voting procedures and authorized statewide registration and provisional ballots. The 26-year senator also drew on life experiences to prove he's most qualified for the job. "I didn't cram for this meeting here today," he said.

Instead, he talked of an upbringing that anchored his belief in the Constitution, his time in the military and Peace Corps, and his work passing landmark child care legislation and the Family and Medical Leave Act — proof he can reach across party lines to make a difference, he said.

"He understands how you have to compromise to make progress," John McNamara, 56, of Coralville said after the event. McNamara said he was impressed with Dodd's pas sion and knowledge, but added he's still unsure who he'll caucus for. "He's deserving of the White House, whether he gets there or not." Dodd, who is scheduled to remain in Iowa with his family through the holidays, said he posted a sign reading, "Dear Santa, we're in Iowa," outside his Connecticut home to put his daughter, Grace, 6, at ease. He has scheduled stops today in Clinton, Muscatine, Burlington and Fairfield. He'll finish his "12 days" tour Monday in Carroll.

Blog Post: Dodd Hopes for Third or Fourth in Iowa, Contrasts on FISA, Iowa Independent, 12-22
John Deeth

At a stop at Iowa City's Hamburg Inn, Chris Dodd told Iowa Independent that "third or fourth" would be a good showing in Iowa, but "first is best."

Dodd spent close to an hour at the politically famous diner, offering no speech but speaking with every one of about 50 every patrons, sometimes at length. Owner Dave Panther said Dodd was the sixth candidate to visit this cycle, joining fellow Democrats Joe Biden, John Edwards and Barack Obama, Republican John McCain and Green Cynthia McKinney. Three candidate's spouses -- Elizabeth Edwards, Jackie Dodd and former president Bill Clinton -- have also visited.

It was the second of Dodd's three Johnson County stops in 24 hours. Friday night, Dodd spoke at the Knights of Columbus Hall, where he won the endorsement of Iowa City Council member-elect Matt Hayek. "We need an adult in the room," Hayek said after the event. "Our next president won't have the luxury of getting up to speed internationally."

Dodd discussed his recent FISA filibuster with Iowa Independent at the Hamburg Inn.

Deeth: How's the FISA work that you did playing out on the campaign trail?

Dodd: I'm impressed how many people are aware of it, because the mainstream media wouldn't hardly cover it. People wonder whether or not blogs and the internet are having any value, and this story would have been buried away, forever maybe, and they might have gotten away with it. But we had 500,000 emails sent to members of Congress through our campaign office by the way, that was through our office and I respect that people did it. People expressing their concern about this had a lot of influence, I think, on people deciding they were going to pull this bill off the floor of the Senate. So it made a big difference, and people here this morning have certainly thanked me for making that trip back to Washington to be there to defeat that legislation.

Deeth. Some of the other Senators who are doing the same thing you're doing didn't go back.

Dodd: No, and they all went back for the farm bill, because that was good politics in Iowa. But the Constitution is what you swore to uphold when you are inaugurated or confirmed in the Senate, that's what you do when you take an oath of office. To me there's nothing more important, and this administration's had an assault on the Constitution for the last six years, and they continue to do it almost on a daily basis. If you can't come back and defend the constitution, I mean, this is a time when we need people to do that. If you let it pass and exonerate the phone companies who've vacuumed up people's phone messages, emails for five long years without a court order at the behest of the Bush administration, and they want to pretend it never happened, is just wrong. And that's why I stood up for 11 hours on the floor of the Senate and pushed back, and they finally pulled the bill out. That's going to come back in January, so we're not done with defeating that. It's a temporary victory, and I'm hoping next time I'll get some more members to come back to be a part of it. If you want to be President of the United States, you've got to lead, not just talk.

Deeth: You were saying last night at the Knights of Columbus that you were the best able to work across the aisle. So far this week I've heard Senator Obama and Senator Clinton also say exactly the same thing. What makes you more effective at working across the aisle than the other candidates who are claiming the same thing?

Dodd: Because I have. I mean, it's a simple record, it's one thing to say it, it's another to have done it. For 26 years, going back to the very first major legislation I was involved in, all the way up till just a week ago on Darfur. People say they are that way, I've actually done it. On the Family and Medical Leave, child care, all those I've done over the years really dozens and dozens, including fourteen pieces of legislation in the last two weeks that have become the law of the land as a result of my working with Dick Shelby, the Republican from Alabama, to get it done. So other people can say it, it's one thing to say it. But the question you want to ask is, where have you done this? What confidence do I have? Of course everyone wants to say that, but I think I'm the only one who's actually done it.

Deeth: You've been working really, really hard here in Iowa, literally staying in Iowa for a while, yet you're still lagging number-wise. What do you have to do to go on from Iowa?

Dodd: I think polls here don't mean as much as they do other places. It's a question of celebrity to some extent, and I think people are getting much more serious about this with ten or 11 days to go here before Jan. 3, and you need to have a good showing here. I don't know what that showing means, it depends where the others are.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Deeth: What's good?

Dodd: Well, you know, third, fourth, first is best here... and I'm hoping Iowans will recognize that it's important of those of us who've had something to say... I've been the most outspoken on the Constitution, the most outspoken on the Iraq war. I bring military service, Peace Corps service, I'm a person who can actually, with proven results bring Democrats and Republicans together. If that's what people are interested in, I think I'm an ideal candidate for Iowans.

Also at the Hamburg Inn was Jim Larew, chief legal counsel to Governor Culver, dining with former state legislator Dave Osterberg of Mt. Vernon. Larew, a leading backer of John Edwards in 2004, was pleased with First Lady Mari Culver's Edwards endorsement, though he was careful to note that the governor himself is neutral. Larew said the governor has "released" his staff to follow their conscience and support the candidates of their choice, and though Larew is busy he hopes to help Edwards again in the remaining days.

Patricia McMichael of Iowa City was signing a Dodd pledge card at the Hamburg. "He's a statesman," she said," and we need that."

Blog Post: Dodd: "Third, Fourth, First Is Best" in Iowa , Iowa Independent, 12-22
by: John Deeth

At a stop at Iowa City's Hamburg Inn, Chris Dodd told Iowa Independent that "third or fourth" would be a good showing in Iowa, but "first is best."

David Osterberg and Jim Larew with Dodd

Dodd spent close to an hour at the politically famous diner, offering no speech but speaking with every one of about 50 every patrons, sometimes at length. Owner Dave Panther said Dodd was the sixth candidate to visit this cycle, joining fellow Democrats Joe Biden, John Edwards and Barack Obama, Republican John McCain and Green Cynthia McKinney. Three candidate's spouses -- Elizabeth Edwards, Jackie Dodd and former president Bill Clinton -- have also visited.

John Deeth :: Dodd: "Third, Fourth, First Is Best" in Iowa

Matt Hayek with Dodd Friday.
It was the second of Dodd's three Johnson County stops in 24 hours. Friday night, Dodd spoke at the Knights of Columbus Hall, where he won the endorsement of Iowa City Council member-elect Matt Hayek. "We need an adult in the room," Hayek said after the event. "Our next president won't have the luxury of getting up to speed internationally."

Dodd discussed his recent FISA filibuster with Iowa Independent at the Hamburg Inn.

Deeth: How's the FISA work that you did playing out on the campaign trail?
Dodd: I'm impressed how many people are aware of it, because the mainstream media wouldn't hardly cover it. People wonder whether or not blogs and the internet are having any value, and this story would have been buried away, forever maybe, and they might have gotten away with it. But we had 500,000 emails sent to members of Congress through our campaign office by the way, that was through our office and I respect that people did it. People expressing their concern about this had a lot of influence, I think, on people deciding they were going to pull this bill off the floor of the Senate. So it made a big difference, and people here this morning have certainly thanked me for making that trip back to Washington to be there to defeat that legislation.

Deeth. Some of the other Senators who are doing the same thing you're doing didn't go back.

Dodd: No, and they all went back for the farm bill, because that was good politics in Iowa. But the Constitution is what you swore to uphold when you are inaugurated or confirmed in the Senate, that's what you do when you take an oath of office. To me there's nothing more important, and this administration's had an assault on the Constitution for the last six years, and they continue to do it almost on a daily basis. If you can't come back and defend the constitution, I mean, this is a time when we need people to do that. If you let it pass and exonerate the phone companies who've vacuumed up people's phone messages, emails for five long years without a court order at the behest of the Bush administration, and they want to pretend it never happened, is just wrong. And that's why I stood up for 11 hours on the floor of the Senate and pushed back, and they finally pulled the bill out. That's going to come back in January, so we're not done with defeating that. It's a temporary victory, and I'm hoping next time I'll get some more members to come back to be a part of it. If you want to be President of the United States, you've got to lead, not just talk.

Deeth: You were saying last night at the Knights of Columbus that you were the best able to work across the aisle. So far this week I've heard Senator Obama and Senator Clinton also say exactly the same thing. What makes you more effective at working across the aisle than the other candidates who are claiming the same thing?

Dodd: Because I have. I mean, it's a simple record, it's one thing to say it, it's another to have done it. For 26 years, going back to the very first major legislation I was involved in, all the way up till just a week ago on Darfur. People say they are that way, I've actually done it. On the Family and Medical Leave, child care, all those I've done over the years really dozens and dozens, including fourteen pieces of legislation in the last two weeks that have become the law of the land as a result of my working with Dick Shelby, the Republican from Alabama, to get it done. So other people can say it, it's one thing to say it. But the question you want to ask is, where have you done this? What confidence do I have? Of course everyone wants to say that, but I think I'm the only one who's actually done it.

Deeth: You've been working really, really hard here in Iowa, literally staying in Iowa for a while, yet you're still lagging number-wise. What do you have to do to go on from Iowa?

Dodd: I think polls here don't mean as much as they do other places. It's a question of celebrity to some extent, and I think people are getting much more serious about this with ten or 11 days to go here before Jan. 3, and you need to have a good showing here. I don't know what that showing means, it depends where the others are.

Deeth: What's good?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Dodd: Well, you know, third, fourth, first is best here... and I'm hoping Iowans will recognize that it's important of those of us who've had something to say... I've been the most outspoken on the Constitution, the most outspoken on the Iraq war. I bring military service, Peace Corps service, I'm a person who can actually, with proven results bring Democrats and Republicans together. If that's what people are interested in, I think I'm an ideal candidate for Iowans.

Also at the Hamburg Inn was Jim Larew, chief legal counsel to Governor Culver, dining with former state legislator Dave Osterberg of Mt. Vernon. Larew, a leading backer of John Edwards in 2004, was pleased with First Lady Mari Culver's Edwards endorsement, though he was careful to note that the governor himself is neutral. Larew said the governor has "released" his staff to follow their conscience and support the candidates of their choice, and though Larew is busy he hopes to help Edwards again in the remaining days.

Patricia McMichael of Iowa City was signing a Dodd pledge card at the Hamburg. "He's a statesman," she said, " and we need that."

EDWARDS

Edwards tells '527s' to stop ads, Des Moines Register, 12-22
By TONY LEYS

Lisbon, Ia. Presidential candidate John Edwards declared Saturday that the country should ban independent political groups that buy ads flattering or trashing candidates, and he said he wished that groups running ads favoring him would stop doing so.

After a rally here, the former North Carolina senator told reporters that by law, he can have no control or over such groups, known as 527s.

I cant talk to them at all, he said. When asked if he would say publicly that he wished the groups would stop running ads for him, Edwards changed the subject. But later, in Coralville, he said that he did wish the groups would drop the ads.

I would encourage all the 527s, not just this one, but all the 527s to stay out of it, he said. But I have no legal authority over that.

Edwards trails his two top Democratic competitors in fund-raising, and he often says that the campaign-finance system should be drastically changed to increase transparency and limit the role of corporations and lobbyists.

Rival candidate Barack Obama criticized Edwards earlier Saturday for benefiting from the 527 groups ads while saying the groups should be banned. Obama said in Oskaloosa that Edwards former campaign manager is working with one of the groups.

You cant just talk the talk, Obama said, according to a transcript provided by his campaign. The easiest thing in the world is to talk about change during election time.

One of the groups running pro-Edwards radio ads is associated with several locals of the Service Employees International Union.

As it happened, an SEIU leader was sitting in Edwards audience in Lisbon Saturday. Cathy Glasson is president of an SEIU local that covers most of Iowa and has endorsed Edwards.

Glasson, wearing one of her SEIUs trademark purple shirts, acknowledged that her union has a 527 group that has been running Iowa radio ads complimentary of Edwards.

She said she understands the criticisms of such groups, including that their finances are not made public, and she has heard calls for them to be banned. I dont think thats necessarily wrong, she said.

But we have to live in the situation were in.

Edwards speculated that his surging strength in Iowa spurred Obamas criticism.

Edwards tells Lisbon he feels momentum again, CR Gazette, 12-23
By James Q. Lynch
The Gazette
LISBON – Four years ago, when he was polling in the single digits, John Edwards kept telling reporters that his campaign for the Democratic presidential nomination was picking up momentum that would surprise people on caucus night.
Now in the thick of a threeway statistical dead heat at the front of the Democratic field less than two weeks from the Jan. 3, Edwards says he getting that feeling again.
“I believe it’s happening right now,” the former North Carolina senator said after speaking to about 300 people at Lisbon High School on Saturday afternoon. “I can see it in the energy and the enthusiasm at the events.” More than that, Edwards, who was the party’s vice presidential candidate in 2004, hears it from people who come up to him after his events.
“I can see it when people come to me after the events and say ‘I came here for Obama, I came here deciding between you and Obama — which is what I hear more often, and I’m for you. I’m committing right now,’” said Edwards, who consistently has trailed Sens. Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama in polls.
“I had a bunch of people tell me that right up there in the middle of that event.” That didn’t surprise Nate Willems, an Edwards supporter from Lisbon, who predicted the former trial attorney would carry caucuses in the southeastern Linn County community. Other candidates might fare better in caucuses dominated by professional and white-collar voters, but Willems thinks Edwards’ promise to fight for working people against corporate greed will play well in blue-collar communities.
“His appeal isn’t personality-driven,” Willems said. “Edwards stands for what the Democratic party is supposed to stand for.” That was the thrust of Ed wards’ comments Saturday.
Focusing on “corporate greed controlling our democracy,” Edwards told his audience that people with the top 1 percent of incomes are taking in twice as much as they did a quarter of a century ago while 35 million Americans go hungry, 47 million are uninsured and 200,000 veterans are homeless. “Enough is enough,” Edwards said. “It’s time to tell the truth and the truth is corporate greed is stealing our children’s future.” He predicted that on Jan. 3, “right here in Iowa, you’re going to rise up and say enough is enough. You’re going to start a wave of change and

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

American is going to be changed." His passionate rhetoric might be part of the reason Edwards is rising, Matt Glasson of Cedar Rapids said.
"It's a much different message than he had four years ago," said Glasson, a member of SEIU of Iowa, a union that has endorsed Edwards. "He has more passion than four years ago."

Edwards doesn't 'walk the walk,' Obama says, Omaha World Herald, 12-23

OSKALOOSA, Iowa (AP) — Opening his latest presidential campaign swing through Iowa, Democratic Sen. Barack Obama on Saturday singled out rival John Edwards for criticism, arguing that the former North Carolina senator doesn't have a track record to back up the sharply populist themes he sounds on the campaign trail.
"I've got a track record," Obama said. "I don't just talk the talk, I walk the walk. John does not have the same track record."
The Illinois senator and his aides also singled out a new television campaign they said is being launched on Edwards' behalf, accusing him of hypocrisy.
"John said yesterday, he didn't believe in these 527s," Obama said. "Those are these independent groups that raise money with no disclosure, nobody knows who is giving them. . . . We found out today there's a group buying three-quarters of a million dollars' worth of television, and the individual running the group used to be John Edwards' campaign manager."
Edwards said in response that he didn't know anything about the ad buy and has no say in it.
"The way the law operates is we're not allowed to be involved in this — the campaign's not allowed to be involved, I'm not allowed to be involved," Edwards said after a campaign stop Saturday in Lisbon, Iowa. "I found out about this probably after most of you did through the news media." At a stop in Coralville, Iowa, Edwards said, "I would prefer that all the 527s — not just this one — that all the 527s stay out of Iowa."
Candidates in both parties are benefiting and taking hits from advocacy groups that are only now making their presence known. Their ads often are more negative than those from the candidates.

Edwards: Industry won't solve health care crisis, Iowa City Press-Citizen, 12-23
Says he wouldn't set policy with drug companies
By Rachel Gallegos

CORALVILLE -- Democratic presidential candidate John Edwards said Saturday that sitting down at the table with health insurance and drug companies would not be his solution for America's health policies.

"Anybody who says to me I'm going to sit at a table with those people and determine America's health policy -- I say never. It's never going to happen," he said.

Edwards, who spent 20 years in courtrooms fighting against big corporations, said he would continue that mission as president.

"I've been in this fight my whole life, and I take every single bit of it very personally," he said to a standing room-only crowd of more than 350 -- including about 60 people who stood in a hallway throughout the campaign speech -- at the Holiday Inn in Coralville. "We have an enormous, epic fight in front of us."

"America doesn't belong to them. American belongs to us," Edwards said.

With Edwards at his campaign stop was James Lowe, a man Edwards said he met in the Appalachian mountains of Virginia, who was born with a cleft palate. Because of this condition, and having no health insurance to make the necessary surgery affordable, Lowe could not speak for five decades until a doctor fixed it voluntarily for him when he was 50 years old.

"James finally got his voice back. When will you get your voice back?" Edwards said.

Lowe said he believes that Edwards is the man who should be the next president.

"If we don't vote for him, we're messed up," Lowe said.

Before Edwards spoke, supporters started chants to excite the crowd, including "We love Elizabeth. We love John. We want to see them on the White House lawn."

Coralville City Councilor John Lundell said he and his wife, Diana, are both longtime Edwards supporters.

"Not only are his positions well thought out and doable, but what impresses me most about Sen. Edwards is his tenacity," Lundell said.

Johnson County Sheriff Lonny Pulkrabek also helped introduce Edwards, saying that since he became an Edwards' supporter, the former North Carolina senator has continued to impress him.

"The campaign actually implemented some of the ideas I gave him about public safety into his initiatives," Pulkrabek said, adding that Edwards has pledged that he is committed to funding methamphetamine programs both in and out of jails.

At Saturday's event, Edwards also emphasized his dedication to the middle class.

"Corporate greed is killing the middle class, robbing you of your jobs and robbing your children of their future," Edwards said.

He said he believes mill workers, using the example of his own family, are worth every bit as much as the person who owns the mill.

Edwards said roughly 35 million people in this country -- almost equal to the population in California -- went hungry this past year.

"Enough is enough, really," Edwards said. "Our country is better than this."

On Saturday, the final day of his "Fighting for America's Voice" tour, Edwards proposed an economic stimulus packages to strengthen the American economy and create new jobs, according to a news release from his campaign. This proposal urges Congress to act immediately and pass at least a $25 billion jobs plan in early 2008, with the possibility of passing $75 billion more if there is evidence of that nation entering into a recession.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The plan calls for investing in clean energy infrastructure, increasing federal aid to help states avoid cutting programs that help families during difficult times, reforming unemployment insurance and addressing the housing crisis.

Luyen Tran of Washington, D.C. said he's still undecided, but he thought Edwards' speech was "quite inspirational."

"I wish more Democratic candidates could speak like he does," Tran said.

Edwards wants Congress to create $100 billion economic cushion, AP/Globe Gazette, Quad City Times, 12-22
By AMY LORENTZEN

DES MOINES, Iowa (AP) -- Presidential candidate John Edwards will argue Saturday said the country can't simply wait for the economy to turn around, and he will call on Congress to come up with $100 billion to prepare for a potential economic slowdown.
The Democrat and former North Carolina senator suggests an initial investment of $25 billion for job creation and other aid, with the rest set aside if the economy slides into a recession. He was scheduled to unveil his plan at campaign stops on Saturday in eastern Iowa.
In his policy paper provided to The Associated Press, Edwards said the economy is struggling because of the housing crisis and stagnant wages. Housing, energy and health care costs have increased while the median income for working-age families dropped $2,400 between 2000 and 2006, he said.
Edwards wants Congress to make a major investment in clean energy that he contends would both fight global warming and create jobs to spark economic activity.
His plan calls for lawmakers to encourage wind and solar farms, help weatherize 250,000 homes and extend the renewable energy production tax credit. Congress should also train workers for "green collar" jobs related to clean energy, and support energy-efficient transportation systems including bus projects and light rail, Edwards said.
He also wants Congress to update the nation's unemployment system, which he said now leaves workers unprepared for hard times. He calls on Congress to help states cover 500,000 additional workers each year, and set aside resources now to keep workers from having to wait for benefits if the unemployment rate rises.
Aid to states also should be boosted to keep them from having to increase property taxes or cut programs such as Medicaid in order to balance their budgets, Edwards said.
To combat the housing crisis, Edwards wants lawmakers to create a home rescue fund to help families get counseling, loans or other financial aid to avoid foreclosure. He also believes that families facing bankruptcy should be allowed to rewrite terms of their mortgage, and write off debt that exceeds the value of their home.
To keep such a crisis from happening again, Edwards said Congress should pass stronger laws against predatory lending and create a federal regulator to oversee financial services products.

Edwards: Greed created health crisis, WCF Courier, 12-22
By CHARLOTTE EBY, Courier Des Moines Burueau

DES MOINES --- Less than two weeks before Iowa's leadoff caucuses, Democrat John Edwards turned up the volume at a rally in West Des Moines Friday, pledging to fight against what he called corporate greed in order to help people who need a voice.

He argued that health insurance and drug companies have managed to block universal health care in the country.

"We will never change this country the way that we need to unless we're willing to take those people on," Edwards said to cheers.

For hundreds who packed a community college meeting room, Edwards brought to life the people he has been talking about for months and years on the campaign trail.

Friday's trip had Edwards campaigning alongside James Lowe, a former coal miner whom Edwards met in Virginia during his poverty tour earlier this year.

Lowe, who lived with a cleft palette that left him barely able to speak, was 50 years old before his condition was fixed because he lacked health care.

Edwards has made Lowe's story a regular part of his stump speech to illustrate the need for universal health care. He often tells voters he was angry when he heard of Lowe's story.

Lowe made his first trip to Iowa so he could campaign for Edwards and got a standing ovation from the crowd.

"The first time I met him, I felt a connection," Lowe said of Edwards. "I felt like he's the man who cares for people like me."

Edwards also introduced the family of Valerie Lakey, who was seriously injured in an accident with a swimming pool drain at the age of 5. As a lawyer, Edwards won a multimillion dollar settlement for the family after making a case that the drain cover was faulty and that the manufacturer knew it but hid the truth.

Mother Sandy Lakey praised Edwards for helping her family.

"John Edwards gave us hope in our darkest hour," she said.

Speaking with reporters after the event, Edwards was upbeat about the state of his presidential campaign. Polls show him locked in a tough three-way fight with Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama in Iowa.

"We're very excited about the energy and momentum behind this campaign. You can literally feel the movement," Edwards said.

He also expressed optimism about his chances in New Hampshire, which holds the nation's first primary five days after the Iowa caucuses. He described huge crowds in that state after returning from a campaign trip, bigger crowds than during his last presidential campaign.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"I never saw those kinds of crowds ever in 2004, and there's a lot of energy. They're responding to the same message," Edwards said.

Edwards steps up rhetoric against health insurance, drug companies, WCF Courier, 12-22
By CHARLOTTE EBY, Courier Des Moines Bureau

DES MOINES --- Less than two weeks before Iowa's leadoff caucuses, Democrat John Edwards turned up the volume at a rally in West Des Moines Friday, pledging to fight against what he called corporate greed in order to help people who need a voice.

He argued that health insurance and drug companies have managed to block universal health care in the country.

"We will never change this country the way that we need to unless we're willing to take those people on," Edwards said to cheers.

For hundreds who packed a community college meeting room, Edwards brought to life the people he has been talking about for months and years on the campaign trail.

Friday's trip had Edwards campaigning alongside James Lowe, a former coal miner whom Edwards met in Virginia during his poverty tour earlier this year.

Lowe, who lived with a cleft palette that left him barely able to speak, was 50 years old before his condition was fixed because he lacked health care.

Edwards has made Lowe's story a regular part of his stump speech to illustrate the need for universal health care. He often tells voters he was angry when he heard of Lowe's story.

Lowe made his first trip to Iowa so he could campaign for Edwards and got a standing ovation from the crowd.

"The first time I met him, I felt a connection," Lowe said of Edwards. "I felt like he's the man who cares for people like me."

Edwards also introduced the family of Valerie Lakey, who was seriously injured in an accident with a swimming pool drain at the age of 5. As a lawyer, Edwards won a multimillion dollar settlement for the family after making a case that the drain cover was faulty and that the manufacturer knew it but hid the truth.

Mother Sandy Lakey praised Edwards for helping her family.

"John Edwards gave us hope in our darkest hour," she said.

Speaking with reporters after the event, Edwards was upbeat about the state of his presidential campaign. Polls show him locked in a tough three-way fight with Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama in Iowa.

"We're very excited about the energy and momentum behind this campaign. You can literally feel the movement," Edwards said. ?

He also expressed optimism about his chances in New Hampshire, which holds the nation's first primary five days after the Iowa caucuses. He described huge crowds in that state after returning from a campaign trip, bigger crowds than?during his last presidential campaign.

"I never saw those kinds of crowds ever in 2004, and there's a lot of energy. They're responding to the same message," Edwards said.

Edwards in Northeast Iowa late next week, WCF Courier, 12-22
WATERLOO --- Democratic presidential hopeful John Edwards will visit Northeast Iowa on Thursday and Friday.

On Thursday the former North Carolina senator will visit Luther College at 1:45 p.m., the Amvets in Waverly at 5 p.m. and Waterloo East High School at 7 p.m.

On Friday, at 10:30 a.m. Edwards will stop by Bill's Pizza and Smoke House, 201 W. First St., in Independence

Edwards rails against corporate influence, Ames Tribune, 12-22

By: Gavin Aronsen/Special to The Tribune

By Amy Vinchattle/The Tribune
Democratic presidential hopeful former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards speaks to a crowd during a roundtable discussion Friday at S.C.O.R.E pavilion in Nevada.
At a Friday campaign stop, former Sen. John Edwards, D-N.C., vowed to fight against the corporate influences he said have corrupted the nation and asked his audience for their votes at the Jan. 3 caucuses in Iowa.

Edwards, who runs third in state polls behind Sen. Hillary Clinton, D-N.Y., and Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., addressed his populist message to a gathering of 120 people at the S.C.O.R.E pavilion in Nevada.

He brought with him James Lowe, a Virginia man who he said couldn't speak until he underwent surgery for a cleft palate at age 50, and the Lakey family, whose daughter Edwards successfully represented as a lawyer after a pool drain disemboweled her.

He also mentioned 17-year-old Nataline Sarkisyan, who died Thursday, hours after CIGNA, a health care insurance corporation, finally agreed to approve a liver transplant it previously had refused her on the grounds that her health care plan didn't cover the procedure.

At the stop, Iowa Farmers Union President Chris Peterson also announced his support for Edwards, applauding the candidate for fighting for the interests of family farmers.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Corporate greed has taken over the government, it's that simple," Edwards said. "It's infiltrated everything that's happening."

Much of his ire was directed at insurance companies and their Washington lobbyists, tax breaks granted to American companies relocating jobs out of the country and private military contractors Blackwater and Halliburton, which have both been embroiled by controversy over their profits off no-bid contracts in the Iraq war.

"These people are stealing your children's future," he said.

Last year, Edwards said, 35 million Americans went hungry. Insurance companies, whose heads make hundreds of millions of dollars annually, lobbied Congress to prevent popular health care reform legislation.

Halfway through his speech, he invited Lowe to talk. Edwards said Lowe's cleft palate could have been fixed by a simple operation had he been able to afford health care coverage.

"I can't talk too well right now, but I'm learning," Lowe said. "And I want to thank Mr. Edwards and all the doctors who helped me, and thank God for it all."

Edwards said he had never taken a dime from Washington lobbyists or political action committees. He invoked Presidents Teddy and Franklin Roosevelt, whom he said were hated by corporate America for not bowing to their whims.

"I won't sit at a table and negotiate with (lobbyists)," he said.

During a brief question and answer session, Nevada High School special education teacher Kevin Ericson asked Edwards what he would do to make the No Child Left Behind Act more equitable for special needs students.

Edwards said he would radically change the act if he kept it at all, with "teachers central to the evaluation process so it's not kids filling in bubbles on a multiple
He also reiterated the necessity of universal health care and said the system should mandate mental health parity.

Ericson said he planned to caucus for Edwards and that his wife, also a teacher, liked the candidate as well.

"We both feel he's genuine in his feelings toward kids and education, and his passion comes through so we know he's going to stand up and do what we need him to do," Ericson said.

Edwards wants Congress to create $100 billion economic cushion, Muscatine Journal, 12-22
By AMY LORENTZEN
DES MOINES, Iowa - Presidential candidate John Edwards will argue Saturday said the country can't simply wait for the economy to turn around, and he will call on Congress to come up with $100 billion to prepare for a potential economic slowdown.

The Democrat and former North Carolina senator suggests an initial investment of $25 billion for job creation and other aid, with the rest set aside if the economy slides into a recession. He was scheduled to unveil his plan at campaign stops on Saturday in eastern Iowa.

In his policy paper provided to The Associated Press, Edwards said the economy is struggling because of the housing crisis and stagnant wages. Housing, energy and health care costs have increased while the median income for working-age families dropped $2,400 between 2000 and 2006, he said.

Edwards wants Congress to make a major investment in clean energy that he contends would both fight global warming and create jobs to spark economic activity.

His plan calls for lawmakers to encourage wind and solar farms, help weatherize 250,000 homes and extend the renewable energy production tax credit. Congress should also train workers for "green collar" jobs related to clean energy, and support energy-efficient transportation systems including bus projects and light rail, Edwards said.

He also wants Congress to update the nation's unemployment system, which he said now leaves workers unprepared for hard times. He calls on Congress to help states cover 500,000 additional workers each year, and set aside resources now to keep workers from having to wait for benefits if the unemployment rate rises.

Aid to states also should be boosted to keep them from having to increase property taxes or cut programs such as Medicaid in order to balance their budgets, Edwards said.

To combat the housing crisis, Edwards wants lawmakers to create a home rescue fund to help families get counseling, loans or other financial aid to avoid foreclosure. He also believes that families facing bankruptcy should be allowed to rewrite terms of their mortgage, and write off debt that exceeds the value of their home.

To keep such a crisis from happening again, Edwards said Congress should pass stronger laws against predatory lending and create a federal regulator to oversee financial services products.

Edwards brings his 'Fighting for America' tour to Le Mars, Le Mars Daily Sentinel, 12-21
By Earl Horlyk

Former United States Senator John Edwards brought his bus tour to Le Mars on Thursday afternoon. Edwards, who is locked in a close race to win the Iowa Democratic Caucus, drew a crowd of about 240 to the Plymouth County Historical Museum.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

[Click to enlarge]
Touting his experience, both in the courtroom and in the halls of the U.S. Senate, and his willingness to fight on the behalf of working Americans, former North Carolina Senator John Edwards kicked off a three-day tour of the Hawkeye State, bringing his "Fighting for America" Tour for a rally in Le Mars Thursday.
Bounding into the Plymouth County Historical Museum with John Mellencamp's "Our Country" playing in the background, the Democratic presidential hopeful remembered the sacrifices made by his parents and grandparents to ensure his life would be better than theirs.

"But what will we do?" Edwards asked the 240 political junkies and undecideds who filled the museums's Old Central gymnasium. "What will we do to insure the future of our children and grandchildren?"

"We have 47 million Americans begging for health care," he continued, "35 million Americans went to bed hungry last night, and 200,000 of our nation's veterans are sleeping under bridges or in homeless shelters."

Edwards shakes his head.

"Yet corporate profits are at an all-time high," he mentioned, "and we continue to give tax breaks to our nation's wealthiest CEOs."

Edwards added: "Iowans have a chance to send a message to the health insurance industry and to the CEO of Exxon-Mobil. And that message is going to be loud and clear. That there is going to be a sea of change taking place. And I'm the man who can lead that change."

This was a message that resonated with Mark Sturgeon.

(Advertisement)

The Le Mars man had first seen Edwards when the Democratic candidate made a stop in Le Mars during Ice Cream Days last summer.

"I truly believe Edwards is the man who can stand up to all of those lobbyists in D.C., put an end to 'pork barrel' politics, and get the country back on the right track," Sturgeon said confidently.

More importantly to Sturgeon is the perception people have of America.

"George W. Bush trashed our image overseas," he contends. "There's no other way to say it. He trashed our country."

Jan Utesch agrees.

The Le Mars woman has been a teacher in the Remsen-Union school district for the past 26 years.

"And in those 26 years," Utesch admits, sighing, "I've seen a lotta programs instituted. But nothing has been as disastrous as Bush's 'No Child Left Behind.'"

"We even have a couplet that uses the acronym of the policy," she said. "'Nickel me/Nickel you/Learning is no longer fun to do.'"

"When it comes to education," Utesch said, throwing up her hands, "Bush has been a disaster."

Steve Mohning knows where Utesch is coming from.

A former educator himself, the Le Mars man said he has been a registered Republican and a registered Independent in the past.

"But I've been a registered Democrat since 2004," Mohning admits. "We need a leader who can lead in a diplomatic way and I don't see the Republican doing that."

"In fact," he continued, "I don't see the Republicans do much leading at all."

Back on stage, Edwards introduced James Lowe, a former Virginia coal miner who could barely speak for 50 years because he didn't have health care and couldn't afford the operation he needed to fix his cleft palate.

"For 50 years," he reiterated, "James could not speak simply because he could not afford medical care."

Last year, the Virginia man finally met with medical professionals at a free clinic who donated their time to perform the surgery he needed to speak.

"And now James' wife says he talks too much," Edwards teased.

"But it just goes to show that our country needs someone who will stand up for working Americans," he mentions decisively. "I am that man."

"I have dedicated my life as an attorney and as a senator to this fight," Edwards explained. "I've been through (the presidential election cycle) before and I bring a seasoned toughness to the table. I WILL win back the White House."

Edwards is currently run neck and neck with Democratic rivals, Illinois Senator Barack Obama and New York Senator Hillary Clinton.

This excites veteran Associated Press reporter Mike Glover because he says it excites likely Iowa Caucus goers.

"The Iowa Caucus is less than two weeks away," he smiles, "and anybody can take it. It's that close."

Becoming a handicapper for a moment, Glover says Edwards' plan for success in the Iowa Caucus will be to emphasize the fact that he came in second place during the 2004 caucus.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"His people know how to play the game," he said, "and they're playing to win."

Clinton will emphasize that has the Democratic party establishment in her corner.

"During the Iowa caucus, you're playing to a pretty limited audience of party faithful," Glover informs. "Having the party machinery behind you definitely helps."

As for Obama, he brings new energy and new people into the fold.

Glover predicts: "In 2004, the Iowa Caucus drew about 124,000 people. If this year, there's fewer people or about the same amount of people, Edwards will win. If there is more, Clinton or Obama can point to the fact that they brought a new following into the race."

"But no matter how anyone spins it," Glover says with a grin, "it's exciting to see a horse-race in Iowa."

Back on stage, Edwards recalls a lesson taught to him by his father.

"I was six-years-old when I got into a fight with a classmate," he remembers. "I got my butt kicked. I went home pretty messed up and my dad asked what happened. I told him I got into a fight. He asked: Did I start it? No, I said. He said: Good, never pick a fight."

"But my dad said never walk away from a fight either," Edwards tells the crowd. "I will never back away from what I believe in and I am ready to fight to bring back our country."

"I am ready to work hard and commit myself with every fiber of my being to bring this country back," he continued, "so on a cold night in January, Iowans across this great state can rise together, look their children in the eye and say we made a difference."

LTE: Man of integrity, Burlington Hawk Eye, 12-22

John Edwards -- direct and to the point.

As a union worker, I appreciate that all of the democratic presidential candidates support the Employee Free Choice Act which is arguably the most important legislation to organized labor. They all support fair trade agreements which are sensitive to workers rights and contain strong environmental laws. They all say the Department of Labor in their administrations would actually support labor.

So any of these candidates would be a welcome change after the current administration. This is why democrats have a tough choice deciding who to caucus for in January.

However, if you've ever been on a long strike or lockout and experienced first hand the weak labor laws protecting the rights of workers, if you have voted for a terrible contract because you felt you would lose your job by voting against it, if you have feared for your family's well being as you've looked in the paper and seen ads for replacement workers as a company says, "this is your final offer, take it or leave it," if you have been in any of these situations, I believe one candidate stands out from the rest.

John Edwards is direct and clear when he says, "Imagine a president saying the word union and telling the nation from the White House that organized labor is important to the strength of America. The banning of permanent replacement workers would be the law of the land in my administration." When you're out there fighting for your family's rights and benefits, no scab should be able to walk through your picket line and take your job.

John Edwards has been to hundreds of labor organizing events and has walked picket lines with workers.

He is a man of integrity who backs up his words with his actions.

BUDDY HOWARD

Keokuk

LTE: What I believe in, The Burlington Hawk Eye, 12-22
My heart beats silently to the red, white and blue of our American flag. I ask myself, with tearful eyes, "What has become of our America"?

I encourage all voters to attend the caucuses on Jan. 3. Your presence at your precinct can and will make a distinct impact on the future of this country and its people.

While canvassing in Mount Pleasant on Nov. 17, 2007, for John Edwards, I realized just how important it was as an American to have the freedom to express my opinion and beliefs at the doorsteps of 27 Mount Pleasant homes.

Afterward, I took out a piece of paper and began to write the emotions that had been created, the enthusiasm and excitement, all due to my actions as an American, and all of this was done in honor of John Edwards and his family. My legs may become weary, my feet begin to tire, but I will not become weak. I shall stand strong for what I believe in and that is for a man who is willing, with our help, to give America back to her people.

John Edwards is indeed that man. As testimony to my belief, I shall walk from my place of employment, New London School, after every eight-hour work day, to my home, 6.l miles. I will begin my walks Dec. 3 until the day of the Iowa Caucuses on the evening of Jan. 3, 2008. "I walk for what I believe in."

CARRIEDUNCAN

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

New London

LTE: Edwards has a plan to end war, health care, Muscatine Journal, 12-21
By Jeffrey Shay, Muscatine, Iowa

The United States has been involved in a war that has caused the death of nearly 4,000 Americans, not to mention becoming one of the most expensive wars in our history, and for debatable policies. John Edwards wants to bring it to an end, and has a plan to have all combat troops out of Iraq in nine to 10 months. Mrs. Clinton is against keeping troops in Iraq, depending on which day she is asked.

John Edwards has presented a plan for helping agriculture and has toured every Iowa county, meeting with individual farmers. Mrs. Clinton decided to examine farm issues by holding meetings with agribusiness lobbyists.

Over 46 million Americans lack health insurance, while the rest are putting up with high co-payments, deductibles and coverage exclusions. United Health Group has increased premiums for most of its policies, yet recently, paid its ex-CEO $1.4 BILLION in stock option gains, $620 million of which has been declared illegal by the U.S. government due to back-dating of his shares, not to mention his salary of $520 million over the last several years.

Yet, Hillary Clinton has a health plan that (in her own words) would give United Health and other insurance companies their “place at the table.” John Edwards has offered a plan to cover all Americans, and put the rascals in their place.

The caucus in January will decide if most Americans will have their place at the table, or under it.

LTE: Edwards will put nation on new course, Muscatine Journal, 12-22
By Sam Osborne, West Branch, Iowa

An old movie, “Wild River,” provides a moving glimpse of a long-past era when Franklin D. Roosevelt put his steady hands to the task of steering our beloved nation out of the Great Depression and onto a new course bent to ensuring that everyone had an opportunity to fairly share in the American Dream.

Back then, FDR offered the same grip and grit that Sen. John Edwards now brings to this pivotal moment in American history. This is why I will enthusiastically and determinedly support John Edwards at our Democratic caucus.

Let us all join together with John Edwards to set this nation moving again. And while Karl Rove, his operatives, and a dwindling flock of Bush excusers go whimpering and woof woofing “Who let the dogs out,” the rest of the American people will joyously feel like singing “Happy Days are Here Again.”

And perchance we might go to the movies and see a John-Edwards-era remake of “Wild River” that fittingly casts Susan Sarandon and Tim Robbins in the lead roles. These two outstanding actors have joined us and John Edwards in this determined fight to ensure a good future for all of We the People and our posterity. It is time to make history.

Blog Post: What Edwards has going for Him in Iowa, 12-22

Time's Mark Halperin says John Edwards has a chance to shock the pundits and win Iowa. Halperin has compiled a list of what Edwards has going for him in Iowa...

1. The endorsement of the First Lady of Iowa.

2. The support (some secret) of people close to Governor Culver.

3. Big Labor help being quietly marshaled by one of Iowa’s top Democratic operatives and by Edwards’ 2004 campaign manager.

4. A consistently confident, upbeat demeanor.

5. A re-tooled stump speech that has audiences rising up, and that is filled with specifics of his agenda.

6. Caucus rules that work to the advantage of those with strong support in rural and blue collar areas.

7. Dedicated supporters who will likely turn out even if the weather is cold and inclement.

8. National trial lawyers who are going to do something (read: “everything”) to get their guy elected.

9. A popular, visible spouse.

10. More than enough money to be competitive.

11. Fearlessness.

12. A stronger work ethic than anyone in the race.

13. Perfect pitch in handling Clinton-Obama conflict.

14. A strong Des Moines Register debate performance.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

15. New polling showing him as a strong general election candidate and some new boffo national media clips.

16. High favorables and strong second choice support.

17. Trained precinct captains in almost every precinct – a true, old-fashioned organization.

OBAMA

History creates 'place of fear' for some, DM Register, 12-23
By JASON CLAYWORTH

Mildred Otis won't caucus for Barack Obama for president largely for one reason: She wants to save his life.

Otis, 87, remembers America's violent civil rights movement 40 years ago when Martin Luther King Jr. was assassinated.

And, having lived through those events, the Des Moines woman and others fear that Obama's nomination could end in tragedy. "I think there's a lot of people not ready for an African-American to be a president," said Otis, a black woman.

With less than two weeks remaining before the Iowa caucuses, the Democratic party could be poised to embark on a historic nominating process. Democrats could wind up with the first African-American or first woman nominated for president on a major ticket as Obama and Hillary Clinton rank first and second, in either order, in most Iowa polls.

Obama and Clinton both travel in caravans that include Secret Service protection. Neither staff discusses campaign security, but Obama's wife, Michelle, addressed the topic in speeches, and his half-sister, Maya Soetoro-Ng, has recently encouraged voters to set aside any apprehensions.

"We can't work from a place of fear," Soetoro-Ng said. "This is a critical juncture in our nation's history, and we have to press forward with courage. ... I see so much love and affection from such a wide range of individuals. I think we are certainly ready for a man like Barack."

Michelle Obama last month urged supporters to confront their own doubts, acknowledging that people want to protect themselves and her family from disappointment and failure but saying the right action is to show bravery and move ahead.

"That veil of impossibility that keeps us down and keeps our children down - keeps us waiting and hoping for a turn that may never come," she said in a speech titled "A Challenge to Overcome," according to text provided by campaign staff. "It's the bitter legacy of racism and discrimination and oppression in this country. A legacy that hurts us all."

Obama has had Secret Service protection since May. Neither national security nor campaign officials have disclosed the reason for the protection.

The vast majority of Iowa's presidential campaign stops take place at small businesses or public places. Only on rare occasions are bomb-sniffing dogs or metal detectors used.

For the most part - even at Obama campaign stops - people simply write their name on a sign-in sheet and walk into the venue without requests for identification. At some events, staffs of candidates don't even bother with sign-in sheets.

Campaign security breaches are rare, but an event last month provided the nation with an example of how serious they can become. The incident occurred when a man walked into a Clinton campaign office in New Hampshire wearing what appeared to be a bomb, demanding to speak about mental health care. The event ended without injury when the man surrendered to police after nearly six hours.

Mark Daley, a spokesman for Clinton's campaign, declined to comment for this article, noting that the campaign generally does not discuss security measures. The former first lady's campaign stops in Iowa after the incident appeared to have the same level of security as before.

Abraham Funchess, who heads Iowa's Commission on the Status of African Americans, said those who chose to vote differently as a safety precaution have been disabled by fear.

"We have to get away from that self-defeating attitude," Funchess said. "I would hope we would not allow that to keep people from participating in democracy. ... There are possibilities that something like that could happen, but there are possibilities at the same time that Hillary Clinton or Bill Richardson could deal with the same type of challenges."

Valeria Sinclair-Chapman, an assistant professor of political science at the University of Rochester, said she's careful not to dismiss such fears because many times they're grounded in relevant history that is central in the African-American experience.

"The strength of the Obama candidacy, I think, is an indication of how far the country has come," said Sinclair-Chapman. "If, in fact, voters are sincere when they say that they won't support a candidate because they fear for his or her life if they win the nomination, then that really completely undermines the progress that we think we see."

Obama vows strong trade agreements, DM Register, 12-23
By JONATHAN ROOS

Indianola, Ia. - Illinois Sen. Barack Obama took a hard line on trade during a snowy day of campaigning in central Iowa on Saturday.

As Democratic presidential candidates continue to battle for support from blue-collar workers in the Jan. 3 Iowa caucuses, Obama tried to press the case that he would best look after their interests.

"If we're serious about fighting for working people - you hear it all the time - then we're going to have to do something to help working people compete abroad," Obama told an audience that filled the auditorium of the Warren County Administration Building.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"I think trade is a good thing for our country as a whole and for rural areas in particular, but only when we sign deals that put American farmers and American workers first," he said.

Obama's remarks coincided with a new campaign television commercial that features a pledge to end tax breaks for companies that move jobs overseas.

Obama says that if he wins the presidency, he will only negotiate trade agreements that have strong, enforceable environmental and labor standards, and that he will make enforcement a top priority.

"I'm going to make sure our trading partners live up to our trade agreements," he told supporters here. "We'll do more to stop countries like China from acting unfairly when it comes to trade because no country should get a free pass to bend the rules."

Obama said during an earlier campaign stop in Oskaloosa that he wasn't going to play by the same old rules of Washington politics. "We don't need someone who knows how to play the game better, we need to put an end to the game-playing," he said.

Sreedhar Somisetty, an undecided voter from Oskaloosa, said Obama is an inspirational speaker. But Somisetty is skeptical of whether Obama can make good on his vow to change the political climate in Washington, D.C.

"He speaks great. He inspires people, that's for sure. But I don't know if he'd be able to deliver on what he's promising," said Somisetty, an independent who is unsure whether he will caucus on Jan. 3.

Winterset, Waukee and Urbandale were also on Obama's Saturday schedule.

Obama criticizes Edwards on new ads, CR Gazette, 12-23

OSKALOOSA (AP) — Opening his latest presidential campaign swing through Iowa, Democrat Barack Obama singled out rival John Edwards for criticism, arguing that the former North Carolina senator doesn't have a track record to back up the sharply populist themes he sounds on the campaign trail.

"I've got a track record," said Obama. "I don't just talk the talk, I walk the walk. John does not have the same track record." The Illinois senator and his aides also singled out a new television campaign they said is being launched on Edwards' behalf, accusing him of hypocrisy.

"John said yesterday, he didn't believe in these 527s. Those are these independent groups that raise money with no disclosure. Nobody knows who is giving them. He said I don't believe in them," said Obama.

"We found out today there's a group buying three-quarters of a million dollars worth of television and the individual running the group used to be John Edwards' campaign manager." Obama used the occasion to suggest that Edwards is guilty of hypocrisy.

"You can't say yesterday, you don't believe in it and today three-quarters of a million dollars is being spent for you," said Obama.

"You can't just talk the talk. Everybody talks change, but how did they act when it was not convenient, when it's hard." Campaign aides distributed to reporters a list of television ad buys in six markets covering Iowa totaling $796,610 that were purchased by the Alliance for a New America, which they described as a proEdwards group.

Edwards said in response to Obama's criticisms that he would like to ban political committees of the type known as 527s, and that he had no knowledge of the ad buy, which was made independently of his campaign.

"The way the law operates is we're not allowed to be involved in this — the campaign's not allowed to be involved, I'm not allowed to be involved," Edwards told a group of reporters after a campaign stop Saturday in Lisbon. "I found out about this probably after most of you did through the news media. I didn't know anything about it."

Obama's Views Have Changed With Time, Quad City Times, 12-23

By CHRISTOPHER WILLS

SPRINGFIELD, Ill. - If he wanted, the Barack Obama of today could have a pretty good debate with the Barack Obama of yesterday.

They could argue about whether the death penalty is ever appropriate. Whether it makes sense to ban handguns. They might explore their differences on the Patriot Act or parental notification of abortion.

And they could debate whether Obama has flip-flopped, changed some of his views as he learned more over the years or is simply answering questions with more detail and nuance now that he is running for president.

The Democratic senator from Illinois hasn't made any fundamental policy shifts, such as changing his view on whether abortion should be legal. But his decade in public office and an Associated Press review of his answers to a questionnaire show positions changing in smaller ways.

Taken together, the shifts could suggest a liberal, inexperienced lawmaker gradually adjusting to the realities of what could be accomplished, first in the Illinois Legislature and then the U.S. Senate.

On the other hand, political rivals could accuse him of abandoning potentially unpopular views or of trying to disguise his real positions.

Take the death penalty.

In 1996, when he was running for a seat in the Illinois Senate, Obama's campaign filled out a questionnaire flatly stating that he did not support capital punishment. By 2004, his position was that he supported the death penalty "in theory" but felt the system was so flawed that a national moratorium on executions was required.

Today, he doesn't talk about a moratorium and says the death penalty is appropriate for "some crimes _ mass murder, the rape and murder of a child _ so heinous that the community is justified in expressing the full measure of its outrage."

Then there's another crime-related issue, gun control.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

That 1996 questionnaire asked whether he supported banning the manufacture, sale and possession of handguns in Illinois. The campaign's answer was straightforward: "Yes." Eight years later, he said on another questionnaire that "a complete ban on handguns is not politically practicable" but reasonable restrictions should be imposed.

His legislative record in Illinois shows strong support for gun restrictions, such as limiting handgun purchases to one a month, but no attempts to ban them. Today, he stands by his support for controls while trying to reassure hunters that he has no interest in interfering with their access to firearms.

Obama's presidential campaign contends that voters can't learn anything about his views from the 1996 questionnaire, which was for an Illinois good-government group known as the IVI-IPO. Aides say Obama did not fill out the questionnaire and instead it was handled by a staffer who misrepresented his views on gun control, the death penalty and more.

"Barack Obama has a consistent record on the key issues facing our country," said spokesman Ben LaBolt. "Even conservative columnists have said they'd scoured Obama's record for inconsistencies and found there were virtually none."

IVI-IPO officials say it's inconceivable that Obama would have let a staffer turn in a questionnaire with incorrect answers. The group interviewed Obama in person about his answers before endorsing him in that 1996 legislative race, and he didn't suggest then, or anytime since, that the questionnaire needed to be corrected, they said.

Since he came to Washington, one piece of legislation that raises questions is the USA Patriot Act, the security measure approved after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks.

When he ran for the Senate, Obama called the act a "shoddy and dangerous law" that should be replaced. After he took office, the Senate considered an update that Obama criticized as only a modest improvement and one that was inferior to other alternatives.

Still, Obama ended up voting for that renewal and update of the Patriot Act.

Another disputed issue is health care.

Obama was asked in the 1996 questionnaire whether he supported a single-payer health plan, in which everyone gets health coverage through a single government program. The response was, "Yes in principle," and probably best to have the federal government set up such a program instead of the state.

Today, health care is a hot issue, and Obama does not support creating a single government program for everyone. In fact, rivals Hillary Rodham Clinton and John Edwards have criticized his health proposal for potentially leaving millions of people uninsured because they wouldn't be forced to buy insurance.

Political analysts don't see much danger for Obama in the changes. They aren't major shifts akin to Republican Mitt Romney's changes on abortion and gun control, so voters aren't likely to see the senator as indecisive or calculating.

"I think they allow for some adjustment," said Dante Scala, a political science professor at the University of New Hampshire. "It depends on whether they're changing the core of what they're about."

In the general election, the Republican nominee would be more likely to go after the first-term senator on another front.

"If Obama is the Democratic candidate, I don't think the Republicans will be attacking him on a particular issue," said Dianne Bystrom, director of the Center for Women and Politics at Iowa State University. "They'd be attacking him on his experience."

Obama's Democratic opponents, concerned about turning off voters who dislike negative campaigning, haven't been aggressively using his shifts against him. Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's campaign does quietly argue that they amount to a pattern that should concern the public.

Clinton spokesman Phil Singer noted Obama's positions on handguns, health care and the Patriot Act. "Voters will ultimately decide whether these are significant shifts in his views or not," he said.

One area where Obama's campaign acknowledges his views have changed is on the Defense of Marriage Act, which bars federal recognition of same-sex marriages. In January 2004, Obama said he was opposed to repealing the law. By February, one month later, he supported a repeal.

His campaign says Obama always thought the Defense of Marriage Act was a bad law but didn't believe it needed to be repealed. After hearing from gay friends how hurtful the law was, he decided it needed to be taken off the books.

Obama sees energy as new frontier, Burlington Hawk Eye, 12-22
By KILEY MILLER
kmiller@thehawkeye.com

Barack Obama pinned his claim to the presidency Friday on his power to inspire and picked energy independence as his Apollo program.

"The skills that I've got, I think, are the skills that the country needs right now," the senator from Illinois said in a telephone interview with a reporter and a member of The Hawk Eye editorial board.

"I can't say that what I offer is in all circumstances more important than what other candidates offer," Obama continued, "but if voters agree that we can't make progress on big issues like health care or energy or education unless we can rally the country together around a common purpose, if voters agree that it is vital for the next president to project a new vision of America around the world, and if voters agree that we need to restore a sense of trust in our leaders and our government and inspire people to think long-term, then I'm convinced that I'm the best equipped to do those things."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Obama, welded into a virtual tie with Hillary Rodham Clinton in Iowa, was seeking The Hawk Eye's endorsement in his bid for the Democratic Party's presidential nomination.

Obama is often compared to President John F. Kennedy, with members of the Des Moines Register editorial board going so far as to liken the choice between him and Clinton to picking between Kennedy and President Franklin D. Roosevelt. (They chose Roosevelt.)

In a speech to Congress in 1961, Kennedy called for millions of dollars to put a man on the moon within a decade.

Asked for his own "man on the moon" dream, Obama had said "energy" before the question was complete.

"I think energy is the place where we get a three-fer," the senator said.

That "three-fer" includes an "immediate boost in the economy" through investment in green energy technology, a response to the "planetary crisis" of climate change and a new freedom from foreign oil.

With the latter comes a diminishing of the role of oil exporting countries Iran, Russia and Venezuela on the world stage, Obama said.

An energy bill President Bush signed Wednesday mandates that vehicles sold in the United States average 35 miles per gallon by 2020.

Obama said he would have reached further, perhaps to 40 miles per gallon by 2016.

His energy proposal also features a cap-and-trade system to slow carbon emissions, incentives to encourage construction of efficient buildings and a heavy emphasis on wind and solar power and renewable fuels.

"And like the Apollo project," Obama said, "what it promises is our ability to train a whole new generation of scientists and engineers, which was one of the most important spin-offs from the space program."

Questioned further on how he would respond to the fuel crunch in the near term, Obama said he has promised to be "straight with people," and that includes telling them there are no easy and immediate solutions.

"I will argue that my election and a change in foreign policy will reduce the world oil market somewhat," he said, "because there's probably a 20 to 25 percent premium that's being paid right now because of concerns about hostilities between the United States and Iraq."

Technology also exists to help Americans cut consumption, Obama said. As an example, he mentioned a plug-in hybrid at the Google campus in California that gets 150 miles to the gallon.

"I actually think a decade is not an unreasonable time for us to start seeing some savings that will impact consumers," the senator said. "The most important thing that we can do in the meantime is make sure that our tax policies and other economic policies are such that the average working families are seeing some boost in their income to meet the rising costs."

Beyond linking Iraq to oil prices, Obama touched on the war there for only a few minutes. His plan for disengagement couples a phased pull-out of U.S. troops over 16 months with a multi-national diplomatic push to bring Iraq's Sunnis, Shiites and Kurds "to the table."

A successful U.S. exit under a peace plan the "Iraqis take some ownership of" will send a signal that this nation does not have long-term plans in the region, he said. That, in turn, will strengthen efforts to root out the Taliban in Afghanistan and help the United States initiate direct talks with Iran regarding its nuclear weapons program and its aid to Hezbollah in Lebanon.

"All of these things are connected," Obama said.

He then reiterated a proposal to convene a summit of Muslim leaders if elected.

At that summit, he said, "I would present a vision of how the west and the Islamic world can cooperate, avert a clash of civilizations and align the Muslim world to go after the terrorist networks that really are out there that we have to strike."

In Burlington Thursday, Obama's wife, Michelle, called her husband the only Constitutional scholar in the race.

That description led to a question to the senator on what guidance he found in the Constitution for use of military force.

Obama responded that the nation's founding document gives Congress the power to declare and fund war, but the president always has authority to strike against an imminent threat to American lives or immediate interests.

"My goal is always going to be to protect and preserve the United States," he said. "I will do what has to be done in concert with the co-equal branches of the government."

The senator then drew a distinction between a plot by al-Qaida terrorists and the situation in Iraq, "where there was not an imminent threat, there was ample time and room for diplomatic negotiations and the potential for congressional involvement."

"There may be cases in the middle that are tougher calls," Obama continued, "but I think the important point is the president has to exercise judgment, and that's part of what's been lacking in this administration."

Like the other front-running Democrats, Obama has put forth a massive health care expansion plan built around employer-provided coverage.

Challenged on what that might do to small businesses, he said such a concern explains why cost control through prevention programs, information technology upgrades and other changes is imperative.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"We can't initiate a universal health-care plan and not have a cost-control element to it," he said, "because not only will it bankrupt employers, it will bankrupt our federal government."

Obama pointed to his proposal for a government-funded catastrophic insurance program to protect employers from sudden spikes in premiums.

The lone African-American candidate in either party and a former community organizer in Chicago, Obama claims an intimate perspective on both race and poverty.

Those two factors are clearly in play in the firestorm issue of illegal immigration and, also, on the less discussed matter of welfare reform.

When it was suggested that the general public does not comprehend the nuances of the nation's immigration struggles, Obama, like New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, who met with The Hawk Eye editorial board Sunday, concurred.

He blamed that lack of understanding among citizens on leaders "who don't bother to explain it to them."

With stronger border security and harsher sanctions against employers, Americans can be persuaded to accept a "pathway toward legalization" for illegal immigrants who already have put down roots, he said.

"I think there's a generosity of spirit in the American people that can be tapped into," the senator said, "but right now they feel the government has ceded sovereignty and have no control."

As for welfare, the senator said prior reforms have worked to change attitudes --people no longer expect government assistance to continue indefinitely.

The new problem, he said, is workers churning out of the low-wage labor market. He cited "The Working Poor: Invisible in America," a 2005 book by David Shipler that describes the lives of people at the bottom end of the economy.

Specifically, Obama mentioned the story of a white single mother in the northeast who, because she has no teeth, struggles "to even get a job as an associate at Wal-Mart."

Then there are the inner-city residents with drug addictions, he said.

"Part of our job is, as much as possible, to catch kids when they're young, make sure they are getting the education they need, making sure there are pathways for success for them," he said.

Parents play a huge part in a solution, Obama added.

"We as a culture, as a whole, have been living on the surplus of the Greatest Generation, the hard work and sacrifices of earlier generations, and haven't always been willing to make those same sacrifices," he said. "That's something that has to be talked about, and I intend to talk about that as president."

Obama touts foreign affairs judgment, Ft. Dodge Messenger, 12-22
U.S should 'act more deliberately'

By BILL SHEA, Messenger staff writer POSTED: December 22, 2007

U.S. Sen. Barack Obama may be fairly new on the national scene, but he says Americans can have confidence in his ability to go one-on-one with foreign leaders if he becomes president.

"I think they can have confidence based on the judgment I've shown on foreign policy issues, judgment that has generally been borne out by events," the Democratic senator from Illinois said Friday afternoon.

Obama spoke with The Messenger by phone while traveling to a campaign stop in Washington, Iowa.

During that interview, he recited a few international issues that he believes he judged correctly. He said he was clearly opposed to the Iraq war before it started. And he said he's been pushing for the United States to "act more deliberately" toward Iran. That's a position he said is supported by a recent National Intelligence Estimate which stated Iran has stopped its nuclear weapons program.

He said American leaders should pressure Pakistani President Pervez Musharaf to fight Al Qaeda and make his country more democratic.

Obama added that the United States should deal with Pakistan in a way that doesn't "put all our eggs in the Musharaf basket."

On the domestic front, Obama isn't offering any quick solutions to the pain people now feel at the gasoline pump.

He said the nation needs vehicles with greater fuel efficiency and more alternative fuel production.

The federal government, he said, needs to work with the airlines to find ways to reduce congestion at airports. He said the eventual solution will involve building some additional runways, which the government would help pay for.

Obama favors more aggressive action to deal with the subprime mortgage crisis. He said the country needs a plan that will join lenders and homeowners with the goal of keeping people in their houses.

Obama to visit the Bluffs Sunday, Council Bluffs Nonpareil, 12-22
Democratic presidential candidate Barack Obama will return to Council Bluffs to meet with the public on Sunday at Thomas Jefferson High School, 2501 W. Broadway.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Doors open at 4:30 p.m. with the event beginning at 5 p.m.

The visit is part of a statewide tour that also includes a stop in Harlan earlier in the day at the Therkildsen Activity Center, 706 Victoria St. at 2:30 p.m.

LTE: JFK to Obama, Burlington Hawk Eye, 12-22

My heart beats silently to the red, white and blue of our American flag. I ask myself, with tearful eyes, "What has become of our America"?

I encourage all voters to attend the caucuses on Jan. 3. Your presence at your precinct can and will make a distinct impact on the future of this country and its people.

While canvassing in Mount Pleasant on Nov. 17, 2007, for John Edwards, I realized just how important it was as an American to have the freedom to express my opinion and beliefs at the doorsteps of 27 Mount Pleasant homes.

Afterward, I took out a piece of paper and began to write the emotions that had been created, the enthusiasm and excitement, all due to my actions as an American, and all of this was done in honor of John Edwards and his family. My legs may become weary, my feet begin to tire, but I will not become weak. I shall stand strong for what I believe in and that is for a man who is willing, with our help, to give America back to her people.

John Edwards is indeed that man. As testimony to my belief, I shall walk from my place of employment, New London School, after every eight-hour work day, to my home, 6.l miles. I will begin my walks Dec. 3 until the day of the Iowa Caucuses on the evening of Jan. 3, 2008. "I walk for what I believe in."

CARRIEDUNCAN

New London

Blog Post: Obama rakes Edwards over indie groups' ads, Radio Iowa, 12-23

By O. Kay Henderson

Democratic presidential candidate Barack Obama today accused rival John Edwards of having an "inconsistent" message when it comes to promising to adandon old-style politics. Obama pointed to outside groups which have purchased time on Iowa broadcast outlets to run ads promoting Edwards.

"Yesterday my understanding was is that (Edwards) said he did not approve of 527s, these independent groups where there's no disclosure so you don't know who's funding them and how much is being spent," Obama said today during an interview with Radio Iowa. "We find out today that a 527 run by his former campaign manager and political director is running three-quarters of a million dollars worth of ads on his behalf and it strikes me that if you say yesterday you don't agree with 'em and today you're benefiting from them -- that's not consistent."

Obama and Edwards are in a tight race to present themselves as the candidate best able to enact change in Washington and Obama points to this episode as proof that Edwards "talks the talk" and doesn't "walk the walk."

"Part of what we need is some consistency when it comes to the positions we take, not just taking them when it's politically convenient," Obama told Radio Iowa.

Later Satuirday afternoon the Edwards campaign issued a statement calling on the so-called "527 groups" to stop running ads.

"I do not support 527 groups. They are part of the law, but let me be clear: I am asking this group and others not to run the ads," Edwards said in the written statement. "I would encourage all the 527s to stay out of the political process."

On Friday, Edwards said during a news conference that he has no control over independent groups -- referred to as "527s" -- as by law candidates are not allowed to coordinate strategy with such groups. Edwards has not commented yet on the role his 2004 campaign manager has in heading up one of the groups planned to run ads on his behalf.

Blog Post: Will Latino caucus-goers break for Obama? , Bleeding Heartland, 12-22

by: desmoinesdem

I don't read the Washington Times, but MyDD user Piuma noticed a piece there about El Latino, Iowa's largest Spanish-language newspaper, endorsing Barack Obama. Here is a link to Piuma's diary .

The El Latino editorial includes this line, which appears to be aimed at Hillary Clinton:

> No other presidential candidate, particularly divisive candidates, can unite Congress and secure the votes to finally pass comprehensive immigration reform.

(I would add that it's a fantasy to think that any presidential candidate will be able to unite Congress on any controversial issue, but that's a matter for another post.)

In the comments below the diary, Piuma notes:

> The Obama campaign has made an outreach to the Latino community and he is endorsed by Perla A., the Vice-President of Siouxland Unidad Latina, the area's oldest and largest Latino organization, as well as City Councilmember Sara Monroy Huddleston, one of four Latino elected officials in Iowa. This may be one of the many surprise groups Obama will turn out who have been ignored by polling.

Obama has several field offices in Iowa towns with significant Latino populations.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

I have felt all year that Obama is the candidate who would benefit most from a primary rather than a caucus, because his support appears to be more concentrated in some parts of the state. However if his campaign can turn out large numbers of Latino supporters, then he could get a significant number of delegates in towns and neighborhoods where there are a lot of Latino residents.

This newspaper endorsement is a good get for Obama and has to be disappointing for Bill Richardson.

I have seen national polling suggesting that Hillary Clinton has much more support among Latinos than Obama does. Jerome Armstrong recently argued that Obama would fare poorly against John McCain among Latino voters. It will be interesting to see if Obama can win strong support among Latinos in Iowa. If so, that could help him in several of the states that will hold primaries on February 5.

Obama's Health Care Plan: 'Not Behind Closed Doors' , Iowa Independent, 12-22

By: Adam Burke

Yesterday in Washington, Iowa, Barack Obama took a question from a skeptical audience member who said there was "a certain unreality about listening to you [Obama] that's about like listening to George Bush..."

Obama responded by addressing two parts of the man's question: "electability and governance."

For the final part of his answer he drew a sharp distinction between his methods and the Clintons' work on health care in the 1990s.

He said, "My plan is not that different from Hillary Clinton's plan or John Edward's plan or any of the other plans. The question is how do you move it forward ... I admire Sen. Clinton and Bill Clinton for having tried in 1993 but they did it the wrong way ... they went behind closed doors ... the Clinton plan was dead on arrival ... "

He went on to say he would try to work differently: "This is all going to be on C-SPAN, the American people will be watching, so it's not behind closed doors, it's open."

Obama was joined onstage by Rep. Dave Loebsack. He recently endorsed Obama for president and introduced the Illinois Senator.

Obama fan Rachel McPherson teaches family literacy and ESL at Kirkwood Community College in Iowa City, Iowa.

She told the Iowa Independent that Obama would make her proud to live in the U.S. again. She said sometimes she tells people she is from Brazil and has had thoughts of moving to Spain to get out of the U.S.

She met Obama at the 2007 Tom Harkin Steak Fry and said that he was her "man" for the caucuses.

In this video she describes that experience and her thoughts on his plan for education:

Another questioner asked him about funding for U.S. schools

Obama said before the crowd in the Washington Junior High School gymnasium that he said he would "change No Child Left Behind, which left the money behind."

Blog Post: Obama rakes Edwards over indie groups' ads, Radio Iowa, 12-22
By O.Kay Henderson

Democratic presidential candidate Barack Obama says rival John Edwards has an "inconsistent" message when it comes to promising to adandon the traditional, old-style politics. Obama points to outside groups which have purchased time on Iowa broadcast outlets to run ads promoting Edwards.

"Yesterday my understanding was is that (Edwards) said he did not approve of 527s, these independent groups where there's no disclosure so you don't know who's funding them and how much is being spent," Obama said today during an interview with Radio Iowa. "We find out today that a 527 run by his former campaign manager and political director is running three-quarters of a million dollars worth of ads on his behalf and it strikes me that if you say yesterday you don't agree with 'em and today you're benefiting from them -- that's not consistent."

Obama and Edwards are in a tight race to present themselves as the candidate best able to enact change in Washington and Obama points to this episode as proof that Edwards "talks the talk" and doesn't "walk the walk."

"Part of what we need is some consistency when it comes to the positions we take, not just taking them when it's politically convenient," Obama told Radio Iowa.

On Friday, Edwards said he has no control over independent groups -- referred to as "527s" -- as by law candidates are not allowed to coordinate strategy with such groups. However, Edwards did not comment on having his 2004 campaign manager heading up one of the groups running ads on his behalf.

Blog Post: Obama says Edwards "inconsistent", Radio Iowa, 12-22

Democratic presidential candidate Barack Obama has opened up a line of attack against rival John Edwards and the issue is...campaign finances & ethics. Here's the Radio Iowa story.

Here are the key quotes on this subject from Obama's interview with Radio Iowa earlier this afternoon: "Yesterday my understanding was is that (Edwards) said he did not approve of 527s, these independent groups where there's no disclosure so you don't know who's funding them and how much is being spent. We find out today that a 527 run by his former campaign manager and political director is running three-quarters of a million dollars worth of ads on his behalf and it strikes me that if you say yesterday you don't agree with 'em and today you're benefiting from them -- that's not consistent....Part of what we need is some consistency when it comes to the positions we take, not just taking them when it's politically convenient."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Obama discussed what he hoped "trickles down" from him as the leader of the campaign to his campaign operatives. "I'm very proud of the fact that you haven't seen a lot of drama or a lot of back-biting in our campaign. I think everybody is focusing on doing their job," Obama said. "People generally left their egos at the door. People take responsibility for their work and, you know, don't blame others when mistakes are made and people don't jump on people when mistakes are made. We hold folks accountable, but there's a calm in our organization and a trust, I think, between people and I like to take a little bit of credit for that."

What is the most important decision you've made in Iowa?

"To put together and trust the best staff on the ground here. I mean, we've got an organization that is just unbelievable. You know, young people with energy and enthusiasm and, you know, we hired them early and so they got into these communities and made friendships and established relationships. You know, they're not mercenaries. They're here because they believe in the kind of change that I think most Americans are looking for and because they're sincere and here for the right reasons I think that communicates itself to Caucus-goers and that's, I think, our ace in the hole."

Blog Post: Obama: Government should Lift Barrier, Century of the Common Iowan, 12-22
Here's a clip of Obama campaigning in Sioux City where he is talking about the government's role in people's lives.

That's what our government should be doing — is lifting these barriers off the shoulders of people so they can live out their dreams and create a better country. along with a better life for themselves.

RICHARDSON

Richardson volunteers to stream into Iowa from New Mexico, Des Moines Register, 12-22
By WILLIAM PETROSKI

Adel, Ia. - About 300 volunteers from New Mexico will arrive in Iowa after Christmas to help launch a final push for Gov. Bill Richardson, their states chief executive, in his Iowa caucus campaign, aides said today.

Richardson said after a campaign appearance here Saturday that he already has a solid political organization in Iowa with precinct captains in 85 percent of the states precincts. His New Mexico volunteers will strengthen the effort, knocking on doors, telephoning caucus-goers and doing other campaign work, aides said.

I feel like I have a very good chance of meeting my goal of being in the top three Democrats in the Jan. 3 caucus, Richardson said in an interview. The momentum right now is a quiet, silent momentum that is building. All of this grass-roots campaigning is paying off

Richardson, who has been running fourth in polls of Democratic presidential candidates in Iowa, has campaigned heavily the past week on ending the Iraq war. He has promised to withdraw all American troops within one year of being elected president.

He said today that his emphasis on the war is paying off because the three Democratic front runners - Sens. Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama, and former Sen. John Edwards - havent made such a strong commitment for withdrawal.

Richardson told almost 100 prospective caucus-goers on this morning at Hannys of Adel cafe that the United States has spent $500 billion on the war when that money could have been used to improve education, health care, create jobs and meet other needs. The nation cant make progress on critical domestic issues until the war is ended, he added.

We are going to continue to hit hard on that issue, Richardson said afterward. The fact that I am firm on the war in Iraq and that I want to bring all the troops home is resonating with people.

The New Mexico volunteers who will be arriving in Iowa in the coming days are part of what the campaign has dubbed the Road Runner program, said Richardson aide Tom Reynolds. They are people who have supported Richardson, a former congressman, in past political campaigns in New Mexico and they want to see him elected to the White House, he said. They will be working throughout Iowa.

They are paying their own way and coming of their own free will, Reynolds said.

Several top officials in Richardsons state cabinet in New Mexico have already been in Iowa to campaign on his behalf. In recent days they have included John Garcia, New Mexicos secretary of veterans services, and Reed Dasenbrock, New Mexicos secretary of higher education.

Richardson today wrapped up a week of intensive campaigning throughout Iowa with a series of appearances in Dallas and Polk counties. He said he was elated with his crowds, noting more than 300 people attended his Conversation on Iraq Friday night at Iowa State University in Ames.

Richardson was scheduled to fly home with his wife, Barbara, to New Mexico on Saturday night with plans to remain there through Christmas Day. He plans to resume campaigning on Wednesday with a trip to western Iowa, and he will stay in the state until the Iowa Caucuses are over.

Richardson calls out Congress, CR Gazette, 12-23
By Rod Boshart
The Gazette

WEST DES MOINES – Democratic presidential hopeful Bill Richardson on Saturday criticized Congress for being weak in challenging President

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Bush to set a timetable for bringing U.S. troops home and pushing a political reconciliation in war-torn Iraq.

The New Mexico governor also took aim at his Democratic rivals who serve in the Senate, saying he is disappointed that the talk of leadership he hears on the campaign trail doesn't jibe with the reality he sees in Washington.

"I think we're going to be stuck with this war because the Congress is weak and the president is persistent," Richardson told about 150 people at the city's public library.

"I think the whole Senate and the whole Congress, their actions are very disappointing and there's an inconsistency between what they're saying on the trail and what they're doing," he later said in an interview, referring specifically to his presidential rivals.

"I'm very disappointed that many of them don't even make the vote. They're out campaigning, so they should practice what they preach," he added. "They need to show up and filibuster. They should put timetables on legislation on the war. But instead they're staying home or they're campaigning." Richardson said he is upset that the focus of the 2008 campaign is shifting away from the war to domestic issues – issues that he contends will continue to languish in inactivity until the costly war in Iraq is brought to an end. He pledges to end it in his first year as president.

Richardson also said it upsets him to hear pundits say the president's surge of U.S. troops in Iraq is working and that November's death toll of U.S. soldiers stood at 37. "That's 37 too many," he told the potential caucus goers in pledging to keep the focus on the war issue until Iowa's first-in-the-nation caucuses Jan. 3.

"The surge is not working. There is no more movement to a political solution. Maybe there's a temporary lull in the violence."

Caucus Digest: Richardson health plan, WCF Courier, 12-22
By Courier Des Moines Bureau

DES MOINES --- Democratic presidential candidate Bill Richardson on Friday presented his plan to improve mental health treatment.

Speaking in Newton, Richardson outlined a plan that would increase federal funding for mental health and substance abuse treatment. He would also take steps to improve community support for people with mental health needs.

"We need to stop treating people with a mental illness or substance use disorders like second-class citizens," Richardson said, according to a statement from his campaign.

He emphasized the need to improve mental health care for military personnel.

"We are going to treat mental trauma such as (post-traumatic stress disorder) the same way that we treat physical wounds-- like the battlefield injuries that they are," he said.

Richardson, the governor of New Mexico, had previously proposed a "Heroes Health Card" that would entitle all returning military personnel to government-funded health care wherever they want it.

OBAMA HITS BACK --- Barack Obama's campaign continued its pushback Friday against a union mailer that criticizes the candidate's health care plan.

At the campaign's behest, two members of the union --- the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees --- stepped forward to say the attack was unfair.

AFSCME has endorsed Hillary Clinton and has joined her in arguing that Obama's health plan is flawed because it doesn't mandate that all Americans receive coverage.

Carter Woodruff of Des Moines, an AFSCME member and a former top official for the union in Iowa, said the mailer is unfair. He said the union is being hypocritical in calling for an insurance mandate, when it had previously opposed such a mandate.

"It's a shame that they're stooping to this level to try to win an election," Woodruff said.

He was joined in a conference call by Henry Bayer, executive director of the AFSCME council in Illinois, Obama's home state.

Clinton and Obama have gone back and forth for weeks about their health plans. Clinton says Obama's plan is fundamentally flawed because it doesn't cover everyone, while Obama says the first priority should be lowering health care costs so it becomes possible to one day cover everyone.

ROMNEY CALLED MISLEADING --- Mitt Romney's most recent attack on Mike Huckabee is misleading, according to an independent analysis from FactCheck.org.

"Romney attacks Huckabee again with false and misleading claims," said the headline of the item published on the site this week.

FactCheck, a research group at the Annenberg Public Policy Center in the University of Pennsylvania, looked at the Romney ad dealing with anti-methamphetamine laws. Romney argues in the ad that he was tougher on meth as governor of Massachusetts than Huckabee was as governor of Arkansas.

Analysts for FactCheck said it's misleading for Romney to say he got tough on meth when he is referring to legislation that never passed.

However, Romney is accurate when he says Huckabee reduced some penalties for drug offenses. But the ad doesn't mention that the penalties in Arkansas were, and remain, much greater than they are in Massachusetts.

Finally, the analysts criticize Romney for the way the ad uses simulated news clippings to say things that don't appear in the actual news articles. For example, the ad uses the quote, "Tough on drugs like meth," and attributes it to the Berkshire Eagle newspaper, but those words don't appear in that order in the article.

While FactCheck is defending Huckabee in this instance, the group raked him over the coals last month when it accused him of misrepresenting his record for tax cuts as governor.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Richardson: War still big issue, Muscatine Journal, 12-22
By: Bob Zientara/The Tribune

Democratic presidential candidate Bill Richardson continues to stake his claim to military ground once monopolized by Republicans.

Ending the U.S. presence in Iraq, promising "a hero's health care" for veterans and even excusing college student loans in exchange for a year's service to the country (including the military or the Peace Corps) were among issues Richardson raised Friday evening in Ames.

A crowd of between 250 and 300 people drove through a heavy fog to fill the Great Room at the Iowa State University Memorial Union for the New Mexico governor's appearance.

Huxley resident Sue Dinsdale led off the evening. She said she'd come to oppose the war after watching her son serve two tours of duty there, and added she was impressed with Richardson's vow to extricate the United States from the struggle.

After three more warm-up speeches, including one by Richardson's wife, Barbara, Richardson admonished his listeners that talk about the war (among voters and the media) seems to be quieting down.

"People say the surge is working, (that) 'only 37 Americans died' during December. That's 37 too many," he said.

The war still is front and center among vital issues, Richardson said, not the least of which is the $500 billion it has taken to fight it - money that could have been spent on domestic problems. He vowed to remove all U.S. troops and private contractors within a year of being elected.

The war is affecting America's moral authority as well, he added.

"Now, we're a nation known for Guantanamo, and I'll get rid of that my first day in office," he said.

Richardson was asked what he'd do to correct the alleged wrongs committed by private Iraq contractors like Halliburton and Blackwater.

"Simple. I'd fire them," he said. "They're paid three times as much as our troops and they have no accountability.

"If we leave (Iraq), we can focus on international terrorism, nuclear proliferation, reducing greenhouse gas emissions," said Richardson.

He said he would help to assure other countries that "we are not the world's policeman, but the world's conscience."

And he'd go to work on other issues, like guaranteeing health care for everyone "from a ditch digger to a professional," and on ending the No Child Left Behind program - which drew one of the evening's biggest rounds of applause.

The run-up to the Dec. 3 Iowa Caucuses has been a marathon for both the candidate and his staff. But Richardson said it has also endeared him to the state where he hopes to do well in less than two weeks.

Richardson said he'd learned to put a long "a" in Nevada and accent the first syllable for Madrid, but he's still struggling with pronouncing Keokuk and Maquoketa.

Blog Post: Richardson says Iowans Can Deliver Win over "Smarty Pants Set in Washington," Iowa Politics, 12-22
By Chris Dorsey

WEST DES MOINES -- New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson on Saturday made the case Saturday that there's room for him in that supposedly "three-person race" in the Jan. 3 Iowa caucuses.

"Here in Iowa, we are moving up," Richardson told about 150 people. "We are going to win this thing -- just watch. Look where John Kerry and John Edwards were four years ago at this stage. I can feel this surge."

Since entering the presidential fray in May, Richardson has admitted he doesn't boast "rock star" or celebrity status. Instead, he has focused on his experience as a governor, congressman, UN ambassador and secretary of energy. Along the way in visiting all 99 Iowa counties, Richardson faced the daunting task of overcoming the perception he wasn't a frontrunner. That perception came from a deficit in many polls -- trailing behind the Sens. Barack Obama and Hillary Clinton and former Sen. John Edwards.

Yet, Richardson still trudges forward. He campaigned Saturday in central Iowa despite strong winds and significant snow fall. He has his eye on the prize, and told the crowd at the West Des Moines Public Library that he can win Iowa -- with their support.

One issue Richardson can distinguish himself from the Democratic field is on Iraq. Richardson has stressed while other issues are emerging as the Iowa caucuses near, candidates can't overlook Iraq. He says the war should end with no residual troops behind.

"I am upset at the fact the media is saying this is one of the issues," Richardson said. "I have the clearest plan. We get out in one year."

Richardson's plan resonates with Ken Briggs, a retired Vietnam veteran.

"I was at a function in June or May," Briggs said. "Every veteran question I asked him, he answered right."

The New Mexico governor contradicts statements made by Republican presidential candidates and the White House that the surge in Iraq is working. Thirty-seven U.S. soldiers died in December in the war-torn region; that's 37 too many, he added.

Richardson spent Saturday afternoon at central Iowa house parties hosted by military families. As the caucus nears, Richardson -- like all presidential candidates -- is taking his message to as many Iowans as he can before Jan. 3.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

He asked Iowans determine his fate, not the media or Washington, D.C. insiders.

"It is Iowa that is making the decision," he said. "Not the smarty pants set in Washington, not the national media and T.V. that tell you this is a two-person race. This is a race that should be who can bring this country together."

GOP

Huckabee: Caucus clout stays - if you support me, Des Moines Register, 12-23
By PAULA LAVIGNE

Council Bluffs, Ia. - Republican presidential candidate Mike Huckabee promised Iowa voters Saturday that they can maintain their influence as the leading caucus state if they support his campaign.

The former Arkansas governor pointed out that he was able to come from behind in the polls to become Iowa's GOPfront-runner despite "being outspent 20 to 1" by the other candidates on fliers, TV ads and consultants.

"This election is going to be an opportunity to prove that, in America, the presidency is not so much a matter of money. It is about the message, and it is about the direction this country is going to take," he said. "It would forever enshrine Iowa's role and significance in having the caucus."

Huckabee spoke to about 120 people who came to the downtown civic center on a blustery morning. He was scheduled to continue his western Iowa tour later in the day at stops in Sioux City, Orange City and Sheldon.

Steve Jacobsen, his wife and their 13-year-old daughter, who helped make several pro-Huckabee signs, were among those who waited to talk to the candidate. Jacobsen, a 47-year-old information technology director from Glenwood, said Huckabee's appeal shows that his message has strength beyond all the other candidates' "glitzy ads."

"I just like him because I know he has a basic value he'll use in any decision," Jacobsen said. "I don't have to worry about where he's going to come from when he makes a decision."

Jacobsen said Huckabee's position on taxes appealed to him because the system is too burdensome.

Huckabee spoke for about 30 minutes on a variety of issues, including his desire to replace federal income and payroll taxes with a national sales tax, for which people below the poverty line would receive a full rebate.

"Imagine how much of a difference it will make to small-business owners who now spend so much time and energy just trying to comply with the tax code," he said, adding that his plan "gives us the best way to revitalize our economy and particularly untax the poor and give them a chance to meet the next rung on the economic ladder."

Huckabee also touched on his proposals to invest more in preventive health care, spend more to better equip the military, secure the nation's borders against illegal immigration, and oppose amnesty for people already here illegally.

He reaffirmed his stances against gay marriage and abortion, and spoke more about the latter issue after a woman asked him to pray with her group in front of a nearby Planned Parenthood clinic.

"Either we value human life or we don't," he said. "In many ways, I got into politics because I'm deeply pro-life and I believe that, on this issue, the future of our civilization will live or die."

Not all of Huckabee's promises dealt with such weighty topics. At the start of his speech, he apologized to the crowd for being a half-hour late and blamed the delay on "the world's longest train," which generated laughter among the crowd.

"When I'm president, we're going to fix that," he said. "We guarantee short trains in Council Bluffs."

In Sioux City, Huckabee said he'd "love to win" in Iowa.

"Obviously, we've been playing to win, not show," he said. "If we do win, it will be a true upset of the classic form to win having been outspent as we have, and outmanned. To win would give us great momentum going into the next several contests."

Analysis: Can Thompson's late effort pay off?, Des Moines Register, 12-23
By WILLIAMS THEOBALD

Mason City, Ia. ◆ Even his harshest critics would likely concede that Fred Thompson had a good campaign swing through Iowa this week.

But as he headed home to Virginia on Saturday for a three-day Christmas break before returning to Iowa for the second half of his Iowa bus tour, the question that this last-minute effort began with still stands.

Will it make any difference?

Sure, Thompson won the endorsement of influential conservative Republican U.S. Rep. Steve King of Iowa. And despite losing out on Rep. Tom Tancredo's endorsement when the Colorado congressman dropped out of the presidential race and backed Mitt Romney, the next day Tancredo's Iowa campaign chairman endorsed Thompson.

Yes, Thompson's five-stop-a-day schedule answers critics who say he is a lazy campaigner. And the press coverage has been more positive, the crowds larger, the candidate sharper yet more relaxed and sometimes even appearing to be having fun.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But politics, in the end, is about concrete things like fundraising dollars and votes. And in those empirical categories it is difficult to see any impact yet.

Some polls have shown slight improvement but others have shown him dropping slightly among voters in Iowa and nationally. The Rasmussen Reports daily tracking poll found Thompson at 11 percent nationally at the start of the week and the same number at the end of the week. That left him tied for third behind Romney, the former governor of Massachusetts, and former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee.

While staffers say there have been no pay cuts or layoffs, the financial leanest of Thompson's campaign is obvious. Romney launched three new TV ads in the past week and was on a jet. Thompson was on a bus, albeit a large, tricked-out one, and left to stopping at small newspapers, doing radio "town hall meetings" and posting pleas for money on his Web site.

Thompson aides say that they have seen increases in donations and in traffic on the candidate's Web site, but would not give specific numbers. And they point to the pile of commitment cards signed by voters at this week's events promising to go to the Jan. 3 caucus and support Thompson.

Thompson said Saturday at the only event he held before a snowstorm forced him to cut short his campaigning and head home that he sees improvement in the reaction of the audiences, the polls, and the comments of prominent conservative political pundits.
"It's also the feeling I have as a person who's won elections," Thompson said.

In the end, however, Thompson supporters in Iowa are left to hope there are more people like the woman in Fort Dodge, who came to see Thompson speak at the Webster County Republican headquarters. As her husband stood outside in the Iowa cold smoking a cigarette, he looked through the window at his wife chatting with members of Thompson's staff.

His wife, he said, had attended a Romney event the night before and had decided to support him. "Now, I bet she's in there changing her mind," he lamented.

Sure enough, when she came out the door she was a committed Thompson supporter who had even sat for a video interview to the posted on the campaign Web site.

Huckabee: My campaign proves it's not about the money, Des Moines Register, 12-22
By PAULA LAVIGNE

COUNCIL BLUFFS, Ia - Mike Huckabee promised Iowa voters Saturday that they can maintain their influence as the leading caucus state by supporting him for president.

Huckabee pointed out that he was able to come from behind in the polls to become Iowa's Republican front runner despite "being outspent 20 to 1" by the other candidates on fliers, TV ads, and consultants.

"This election is going to be an opportunity to prove that, in America, the presidency is not so much a matter of money. It is about the message, and it is about the direction this country is going to take," he said. "It would forever enshrine Iowa's role and significance in having the caucus."

The former Arkansas governor spoke to a crowd of about 120 people who came to a downtown civic center on a blustery weekend morning. He was scheduled to continue his Western Iowa tour later in the day at stops in Sioux City, Orange City, and Sheldon.

Steve Jacobsen, his wife and their 13-year-old daughter Sarah, who helped make several pro-Huckabee signs, were among those waiting to talk to the candidate after the event. The 47-year-old IT director from Glenwood said Huckabee's appeal shows that his message has strength beyond all the other candidates' "glitzy ads."

"I just like him because I know he has a basic value he'll use in any decision," Jacobsen said. "I don't have to worry about where he's going to come from when he makes a decision."

Jacobsen said Huckabee's position on taxes most appealed to him because the current system for filing taxes is too burdensome and difficult.

Huckabee spoke for about a half hour on a whole slate of issues, including his support for replacing all federal income and payroll taxes with a progressive national sales tax, from which people below the poverty line would receive a full rebate.

"Imagine how much of a difference it will make to small business owners who now spend so much time and energy just trying to comply with the tax code," he said. "….The FairTax gives us the best way to revitalize our economy and particularly untax the poor and give them a chance to meet the next rung on the economic ladder."

Huckabee also touched on his proposals to invest more in preventative health care, spend more money to better equip the military, secure the nation's borders against illegal immigration, and oppose amnesty for people already here illegally.

He reaffirmed his stance against recognizing gay marriage and abortion, and spoke more about the issue after a woman asked him to pray with her group protesting that morning in front of a nearby Planned Parenthood clinic.

"Either we value human life or we don't," he said. "In many ways, I got into politics because I'm deeply pro-life and I believe that, on this issue, the future of our civilization will live or die."

Not all of Huckabee's promises dealt with such weighty topics. At the start of his speech, he apologized to the crowd for being a half-hour late and blamed the delay on waiting for "the world's longest train."

"When I'm president, we're gonna fix that," he said, generating laughter among the crowd. "We guarantee short trains in Council Bluffs."

Huckabee: My campaign proves it's not about the money, Des Moines Register, 12-22
By PAULA LAVIGNE

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

COUNCIL BLUFFS, Ia - Mike Huckabee promised Iowa voters Saturday that they can maintain their influence as the leading caucus state by supporting him for president.

Huckabee pointed out that he was able to come from behind in the polls to become Iowas Republican front runner despite being outspent 20 to 1 by the other candidates on fliers, TV ads, and consultants.

This election is going to be an opportunity to prove that, in America, the presidency is not so much a matter of money. It is about the message, and it is about the direction this country is going to take, he said. It would forever enshrine Iowas role and significance in having the caucus.

The former Arkansas governor spoke to a crowd of about 120 people who came to a downtown civic center on a blustery weekend morning. He was scheduled to continue his Western Iowa tour later in the day at stops in Sioux City, Orange City, and Sheldon.

Steve Jacobsen, his wife and their 13-year-old daughter Sarah, who helped make several pro-Huckabee signs, were among those waiting to talk to the candidate after the event. The 47-year-old IT director from Glenwood said Huckabees appeal shows that his message has strength beyond all the other candidates glitzy ads.

I just like him because I know he has a basic value hell use in any decision, Jacobsen said. I dont have to worry about where hes going to come from when he makes a decision.

Jacobsen said Huckabees position on taxes most appealed to him because the current system for filing taxes is too burdensome and difficult.

Huckabee spoke for about a half hour on a whole slate of issues, including his support for replacing all federal income and payroll taxes with a progressive national sales tax, from which people below the poverty line would receive a full rebate.

Imagine how much of a difference it will make to small business owners who now spend so much time and energy just trying to comply with the tax code, he said The FairTax gives us the best way to revitalize our economy and particularly untax the poor and give them a chance to meet the next rung on the economic ladder.

Huckabee also touched on his proposals to invest more in preventative health care, spend more money to better equip the military, secure the nations borders against illegal immigration, and oppose amnesty for people already here illegally.

He reaffirmed his stance against recognizing gay marriage and abortion, and spoke more about the issue after a woman asked him to pray with her group protesting that morning in front of a nearby Planned Parenthood clinic.

Either we value human life or we dont, he said. In many ways, I got into politics because Im deeply pro-life and I believe that, on this issue, the future of our civilization will live or die.

Not all of Huckabees promises dealt with such weighty topics. At the start of his speech, he apologized to the crowd for being a half-hour late and blamed the delay on waiting for the worlds longest train.

When Im president, were gonna fix that, he said, generating laughter among the crowd. We guarantee short trains in Council Bluffs.

Fred Thompson events canceled, Des Moines Register, 12-22
Two meet-and-greet campaign events for Republican Fred Thompson scheduled for today have been canceled due to the weather.

Thompson will not appear at either the 1 p.m. Ames event, nor the 5:10 p.m. Urbandale event. Campaign staff are working on rescheduling, but do not yet have concrete details, a spokeswoman said.

Romney says McCain flunked ‘Reagan 101’, Omaha World Herald, 12-23

NORTH CONWAY, N.H. (AP) — Taking aim at a rallying John McCain, New Hampshire frontrunner Mitt Romney said Saturday that his GOP presidential rival had failed “Reagan 101” by twice opposing President Bush’s tax cuts.

Romney also sought to turn McCain’s well-known maverick streak — a central theme in his campaign ads — against the Arizona senator. McCain’s go-italone attitude, Romney suggested, will breed more divisiveness in Washington if he wins.

“Anyone who’s run something, whether it’s a small business or a big business, knows that the No. 1 ingredient for success is building a remarkable team of people around you, motivating them, guiding them, insisting on them drawing out their best capacities,” Romney told a crowd of more than 100 people at an elementary school. Taxes, a major focus in a state without an income tax, also came up in Romney’s criticism of McCain.

“He voted against the Bush tax cuts — twice,” Romney said. “That’s failing Reagan 101. (Ronald) Reagan taught . . . almost all of us in the Republican Party that lowering taxes would grow the economy and was good for our economy and good for individuals. And I believe that the Republicans are going to nominate a tax-cutter to become president of the United States.”

The McCain campaign did not immediately respond to a request for comment. In 2000, McCain beat Bush in the New Hampshire primary, and the two later squared off over the president’s tax-cut policy. Romney’s criticism could open him up to a line attack about his own position on the tax cuts, given a report from the Boston Globe about a meeting in Washington in 2001 with the Massachusetts congressional delegation. The Globe said Romney, governor of Massachusetts at the time, was asked about Bush’s tax cut plan, and Romney replied that he “won’t be a cheerleader” for proposals he did not agree with. “But I have to keep a solid relationship with the White House,” the Globe reported him as saying.

Giuliani downplays hospital stay

HOPKINTON, N.H. (AP) — Republican presidential hopeful Rudy Giuliani said Saturday that he is glad to be back campaigning after canceling some events last week because of illness.

The former New York mayor spent Wednesday night at a hospital in St. Louis and was released Thursday.

On Saturday, Giuliani downplayed the episode. “I am in good health,” he said. “This is just something that came about because I was tired, not sleeping, who knows exactly why, but I had a very bad headache. They were concerned it might be other things, (but) they ruled out just about every other possibility. It was just a bad headache."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton pledges help for working women

MANCHESTER, N.H. (AP) — Sen. Hillary Clinton on Saturday tailored her messages and appearances to female voters, with whom she enjoys a sizable lead in this state's contest for the Democratic nomination.

Clinton, speaking at a YWCA here, said her agenda for families and children is the most aggressive among the candidates. She touted her plans for familycare and child-care tax credits that she said would ease the burden on working women.

"We can do a better job in supporting families than we do right now," Clinton said. "We give a lot of lip service to family values, but we've never really valued families in a way that we can."

Huckabee: Stronger Military, Families, AP/Quad City Times, 12-23

By LIBBY QUAID

SIOUX CITY, Iowa - Republican presidential candidate Mike Huckabee appealed to Iowa conservatives on two fronts Saturday, calling for a stronger military and stronger families.

Huckabee, the former Arkansas governor who jumped to a lead in Iowa polls earlier this month, wants a drastic increase in regular forces to ease the strain on National Guard and reserve units being called up for duty in Iraq and Afghanistan.

"We need to have a larger regular force to make sure we are capable if we do have to go into battle, and let's pray to God that we don't," Huckabee told about 120 people in Council Bluffs, Iowa.

Huckabee acknowledged the criticism leveled at him last week for his negative comments about President Bush's foreign policy, although he mischaracterized the criticism.

Huckabee said detractors don't like his opinion that a larger force should have invaded Iraq. In fact, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice disagreed with a separate Huckabee complaint, that Bush has an "arrogant bunker mentality" toward foreign policy that is offensive to other countries.

"Mistakes were made in how things were handled; we all understand that," Huckabee said of the Iraq war. "Now I'm getting criticism because I'm suggesting there were mistakes in the light-footprint concept."

He repeated his complaint that Bush should have listened to military commanders who said more troops were needed for the initial invasion.

"Once you engage in battle, you do not let the politicians second-guess and mess with the decisions of the battlefield commanders who have the blood on their boots and the medals on their chest," Huckabee told around 300 supporters later in a high school auditorium in Sioux Falls.

Huckabee's foreign policy views were also criticized by GOP rival Mitt Romney, whom Huckabee knocked out of the lead in Iowa polls earlier this month.

The ascent of Huckabee, an ordained Baptist minister, has been fueled by Christian conservatives who share his evangelical faith and, in many cases, say they are uncomfortable with Romney's Mormon faith.

On his final stretch of campaigning before the Christmas holiday, Huckabee underlined his lifelong opposition to abortion and gay marriage, issues that will likely drive many churchgoers to the Jan. 3 caucuses in Iowa. He spent Saturday traveling the western edge of Iowa, the most conservative part of the state.

"It's not because I don't like them," Huckabee said of gay people. "It's because I like even more the idea that the heart and soul, the essence of our civilization is in the family. It's not in the government. It's not even in some institution, not even the church. Before there was the church, and before there was government, there was family.

"When you mess with the design, you end up messing with results," he added. "We can't afford to do that. That's why you will never hear me waver."

His emphasis on consistency calls attention to Romney's inconsistency. Romney favored abortion rights and gay rights when elected governor of Massachusetts, but has since changed his mind on abortion and in his presidential campaign has played down his support for gay rights, while playing up his opposition to gay marriage.

Huckabee also thumped Romney for spending millions of dollars to organize and boost his profile in Iowa. Huckabee runs a tiny campaign on a shoestring budget and, even with significant help from outside groups and pastors, is vastly outgunned in the state.

"But what would happen in this country if money couldn't buy the presidency?" Huckabee asked. "What would happen if Iowa said we're not for sale, and we're not even for rent?"

In Orange City, he joked about mailboxes stuffed full of campaign mailings: "I know you normally look forward to Christmas cards this time of year. This time, you go and _ Huckabee's a bum, Huckabee's a bum, Huckabee's a bum, Huckabee's a bum.

"My wife could've told you that and saved the postage," he said as a packed auditorium laughed and clapped.

It wasn't all talk for Huckabee, who despite his conservative image likes to rock out on bass guitar. In Sioux City, to illustrate what he needs to do over the crucial next few days, Huckabee played "Takin' Care of Business," the 1970s hit by Bachman-Turner Overdrive.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Romney Takes on McCain Over Taxes, AP/Quad City Times, 12-23

By GLEN JOHNSON
NORTH CONWAY, N.H. - Taking aim at a rallying John McCain, New Hampshire front-runner Mitt Romney said Saturday that his GOP presidential rival had failed "Reagan 101" by twice opposing President Bush's tax cuts.

Romney also sought to turn McCain's well-known maverick streak _ a central theme in his campaign ads _ against the Arizona senator. McCain's go-it-alone attitude, Romney suggested, will breed more divisiveness in Washington if he wins.

"Anyone who's run something, whether it's a small business or a big business, knows that the No. 1 ingredient for success is building a remarkable team of people around you, motivating them, guiding them, insisting on them drawing out their best capacities," Romney told a crowd of more than 100 people at an elementary school.

"I've had occasions to run business, to run the Olympics and to run a state, and you don't do that by yourself," said Romney, a former Massachusetts governor.

Taxes, a major focus in a state without an income tax, drew Romney's attention in his criticism of McCain.

"He voted against the Bush tax cuts _ twice," Romney said. "That's failing Reagan 101. (Ronald) Reagan taught ... almost all of us in the Republican Party that lowering taxes would grow the economy and was good for our economy and good for individuals. And I believe that the Republicans are going to nominate a tax-cutter to become president of the United States."

The McCain campaign's state vice chairman, Chuck Douglas, said Romney had a tendency to change political positions depending on the circumstance.

"From his claims of being a 'lifelong hunter' to receiving the NRA's endorsement to marching with Martin Luther King Jr., it's clear that Mitt Romney has trouble with the truth," Douglas said. "His latest attacks are yet another example of his complete inability to level with the voters of New Hampshire. The facts are clear: Romney refused to endorse the Bush tax cuts he now claims to champion, maybe because he was too busy raising taxes in Massachusetts by over $700 million per year."

In 2000, McCain beat Bush in the New Hampshire primary, and the two later squared off over the president's tax-cut policy.

The attacks on McCain come as the latest public opinion survey shows the lawmaker gaining on Romney, who long held double-digit leads in the state. Those questioned in the USA Today/Gallup Poll said they liked McCain for standing up for his beliefs and being in touch with average people, but Romney for having new ideas to solve problems and sharing voters' values.

Romney's criticism could open him up to a line attack about his own position on the tax cuts.

McCain was one of two Republican senators to vote against a $1.35 trillion tax cut that Bush proposed in 2001. McCain also voted against similar plans in 2003, as well as a proposed repeal of the federal estate tax. McCain said they disproportionately benefited the wealthy.

"That sounds like Ted Kennedy and John Kerry," Romney later told a house party in Tuftonboro, referring to the two liberal Democratic senators from his home state.

At the time of the latter votes, Romney was in his first stint in elective office, leading Massachusetts.

The Boston Globe reported that year that during a meeting in Washington with the Massachusetts congressional delegation, Romney was asked about the tax cuts and said he "won't be a cheerleader" for proposals he did not agree with. "But I have to keep a solid relationship with the White House."

Now, Romney is solidly behind the cuts, arguing they should be made permanent before they expire in 2011.

A questioner at a town hall meeting Friday night in Rochester asked Romney about his apparent change of heart. The man refused to give his name, and Romney aides surrounded him afterward and accused him of being a Massachusetts Democrat who had challenged Romney about his tax record at another event.

Romney said that his first public comments were in support of the tax cuts, and that he campaigned on behalf of Bush in 2004.

Turning back to 2003, Romney told the man: "You see, I wasn't a U.S. senator. I didn't have to vote on this, didn't get a choice to. I was running my state, so I didn't have a comment on their position. And I said, `I'm not weighing in on federal issues.' But Senator McCain was a senator. He had to vote. He had to decide, `Am I in favor of pursuing these tax cuts or not,' and he voted against the tax cuts _ twice. That's a very different position."

Rivals: Huckabee Another Bill Clinton, AP/Quad City Times, 12-23
By: Liz Sidoti

DAVENPORT, Iowa - To hear Mitt Romney tell it, Republican Mike Huckabee shares more with Democrat Bill Clinton than a hometown in Hope, Ark., and a stint as Arkansas governor.

Both men, Romney suggests, have left-leaning governing philosophies, particularly on taxes and spending.

"Governor Huckabee's record is more liberal than our nation needs right now," the former Massachusetts governor said in Iowa last week, seeking to link his GOP presidential rival to the former Democratic president who is loathed by many Republican loyalists.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Retorted Huckabee: "This nonsense about being a liberal is pure nonsense."

Romney started giving Huckabee that brand _ and implicitly linking him to Clinton _ as polls started showing a tight race in the first state to speak in the GOP nomination fight. Romney had led in Iowa for months, but Huckabee's recent rise here and elsewhere has prompted Romney to go after his opponent.

The effort may be paying off. Polls show Huckabee's double-digit lead dropping to single digits less than two weeks before the caucuses.

Romney's aides argue Huckabee's record as governor undercuts his claim that he's the only authentic conservative in the race. Romney himself has stopped short of explicitly saying his rival is simply another Clinton, though he's less shy about it in campaign literature mailed to thousands of Iowa Republicans.

He wouldn't bite this past week when pressed on whether Huckabee and Clinton were one and the same.

"They're very different people, and obviously the area of concern relates to spending and taxation. We think of Bill Clinton as being a tax raiser and a spender," Romney said _ then mused that he had read somewhere that Huckabee had raised more taxes than Clinton when they were governors.

Asked whether Huckabee was more like him or Clinton, Romney sidestepped.

"I think you have to look issue by issue," he said.

Huckabee returns to city, now with front-runner status, Sioux City Journal, 12-23
By Bret Hayworth Journal staff writer

SIOUX CITY -- Campaigning July 11 in Sioux City, Republican presidential candidate Mike Huckabee spoke to 35 people in a stop at Panera Bread.

Like a band growing in stature, sometime-bassist Huckabee has moved from small venues to the big halls. On Saturday, Huckabee drew roughly 10 times the amount of the summer stop when 330 people came to the North High School auditorium. In a Journal/Lee Enterprises Poll last week, Huckabee had vaulted to the lead in Iowa, surpassing Mitt Romney, who had been the polling leader for much of 2007.

Siouxlanders taking in the event heard Huckabee namecheck a wide variety of topics, including the Declaration of Independence, the prophet Isaiah and the 1972 movie "Billy Jack." The crowd was energized from the beginning, and a group of teen girls began a chant of "Huckabee, Huckabee" when he strapped on a bass and played a Bachman Turner Overdrive song prior to delivering a 35-minute speech.

"You guys are jazzed up, aren't you? I'm not sure if this is a political rally or the set for The Price Is Right," Huckabee said as he began.

He noted he was the 44th governor of Arkansas, serving for 10 years, and pointed to the numerical symmetry of what he's looking to become. "Ladies and gentlemen, with your help on Jan. 3, I'll be on the way to becoming the 44th president of the United States," Huckabee said.

Huckabee pointed with relish to his status at the top of polls, noting the difference from "the days nobody knew or cared about me."

At a time when there is increased back-and-forth between the Romney and Huckabee campaigns, Huckabee encouraged Iowans to listen to the candidates themselves, not what's coming out of opponent camps. He said he's gotten some advice on "going negative" against GOP candidates, but said he's not going down that path.

"I can't stop the negative attacks, and I can't equally spend what my opponents will spend," he said.

Rather, Huckabee said, "I've got a record I'm very proud to stand on -- more executive experience than any one else running, Republican or Democrat." He added that the nation needs a president who will take the country "not to the left or the right, but up."

On immigration reform, Huckabee said he supports beefing up border security and having illegal immigrants go "to the back of the line" for legal status. He also cited support for revising the tax system and for "traditional marriage," terming that as only between a man and a woman.

Romney ads have been critical of the number of pardons and commutations Huckabee gave Arkansas prisoners, and Huckabee noted some contend he's been "soft on crime."

Said Huckabee, "The 16 people who were executed when I was governor probably wouldn't agree with that statement."

The event was attended by three Kingsley, Iowa, natives now living elsewhere but home for the holidays, including one now living 20 minutes away from Huckabee's hometown of Hope, Ark. Sherri Kaneversky of Sioux City said she came to the event unsure of which candidate she would support.

"I liked everything I heard and, yeah, I'm going to support (Huckabee) for the caucuses. I'm going to my first caucus," said Kaneversky, who moved from California three years ago.

She's a former school teacher who now home schools her children. Homeschoolers have had a strong affiliation with Huckabee, and some from Iowa and Nebraska were in attendance.

"He's clear and concise and he answers the questions," Kaneversky said, and cited her agreement with Huckabee on tax policy, education and immigration reform.

"If the true conservatives will listen to him and get out to vote ... I think he can win," she said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

At the conclusion of the event, Sioux City councilman Jason Geary announced he was endorsing Huckabee. "He's a man of principle, a man who governs effectively," Geary said.

Huckabee touts poll climb, Dubuque Telegraph Herald, 12-22

Former Arkansas governor, appearing at Loras, says he is accustomed to being the underdog
By EILEEN MOZINSKI TH staff writer

Republican presidential hopeful, former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee greets people during a campaign stop at Loras College in Dubuque, Iowa, Friday, December 21, 2007.
Other candidates have shelled out a lot more cash, but Mike Huckabee said his recent climb in the polls is more than a fluke.

In an appearance Friday at Loras College, the former Arkansas governor and suddenly heavyweight contender for the Republican presidential nomination said he's used to being the underdog. Huckabee said he thinks his Iowa lead is destined to stick even though, by Huckabee's numbers, one opponent, Mitt Romney, has outspent him 20-to-1.

When questioned about what his thoughts were after the campaign took the lead among Republican candidates in Iowa, Huckabee said he has always believed in the possibility that big aspirations can sprout from humble roots.

It's a theme he said has been peppered throughout his life and presidential campaign.

"It's about all those people who grew up like me," Huckabee told a crowd of about 60 people at the Loras Alumni Campus Center. "With the odds stacked against them 20-to-1."

In a town hall-style question- and answer-session, the presidential hopeful defended himself against recent attacks questioning Advertisement his record of tax increases and pardons as governor.

Huckabee said the accusations have missed the big picture about his record.

"When you tell a half-truth as if it was a whole truth, it becomes an untruth," he said.

Huckabee touted his ability to improve and maintain the Arkansas budget and bolster the state education system.

"If I messed up that bad, I hid it really well from the people who voted for me," he said.

Huckabee added that the pardons he granted were typically situations that rectified a minimal offense so someone could attend college or get a job and came from a stack of more than 8,700 requests.

"The idea that I stood at the prison door and let people out en masse is ridiculous," he said.

The candidate also took questions on his views about gay marriage, gun control and illegal immigration.

After telling his personal story of losing more than 100 pounds and becoming healthy enough to participate as a marathon runner, Huckabee outlined his belief that health care needs to focus on "prevention and wellness."

He shared his "unabashed view" that the Second Amendment is as sacred as the First and said the illegal immigration issue is a complex one that can be remedied by establishing a firm border. "The first thing has to be a sealed border, and I mean a literal fence," he said.

To a young woman asking about same-sex marriage who said she strongly believes that "people can't help who they love," Huckabee asked the audience to applaud her candor. But the candidate demanded he supports a more "traditional" view of marriage.

"When you start redefining words like 'family' and 'marriage' it's a pretty big deal," he said, adding that he is not the candidate to count on to "change those rules."

Huckabee urged participants to help him win the Jan. 3 Iowa caucus. He said the move would reaffirm the importance of the caucuses by making them more than being about supporting the candidate who spends the most.

"It would create such havoc in the whole political world," he said, promising to honor the idea that elected officials are not supposed to be rulers. "We're elected to be servers."

Angela Warnke, of Dubuque, asked Huckabee about alternative energy and said she was pleased with his stance that the United States needs to become energy independent in the next decade. Warnke supported Huckabee in the summer straw poll.

"Every time I try to change candidates, I keep coming back to him," she said.

'I dance to no man's tune', Ft. Dodge Messenger, 12-22
By BILL SHEA, Messenger staff writer

Former U.S. Sen. Fred Thompson came to Fort Dodge Friday and quickly staked his claim to being the true conservative Republican who can protect American values if he becomes president.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

He defended his qualifications for that job by asserting that a resume loaded with administrative experience doesn't always make a good leader.

''Administrators are people who leaders hire,'' he said. ''There is a difference between administration and leadership.''

Speaking in the measured baritone that TV viewers came to expect on ''Law & Order,'' the actor-turned-politician recited what he views as the basics of conservative government.

Along the way, he enhanced his homespun Tennessee lawyer image with quips such as calling the signers of the Declaration of Independence ''the old boys.''

Of himself, he said, ''What you see is what you get. I dance to no man's tune.''

He spoke to about 80 people at the Webster County Republican headquarters, 900 Central Ave., winning over Linda Sorenson, of rural Webster County, who had been a Democrat for years.

''I was not at all a Fred Thompson supporter until tonight,'' Sorenson said. ''He's very straightforward. He doesn't hold back punches. He says what he thinks.''

Sorenson said she'll caucus for him because she believes he'll bring leadership and truthfulness to the White House.

Others in the crowd, like Howard Ortmeyer, of Fort Dodge, are still making up their minds about the candidates.

''I kind of liked him,'' Ortmeyer said. ''I do think he's a little conservative for me, but he has good ideas.''

He said he's still considering three candidates.

Thompson said he's committed to the ''sound conservative principles that have unified us for over 200 years.''

Topping the list of those principles, he said, is the idea that basic rights come from God, not government.

Smaller government and a federal court system that's limited to case law, not social policy, are also key, he said.

He called for tight-fisted budget policies.

''You don't spend money you don't have and you don't borrow money that only your children and grandchildren can pay back,'' he said.

Thompson said all those ideals are threatened by a ''liberal, big-government, high-taxes, weak-on-national-defense Democratic Party that is licking its chops to get back in power to lead us down the road to a welfare state.''

The candidate said that if he's elected he'll simplify the tax system, save Social Security, modernize the military and stop illegal immigration.

The security of the nation would be his No. 1 priority, he said. The United States, he said, is ''one terrorist plot away from nuclear disaster.''

A Thompson administration, he said, would permit an aggressive search for domestic energy sources that would include drilling for oil in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge in Alaska. He said he also supports ''clean coal,'' nuclear energy and alternative fuels such as ethanol.

While some of his competitors hit the campaign trail in 2006, Thompson entered the race in late summer 2007. He said presidential campaigns ought to be shorter. Long campaigns, he added, are ''certainly not adding to the intellectual capital of our nation.''

In Iowa, barnstorming Thompson aims to keep campaign alive, Muscatine Journal, 12-22
By LIBBY QUAID

SIOUX CITY, Iowa - Actor-politician Fred Thompson is making an eleventh-hour push to convince Iowa voters he is the only real conservative in the presidential race, contrasting his ideas and record on immigration and abortion with those of his leading rivals.

His job isn't getting any easier. Thompson suffered a stinging setback Thursday, when conservative Rep. Tom Tancredo dropped out of the presidential running and endorsed another rival, former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney.

Tancredo, a Colorado congressman, is a hero to many voters who are furious at illegal immigration in this country, and a lot of them are Iowa caucus goers. The endorsement was a disappointment to Thompson, especially since his week had begun on a high note with the unexpected backing of another anti-immigration hero, Rep. Steve King.

King, an Iowa congressman, said volunteers are frantically calling Tancredo supporters to try to recruit them for Thompson. Two senior officials came on board Friday, campaigning with Thompson in Sioux City in conservative western Iowa, which King represents and where he traveled with Thompson this week.

"I am convinced the majority of Tancredo people will end up with Thompson," King said in an interview.

Thompson is barnstorming across Iowa by bus to make the face-to-face contact that voters in Iowa have come to expect. The state begins the nominating process in just two weeks, on Jan. 3.

A long shot because of his late and sluggish entry to the race, Thompson is battling for third place to keep himself in the running. No one has gone on to win the nomination without a top-three finish in Iowa.

He shrugged off polls, saying he has the potential to come on fast in the final days of the Iowa campaign. If history is any guide, Thompson may be right.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"The experts don't know nothin'," Thompson said Friday in Sioux City. "It's the people of Iowa who decide these things, and momentum makes a whole lot of difference."

Later in Sioux Center, he laid out his conservative credentials for a community college audience: "We ought to be a nation with high fences and wide gates, but we get to decide when we open that gate and how long we leave it open."

Thompson wants to force employers to verify they aren't hiring illegal immigrants. And he says the government should yank federal dollars from "sanctuary" cities that don't report illegal immigrants, a dig at Romney and especially former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani.

Giuliani sued the federal government to keep from having to report illegal immigrants. The reason: New York officials wanted to encourage people to report crimes, send their kids to school and seek medical treatment. And cities in Massachusetts had similar policies while Romney was governor.

Thompson also took a swing at Mike Huckabee, who has risen to the top of Iowa polls, for trying to make children of illegal immigrants eligible for scholarships and in-state college tuition when he was governor of Arkansas.

Thompson called for "stopping sanctuary cities or giving in-state tuition to illegal immigrants, which would lure people in, and lure them to bring innocent children in, in the future by the millions."

At the same time, Thompson is emphasizing endorsements from at least 10 anti-abortion groups, including the National Right to Life Committee and nine state groups. His record is not perfect to abortion foes _ he made conflicting statements in his Senate races and as a lawyer lobbied on behalf of an abortion-rights organization.

But Romney's and Giuliani's records are even less agreeable to abortion foes. Romney switched from supporting to opposing abortion rights before running for president, and Giuliani still supports abortion rights.

Thompson tries to close the deal with an appeal that is broader than those two issues, saying he is the best person to sit down at the negotiating table with the nation's worst enemies, an argument he made in a debate performance that won him praise earlier this month in Des Moines.

He argues his experience as a senator and on foreign policy is better than Romney's and Huckabee's experience as governors and Giuliani's as a mayor.

"When it gets right down to it, you're not electing a set of plans or position papers," he said. "You're going to be electing a leader for dangerous times. Nobody likes to be a fear monger, but I've been there. It is no exaggeration in this country to say that for a long time to come, I fear, we're going to be one terrorist plot away from nuclear disaster.

"This is not the time for on-the-job training."

A Rendezvous with Huckabee: Republicans' rising star lands in Muscatine for campaign appearance, Muscatine Journal, 12-21
By Melissa Regennitter Of the Muscatine Journal

MUSCATINE, Iowa — About 50 people — and nearly as many media representatives and political crew members — were at The Rendezvous banquet facility in Muscatine Friday afternoon for an appearance by Republican presidential candidate Mike Huckabee.

Bob Vander Plaats, who ran for Iowa lieutenant governor in 2006, introduced Huckabee and reminded the crowd how things can change for candidates in this race.

“He went from second tier ... to front-runner in Iowa,” Vander Plaats said of Huckabee’s current ranking in the state.

Huckabee has focused on issues including how to improve the nation’s infrastructure, education system, environmental policy and failing health-care system.

In Muscatine, Huckabee, the 44th governor of Arkansas, said he’s more than ready to be the 44th president of the United States. He said that people are beginning to realize the importance of the upcoming caucus and that on caucus night, the rest of the world will be focused on Iowa.

Huckabee spoke of the hardships he faced in life, such as his wife’s need for spinal surgery early in their marriage and how his father had to work hard to make ends meet.

He also wanted to remind young Americans to get out and vote because the decisions made by the next president will dramatically affect their future.

Sheila Blaskowski, 48, Fruitland, said she is leaning strongly toward Huckabee. She brought along her seven home-schooled children, ages 5-18, to hear his message.

“Our family is strongly pro-life and we are for his conservative ideas,” she said. She added that it’s important for her children to learn about politics and see candidates before making a decisions based on what they hear in person, not just on television advertisements.

Her oldest son, Bernard, 18, said he’ll vote in 2008 for the first time and is also leaning toward Huckabee. After hearing the speech, he said that Huckabee had confirmed his previous beliefs in the candidate.

Immigration

Huckabee said he had a nine-point immigration plan that starts with securing the borders with a fence, no amnesty in sanctuary cities and requiring illegal immigrants get to the back of the line and earn their right to become an American citizen.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

We have an “insecure border that the government has failed for more than 20 years to do anything about,” he said. “When you come to the United States you come through the front door, not the back door.”

He added that people who want to immigrate to the U.S. shouldn’t have to live in hiding or in shame for breaking the laws. They should have the opportunity to become part of the nation through the proper means.

Curriculum

Huckabee said he’s interested in “launching a curriculum of mass instruction” into the school systems. He believes that students are being taught with an 18th century model in a 21st century world and they are bored, not stupid.

“We need to make the curriculum about what they enjoy and excite them,” he said.

He believes if teachers had the materials and curriculum to teach kids what they are interested in learning that it would be more productive than the “sit down, be quiet and be still, put your nose in a black-and-white book and hope you learn something from it” attitude.

Military

Huckabee said there should be strength in the U.S. military that no one wants to mess with, and that peace doesn’t come through weakness.

We should have “a military that intimidates the rest of the world,” he said, adding that if the U.S. military were feared because it was fully equipped and strong, there would likely never be a reason to use it.

But if it was necessary to engage the military, “do it in full-force ... no politicians interfering with military commanders,” he added.

Huckabee was in Davenport before stopping in Muscatine and then planned to head to Iowa City and Dubuque.

Q&A: Inside the bus with Fred Thompson, Carroll Times Herald, 12-21

Daily Times Herald reporter and columnist Douglas Burns spent about 15 minutes speaking one-on-one with Republican presidential candidate Fred Thompson on his campaign bus outside the Carroll Country Club Thursday morning.

Thompson, a former U.S. senator from Tennessee and accomplished actor, discussed the war in Iraq, his own campaign style, criticism of his admitted lack of "type A" personality, his chances against Hillary Clinton in a potential general election match-up and the recently held Des Moines Register GOPdebate.

U.S. Rep. Steve King, R-Iowa, a Thompson supporter, was present for the full interview, and the presiden-tial hopeful's wife, Jeri, stood in for some of the session aboard a bus bearing the slogan: "Clear Conservative choice: Hands down!" bus tour.

The following is a transcript of the Daily Times Herald exchange with Thompson.

Daily Times Herald: We aren't hearing too much on the war in Iraq from the Democratic side of the presidential race right now. Perhaps they feel it is going well. Do you think at the end of the day the Iraq war becomes a good issue for the Republicans?

Thompson: Yeah, I think it is going well from all those whose opinions I value who have come back from over there. We have very close friends of ours who have kids over there who have re-upped and we get reports back from them from time to time and things are going on the provinces, just something that hasn't been going on before.

We saw some of these atrocities I think in the last day or two day, al Qaeda torch hospitals or whatever they call them. That's indicative of what's been happening out there and people are sick and tired of it. And they're coming to our side. Some of the Sunni leadership is coming to our side.

They're reaching some arrangements at the local level that has not yet made its way to the politicians in Baghdad.

And that needs to happen but it doesn't mean a lot of good things aren't happening. Violence is down. Car bombings are down. Ramadan was much more peaceful than it has been in a long, long time.

So all indications are good. I was amazed the other night at the Iowa debate when they took Iraq and immi-gration off the table to start with.

I said to myself, if there had been some bad news out of Iraq it wouldn't have been off the table.

Daily Times Herald: Was that last Des Moines Register debate at Iowa Public Television the worst-run debate you've ever been involved with, senator?

Thompson: I'll have to think for a minute because I've been involved in some pretty badly run debates.

I don't think the format serves the people well. It's an exchange of sound bites and then when they come in and get even more officious than usual.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

They set the ground rules and tell the candidates, "it's take it or leave it."

They wouldn't even give a break in the middle of that hour-and-a-half debate. Any other debate we've had there's been a break or two, usually two little breaks along the way.

They said "no." I said, "Wait a minute, this is kind of unusual." They said, "Take it or leave it."

So that's the attitude they have. This is our deal. You have to dance to our tune and do it our way.

Then when they take that extra added step when they say now we're going to have a show of hands like we're a bunch of trained seals waiting for a fish to be thrown to them there are some things that ought to be even beneath the dignity of a presidential candidate. When I basically said, "No," it kind of broke them and showed it for what it was.

And now they're getting an awful lot of bad comments about it and I think richly deserved.

It was a poorly conceived deal and they would have been a whole lot better off if they would talk to some people in the process a little bit about what might make a better debate, instead of being so officious about it.

Daily Times Herald: On the Democratic side of the presidential race U.S. Sen. Barack Obama has admitted in his book and in different speeches that not only has he done marijuana in his past but that he has had some experience with cocaine. His campaign's explanation is that the honesty, the forthright element of that, is good. Some people have been critical of it, suggesting that it might red carpet the notion of experimentation for kids. Do you have any thoughts on that, that this is out there in the dialogue and it's not just marijuana, it's cocaine?

Thompson: Well, it's hard to comment on somebody else's personal revelations without knowing all the circumstances involved.

Obviously, that's not a good example for kids and it's very unfortunate, but I imagine Obama thinks the same thing. I imagine that's his own opinion about it. I wish it hadn't happened. He probably wishes it hadn't happened.

The political effect of that is for people to decide.

He's like every other human being. You have to live with the consequences of your actions.

Daily Times Herald: With the fighting between GOP candidates Mitt Romney (former Massachu-setts governor) and Mike Huckabee (former Arkansas governor), do you see a dynamic at work here similar to the Democratic side in 2004 where you had (U.S. Rep. Dick) Gephardt and (former Vermont Gov. How-ard) Dean going at it and you had (U.S. Sen. John) Kerry emerge? You're just about as tall as Kerry. Do you see yourself playing that role?

Thompson: I think I'm ahead of where he was in the polls. I don't know. You just kinda got to follow your own game plan.

And, you know, my game plan is just to be who I am and what I am. It's a whole lot easier to remember. My positions on the issues are constants.

Some people say I'm not a Type A personality and they're right.

They want examples of me clicking my heels and things like that. That ain't me. It wasn't me in Tennessee when I got more votes than anybody in the history of Tennessee politics.

It's served me well all my life being who I am. A large part of what I am is that, you know, I don't mind telling it like it is.

Daily Times Herald: You stayed in Carroll last night at the Super 8. Your first event started at 10 o'clock today. One of the knocks on you has been maybe that you're a little lazy. Why did you start your first event at 10 o'clock?

Thompson: First of all we had telephone interviews this morning in our room. We had briefings in our room. We got in last night from over in east Iowa. I don't know what time we finally got to bed but it was late last night. We've been doing I don't know how many events. We're going to do 50 towns and communities. You can catch us sometimes where there is a gap there. But if you look at the overall schedule you'll find it to be a very, very active one.

I don't have anything to prove to anybody.

I mean, you know, I actually like to read a little bit along the way. The first thing I do when I walk out is get asked about the president's news conference that he had this morning that I saw, and what's happened with the other candidates and comments that they've made, and sometimes disasters that have happened in various communities and shootings and so forth. I read and talk to people about that. Talk to them in the home office. Get my plan for the day and the information I need for the day.

You can't put yourself in another man's shoes, figure out well he got in this time that night so he ought to start this time the next morning in order to prove he's more energetic. That's the kind of thing they used to say about Ronald Reagan and he always said, 'They say hard work never hurt anybody but why take a chance?'

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Daily Times Herald: If Hillary Clinton is the nominee and you are, do you take the South off the table? Are you just going to destroy her in the South?

Thompson: That's a little premature. I think that we're going to need somebody who is a solid conservative who can unite the country. I think that I would match up very, very well with her in that regard.

Daily Times Herald: By the way I saw "Hunt for Red October" four times in the theater when it came out.

Thompson: That's more times than me.

Republicans, Le Mars Daily Sentinel, 12-21

People registered as Democrats, Independents, or even unregistered eligible voters can still participate in the Republican Caucus. They will have to fill out the voter registration form at that caucus site.

Choosing a presidential candidate will be the first order of business at the Republican caucus sites, starting at 7 p.m. sharp.
"Instead of having a ballot, we will pass out a colored piece of paper and the people will write the candidate's name of their choice," said Don Kass, the county Republican chairman since 1994.

Before the vote, one person for each candidate is allowed to speak on their behalf. After the ballots are cast, they will be immediately counted, with one representative from each candidate watching.

Numbers from each precinct will be tallied, then Kass will call the total in to the state.

"Precinct by precinct, people will know immediately," Kass said. "Lately, I've known easily by 9 p.m. what the county total is. I'll be calling the state as soon as humanly possible since they have 99 counties reporting. Having 99 counties is like herding 99 cats."

Candidates, he said, might show up at a precinct in Des Moines or Iowa City. That would not be unusual.

Next up, the Republicans will choose delegates to go to the county, district and state conventions. They will also pick people to serve on the county's Central Committee, what Don Kass calls the "nuts and bolts organization" that runs the party in the county.

Separate from the Central Committee, county delegates serve for two years. If a county elected official would need to be replaced mid-term, they would convene to nominate one. There are usually 100 total county delegates for the Republican party, Kass said, and each precinct gets a certain number based on voter turnout in that precinct for the last general election.

Finally, they'll discuss the local platform.

"Let's say a person has a given issue that they feel very strongly about, they can write down what they believe -- "this is what we should stand for" -- bring it, submit it at the caucus, it can be discussed and voted up or down, and it will go to a committee set up by the new Central Committee to sort through those and compile them into a proposed county platform.

"If you have a new platform plank, please write it as legibly as possible and in complete sentences," Kass said. "It might be the best thing in the world, but if we can't read it, we can't use it."

If they have opposing views from two separate precincts on a platform plank, they will list both in a proposed platform and have the county convention decide which to go with.

"And conceivably you could have a motion from the floor to through them both out," Kass said.

On March 8, the county convention will ratify the county platform.

"We will send representatives who will fight for what's in the county platform at the district level," Kass said. "Then we develop a district platform, and that evolves into the state platform."

Some issues, he said, will move from the state level to define the party's national platform. Abortion has been one of those issues in the past. This year, he said, illegal immigration will likely be one of those topics.

The caucuses will likely last about an hour or an hour and a half, Kass said.

"We're in the national news so much -- you're kind of missing out on history not to participate," Kass said. "This is how you make your voice heard. This is Iowa's only selection process for the two parties. You're not entitled to have your way without doing something to get it."

Kass said he'd like to see more people get involved, especially young people.

"We need new blood," he said. "The most basic unit of government is the citizen, the individual."

Republican Caucus Sites for Plymouth County

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Precinct I Akron & Portland Township., Precinct 6 Westfield, Westfield & Sioux Townships

Location: Akron Public Library

Precinct 2 Craig, Preston & Grant Townships, Precinct 4 Brunsville, Johnson & Washington Townships

Location: Brunsville Legion Hall

Precinct 3 Seney, Struble, Elgin & America Townships, Precincts 11, 12, & 13-City of LeMars

Location: Prime Bank of Le Mars (Basement)

Precinct 5 Remsen, Fredonia, Marion, Meadow, & Remsen Townships

Location: Remsen-Union High-School Auditorium

Precinct 7 Merrill, Liberty & Plymouth Townships

Location: Merrill Civic Center

Precinct 8 Hancock & Perry Townships

Location: Ed & Sandy Fravel Residence 17073 C60 Sioux City

Precinct 9 Hinton, Hungerford & Lincoln Townships

Location: Hinton Community Center

Precinct 10 Kingsley, Elkhorn, Garfield, Henry & Union Townships

Location: Kingsley State Bank

LTE: As candidate, Thompson is refreshingly honest, CR Gazette, 12-23

Fred Thompson’s personal ambitions did not drive him to began preparations years ago for a run at the presidency.
He never enlisted a staff of writers to formulate the perfect positions to attract the most support at each stage.
He didn’t think to memorize a litany of perfectly pat answers to all conceivable questions — as tested and rated by his focus groups. He didn’t even start assembling a crackerjack marketing team as soon as the polls closed in ’04.
Thompson stepped up and entered the race only when called upon by those who saw the absence of any true conservative among the existing candidates.
All the work that had to be done to put together a national campaign had to be accomplished in months, not years. No doubt it has slowed his start, but it hasn’t changed his commitment. Thompson is here until we caucus.
Are you looking for a candidate whose declared beliefs actually agreed with his history? Are you looking for a candidate who will answer your questions directly and honestly, without relying on a prepared script, designed to avoid any commitment? Look closely at Thompson because what you see is exactly what you will get — a refreshingly honest and remarkable man.
Allan Stewart, Iowa City

LTE: McCain right to speak out about U.S. use of torture, CR Gazette, 12-23

I applaud the fact that Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., has courageously spoken out against the sadistic practice of torture the Bush administration has repeatedly used in violation of our values as a nation. There are other ways to get information without stooping to the level of our enemies. If we practice torture, how are we better than the cruelest regimes on Earth?
The Rev. Don Hodson Coralville

Blog Post: Huckabee Delivers Populist Message in Iowa's Democratic Stronghold, Iowa Independent, 12-22

In the last couple of weeks, Iowans saw a new face atop the GOP polls, a dwindling campaign resurrected with the endorsement of Iowa's largest newspaper, and one contender throwing in the towel while simultaneously endorsing the former frontrunner.
Welcome to the Iowa Caucuses, where five months is a lifetime.

Just ask former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, who, having recently usurped the position of former Massachussetts Gov. Mitt Romney, now leads the latest polls in Iowa. However, this was not the case the last time Huckabee visited Johnson County, Iowa's Democratic stronghold, in July, when he delivered some good tongue-in-cheek news.

"A new AP poll shows I was actually the new leader in the entire race," Huckabee told a crowd of 45 gathered at the North Liberty Pizza Ranch. "The poll says that the new leader is 'none of the above.' I am none of the above, since I'm not those guys at the top. What a great day for me. The dynamics of this race are beginning to change. Our campaign has been on an upward trajectory. Iowa has a great tradition of telling the national media that maybe they didn't quite get it right and maybe their picks aren't quite America's picks."

Prophetic? Maybe so. Huckabee returned to Johnson County Friday, only this time he was greeted by over 250 people crammed into a meeting room at the Marriott Hotel in Coralville. A large contingency of the crowd, roughly a third, was comprised of younger people-college aged and younger. This observation was not lost on two elderly gentlemen standing by the media pit. "Boy, there sure are a lot of young folks here," one gentleman said to the other.

T.M. Lindsey :: Huckabee Delivers Populist Message in Iowa's Democratic Stronghold

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Huckabee charmed the crowd with his populist message, disarming them with his sense of humor as took on his opponents' negative attacks, the ruling class, Congress, the IRS, and the Clinton machine. Pointing out a sign in the audience, "Chuck Norris Approved," Huckabee noted that this can't be done alone, and it helps to have Chuck Norris watching his back. (see pic of Hawkeyes for Huckabee holding signs)
Huckabee wasted no time appealing to Iowans and their coveted first-in-the-nation-caucus responsibility by bucking the national polls and media in the process. "Despite being outspent 20 to 1 in Iowa, we're seeing a tremendous amount of enthusiastic support across the state," Huckabee said. "What this is saying is much more than Mike Huckabee. It's saying something about the caucus process. It's saying Iowans can't be bought, or as I said after the Ames Straw Poll, `Iowans cannot be rented.'"

This message has appealed to UI student and Hawkeyes-for-Huckabee Chair Brad Brett: "Huckabee caught my attention a while back despite the fact he's not a money candidate. Now he's got everyone's attention and people are starting to take him seriously."

Alluding to recent criticisms launched against his campaign, more notably Romney's recent attacks, Huckabee commended Iowans for their resistance to wholeheartedly accepting negative critiques, especially if the source is one of the candidate's opponents "Iowa gets the first bite of the apple," Huckabee said. It's best for the country that a candidate who wants to be president has to come to the middle of America and talk to folks who understand what it's like to get the rent paid, put food on the table, and struggle with things that people in the real world where you live do. Sometimes people get elected to office and they forget that they were elected to the serving class, not the ruling class. And the average person is the ruling class."

Brett has been impressed by how Huckabee has handled criticisms from his rivals and has not gone to the negative side. "I hope this pays off at the caucuses," Brett said. "I'm tired of all the mudslinging and personal attacks, when we should be focusing on the candidates' substance and what they stand for."

Maintaining a positive approach has also resonated well with Coralville resident and grassroots organizer Lindsey Helpser: "Best of all, Huckabee has chosen to stay positive. I realize that negative attacks are part of politics, but this is also why a lot of people don't want to get involved."

Huckabee set his sights on Congress, arguing that they are so completely paralyzed, because they are so polarized. "They can't get anything done. The best thing they can do is go home. When they're in business, they're dangerous. When they go home, we at least have some relief for a little while.

"It doesn't seem to matter whether it's Republicans or Democrats in charge, they're more interested in defeating the other side than they are in winning something that will help our lives. Americans are tired of this and want to see change."

Huckabee took aim at the current tax system, which he contends is dysfunctional, to pitch his Fair Tax proposal. Citing a poll conducted by FOX news, Huckabee said, "The average American is more afraid of being audited than being mugged. This didn't make sense at first, but when you think about it, it does make sense. When you get mugged it only lasts a few seconds, Huckabee quipped. "When the IRS comes after you, they don't quit until they have every last dime and it could take years."

"I'm the only person running for president who has done something that might have to be done next year, and that's run against and win against the incredibly, formidable force of the Clinton machine. I've done it four times, I've won four times, and I would like to round it out by doing it just one more time."

Huckabee ended his stump speech by pitching for support at the caucuses and reminding Iowans that "You can't but the white house, you'll have to earn it the old fashioned way."

After his speech, the Iowa Independent caught up with former Iowa Rep. Danny Carroll of Grinnell, who is serving alongside Bob Vander Plaats as Huckabee's state co-chair. Carroll touched on Huckabee's latest surge and viability. "People across Iowa have responded to Huckabee's sincerity and genuineness and we're starting to see the press converge on his campaign. People are seeing that he's a viable candidate," Carroll said. "There's always been a reservoir of willingness to support Huckabee in Iowa, but people were holding off their support to see if he would be viable.

Pressed as to why this was the case, Carroll told the Iowa Independent, "Holding off before committing is typical for a lot of Iowans. They don't want to commit to candidates early, knowing they may want or have to retract later for another candidate," Carroll said. "Iowa voters are not easily swayed by the early polls and the lack of media coverage for some of the lesser-known candidates. Huckabee is the perfect example of the Iowa caucuses doing what they are supposed to be doing."

Blog Post: Doing Mitt's Bidding in Des Moines, Des Moines Register, 12-22
On a recent evening at People's Court, a bar in downtown Des Moines, the former most powerful woman in the world sat down at a table with 20 young professionals. Then the former most powerful woman in the world sipped her white wine and waxed eloquent on this year's presidential race.

Was she Hillary Clinton?

Nope.

Oprah Winfrey?

Not quite.

Er, Martha Stewart?

Getting closer. Joining the Young Professionals Connection's Candidate Conversations event was Meg Whitman, the CEO of eBay and the 2005 "most powerful woman in business," according to Fortune magazine.

"I'm in Iowa for the same reason everyone is right now who isn't living here," Whitman said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Er, the pork chops?

Ah, yes. The upcoming caucuses, of course. Whitman is a close personal friend of presidential hopeful Mitt Romney and was dispatched by the campaign to Iowa to lobby voters on behalf of the former Massachusetts governor and wildly successful businessman.

"He's the best business executive we had on either side of the aisle, and he has the ability to work with the other side of the aisle," Whitman told the intimate group after she detailed the meteoric rise of eBay since she started there during the company's infancy in 1998. (The company now employs 16,000 worldwide and had $7.6 billion in revenue this year.)

Whitman also worked at Bain and Co., the consulting firm, with Romney for a decade.

"Even back then, Mitt was the one you wanted to work for at Bain," she said.

So why vote for him for president? It's simple, Whitman said. There are plenty of parts of America that needs reinvestment: schools, health care, roads, bridges, airports, the military. And that money has to come from somewhere. A president could raise taxes. Or a president could look at the basic cost structure in the federal government and eliminate waste and duplicated efforts and make the government efficient, run like a corporation.

"I think we should try that before we start raising taxes on corporations and individuals," she said. "Mitt would be the best at doing a stem to stern review of the cost structure of the federal government."

Blog Post: Huckabee Delivers Populist Message in Iowa's Democratic Stronghold, Iowa Independent
by: T.M. Lindsey

In the last couple of weeks, Iowans saw a new face atop the GOP polls, a dwindling campaign resurrected with the endorsement of Iowa's largest newspaper, and one contender throwing in the towel while simultaneously endorsing the former frontrunner.

Welcome to the Iowa Caucuses, where five months is a lifetime.

Just ask former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, who, having recently usurped the position of former Massachussetts Gov. Mitt Romney, now leads the latest polls in Iowa. However, this was not the case the last time Huckabee visited Johnson County, Iowa's Democratic stronghold, in July, when he delivered some good tongue-in-cheek news.

"A new AP poll shows I was actually the new leader in the entire race," Huckabee told a crowd of 45 gathered at the North Liberty Pizza Ranch . "The poll says that the new leader is 'none of the above.' I am none of the above, since I'm not those guys at the top. What a great day for me. The dynamics of this race are beginning to change. Our campaign has been on an upward trajectory. Iowa has a great tradition of telling the national media that maybe they didn't quite get it right and maybe their picks aren't quite America's picks."

Prophetic? Maybe so. Huckabee returned to Johnson County Friday, only this time he was greeted by over 250 people crammed into a meeting room at the Marriott Hotel in Coralville. A large contingency of the crowd, roughly a third, was comprised of younger people-college aged and younger. This observation was not lost on two elderly gentlemen standing by the media pit. "Boy, there sure are a lot of young folks here," one gentleman said to the other.

Huckabee charmed the crowd with his populist message, disarming them with his sense of humor as took on his opponents' negative attacks, the ruling class, Congress, the IRS, and the Clinton machine. Pointing out a sign in the audience, "Chuck Norris Approved," Huckabee noted that this can't be done alone, and it helps to have Chuck Norris watching his back. (see pic of Hawkeyes for Huckabee holding signs)

Huckabee wasted no time appealing to Iowans and their coveted first-in-the-nation-caucus responsibility by bucking the national polls and media in the process. "Despite being outspent 20 to 1 in Iowa, we're seeing a tremendous amount of enthusiastic support across the state," Huckabee said. "What this is saying is much more than Mike Huckabee. It's saying something about the caucus process. It's saying Iowans can't be bought, or as I said after the Ames Straw Poll, `Iowans cannot be rented.'"

This message has appealed to UI student and Hawkeyes-for-Huckabee Chair Brad Brett: "Huckabee caught my attention a while back despite the fact he's not a money candidate. Now he's got everyone's attention and people are starting to take him seriously."

Alluding to recent criticisms launched against his campaign, more notably Romney's recent attacks, Huckabee commended Iowans for their resistance to wholeheartedly accepting negative critiques, especially if the source is one of the candidate's opponents "Iowa gets the first bite of the apple," Huckabee said. It's best for the country that a candidate who wants to be president has to come to the middle of America and talk to folks who understand what it's like to get the rent paid, put food on the table, and struggle with things that people in the real world where you live do. Sometimes people get elected to office and they forget that they were elected to the serving class, not the ruling class. And the average person is the ruling class."

Brett has been impressed by how Huckabee has handled criticisms from his rivals and has not gone to the negative side. "I hope this pays off at the caucuses," Brett said. "I'm tired of all the mudslinging and personal attacks, when we should be focusing on the candidates' substance and what they stand for."

Maintaining a positive approach has also resonated well with Coralville resident and grassroots organizer Lindsey Helpser: "Best of all, Huckabee has chosen to stay positive. I realize that negative attacks are part of politics, but this is also why a lot of people don't want to get involved."

Huckabee set his sights on Congress, arguing that they are so completely paralyzed, because they are so polarized. "They can't get anything done. The best thing they can do is go home. When they're in business, they're dangerous. When they go home, we at least have some relief for a little while.

"It doesn't seem to matter whether it's Republicans or Democrats in charge, they're more interested in defeating the other side than they are in winning something that will help our lives. Americans are tired of this and want to see change."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Huckabee took aim at the current tax system, which he contends is dysfunctional, to pitch his Fair Tax proposal. Citing a poll conducted by FOX news, Huckabee said, "The average American is more afraid of being audited than being mugged. This didn't make sense at first, but when you think about it, it does make sense. When you get mugged it only lasts a few seconds, Huckabee quipped. "When the IRS comes after you, they don't quit until they have every last dime and it could take years."

"I'm the only person running for president who has done something that might have to be done next year, and that's run against and win against the incredibly, formidable force of the Clinton machine. I've done it four times, I've won four times, and I would like to round it out by doing it just one more time."

Huckabee ended his stump speech by pitching for support at the caucuses and reminding Iowans that "You can't but the white house, you'll have to earn it the old fashioned way."

After his speech, the Iowa Independent caught up with former Iowa Rep. Danny Carroll of Grinnell, who is serving alongside Bob Vander Plaats as Huckabee's state co-chair. Carroll touched on Huckabee's latest surge and viability. "People across Iowa have responded to Huckabee's sincerity and genuineness and we're starting to see the press converge on his campaign. People are seeing that he's a viable candidate," Carroll said. "There's always been a reservoir of willingness to support Huckabee in Iowa, but people were holding off their support to see if he would be viable.

Pressed as to why this was the case, Carroll told the Iowa Independent, "Holding off before committing is typical for a lot of Iowans. They don't want to commit to candidates early, knowing they may want or have to retract later for another candidate," Carroll said. "Iowa voters are not easily swayed by the early polls and the lack of media coverage for some of the lesser-known candidates. Huckabee is the perfect example of the Iowa caucuses doing what they are supposed to be doing."

Huckabee Disavows Anti-Catholic Sentiments At Church Where He Will Speak, Iowa Independent

by: Jay Wagner

During an interview at his last campaign stop in Iowa before Christmas, Republican front-runner Mike Huckabee disavowed anti-Catholic comments and teachings made by the senior pastor of a Texas church where he will be speaking on Sunday.

Huckabee wrapped up an ambitious pre-Christmas tour of Iowa on Saturday with four appearances in the Fifth Congressional District, home to more than half of the state's registered Republicans. He returns to Iowa after celebrating Christmas with his family in Arkansas. But on the way home, Huckabee will make a stop in San Antonio where he will speak to members of the Cornerstone Church.

Cornerstone is one of the nation's largest churches, with nearly 17,000 members. John C. Hagee, senior pastor at the church, has told his congregation in the past that the Beast referred to in the Bible is actually the Catholic Church and the so-called Anti-Christ is the Pope.

"I have to say that I don't agree with those teachings," Huckabee told the Iowa Independent following a speech in Sheldon. "Several members of my staff are Catholic and have marched shoulder to shoulder many times in pro-life marches with people of the Catholic faith."

When he was asked if he was aware of Hagee's teachings about the Catholic Church, Huckabee said he wasn't. "There are things that he believes that I wouldn't agree with and I am sure there are things that I believe that he wouldn't agree with."

Hagee has also been criticized by some Evangelicals because of the large salary he collects for the work he does, more than $1.25 million in 2005, according to the San Antonio News-Express. Hagee said at the time that he deserves the pay because of the long hours he works.

Hagee has also said that the Catholic Church was implicit in its support of Adolph Hitler. "When Hitler became a global demonic monster, the Catholic Church and Pope Pius XII never, ever slightly criticized him," Hagee wrote. ".... In all of his [Hitler's] years of absolute brutality, he was never denounced or even scolded by Pope Pius XII or any Catholic leader in the world. To those Christians who believe that Jewish hearts will be warmed by the sight of the cross, please be informed-to them it's an electric chair."

THE FIELD

The Tribune's guide to caucusing. Ames Tribune, 12-21
12/22/2007

What is caucusing?

It's a grassroots and largely informal method of determining who has the support to win the nomination of a given party.

Who caucuses?

You have to be a registered Democrat or a Republican, and you have to be able to prove residency in Iowa.

When is the caucus?

7 p.m. Thursday, Jan. 3.

Where do I caucus?

Check the lists below. If you don't know your precinct, check the Story County auditor's Web site at http://www.storycounty. com. Also, some candidates have Web sites to direct you to your caucus location. Here are two good sites:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

* For Democrats: www.iowafirstcaucus.org/caucus_finder.php.

* For Republicans:www.iowagop.net/countycontacts.asp.

(Note: If you're a Republican, you'll need to know your precinct first. You can find that by entering your address here: www.sos.state.ia.us/elections/voterreg/PollingPlace/search.aspx.)

If those don't work, you can call the Story County Democrats at (515) 268-0313 or the Story County Republican Party at (515) 282-8105. If all else fails, call the local headquarters of your candidate and ask. Chances are, they'll be happy to help you out.

How do I caucus?

If you're a Republican, it's easy; you show up, you cast your vote for the candidate of your choice, and the one with the most votes wins. Then you elect delegates to the county caucus. They, in turn, elect delegates to the district caucuses and the statewide convention.

If you're a Democrat, the process is a bit more complicated. Caucus goers will establish "preference groups" to determine the viability of a candidate. Basically, the more people in a preference group, the more delegates they can send up to the higher levels. They also allow for "realignment" of preference group members whose groups don't have enough people, allowing them to be taken in by other candidate groups. This is why it's a good idea to have a second choice when you caucus.

What about the party platform?

Both Republicans and Democrats take time in the caucus process to examine platform planks suggested by attendees. These in turn are taken to higher levels and eventually presented before national committees.

Where to caucus

Ames Democrats

W1-P1, Scheman Building, Rooms 167 to 179, Iowa State Center

W1-P2, Heartland Senior Services, 205 South Walnut Ave.

W1-P3, Ames Public Library, Farwell T. Brown Auditorium, 515 Douglas Ave.

W1-P4, Ames City Hall, City Auditorium, 515 Clark Ave.

W1-P5, Meeker Elementary School, Auditorium, 300 20th St.

W2-P1, Ames High School, Commons, 1921 Ames High Drive.

W2-P2, ISU Memorial Union, Great Hall, Union Drive.

W2-P3 Fellows Elementary School, Multi-purpose Room, 1400 McKinley Drive.

W2-P4, Ames High School, Auditorium, 1921 Ames High Drive.

W2-P5, ISU Memorial Union, Sun Room, Union Drive.

W3-P1, Ames Middle School, Commons, 3915 Mortensen Road.

W3-P2, St. John's Episcopal Church, Parish Hall, 2338 Lincoln Way.

W3-P3, Ames Middle School, Rooms G103/104, 3915 Mortensen Road.

W3-P4, Ames Middle School, Sixth Grade Commons, 3915 Mortensen Road.

W3-P5, Scheman Building, 195 Benton Auditorium, Iowa State Center.

W4-P1, Edwards Elementary School, Gymnasium, 3622 Woodland St.

W4-P2, Sawyer Elementary School, Gymnasium, 4316 Ontario St.

W4-P3, ISU Memorial Union, South Ballroom, Union Drive.

W4-P4, ISU Memorial Union, Campanile Room, Union Drive.

W4-P5, ISU Memorial Union, Gallery, Union Drive.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Ames Republicans

W1-P1, Kate Mitchell Elementary, Gym, 3521 Jewel Drive.

W1-P2, Coldwater Golf Links, 615 S. 16th St.

W1-P3, Public Library, 515 Douglas Ave.

W1-P4, High School, Multi-Purpose Room, 1921 Ames High Drive

W1-P5, Meeker Elementary School, Gym, 300 20th St.

W2-P1, Ames High, Band Room 1, 1921 Ames High Drive.

W2-P2, Ames High, Band Room 2, 1921 Ames High Drive.

W2-P3, Fellows Elementary, Gym, 1400 McKinley Drive.

W2-P4, Stonebrook Church, 3611 Eisenhower Drive.

W2-P5, Bethesda Lutheran Church, 1517 Northwestern Ave.

W3-P1, Middle School, Room B112A, 3915 Mortensen Road.

W3-P2, Middle School, Room B111A, 3915 Mortensen Road.

W3-P3, Middle School, Room E205, 3915 Mortensen Road.

W3-P4, Middle School, Room F204, 3915 Mortensen Road.

W3-P5, Middle School, Room F206, 3915 Mortensen Road.

W4-P1, St Andrews Church 209 Colorado Ave.

W4-P2, Middle School, Room G203, 3915 Mortensen Road.

W4-P3, St Andrews Church, 209 Colorado Ave.

W4-P4, St Andrews Church, 209 Colorado Ave.

W4-P5, St. Andrews Church, 209 Colorado Ave.

Mid-Iowa Democrats
Collins, Collins Community Center, 212 Main St., Collins

Franklin/Gilbert, Gilbert High School, Commons, 103 Mathews Drive, Gilbert

Grant, Mitchell Elementary School, The Forum, 3521 Jewel Drive, Ames

Howard/Roland, Roland-Story Middle School, Cafeteria, 206 S. Main St., Roland

Indian Creek/Maxwell, Collins-Maxwell High School, Lunch Room, 400 Metcalf St., Maxwell

Kelley, Kelley City Hall, 1111 Grace St., Kelley

Lincoln/Zearing, Security State Bank, 103 E. Main St., Zearing

Milford, Story County Conservation Center, McFarland Park, 56461 180th St., Ames

Nevada 1, Nevada Middle School, Cafeteria, 1035 15th St., Nevada

Nevada 2, Nevada Elementary School, Cafeteria, 925 Ninth St., Nevada

Nevada 3, ISU Extension Bldg., Christy Hall, 220 H Ave., Nevada

Nevada 4, Nevada High School, Cafeteria, 1001 15th St., Nevada

Nevada Township, Nevada High School, Library, 1001 15th St., Nevada

New Albany/Colo, Colo Community Center, 309 Main St., Colo

Palestine 1/Huxley, Ballard Community High School, Auditorium, 509 N. Main Ave, Huxley

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Palestine 2/Slater, Nelson Park Log Cabin, Nelson Park, Slater

Richland, Nevada Middle School, Library, 1035 15th St., Nevada

Sherman, Colo Community Center, 309 Main St., Colo

Story City 1, Roland-Story High School, Auditorium, 1009 Story St., Story City

Story City 2/LaFayette, Story City City Hall, Community Room, 504 Broad St., Story City

Union/Cambridge, Ballard East Elementary School, Commons, 505 W. Fourth St., Cambridge

Warren/McCallsburg, Colo-Nesco Elementary School, Music Room, 400 Latrobe Ave., McCallsburg

Washington, Ames Middle School, Chorus Room, Room B109A, 3915 Mortensen Road, Ames

Mid-Iowa Republicans

Collins, Collins Elementary-Lunch room 416 Fourth St., Collins

Franklin, Gilbert High School, Media Center, 103 Mathews Drive, Gilbert

Grant, Cornerstone Church, Activity Room, 56829 U.S. Highway 30, Ames

Howard, Roland-Story Middle School, 206 S Main St., Roland

Indian Creek, Collins-Maxwell Middle School, 400 Metcalf St., Maxwell

Kelley, Kelley City Hall, Council Chambers, 111 Grace St., Kelley

Lafayette, Roland-Story High School, 1009 Story St., Story City

Lincoln, Colo-Nesco Middle School, Lunch Room, 407 N. Center St., Zearing

Milford, Cornerstone Church, 56829 U.S. Highway 30, Ames

Nevada 1, Gates Hall, 825 15th St., Nevada

Nevada 2, Gates Hall, 825 15th St., Nevada

Nevada 3, Gates Hall, 825 15th St., Nevada

Nevada 4, Gates Hall, 825 15th St., Nevada

Nevada Township, Gates Hall, 825 15th St., Nevada

New Albany, Colo-Nesco High School, 919 West St., Colo

Palestine 1, Huxley, Community Center

Palestine 2, Senior Center, 301 Tama St., Slater

Richland, Gates Hall, 825 15th St., Nevada

Sherman, Colo-Nesco High School, 919 West St.

Story City 1, Roland-Story High School, 1009 Story St., Story City

Union, Legion Hall, 216 Water St., Cambridge

Warren, Colo-Nesco Elementary School, Lunch Room 400 Latrobe Ave., McCallsburg

Washington, Ames Middle School, Vocal Music Room, 3915 Mortensen Road, Ames

Together we caucus, ... Divided they can fall. The Iowa caucus, is the first big test of a presidential candidate's viability and popularity, and it's one where every person's involvement can reap big dividends - or losses - for a White House hopeful., Muscatine Journal, 12-21

By Connie Street Of the Muscatine Journal

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

MUSCATINE, Iowa — Don't skip the Iowa caucuses on Thursday, Jan. 3, 2008, just because you don't understand how they work.

Both the Republican and Democratic parties begin their caucus the same way. Business begins at 6:30 p.m. and the doors close at 7 p.m. To participate, you must be signed in or in line to sign in by 6:30 p.m. Latecomers can watch, but cannot participate.

At both caucuses, anyone can attend, but those who wish to participate must live in the geographic area of the caucus, be registered to vote and be registered as a member of the political party for which they are caucusing.

If you don't know what precinct you live in, call your county auditor's office (contact information for Muscatine and Louisa County auditors appears elsewhere in this article).

If you are not registered to vote, you can do so at the caucus. Becoming a member of a political party is simple and doesn't cost anything. When you register to vote, just check the box for the party of your choice and make sure you are at the right caucus. You may also be asked to sign a separate piece of paper for the party.

There is no rule that you have to stay in a political party for a certain length of time.

"You can go to the auditor's office the next day and change your party preference," said Don Foor, a Democratic caucus leader in Louisa County.

Youth who will be 18 by Tuesday, Nov. 4, 2008, may participate at caucuses.

In Muscatine County, the Republican caucuses are being held at two locations.

The reason is to make it easier for any candidates who want to stop and speak to party members, said Bob Bahn, co-chairman of the Muscatine County Republican Party.

Record-breaking numbers are expected since there are so many candidates, Bahn said. He said a typical number at a Muscatine County Republican caucus is anywhere from 300 to 500 people. He is predicting attendance of 1,200-1,500 people. Others in the party are hoping for up to 2,500.

"The candidates are trying to get supporters to go to the caucuses and have held caucus-training events," Bahn said.

Don Paulson, Muscatine County Democratic Party co-chairman, said caucus-goers in his party should come early and have patience while registering. Registration begins by 6 p.m.

"We are looking forward to a huge turnout this year," he said, adding that attendance at larger precincts is typically about 50 people.

"We are expecting to triple our average attendance this year," Paulson said.

As for predicting the outcome, Bahn said, "May the best man win."

The caucus agenda

n A temporary chairman opens the caucus, then an election is held for the permanent chairman. Generally, the temporary chair is elected, mainly because he or she has had training on how to run a caucus, said Mike Hodges, chairman of the Louisa County Republican Party. A secretary is also elected to record the actions taken at the meeting.

n Letters from candidates will be read or made available, as will nomination petitions for candidates. You will be encouraged, but not required, to sign the petitions. You may also be asked to complete surveys and you will have the opportunity to donate to the party.

n The main item for the evening is choosing a candidate. That's what happens at 7 p.m. The way this is done differs between Republicans and Democrats.

The Republican Party carries out a straw poll, either by handing out a list with the names of the declared candidates and asking caucus-goers to circle the name of the candidates they prefer. Or, they are given a blank piece of paper and asked to write in the name of their favorite candidate.

The Democratic Party uses a more complicated system. A mathematical process determines the viability of the preference group for each candidate. To be viable, a group needs to have 15 percent of the total participants at the caucus.

If there aren't enough people in a group to be viable, you can approach members of other preference groups and try to persuade them to join your candidate's group.

Results are tallied immediately and phoned in to the state party and are considered to be a good barometer of the composition of Iowa's national delegation.

"These votes are non-binding," Hodges said. "It could be compared to a popularity poll. When delegates go to the state conventions, that's when they choose their candidate preference."

n Delegates and alternate delegates to the county convention slated for Saturday, March 15, 2008, are nominated from the floor and elected. The number of delegates is determined by the number of votes cast in the previous general election.

The Muscatine County Republicans will elect 300 delegates and 150 alternates. The Louisa County Republican Party will be seeking 120 delegates and 60 alternates.

Muscatine County Democrats will seek 150 delegates and 75 alternates, while Louisa County Democrats will seek 50 delegates and 25 alternates.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The county conventions in turn elect delegates to district and state conventions, and those conventions choose delegates to attend the national conventions.

Also elected are committee persons to organize the county convention, and members of the party's County Central Committee, which takes care of party business through the following two years.

n Attendees also have the chance to discuss and adopt party platforms or goals. A platform committee will be chosen to organize the proposed platforms and those will be presented at the county convention. Platforms that are approved at the county level will then be presented at the district convention, then at the state and national levels.

Reporter contact information

Connie Street: 319-527-8164 ckcasey@louisacomm.net

Auditor Info

Muscatine County

Leslie A. Soule, Auditor and Commissioner of Elections

Address: 414 E. Third St. Suite 201, Muscatine

Telephone: 563-263-5821

Fax: 563-263-7248

E-mail: auditor@co.muscatine.ia.us

Office hours: 8 a.m.-4:30 p.m. Monday-Friday

Louisa County

Sylvia Belzer, Auditor

Address: 117 S. Main St., Wapello

Telephone: 319-523-3371

Fax: 319-523-3713

E-mail: auditr58@louisacomm.net

Office hours: 8 a.m.-4:30 p.m., Monday-Friday

Caucus doors open at 6:30 p.m. Doors close at 7 p.m., sharp.

Muscatine County

n Republican precincts:

Wapsie Township and the City of West Liberty will caucus at the West Liberty Community Center

All other precincts and townships in Muscatine County will gather at Muscatine High School

n Democratic precincts:

Muscatine 1 – School Board Office great room, 2900 Mulberry Ave.

Muscatine 2 – West Middle School media center

Muscatine 3 – Washington School gym

Muscatine 4 – Muscatine County Courthouse

Muscatine 5 – Central Middle School cafeteria

Muscatine 6 – Grant School gym

Muscatine 7 – Franklin School gym

Muscatine 8 – Garfield School gym

Muscatine 9 – Colorado School gym

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Muscatine 10 – Madison School gym

Bloomington /Lake – Mulberry School gym

Cedar 76 – Township Hall

Fruitland 1 – Fruitland Community Building

Fruitland 2 – Fruitland Community Building

Fulton – Stockton City Hall

Goshen – Atalissa City Hall

Montpelier – Varner's Bed and Breakfast, 201 E. Second St.

Moscow/Wilton Township – Wilton Elementary School upper commons

Orono – Conesville City Hall

Pike – Nichols City Hall

Seventy-Six – 76 Township Hall

Sweetland – Little Theater, Strahan Hall, Muscatine Community College

Wapsie – West Liberty Community Center

West Liberty – West Liberty Community Center

Wilton – Wilton Elementary School gym

Louisa County

n Republican precincts:

Columbus Junction (City of Columbus Junction) and Concord-Oakland (Concord and Oakland townships and City of Fredonia) – Columbus Junction American Legion Hall

Eliot (Eliot Township and City of Oakville) – Oakville City Hall

Grandview-North Port Louisa (Grandview and North Port Louisa townships and cities of Grandview and Letts) –Louisa-Muscatine High School

Morning Sun- Marshall (City of Morning Sun and Marshall and Morning Sun townships) – Morning Sun American Legion Hall

Wapello City I, II and III – Briggs Civic Center

Wapello-Jefferson-South Port Louisa – Louisa County Courthouse

West Louisa (cities of Columbus City and Cotter and Elm Grove, Columbus City and Union townships) – Columbus City Masonic Lodge

n Democratic precincts:

Columbus Junction (City of Columbus Junction) –Roundy Elementary School library

Concord-Oakland (Concord and Oakland townships and City of Fredonia) – Roundy Elementary

Eliot (City of Oakville and Eliot Township) – Oakville Community Building

Grandview-North Port (cities of Grandview and Letts and Grandview and North Port Louisa townships) – Louisa-Muscatine High School gym

Morning Sun-Marshall (City of Morning Sun and Morning Sun and Marshall townships) – Morning Sun School cafeteria

Wapello (all wards) – Wapello High School band room

Wapello Township-Jefferson-South Port (Wapello, Jefferson and South Port Louisa townships) – Wapello High School library

West Louisa (cities of Columbus City and Cotter and Union, Columbus City and Elm Grove townships) – Columbus City City Hall

Democrats, Le Mars Daily Sentinel, 12-21

People not registered as a Democrat can participate in their precinct's Democratic Caucus. They must simply register as a Democrat the night of the caucus at the site.
For Democrats, the evening begins at 6:30 p.m. with party business but the actual caucus doesn't begin until 7 p.m.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

At that point, everyone will be invited to separate themselves into groups based on which presidential candidate they want to support.

"That's one thing about the caucus," said Jon Neunaber, the county Democratic chairman. "It's not a secret ballot. You actually have to declare that you're for this candidate."

Candidate's groups must have a certain number of people in them -- called a "viability number." This number is determined based on how many people attend the precinct caucus. If groups fall below that, they have to disband and join the group supporting another candidate that does meet that limit.

"The campaigns that are viable try to recruit those that aren't," Neunaber explained. "They try to convince them, 'This is how our candidate is just like yours.' There usually is at least one unhappy group."

The narrowing process continues until all groups are viable and there is at least one precinct delegate for each viable group. The number of delegates differs from precinct to precinct.

"We're allowed to take up to 30 minutes for this, but usually we're done in a few minutes," Neunaber said.

Depending on the presidential candidate's group size, a number of the precinct's delegates are assigned to that candidate. For example, if 10 out of 40 people support Hillary Clinton at a precinct that has four delegates, one of those delegates will be assigned to support her.

Once the delegates are assigned, the precincts call the numbers in to Neunaber, who will put them together and call them in to the state hotline.

After those numbers are in, the caucus-goers will elect people to hold those delegate positions, plus a few alternates. These delegates will represent the precinct at the county convention on March 15, where a second caucus will be held.

They'll also elect precinct committee people to serve on the county central committee.

"If we were to have an opening for a state legislator race, the precinct people would meet to nominate that person," Neunaber said. In general, the central committee meets once a month.

Electing three convention committee members per precinct is next. One of these committee members will be on the platform committee, and the other two will be in charge of things like arrangements, credentials and rules for the upcoming convention.

All the elected representatives will then have to be ratified, or voted upon and approved, by the whole group in attendance.

Finally, the caucus will switch focus to the local Democratic party's platform.

People can submit proposed ideas for the party to stand by -- called platform "planks."

"For example, take the bottle/can return law. It's been the way it has for 30 years," Neunaber said. "One platform plank might be to raise the handling fee from one cent to three cents."

The party platform is the last item for the night.

"Around here, caucuses take around an hour," Neunaber said. "I've heard legendary stories of caucuses that lasted until midnight, but I've never seen one."

Caucusing, he said, is pretty easy. It's simple, it's short and it's free. And, he added, with Iowa hosting the first caucus in the U.S., it's good for Iowa.

"Apartments get rented, offices get rented, restaurants get customers. It's an economic boost to Iowa," he said. "A good turnout will be crucial to have Iowa continue to have the first in the nation title."

Democratic Caucus Sites for Plymouth County

Precinct # I City of Akron, Portland Township

Location: Akron-Westfield High School

Precinct #2 Preston, Grant Townships

Location: County Line Bar and Grill, Craig

Precinct #3 Elgin, America Townships minus city limits of Le Mars

Location: Lally's Eastside Restaurant, Le Mars

Precinct #4 Johnson, Washington Townships

Location: Legion Hall Bar Area, Brunsville

Precinct #5 Fredonia, Meadow, Marion and Remsen Townships

Location: Remsen-Union High School Commons

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Precinct #6 Westfield Township minus city limits of Akron, SIOUX

Location: Westfield Congregational United Church Of Christ

Precinct #7 Liberty, Plymouth and Stanton Townships

Location: Merrill Civic Center

Precinct 48 Hancock and Perry Townships

Location: Perry Township Hall, 22500 C60, Hinton, IA, 51024.

Precinct #9 Hungerford, Lincoln Townships

Location: Hinton High School Library

Precinct 4 10 Union, Henry, Elkhorn and Garfield Townships

Location: Kingsley Community Center

Precinct#11 Le Mars #1

Location: Le Mars Community High School Commons

Precinct # 12 Le Mars #2

Location: Le Mars Community High School Little Theater

Precinct #13 Le Mars #3

Location: Le Mars Community High School Commons

Note: The three LeMars Precincts will have a common entrance. Entrance A.

Iowa Caucus 2008: A how-to guide, Le Mars Daily Sentinel, 12-21
By Magdalene Biesanz

On Jan. 3, Iowans have the chance to help decide who will run for our nation's president in 2008. The Iowa caucuses, both Democratic and Republican, are the first in the nation, and eligible voters can have a voice not only in nominating a presidential candidate, but also setting up the platform for their party. Here's how it works:
Who:

(Advertisement)

Anyone who will be 18 by Nov. 4

You do not have to be registered for the party you will caucus with. But in order to caucus with a party, you must register that day on-site or already be registered with that party.

When:

Thursday, Jan. 3

Democratic precincts - 6:30 p.m.

Republican precincts - 7 p.m.

Caucuses will likely last an hour or an hour and a half.

Where:

Location depends on your party and your precinct. See the lists.

Why:

To nominate a presidential candidate.

To pick local leaders for the party for the year.

To set up the party's platform, their core values and beliefs, for the county.

What to bring:

Driver's license (Republicans)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Ideas for party platform

Names and addresses of people who might serve as delegates

.

LTE: Caucus buddy, Burlington Hawk Eye, 12-22

As we wrap up 2007, it gives us time to think about what awaits us in 2008. All of us in Iowa are aware we will have caucuses where we will have an impact on how the rest of the nation will react to presidential candidates. While it is somewhat frustrating at times to be inundated with presidential campaigns and commercials, we are viewed with envy by many other states. That was obvious by the constant moving of the caucuses to an earlier date to be first in the nation to have a voice.

Hopefully you are making plans to be part of that voice by participating in your local caucus. If you have never attended a caucus, make plans now to let this be your first. Jan. 3 is the date. Look in your local newspaper for caucus precinct places to vote. Bring your neighbor or friends. Bring a caucus buddy.

CELINE SCHULTE

West Point

LTE: Iowa college students are Iowans, DM Register, 12-23

David Yepsen seems to believe that out-of-state college students would "taint" the Iowa caucuses if they returned to exercise their democratic right at the Jan. 3 caucuses ("Parties, Candidates Must Make Sure Caucuses Are Clean," Dec. 11 column).

As a sophomore at Drake University, I have been working hard to make Iowa my home. I pay rent, I volunteer at a local school and I support local businesses. For eight months of the year, I live in Iowa; I consider this state my home. I can count on one hand the number of times I have been to my hometown in the past months. Why should I vote where my parents live instead of where I live?

Students are an increasingly important part of the electorate. Asking tens of thousands of us not to vote simply because we may or may not leave the state for three months of the year is blatant disenfranchisement. Would we ask the same of a homeowner in Des Moines who vacations in Florida for the winter?

Our leaders should be trying to figure out how to engage young people directly in this upcoming election - by talking to us about the issues we care about, such as global warming and college affordability.

We are the future of this country, and we will be making the big decisions for our country in years to come. Don't stifle our voices and tell us we are not welcome in our own state.

As the race heats up, cool heads should prevail - let students have their voices be heard.

- Stacey Wilson, sophomore, Drake University, student leader, Rock the Caucus, Des Moines.

David Yepsen's repeated insinuations that out-of-state college students should go home to vote are irresponsible. If we want to solve our brain-drain problem, out-of-state students should be welcomed into every aspect of Iowa life, including our caucuses. Caucuses are a distinctly Iowa experience, and for some students, they could be the symbol of Iowa's community and pride in civic responsibility that makes them decide to stay.

It is difficult to imagine a more unwelcoming gesture than to have Iowa's most noted columnist tell them they should go home to vote. As students at the University of Iowa law school, one supporting Clinton, the other Obama, we find our out-of-state classmates excited about being in Iowa when we talk about the caucuses.

We should encourage all young people in Iowa to become civically engaged and invested in their communities, because the more they do, the more likely they are to stay. This issue isn't about politics. It is about what is best for our state.

- Rob Sand and Josh Mandelbaum, Iowa City.

III. Op-Eds and Editorials

Voter's voices, DM Register, 12-23

Should the candidates take a timeout from campaigning in deference to the Christmas holiday? What do you think the consequences will be if they do or do not?

It's unanimous: Give it - and us - a rest

Absolutely. The break would be a welcome relief from the volumes of horsefeathers being spewed out of each of them. It would be a miracle if they just shut up for the Christmas and New Year holidays.

- Wayne Dominowski, Republican, Sergeant Bluff.

Yes, candidates should take a timeout for the holidays. It is a time for family. The national problems can be picked up again on Dec. 26th.

- Mike Kennedy, Democrat, New Hampton.

I have been around all of the caucus campaigns since their inception and I have never witnessed such intensity among andidates, their staffs and supporters, nor as much frustration and mental fatigue among the citizenry. Let's all take the Christmas holidays off as a much-deserved reprieve from the hullabaloo of campaigning and refresh ourselves by celebrating the season. Perhaps the consequence of such a move would be to provide candidates and citizens alike the capacity to endure.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- Jim Wise, Independent, Des Moines.

Spending must be controlled, CR Gazette, 12-23
Rep. Ron Paul

An out-of-control federal government is the biggest problem confronting Iowans. They are joining other voters all over America in demanding a change.

The federal government has long traveled two disastrous roads. First, Washington has pursued an interventionist foreign policy against the Founders' advice. Second, it has financed that and other extravagant expenditures with a fiat currency — money printed with its only backing being the promises of politicians that it is sound.

Partisanship, political posturing and the failure of too many politicians to take seriously their oaths to the Constitution have stopped efforts to address these policies.

Iowans know that our outof-control foreign policy is harming our national security. Our troops are spread all over the world, meaning we may have difficulty defending ourselves from threats. At the same time, our intelligence community tells us that our presence in Iraq is "rejuvenating" al-Qaida. Our policies damage our national security by serving as a recruiting tool for Osama bin Laden.

While most Americans agree we should bring our troops home and out of harm's way, those who caution that leaving Iraq would be a disaster are the same "experts" who promised that it would be a "cakewalk." The lesson must be learned that we should never again go to war without a congressional declaration of war, as the Constitution requires.

I would refocus the efforts of our intelligence services and military on locating those individuals who planned the terrorist attacks on the United States and who remain at large. It must be made clear that the United States cannot be attacked with impunity.

As president, I would make securing our borders against a possible terrorist threat the top defense priority. It makes no sense to fight terrorists abroad when our own front door is left unlocked.

As off-track as our foreign policy is, it is ultimately the federal government's refusal to adopt a sound monetary policy that weighs most heavily on the backs of Iowans.

Iowans feel this burden daily with rising costs at the pump, in the store and on mortgages. Meanwhile, government demands more of their money to continue these policies. The idea of an estate tax is especially an affront to our founding principles.

A plan to guarantee health care for all, CR Gazette, 12-23
By Hillary Clinton

When the next president takes office in January 2009, he or she will face challenges unlike any we've ever known: a war to end.

An economy to revive. An energy crisis to solve. A homeland to secure.

And a health care system in crisis. A system in which 47 million Americans are uninsured, and millions more are underinsured — they have health care, except when they need it most, and their insurance company refuses to pay. I hear their heartbreaking stories day af ter day out here in Iowa.

I'm running for president because it's time for a new beginning on health care.

That's why my health care plan doesn't just cover some Americans, or most Americans — but all Americans.

Here's how it works: If you have private insurance you like, you keep that insurance — the only thing that changes is that your current coverage will become more affordable.

But if you don't have health insurance — or don't like the insurance you have — you can choose from the same wide variety of private plans as members of Congress. And I'll ban insurance company discrimination, so people will never again be denied coverage because of preexisting conditions or other risk factors.

Whatever plan you choose, your coverage will be guaranteed. Even if you lose your job. Even if you decide to start your own business, or stay home with your children for a few years. And you'll be able to take your plan with you as you move from job to job and state to state.

Everyone will have a responsibility to get health insurance, and we'll provide tax credits to make sure everyone can afford it and tax credits to small businesses to cover more of their employees.

I'm not new to this fight.

As first lady, I fought for universal health care back when it was still considered a pretty radical idea. And I didn't give up when we didn't succeed. I helped create the State Children's Health Insurance Program to get health care for 6 million children. I won vaccinations for all our children and pediatric drug testing so kids could get the medicines they need. And I successfully pushed for mammograms to be covered under Medicare and for more funding for early cancer detection for all Americans.

I continued my work on health care in the Senate, working to expand and improve health care for our veterans and troops, lower drug prices for our seniors, and help first-responders who got sick after Sept. 11.

I know that insuring every American won't be easy.

People have told me that Republicans and insurance companies would attack me for making my plan truly universal. Well, I wasn't afraid of the Republicans back in 1994, and I'm not afraid of them now. I'm not running to put a Band-Aid on this problem. I'm running to solve it.

After eight years of incompetence, it's time for leadership that can get results. It's time for a president with the strength and experience to lead on day one. Someone who's beaten the Republicans and the special interests before — and will stand up and fight for our families every day in the White House. A president who doesn't just talk about change — but delivers.

If you caucus for me Jan.

3, I pledge to you that I will be that president.

Hillary Clinton, a Democrat, is a U.S. senator from New York. Web site: www.

hillaryclinton.com/

No. 1 duty: Protect nation from our enemies, CR Gazette, 12-23
By John McCain

As president, I would take all my responsibilities seriously and would work hard to secure the border, reform health care and entitlement programs, end reckless spending, keep taxes low and nominate judges who don't legislate from the bench. But I would have one responsibility above all that must be met from day one of my presidency and that is to protect the security of this great nation from all enemies. In particular, we must understand that we confront a lengthy struggle against Islamic extremism that will not be won quickly or easily. But we will win it.

While our ultimate victory is not in doubt, the length and intensity of this struggle remain to be determined. It's up to us.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

We must recognize that our enemies are in this fight to win, and I assure you that I would employ all instruments of national power — military, intelligence, law enforcement, economic and political — to defend our nation and defeat them.

Defeating radical Islamist extremists is the national security challenge of our time. At home, my administration will be fully prepared to deter, detect and respond to any attack. But we must stay on offense. The Sept. 11 attack highlighted a failure to adequately respond to a hostile global terror network.

Before Sept. 11, al-Qaida was basically free to plan, train and conduct attacks from Afghanistan despite bombing U.S. embassies and attacking the USS Cole. As president, I will not allow such terrorist sanctuary. We must never again assume that the activities of extremists overseas do not impact our own security, which is why we must succeed in Iraq and Afghanistan.

But prevailing in this struggle will require more than military power. I would employ every tool possible to help moderate Muslims resist the well-financed campaign of extremism that is tearing their societies apart. I would also seek a Free Trade Area from Morocco to Afghanistan, open to all who do not sponsor terrorism.

Secondly, I will act to break our dependency on foreign oil. Al-Qaida continues to plan attacks on oil facilities, hoping to skyrocket oil prices and nose dive the American economy.

We cannot continue to enrich the foreign oil cartel and petro-dictators. In fact, some of our gas dollars flow to the very fanatics we are fighting. As president, I'll implement an energy strategy of diversification and conservation to break the dominance of oil in our transportation sector.

For example, my agenda will include deploying more technologies to improve energy efficiency, developing alternative fuels, increasing electrical power generation from nuclear power and other sources and increasing domestic oil production in environmentally friendly ways.

I also will push for a worldwide League of Democracies. It could act where the United Nations fails, principally because of the vetoes of autocratic states. The United Nations has proved to be ineffective in meeting the great challenges of our time. The league would not supplant the United Nations but would harness the political and moral advantages offered by united democratic action.

Whether pressuring tyrants on human rights, uniting to impose sanctions on nations to stem nuclear proliferation, or supporting struggling democracies, the league would advance freedom and opportunity.

As president, I would call a summit of the world's democracies in my first year — just as America led 60 years ago in creating the NATO alliance.

John McCain, a Republican, is a U.S. senator from Arizona. Web site: www.explore mccain.com/

There's no U.S. military solution for Iraq, CR Gazette, 12-23
By Bill Richardson

Recently, I attended a funeral for Korean War veteran Clem Boody (Otterville), whose remains I was honored to bring back from North Korea. As such, I was unable to attend National Public Radio's Democratic forum. When I later read the transcript, however, I was shocked that there was almost no discussion of the single most important issue facing our county: Iraq.

The conventional wisdom on Iraq is once again wrong.

After three months of declining casualty rates, the Beltway consensus seems to be that Iraq is on a glide path to stability. The only problem with this rosy-eyed scenario is that it's not true.

U.S. troops occupying Iraq for the long term would be a disaster for those troops, for Iraq itself and for American security around the world.

It would lead to thousands of additional dead American soldiers; it would prevent Iraq from reaching a peaceful settlement; and it would continue to inflame Muslims around the world.

Progress cannot be measured from body counts. I'm not sure who decided what an "acceptable" level of American troop deaths is, but 37 — the number who perished last month — is too many. After nearly five years of war, the only acceptable number is zero.

Americans elected a Democratic Congress last year in order to end the war in Iraq. That has not happened.

Some now say that we're finally turning a corner, and that the sacrifices of the few must continue for a few more years. And in the face of this sacrifice, other leading Democrats, including Hillary Clinton, John Edwards and Barack Obama, refuse to pledge to remove all troops from Iraq by 2013.

We have heard this flawed reasoning before. From "Mission Accomplished" to "Last Throes," Americans have been told again and again that victory is just around the corner.

Unfortunately, we have turned the corner so many times that we're walking in circles.

Indeed, on nine previous occasions casualties have fallen three months in a row, and each time we were told that this represented a great step forward. On each of those nine occasions, however, casualties rose back to newer and more tragic levels.

Washington insiders forget that the stated purpose of the surge was not to reduce violence mildly in certain parts of the country. It was to give Iraqi politicians the breathing room to effect real reconciliation. That has not happened.

Iraq's Kurdish Deputy Prime Minister, Barham Salih, has flatly declared that "there will be no reconciliation. ... This is a struggle about power." Iraq's vice president and most influential Sunni politician, Tariq al-Hashemi, echoed these sentiments, stating: "There has been no significant progress for months." To truly reduce violence and pressure the Iraqis into making the hard choices necessary to create a functioning state, we must begin immediately to withdraw all of our forces.

We face a choice. Our forces can stay for years, or even decades, trying to impose an outside resolution upon warring factions, having horrific months and less horrific months along the way. Or we can take the initiative to end this war now — by withdrawing all of our forces, and leaving no troops behind.

The conventional wisdom on Iraq has been wrong every step of the way. It is wrong once more. There is no military solution to Iraq, and there can be no political solution while our military remains there. Until then, we can only look at the body counts that some tout as success, pray for our men and women overseas and work hard to change our leadership.

Bill Richardson, a Democrat, is governor of New Mexico. Web site: www.
richardsonforpresident.com/

Pause the PlayStation; focus on Iowa caucuses, CR Gazette, 12-23

This is one in a series of guest columns by Linn and Johnson county adult and student leaders involved in the Jan. 3 Iowa caucuses.

What do Bill Richardson, Barack Obama, John Edwards and Rudy Giuliani have in common? Of course, they are all running for president, but more importantly, they have all made campaign stops at Coe College.

These stops mean a lot to me.

First of all, I have gotten to meet, shake hands and ask questions of people who may be the next president.

Second, I hope this means that politicians are taking my generation seriously and that my generation is taking them seriously as well. The political apathy of my generation is disheartening. We don't understand that in numbers, we are a force that could demand significant attention.

Unfortunately for some of us, playing PlayStation is a better use of our time than choosing our nation's leaders.

When Obama visited campus, however, I was given hope.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Students stood outside in line waiting for tickets, the theater was full, and those who didn't get in stayed outside and watched the event on a big-screen TV. Maybe people showed up because MTV was the host or because they got extra credit for a class, but, still, they went.

Opportunities like this give students in Iowa exceptional access. Even though students were going for different reasons, they got to see a man who wants to be president, and maybe he inspired them. Maybe they fell in love and decided to caucus for him or maybe he upset them and they decided to caucus against him. I don't care; maybe they felt something!

My friends and family who are into politics and live out of state send me jealous e-mails when I show them pictures of the candidates I've been meeting. They understand how important Iowa is in choosing the candidates for the next election.

This important role that Iowa plays and my potential to be a part of shaping the outcome of national events has me excited.

As the caucus nears, I'll continue to read the news and educate myself so I'm ready when the day comes. I'll be back at home in De Witt caucusing with my friends and family. I'll be looking to the guidance of family members who are veteran caucusgoers, and sharing the excitement with my friends who also are participating for the first time. I'm eagerly waiting to be in a room with people who care about democracy and share some of my political values.

We will be a group doing what we think is important, what I think is important — exercising the right to select our future leaders. And if that opportunity isn't exciting, go back to your PlayStation.

Mitchell Lincoln, 21, of De Witt, is a junior at Coe College, where he is president of the Coe College Democrats.

Poll-obsessed media focus on strategy over substance, CR Gazette, 12-23
By Peter Hart
Seattle Times

With just a week and a half to go before the Iowa caucuses, polls are providing pundits and political junkies with fresh data to spin out a new round of the usual "who's up, who's down" campaign coverage. But while the press seems settled on a new narrative for the campaign, journalists should recall what the polls told them last time around about who would likely win the Iowa caucuses.

The tone of coverage of the Democratic race seemed to shift when a Nov. 19 ABC/ Washington Post poll of likely caucusgoers showed a tight race among three candidates: Barack Obama, Hillary Clinton and John Edwards.

The difference from the previous survey was within the poll's margin of error, so the actual data said very little. Much of the media seemed to think otherwise. "The ground may be shifting," NBC anchor Brian Williams said. The Los Angeles Times called it "a shift in momentum in this crucial state" — in an article that boiled the race down to just two candidates, Clinton and Obama.

The Washington Post's write-up was downright confusing — the Post mentioned the results were "only marginally different" from their poll several months earlier, yet nonetheless pointed to "significant signs of progress for Obama — and harbingers of concern for Clinton." On ABC, reporter Kate Snow mentioned something most of her colleagues seemed unconcerned with: the fact that these polls actually tell you very little about the outcome of the race. Snow recalled that "four years ago, John Kerry — who eventually was the Democratic nominee — he was polling in Iowa at 4 percent." Indeed, campaign reporters should all remember the lesson of the 2004 Iowa caucus. A little more than a month before Iowa Democrats actually caucused in January, the pollobsessed media had narrowed down the field to two "frontrunners": Rep. Richard Gephardt of Missouri and Vermont Gov. Howard Dean.

"Two see Iowa as crucial battleground," announced the Washington Post on Nov.

29, 2003, billing the race as a "fight rich in substance and symbolism." A Nov. 9 Post report said that Dean was "for the first time, threatening to pull away from the pack," and even discussed his "opening for a quick-kill strategy" by winning Iowa and New Hampshire.

The polling was presumably a key factor leading reporters to reach such conclusions. A December 2003 Pew poll of likely Iowa caucusgoers showed Dean leading the pack with 29 percent, followed by Gephardt at 21 percent.

Kerry was in third with 18 percent, followed by John Edwards at 5 percent. A Zogby poll from around the same time had a closer race between Dean and Gephardt (26 to 22 percent), with Kerry and Edwards picking up 9 and 5 percent, respectively.

And what happened when Iowa Democrats actually caucused? Kerry won with 37 percent, followed by Ed wards at 32 percent. "Frontrunners" Dean and Gephardt finished with 18 and 11 percent, respectively.

The fundamental problem for the press — and for American democracy — is that the media's overreliance on polls encourages a kind of political conversation that prioritizes strategic consideration and tactics over substance.

A recent study from the Project for Excellence in Journalism confirmed that much of what passes for campaign journalism focuses primarily on the tactical dimensions of the race (like poll results and fundraising) and not on the actual policy differences between the candidates.

In a recent New York Times op-ed, former ABC News political director and current Time magazine editor-at-large Mark Halperin admitted that most political coverage is built around the notion that you can judge candidates' potential to be a good president based on how well they run their campaigns.

Halperin admits he was "wrong" and suggests a change of course: Journalists "should examine a candidate's public record and full life as opposed to his or her campaign performance." What a concept. That's bad news, to say the least — and makes it hard to imagine journalists are going to change any time soon.

Peter Hart is the activism coordinator at Fairness & Accuracy In Reporting, www. fair.org , a media-watch group in New York. He wrote this for the Seattle Times.

Who elected Iowa?, CR Gazette, 12-23
IOWA CAUCUSES

KNOXVILLE, Iowa — It isn't until his seventh stop, almost two hours into his work on an icy Sunday afternoon, that James Ahn hits pay dirt, in the form of Jennie and Arvin Van Waardhuizen.

Until recently, Ahn, a 31-year-old Columbia law school graduate, was working for a posh Boston law firm, structuring complex investment deals for venture capital funds.

Today, computer printout in hand, he is trudging from house to house, seeking to explain to potential Hillary Clinton supporters a process that seems nearly as arcane: how to participate in the Iowa caucuses.

The Iowa ground game is a game of centimeters.

The universe of known caucusgoers is small and hotly contested: Just 122,000 Iowans participated in the 2004 Democratic caucuses.

The victor this year will be the candidate who can lure more of those proven caucusgoers, or the one who succeeds in expanding the pool with new entrants.

This is where Ahn comes in. The people on his printout have already been identified as Clinton prospects; his job is to seal the deal with these folks, who've never caucused before or haven't gone in years.

So after a series of fruitless knocks at empty homes, after talking fast through a barely opened door to a woman whose commitment to Clinton — or to caucusing, for that matter — seems doubtful, Ahn has finally made it into the Van Waardhuizens' cozy living room, where Santa figurines line the mantel.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Within minutes, Ahn has given his basic, don't-let-theprocess-scare-you spiel: Get there by 7, stand in Clinton's corner, make sure you're counted. He has jotted down that Arvin wants to see Bill Clinton and has delivered a requested yard sign.

In a mass-media age, there is something charmingly anachronistic about the smalltown way presidential politics is practiced here. Iowa and New Hampshire are valuable in preserving the ability of voters, at least some voters, to get to know candidates as more than flickering images on a screen or talking heads in a televised debate.

"This is our third followup visit since Hillary's come to town," says Jennie Van Waardhuizen, 55, who runs her parents' small manufacturing plant. "I got an e-mail from Hillary," offers Arvin, 60, an Air Force veteran.

And yet, to join Ahn on his appointed rounds is also to reinforce doubts about a system of irrationality layered on irrationality.

The caucuses draw a small, unrepresentative sample of a small, unrepresentative state. While nearly 30 percent of eligible voters participated in the 2004 New Hampshire primary, just 6 percent went to the Iowa caucuses, according to data compiled by George Mason University professor Michael McDonald. The 2000 turnout figures were even more skewed, 44 percent in New Hampshire compared with 7 percent in Iowa.

This year's outreach may boost those numbers, but most Iowans view the caucuses as an obscure art practiced by an elect few.

"Usually I don't go, because I'm afraid I'm going to get there and feel like a dummy," one man on Ahn's list confides.

Candidates spend enormous sums — it could be as high as $20 million — to win this handful of votes. John Norris, the organizing guru who helped propel John Kerry to his 2004 victory here and is advising Obama, estimates that the top candidates will spend around $400 per caucus vote.

All for a result whose significance resides largely in the fact that it is deemed significant. Political reporters, myself included, get misty over the notion of neighbors gathering on a cold winter night to hash out differences over who is the best candidate. But the caucus process also serves to disenfranchise — those who would rather not state preferences publicly or those who can't make it at the assigned hour. The bizarre rules of the Democratic contest further distort the results. Why should the final outcome depend on how those losing campaigns decide where to throw their backing when, in caucus-speak, nonviable preference groups realign for a second round?

No wonder the caucus process makes ordinary people's heads hurt.

Why should some votes — in precincts that had a good turnout in the last election, in rural areas — get more weight than others? Why aren't the raw numbers — how many voters supported which candidates — made available?

And perhaps the most important question: Given all this, why do we in the media invest the caucuses with such make-or-break significance?

Ruth Marcus is a member of the Washington Post's editorial page staff.

The caucuses draw a small, unrepresentative sample of a small, unrepresentative state.

While nearly 30 percent of eligible voters participated in the 2004 New Hampshire primary, just 6 percent went to the Iowa caucuses.

The '70s live on in the '08 race through Arkansas connection, Omaha World Herald, 12-23

In a political season that has become like "That '70s Show," a Richard Nixon revival infects both parties' primaries. Even Spiro Agnew — Nixon's Nixon— is being reprised.

Hillary Clinton attacks Barack Obama by recycling a slogan Nixon used in 1960 against John F. Kennedy: "Experience Counts." But is it prudent of her to invite remembrances of things past? She had two experiences of wielding power regarding important matters for her husband's administration. One concerned the selection of his first, second and third choices to be attorney general — all in just 50 days. The decisive criterion would be chromosomes: The attorney general had to be a woman.

The first selection, Zoe Baird, crashed because a slipshod selection process did not discover that she and her husband had employed two illegal immigrants as domestic help and had not paid Social Security taxes.

Then Kimba Wood failed because she once hired an illegal immigrant before such hiring was itself illegal, a nonoffense magnified by the Baird debacle.

The third choice was Janet Reno, whose eight-year tenure was notable for three things. One was the botched assault on the Branch Davidian compound in Waco, Texas, in which 86 people died, 17 of them children the assault was supposed to rescue.

Another was seizing, at gunpoint, 6-year-old Elian Gonzales from his Miami relatives and deporting him to Fidel Castro's Cuba, from which he and his mother had fled in an escape in which she drowned.

The third was the optional appointment of an independent counsel to investigate the Whitewater land deal, an investigation that led to Paula Jones. When Hillary Clinton adamantly opposed a financial settlement with her, the investigation meandered to Monica Lewinsky and impeachment.

The second of Hillary Clinton's important experiences was the drafting, in secret, of a national health care plan. It was so dauntingly baroque and ominously statist that a Congress controlled by her party would not bring it to avote.

Her experiences that should matter most to primary voters reveal consistently bad judgment. Her campaign's behavior radiates bad character.

Mark Penn, a senior campaign official, served as her Agnew after Bill Shaheen, co-chairman of her national campaign, made a Nixonian observation. Nixon specialized in mock-solemn tropes such as "It would be wrong to say" this or that, thereby getting this or that into the political conversation.

Shaheen theatrically worried that if Obama, who in a book published 12 years ago acknowledged using drugs as a teenager, is nominated, Republicans will ask him when he last used drugs and if he ever gave or sold them to others.

Penn then kept the story bubbling by talking about how uninterested the Clinton campaign is in talking about it: "The issue related to cocaine use is not something that the campaign was in any way raising."

On the Republican side, Mike Huckabee's role in the '70s Show involves blending Jimmy Carter's ostentatious piety with Nixon's knack for oblique nastiness.

"Despicable" and "appalling" evidence of a "gutter campaign" — that is how The Eagle-Tribune of Lawrence, Mass., characterized this from a recent New York Times Magazine profile of Huckabee: " 'Don't Mormons,' he asked in an innocent voice, 'believe that Jesus and the devil are brothers?' " Imagine someone asking "in an innocent voice" this: "Don't Jews use the blood of Gentile children to make matzoth for Passover?" Such a smarmy injection of the "blood libel," an ancient canard of anti-Semitism, into civic discourse would indelibly brand the injector as a bigot with contempt for the public's ability to decode bigotry.

Huckabee's campaign actually is what Rudy Giuliani's candidacy is misdescribed as being— a comprehensive apostasy against core Republican beliefs.

Giuliani departs from recent Republican stances regarding two issues — abortion and the recognition by the law of samesex couples. Huckabee's radical candidacy broadly repudiates core Republican policies such as free trade, low taxes, the essential legitimacy of America's corporate entities and the market system allocating wealth and opportunity.

And consider New Hampshire's chapter of the National Education Association, the teachers union that is a crucial component of the Democratic Party's base.

In 2004, New Hampshire's chapter endorsed Howard Dean in the Democratic primary and no one in the Republican primary. Last week it endorsed Hillary Clinton in the Democratic primary — and Huckabee in the Republican primary. It likes, as public employees generally do, his record of tax increases, and it applauds his opposition to school choice.

Huckabee's role in this year's '70s Show is not merely to attempt to revise a few Republican beliefs. He represents wholesale repudiation of what came after the 1970s —Reaganism.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

OP-ED: Obama, Romney best tap into America's desire for change, Sioux City Journal,12-23

Last weekend, the Journal published the results of a poll of Iowans done for all Lee Enterprises newspapers in the state, including us. Although Republicans, Democrats and Independents who responded to the poll differed in terms of how they prioritized issues, they shared an unhappiness with Washington. They all gave President Bush and the Democratic-led Congress approval ratings in the 20s.

It's clear people in this state want change. In that regard, we don't think Iowans are any different from anyone else in the country.

Americans, it seems, want a new face, a different voice. They want vision. They want someone to inspire and lead them. They want someone who will unite them. They want a positive, issue-oriented campaign. They want less poisonous partisanship and more cooperation in finding solutions to our challenges.

This election for president provides an opportunity for them to get exactly that. For the first time since 1952, no incumbent president or vice president is seeking the White House.

Over several months, we have interviewed, studied, watched and listened to candidates for president from both major political parties. Today we offer our opinion on who among the Democrats and who among the Republicans best combines a new face and voice; a strong vision; integrity and the potential for running a positive, issue-oriented general election campaign, and an ability to lead, motivate and forge consensus.

We understand Barack Obama and Mitt Romney are different men who possess different ideas and approaches. We neither agree nor disagree with either of them on all the issues facing our country.

We do, however, believe the Illinois senator and the former Massachusetts governor share a unique ability to tap into that need for change which most Iowans and Americans appear to want.

The country would be well-served by a contest between them.

OP-ED: Obama vs. Romney, Sioux City Journal, 12-23
'A common good and a higher interest'

The morning of Jan. 20, 1961, dawned under a bright sky. Despite a heavy snow, the blinding sun’s reflection forced poet Robert Frost, 86, to put aside the copy of the inaugural poem he had prepared and instead recite from memory “A Gift Outright.”

The poem set aside soared, and John F. Kennedy epitomized Frost's “young ambition eager to be tried,” delivering one of our finest political speeches.

This is not 1961.

There are striking parallels, however, between the landscape our country faced then and today, representing a challenge few generations are charged with answering, and “the trumpet summons us again.”

Barack Obama is the Democratic candidate who best understands this critical moment in our nation’s history. He is equipped to bring a fractured people together and possesses the gifts to move us forward, united with a common mission, ready to answer that call.

That is why we are endorsing the U.S. senator from Illinois in the Jan. 3 Iowa Caucuses.

Obama is a gifted orator. Yet, his skills extend beyond the stage of political theater. He has demonstrated a deep understanding of the challenges, home and abroad, our next president must confront. His record in Congress and the Illinois state senate indicates he has the ability to reach out to Republicans and Independents to identify sound, bipartisan solutions and take on special interests.

Obama’s domestic priorities are similar to those of many of his opponents in the Democratic field. That doesn’t mean he fits neatly into the traditional liberal mold.

His health care plan, for instance, is the only Democratic plan that does not require that all Americans have health insurance, only access. He supports merit pay for teachers, something that doesn’t sit well with one of the party’s key union supporters. The Obama energy plan includes a sensible cap on carbon emissions without sacrificing his demand for “big” rather than incremental change.

Obama’s lack of experience is most notable in the realm of foreign policy. His assertion, however, that experience can’t match sound judgment has merit. Obama opposed the war in Iraq early, predicting a scenario that closely resembles the situation today. Now, he understands the complexities prohibiting immediate withdrawal. Instead, he has called for a phased, responsible withdrawal that may not be completed until 2010.

He’s been a hawk on the war on terror, criticizing the Bush administration for its failure to find Osama bin Laden and other key al-Qaeda leaders. There is no negotiating with these “hard-core jihadists,” Obama maintains, “all we can do is hunt them down.” He won’t, however, abandon diplomatic efforts abroad and maintains we must enhance our image elsewhere in the world.

Still, Obama has been wise to surround himself with an impressive group of foreign policy advisers. A running mate with a strong foreign policy track record would be the perfect complement. If nominated, we recommend Obama consider one of his competitors n U.S. Sen. Joe Biden. An Obama-Biden ticket would offer an intriguing mix of fresh ideas and measurable achievement.

The experience of a respected politician like Biden can certainly be a blessing. Too often, however, beltway experience manifests itself in a political culture Obama describes as settling for “the constraints of the past.”

The great hope embodied by a candidate like Obama is the promise of a new path. He has little patience for the “that’s-just-the-way-it-is” mentality of Washington, D.C. It's a culture that increasingly relies on polling and special interests to guide policy and measures success by political points scored. Instead, Obama speaks of a change harkening back to moments in our nation's history when we shared "a common good and a higher interest. That's the change I'm looking for."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It's the kind of change America appears eager for.

Opinion: Caucus 2008: Our Endorsements, Daily Iowan, 12-23

DEMOCRAT: Sen. Barack Obama

From the start, Obama was viewed as charismatic but lacking in substance. Now, fewer than two weeks from our state caucuses, this is no longer the case. Obama's commanding oratorical abilities should not distract voters from his policy proposals, objectives that outline a return of "united" to the United States. We believe his judgment and ideas are the best fit, not just for a party but for a people. We believe Obama represents the best of our polity and a better future for our nation, which is why he is receiving The Daily Iowan's endorsement.

REPUBLICAN: John McCain

John McCain was elected to the U.S. Senate in 1986 after spending four years in the House of Representatives. A U.S. Navy veteran, McCain was captured while serving in Vietnam and spent more than five years as a prisoner of war. The Arizona senator has succeeded in two careers: as a courageous naval aviator who defended our country in war and a longtime civil servant. These accolades make him the most qualified Republican presidential-nomination candidate, and The Daily Iowan endorses McCain's candidacy.

Guest Columnist: A plan to end the war, Council Bluffs Nonpareil, 12-22

One of the most important responsibilities of the next president is to restore the trust relationship between the president of the United States and the rest of the world. The war in Iraq has badly damaged our reputation in the world, decreased our national security and increased terrorism worldwide.

The world desperately needs America to show moral leadership again, but moral leadership is based on truth. America's leaders must tell the truth. I voted for this war, and I was wrong. I take responsibility for that vote. Now every American, including myself, who believes this war is wrong must make our voices heard loud and clear: It is time to end this war.

Unfortunately, President Bush refuses to level with the American people and admit his strategy in Iraq is not working. Earlier this year, instead of implementing a plan to bring about real change in Iraq, President Bush decided to escalate the war. And now Defense Secretary Robert Gates has proposed leaving our troops in Iraq for another decade in a "Korea-like" model. The actions of the Bush administration are wrong for Iraq and wrong for America. Our brave men and women in uniform have served heroically, and now it is time to bring them home to the heroes' welcome they deserve.

If President Bush won't end this war, then Congress must use its power and force him to end it.

We don't need more debate and non-binding resolutions to end this war - we need Congress to force a change of course. Congress needs to stand firm against the president and use their constitutional funding power and send the president a funding bill that stops the surge and implements a timetable for withdrawal. And if the president vetoes that bill, they should send it back to him, again and again, as many times as it takes for him to finally get the message. Congress has the power to end this war. They should use it now.

The American people deserve to know where I stand on the important challenges facing our nation, especially the war in Iraq. More than a year ago, I proposed a specific plan to end the war. I would immediately draw down 40,000 to 50,000 combat troops, require a complete withdrawal of combat troops within nine to 10 months and prohibit permanent U.S. military bases in Iraq. After withdrawal, we should retain sufficient forces in Quick Reaction Forces located outside Iraq, in friendly countries like Kuwait, to prevent an Al Qaeda safe haven, a genocide or regional spillover of a civil war.

Additionally, Congress should prohibit funding to deploy any new troops to Iraq that do not meet real readiness standards. American tax dollars should be used to train and equip our troops, instead of escalating the war. It is disgraceful to send our brave men and women of the military into harm's way without the training and equipment they need.

Congress should also make it clear that President Bush is conducting this war without authorization. The 2002 authorization did not give President Bush the power to use U.S. troops to police a civil war. President Bush exceeded his authority long ago and now needs to end the war and ask Congress for new authority to manage the withdrawal of the U.S. military presence and to help Iraq achieve stability.

A stable Iraq should be a priority not just for the United States but also for the entire world. We must intensify our efforts to train the Iraqi security forces and step up our diplomatic efforts by engaging in direct talks with all the nations in the region, including Iran and Syria. The United States should convene a peace conference with the regional powers to discuss how all parties can work to bring about a peaceful and prosperous Iraq.

It is time for the Iraqi leaders to take responsibility for their country. We must show them that we are serious about leaving, and the best way to do that is to actually start to leave.

The deteriorating situation in Iraq will only be resolved when the factions in Iraq engage in the search for a political solution that will end the sectarian violence and create a stable Iraq.

All of us who know this war is wrong have an obligation to speak out and tell Congress to bring our brave men and women home. Our silence enables this president to continue the war; our voices can bring it to an end.

- John Edwards is a Democratic candidate for president.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Columnist: People's Business: Looking for a sure thing? Look elsewhere, Ames Tribune, 12-22
By: Charlotte Eby
12/22/2007
Updated 12/21/2007 07:19:05 PM CST
Email to a friendPost a CommentPrinter-friendly
The one thing that's a sure bet is that nothing's a sure bet on caucus night.

The Republican campaign is in flux, and it's hard to predict who will pull out a win on Jan. 3.

Although Mike Huckabee, the former Arkansas governor, has enjoyed a meteoric rise in Iowa, he could be in for a tough finale.

His shoestring campaign might have difficulty capitalizing on his popularity in the Iowa caucuses, where organization and getting supporters to the caucus matters as much as message.

Huckabee, who has led in recent polls, has been attacked from all sides on questions about his foreign policy experience and his record as governor.

Rival Mitt Romney has been relentless in his criticisms of Huckabee's record on crime, pointing to commutations Huckabee granted to convicted criminals in Arkansas.

Huckabee took on the question of commutations head-on during an Iowa appearance. He said of 8,700 commutation requests he received during his time as governor, he denied 90 percent.

But he highlighted a few that he was proud of granting. He talked of a 25-year-old who wanted to attend culinary school but had the black mark of joy-riding in a stolen car as an 18-year-old in his record.

Huckabee said it was the right thing to do to grant him a clemency and give him a second chance.

He also granted commutations to single moms who couldn't get a job in a nursing home years later after writing a "hot" check.

Huckabee bashed Romney's decision not to grant clemency to a man who wanted to be a police officer but had shot someone with a BB gun when he was 13 years old, not even breaking the skin.

Huckabee said the best political decision is to deny every application.

"I think we ought to make decisions on what's best for the future of a young man, not what's best for the future of somebody who wants to run for a future office," Huckabee said.

Polls show Romney, who once held a lead in Iowa, still coming in a close second. Romney packed a hotel ballroom with nearly 1,500 revelers for his Christmas party Wednesday night in West Des Moines.

Romney has one thing Huckabee lacks - a strong campaign organization that knows how to turn out supporters. They flexed that muscle in August at the GOP straw poll in Ames, busing in supporters from around the state who handed Romney a win.

But don't call it a two-person race just yet.

Fred Thompson has been trying to wrangle interest in his campaign by spending time in Iowa, although to less-than-stellar reviews.

He's been labeled as a lazy, unenthusiastic campaigner, and it is starting to stick.

Thompson has still managed to land the endorsement of U.S. Rep. Steve King, the king of right-wing true believers in Iowa.

John McCain, riding a new wave of momentum after an impressive string of newspaper endorsements, is trying to breathe new life into his sagging campaign.

But he's doing that in New Hampshire, not Iowa, where he hasn't shown his face much in recent months.

McCain isn't the only candidate running a drive-by campaign in Iowa.

Public schedules for Rudy Giuliani don't show him making a stop in Iowa on his latest 10-day campaign stretch. His scattershot approach has him stopping in Missouri, hardly an influential primary state, but not crossing the border to meet voters in Iowa.

The X-factor this year could be Ron Paul if he can encourage his backers to log off their computers long enough to head to the caucuses.

Even without a strong campaign structure in Iowa, Paul was able to surprise many by snagging fifth place at the GOP straw poll in Ames.

And everybody likes a surprise on caucus night.

Charlotte Eby is a reporter for the Lee Enterprises Des Moines bureau. She can be reached at (515) 243-0138 or chareby@aol.com.

Christopher Chase
Press Assistant
Iowans for Hillary -- Hillary Clinton for President
715 E. 2nd Street

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Des Moines, IA 50309
cchase@hillaryclinton.com

Contributions to Hillary Clinton for President
are not deductible for federal income tax purposes.

Paid for by Hillary Clinton for President

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Joel Benenson" <jbenenson@bsgco.com>
To: "John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
Date: 3/16/2015 3:46:21 AM
Subject: Re: Earned Media Update

Maybe a continued waste of taxpayers' money while the Republicans in Congress continue to block anything that would help everyday Americans get ahead.

Joel Benenson
Benenson Strategy Group

On Mar 16, 2015, at 6:29 AM, John Podesta <john.podesta@gmail.com > wrote:

I think we should be calling this millions of dollars of taxpayer funded oppo research.

On Mar 15, 2015 5:13 PM, "Jesse Ferguson" <jesse@jesseferguson.com > wrote:

Hello All – Two quick things.

1) As you may have seen, ABC News reporting that Speaker Boehner and Republicans in Congress are pledging more investigation into Secretary Clinton on emails. Below are the key points we're sharing with Hill allies and TV surrogates this afternoon to get ahead of it and frame it as crazy GOP investigations AND GOP hypocrisy. We're trying to push folks to go after them.

2) Everyone asked on our last Comm call for more offense against GOP. While we can't do it perfectly before campaign is launched, we've had some success working with partners getting stories on Jeb and others. Clips attached.

Thanks. We'll try to keep these Earned Media Updates as often as we can.

POINTS

While it was permitted for Secretary Clinton to use one blackberry instead of two, looking back she's said it would have been better for her to use two. At the time, this just didn't seem like an issue. She's asked State Department to publicly release all of roughly the 55,000 printed pages of emails she provided them.

Secretary Clinton was the first and only former Secretary to respond to the Department's request last year, and was the only one to provide her work emails.

Secretary Clinton has asked the Department to make her work related emails publicly available, and just like every other Cabinet Secretary and U.S. government official, she gets to choose to keep her personal emails private.

Charlie Cook wrote that: "This is the classic kind of inside-the-Beltway, process story that politicos and reporters get in a lather over, but that resonates very little with average voters."

This isn't about emails, it's about Trey Gowdy furthering a partisan witch-hunt and Republicans in Congress distracting from their dangerous letter to the Iranian regime. There have been nine different Congressional committees that have held hearings on

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Benghazi . Secretary Clinton spent more than five hours testifying before the Senate and the House of Representatives and participated in briefings for Members.

Gowdy has been criticized for subpoenaing the State Department for emails already turned over to the Select Committee.

Gowdy and Republican have been caught numerous times trying to use the Benghazi investigation to fire up their base and raise money.

Republican Hypocrisy on Emails. They want to hold former Secretary Clinton to a different standard than they'd hold themselves.

Washington Post: "Jeb Bush used his private e-mail account as Florida governor to discuss security and military issues such as troop deployments to the Middle East and the protection of nuclear plants, according to a review of publicly released records." [Washington Post, 3/15/15]

Wall Street Journal: " But much like with Mrs. Clinton, the decision over which emails should be considered official and which remain private was made by Mr. Bush. It is unclear how many emails Mr. Bush withheld because he deemed them unrelated to state business. "He did exactly what Hillary did," said Barbara Petersen, president of the First Amendment Foundation, a Florida-based government watchdog group. In turning over emails from his private account, she said, Mr. Bush and his staff "went through those emails and decided what were public-record emails and what wasn't. […] The Wall Street Journal reports today: "When the Orlando Sentinel filed a public-records request for the emails from the private account about the legislative session, Mr. Rubio's spokeswoman said they had been deleted." (WSJ, 3/13/15)

Associated Press, "Several current and former governors who are considering a presidential run have found ways to delay or prevent public scrutiny of their communications while in office. That includes Republicans who have criticized their potential Democratic rival." [AP, 3/7/15]

Roll Call, "But the legislative branch, which has effectively exempted itself from the Freedom of Information Act, can keep its emails and other correspondence hidden for 20 years or more — and some forever." [Roll Call, 3/10/15]

Congressman Jason Chaffetz, who chairs the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee, was caught by ABC News with a personal email address – a gmail account – on his Congressional business card. [ABC, 3/3/15]

In fact, people have called on Trey Gowdy to release his email if he wants to oversee this investigation. [MSNBC, 3/11/15]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Andre, Project On Government Oversight" <afrancisco@pogo.org>
To: podesta@law.georgetown.edu
Date: 8/30/2014 12:00:34 AM
Subject: Weekly Reader: Making sure weapons work

POGO PROJECT ON GOVERNMENT OVERSIGHT

The independent weapons testing office is under fire, again.

August 30, 2014

Editor's Choice

Independent Weapons Testing Comes Under Fire, Again

In 1983, Congress passed a law to ensure that weapons would be tested to see if they actually work in real-world scenarios. Ever since, the Director of Operational Test and Evaluation has been under fire from critics in the defense industry and their allies in Congress, even though operational testing reduces the overall cost of weapons and makes sure our fighting men and women are given systems that work. Read more on POGO.org.

Watchdogs and Whistleblowers: A Progress Report

This summer, POGO surveyed the websites of all 72 statutory Inspectors General to see how they are complying with a new law that requires them to have a Whistleblower Protection Ombudsman to provide information about whistleblowing to federal employees. Many agencies had comprehensive information and dedicated contact information for the ombudsman, but three agencies had little to no information on their website. Read more on POGO's blog .

Billions of Dollars in Federal Spending Not Reported

USAspending.gov is supposed to be a central website that allows the public to track all kinds of federal spending, but a Government Accountability Office audit found that in 2012 federal agencies failed to report nearly $619 billion in grants, loans, and voucher programs to the site. That's nearly one-quarter of what the government spent on federal assistance for that year. Read more on POGO's blog .

No More Excuses for Failing to Downblend

Highly enriched uranium is an enormously dangerous nuclear material used in nuclear weapons. With as little as 20 pounds, a terrorist could create an improvised nuclear device within minutes. So why isn't the government doing more to downblend the 375 metric tons of excess highly enriched uranium into a safer type of uranium? Read more on POGO's blog .

Another Take on FOIA Objections by Contractors

Last week, POGO's Scott Amey wrote about contractors being allowed to redact government documents before they are released through Freedom of Information Act requests. In response, Scott received a thoughtful email from someone who has spent years on the other side of those redactions. Read the response on POGO's blog.

POGO Joins in Asking FCC to Reform Radio Political Ad Info

This week, POGO joined 10 other groups in asking the Federal Communications Commission to require radio stations to post political ad spending information to an online database. Right now, that information is only available in physical files at individual radio stations, which can keep it from the public. Read more on POGO's blog.

Come Work at POGO!

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

POGO is currently looking to fill two positions.
Congressional Program Coordinator: A former Hill staffer to help POGO expand its oversight training series to create a new initiative to strengthen the institutional role of Congress.
Jack Shanahan Fellow: A post 9/11 combat veteran interested in military reform and national security issues.
Visit our jobs page to find out more about the positions and how to apply.

Click Here to See's POGO's List of 10 Books that Matter

Tweets of the Week

"I hope the public decides to get angry and demand more truth" great sentiment from @crelewis over on @POGOBlog . http://t.co/kYk1ZAL1Bb
— Liz Hempowicz (@lizzy_loo_hoo) August 25, 2014

Every day I hear people complaining about the government. Do something. Speak up. Use your voice. I do. It counts. Follow @POGOBlog
— Holly Ann Thomas (@HollyGirlRox) August 25, 2014

$500 million in #HealthCare .gov spending explained http://t.co/a8H8AZzXPA #obamacare #ACA
— Scott Amey (@SAmeyJD) August 28, 2014

#Congress doesn't work for a lot of reasons. Decimating its own ability to know anything's gotta be top among them. http://t.co/Rmx1AygnK4
— Danni Downing (@dannidi) August 27, 2014

We rely on people like you to spread the word about our work. Tell a friend about POGO!

POGO :: 1100 G Street, NW, Suite 500 :: Washington, DC 20005 :: (202) 347-1122

Unsubscribe

POWERED BY blackbaud nonprofit software

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Ryan Duncan" <ryan@progressiveaccountability.org>
To: "Big Campaign" <bigcampaign@googlegroups.com>
Date: 8/8/2008 2:46:18 PM
Subject: [big campaign] Media Monitoring Report - Evening 08/08/08

Main Topics: China Olympics, Edwards Affair, Russia Invades Georgia, Surrogate Interviews

Summary of Shift:
The Summer Olympics in Beijing, China got under way this evening, dominating discussion across all networks. President Bush's arrival in China, his tepid response to the country's human rights abuses, and China's pollution issues were mentioned along with this. Russia invaded Georgia over the disputed area of South Ossetia. Fighting quickly escalated, with hundreds reported dead, and full out war quickly escalating. The price of a barrel of oil dropped $5.00 today, giving Wall Street some welcomed relief which saw stocks soaring to their biggest gains in more than three months.

Political coverage was dominated by the breaking scandal of John Edward's confession to an extra-marital affair. An interview will air this evening on ABC Nightline News. Bill Clinton has been asked to speak at the DNC Convention's third night and Hillary has picked up her campaigning for Obama while Obama goes on vacation to Hawaii this week. Detroit's Mayor was released from prison today, followed by his indictment for assaulting a police officer.

Highlights:
1. MSNBC: Nicole Wallace Talks McCain's Energy Policy, Attack Ads, and Maverick Status
2. FNC: Morris Dismisses Romney as Poor V.P. Choice For Flip-Flops on Abortion
3. MSNBC: McCain Is Takes Bronze in Olbermann's Worse Person For Hamdan Lies
4. MSNBC: Donatelli Discusses McCain's Energy Plan and Vice Presidential Selection

Highlights, No Clips:
1. CNN – JOHN MCCAIN: "The government of Georgia has called for a cease-fire and for a resumption of direct talks on South Ossetia with international mediators. The U.S. should immediately convene an emergency session of the United Nations Security Council to call on Russia to reverse course."
2. CNN – John McCain, when asked on for his opinion on the Edwards affair scandal, gives a simple no comment.

Clips:

Highlight #1
Nicole Wallace Talks McCain's Energy Policy, Attack Ads, and Maverick Status (MSNBC 08/08/08 6:58pm)
DAVID GREGORY: Let's talk about this campaign, and talk about McCain campaign strategy. You have tried- the campaign has recently to tarnish Obama's credibility and his image in a couple ways. On the one hand, it is to describe him as a celebrity, to use Britney spears, Paris Hilton to suggest he's sort of famous for being famous, that he's a lightweight. That's on the one hand. On the other hand, it is to reduce his energy plan to the idea of the tire gauge, to suggest that his whole energy plan is really about whether there's enough air in the tires. So the question is, are these ambush political tactics? And is that consistent with the original maverick that you claim john McCain is?

WALLACE: You know, two quick things here, David. One, I never hear anyone put it to the Obama campaign, the internal deliberations that they may have gone to when they made the strategic decision to essentially filet an American hero, a former p.o.w. On the stump every day, which is what comes out of their candidates mouth. And two, Barack Obama, tarnished himself. We didn't paint him as anything that he isn't. He certainly, you know, he went overseas, we were pleased that he was finally going to visit the war zone. But their campaign made a decision, and they obviously did it to gain advantage. Because you don't do things in campaigns for other reasons. To hold a 200,000 person rally in Europe in the midst of a presidential campaign. So it was obviously a decision to celebrate his celebrity with a crowd of screaming Europeans. And you know, by pointing it out it's not our effort to tarnish him, it's shining a light on something his campaign spent a lot of time and money trying to shine the light on themselves.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

GREGORY: And when you talk about trying to tarnish McCain's image or filet his image, his reputation, certainly, there's been a very aggressive attempt to tie him to president bush and say he's a third bush term. What else do you have in mind in terms of what they've done?

WALLACE: let's not gloss over that. I covered this White House, I worked at this White House. John McCain used to make major news every time he ended up at odds with the bush white house. Whether it was attacking the secretary of defense for the conduct of the war, whether it was a very high profile disagreement that he had with the bush white house over torture and other aspects of the war on terror. So it is a blatant lie when Barack Obama stands in front of his supporters and calls john McCain an extension of the bush administration. It's simply not true. So, it's not something to gloss over. On the other hand, Barack Obama is someone who's -- the two pillars of his candidacy are a politician who's going to do things differently, change we can believe in and the other is judgment that he pointed to in his race against Hillary Clinton when he said "I gave a speech in 2002, in which I had better judgment than you did on Iraq." So I think that Barack Obama's wounds are self-inflicted and I think it's the job of any campaign to highlight a candidate's weaknesses, so that's all that we've done. And really our focus is on communicating John McCain's vision for the future, for making this country energy independent., getting people working again.

GREGORY: but, clearly, the McCain campaign has made a calculated decision to turn up the heat on Obama, to go on the attack, to try to have a different narrative frame for this campaign. In fact, senator McCain told David Broder that he laments the tone of this campaign and what's happened over the past several weeks. This is what he said in back in April about the kind of campaign that he was looking forward to. We'll let you listen and have a response. >>
WALLACE: okay.

MCCAIN: this will be a respectful campaign. American's want a respectful campaign. They're tired of the attacks, they're tired of the impugning people's character and integrity. They want a respectful campaign and I'm of the firm belief they'll get it, and they can get it, if the American people demand it and reject a lot of this negative stuff that goes on.

GREGORY: has senator McCain lived up to that?

WALLACE: I believe he has. And you know, look, it is a respectful campaign. But that that doesn't mean you shy away from highlighting the differences. As your own Tim Russert used to say, it's a big election about big stuff. And I think when you're talking about big differences, these are very different men with very different biographies. The Obama campaign is never shy about pointing out an age difference and philosophical difference, and time in Washington. And you know, that's the work of campaigns to make sure that people understand the choice that they have. And on the big issues, there are very stark differences., and the policies people care about- people are looking for leadership. I believe this is a leadership election. They want someone that's going to end this war with victory. They want to achieve the objectives. I think everyone agrees now, as a country, it's time to end the war in Iraq, it's how do we do it. I think everyone agrees now, as a country, it's time to stop shipping $700 billion overseas to countries that aren't friendly very to us. The question is how do we make ourselves energy independent. So there are big differences there. And we are certainly committed to running the honorable campaign that john McCain promised.

GREGORY: let's talk about McCain, the maverick. Which is a theme that's been highlighted by the McCain campaign this week. There's a new ad that has been put on the Internet in support of that idea. Let's run it and talk about it on the other side of it.

[…]

MATTHEWS: It is a very cleverly constructed ad, I have to admit. But is this a conversation that you really want to have. John Kerry, for instance, in a response that you knew the democratic committee would have, said this about McCain today "John McCain has changed in profound and fundamental ways that I find personally really surprising, and frankly upsetting. He is not the john McCain, as a senator who defined himself, quote, as a maverick, though questionable. This is a different john McCain." And that's an argument you get from democrats and critics of john McCain. That this is not the john McCain of 2000, who took on George W. Bush. It's a different figure.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

WALLACE: Well look, I put all my faith in the wisdom of the voters. And I think if you came out with us on the trail, which I hope you will do, you'd see that john McCain the maverick, john McCain the straight talker and john McCain the guy that gets a standing ovation when he talks about you need to drill and drill now. Who would have thought two years ago that would be the largest applause line, when you travel through Wisconsin and through Michigan and through Ohio and through Florida? You know, if you come out and see it, and if we get out of some of the back and forth that happens, as I understand it must in the Northeast Corridor, you'll see that john McCain is still offering straight talk. He spends his days on the campaign trail face to face with voters. He does not stand in the arena. We do not have crowds of 200,000 people. And he interacts. These are spontaneous interactions. I think even his early supporters consider him vintage john McCain. And he's talking about his vision for the future. So that's the campaign we're running, and I think people in Washington are going to say what they are going to say. It's really not the focus of our campaign.

GREGORY: Nicole, certainly, the McCain campaign has landed some blows against senator Obama the last week and a half, some of the polling reflects that in your estimation here, as we start to gear up to the convention, is this a dead even race?

WALLACE: oh, god. I feel like we are still very much the underdog, and I think that polls go up and polls go down. You and I have been involved in more than a couple presidential campaigns and the only campaign and the only poll that matters is the one on Election Day. So, um, we're the underdog. I think we expect to remain in that position. It's one that senator McCain is comfortable running as. I think we'll look forward to staying neck in neck through November.

Highlight #2
Morris Dismisses Romney as Poor V.P. Choice For Flip-Flops on Abortion (FNC 08/08/08 8:18pm)
BILL O'REILLY: […] Who do you predict for John McCain?

DICK MORRIS: Predict Tom Ridge. Think he should do? Condi, Powell, or Joe Lieberman. He needs a vice president that wakes up this campaign. And the country says, wow.

O'REILLY: Yeah, but Lieberman's already had that shot. […]

MORRIS: Yeah, but he will be the first president since Abraham Lincoln to cross party lines in his ticket.

O'REILLY: Let's deal with your Tom Ridge prediction.

MORRIS: Marine, Homeland Security, good looking guy, Pennsylvania.

O'REILLY: But, pro-abortion. That's going to hurt him among conservatives, he's already weak there.

MORRIS: It'll hurt him, but not terminally, and Ridge will back and fill like he did in Pennsylvania. He didn't change the Medicade ban in Pennsylvania. And Ridge would be ok on that.

O'REILLY: Now how convinced are you that Ridge is going to get it?

MORRIS: Oh not. […] But the guy I'm praying it isn't, is Romney.

O'REILLY: See, I don't get that. Because I think Romney would be the best choice, because for McCain obviously, because of Michigan. He gets that in play, and because of the economy, he's a business guy. But you go ahead.

MORRIS: This guy outspent his rivals a hundred million to one. And he lost New Hampshire, and Iowa, and Florida, and South Carolina, and California. The only states he carried were Michigan, because his Dad was governor in a republican primary which is a very small affair there, and a couple of Mormon states, and a couple of states where nobody else could afford to run because they were all spending money on California. There is a national propensity not to vote for Romney.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

O'REILLY: Why?

MORRIS: Well it could be the flip-flop on abortion, which is a reason not to vote for him. It could be the Mormon, which is not a reason not to vote for him but people feel it. And he would send, at best, a gigantic yawn, and at worst an animus throughout the country.

O'REILLY: Now he's a conservative guy that could mobilize the base to be friendlier to McCain, though. Some people might say, oh, I might come over.

MORRIS: But he's pro-life and pro-choice depending on week you find him in.

O'REILLY: No, but now he's a conservative.

MORRIS: Yeah, but 48 months ago he was a liberal.

O'REILLY: That's alright though, because, I mean, people have a right to change their minds. Barack Obama changes his mind quite often.

MORRIS: You have the right to change your mind on abortion once. You can't go from pro-life to pro-choice to pro-life, and expect the base to believe you're pro-life.

O'REILLY: So you think if he puts Romney on the ticket it's a big mistake. I disagree, I think Romney would probably bring him some votes.

Highlight #3
McCain Is Takes Bronze in Olbermann's Worse Person For Hamdan Lies (MSNBC 08/08/08 8:57pm)
KEITH OLBERMANN: Time for Countdown's worst person's in the world. The bronze to John McCain. It will soon be news, not if he gets something terribly wrong, but if he goes a week without getting something terrifyingly wrong. The candidate issued a statement about the conviction of Salim Hamdan by military commission, which McCain helped to design, and he exaggerated reality again. The jury found that the prosecutions lawyers had proven beyond a reasonable doubt that Hamdan had aided terrorists by supplying weapons to Al-Qaeda and Taliban forces in Afghanistan. But that's not what the jury ruled. It convicted him of supplying resources to Al-Qaeda, namely himself as Bin Laden's driver. But this is getting clearer, John McCain either lies or can't tell the difference between reality and stuff he dreamed or imagined. Those are not two good options.

Highlight #4
Donatelli Discusses McCain's Energy Plan and Vice Presidential Selection (MSNBC 08/08/08 1:17pm)
MITCHELL: … you know that's not all of Barack Obama's energy policy. We're in the silly season. What's going on here?

DONATELLI: I have a tire gauge right here, so when I finish this interview I'm going to go out an inflate my tires right.

MITCHELL: Actually you probably should.

DONATELLI: It's not a bad idea, but it's a very small idea. I think the key point that Senator McCain is trying to make is that whether you want to talk about his tire pressure proposal or his windfall profits tax, or anything else he's been talking about, nothing that he has proposed, this is the important point, adds a drop of additional domestic oil or additional energy produced here in the United States for use by Americans. That's the bottom line. For him it's all scarcity. I mean he's morphing into Jimmy Carter when it comes to his energy policy.

MITCHELL: In fairness to the democratic nominee, he is talked about taking 70 million barrels out of strategic petroleum reserve; he has talked about offshore drilling as part of a larger compromise; he's talked about alternative fuels. I mean he's got a number of things. He's also talked about rebates and putting money in consumers' pockets of a thousand dollars, paid for by the windfall profits tax, just to balance things up here.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

DONATELLI: Yeah, well let's talk about each of those. Alternative fuels, that's a good idea. But you just can't wish it to happen. It'll happen when it becomes technologically feasible, and most people tell us that that's not for several years. Um, as far as this new plan for drilling that he says he favors- Andrea, there's no bill. There's no bill at all. It's just some speech that he gave. I mean if he's for offshore drilling and he's going to change his position, then let him say so. Um, again, I stand by my statement., that there's nothing that he's proposed that will increase America's proven reserves. McCain favors increasing America's energy reserves, that's why there's such a big distinction on this issue.

MITCHELL: Of course, offshore drilling is a long-term solution, so is nuclear power. John McCain has talked about 45 new nuclear plants by 2030, and that is considered pie in the sky, uh, a fantasy kind of scenario, given how long it's taken to get even one nuclear plant license. It's been decades since anything's been licensed in this country.

DONATELLI: You're absolutely right about that, but it's a government created problem. There isn't any reason why if we don't have the will in this country, to try to untangle some of the red tape involved, that we couldn't put nuclear plants online much quicker.

MITCHELL: It's also market-based and insurance-based. Uh, it's liability issues as well.

DONATELLI: Well, I mean, we have to get to all of those, but I don't think anyone would dispute that fact, Andrea, that the number one problem is red tape for the government. As far as oil becoming more available to the United States quickly, you can do that much more quickly in the Gulf of Mexico, uh, because you have the infrastructure there already. You know I'm really amazed Senator Obama claims to campaign on the audacity of hope, on the issue of energy, he's hopeless. You know, nothing can be done. Nothing can be done. It's going to take seven years. It's gonna take ten years . You should inflate your tires. I mean, the obvious answer is staring him in the face. We have to drill for more energy and more oil and more gas. That's the thing we need right now to gradually begin to bring the price down.

MITCHELL: Now, the announcement today from the Republicans, that Dick Cheney will be the big speaker on Monday night. Uh, tell me about the plusses and minuses. You've got a vice president who is very, very popular with the Republican base, the conservative base. He's been a great fundraiser, he's a great campaigner. At the same time, he's not popular with your wider audience. So, how do you bridge that divide?

DONATELLI: Well Monday night, uh, you know, would be the vice president. Uh, and probably the president. And, uh, normally it would be the first night. Uh, he's the president and vice president of our party, uh, you want to give an appropriate- you want to honor them appropriately. At that point, Andrea, you then shift away, and you're talking about Senator McCain and his running mate and his policies. That'll be the focus for the rest of the convention, highlighted, of course, on Saturday night by Senator McCain's acceptance speech.

MITCHELL: So basically, you want to get Dick Cheney and George Bush on and off the stage as quickly as possible, and have that torch passed because of their singular unpopularity right now, fair or not, with the voters.

DONATELLI: Look, passing the torch I would agree with, but I'll go back to 1988 when I worked for President Reagan. Monday night was President Reagan's night. Um, he was honored, appropriately, then he exited the stage in favor of then Vice President Bush. I mean, this happens all the time, it should not be any different in this case.

MITCHELL: Now, as I recall in 1988, because it had something to do with the way it unfolded, 1988 the vice presidential nominee was introduced on the second night, the Tuesday night of the convention. Can you imagine that scenario, or do you expect that John McCain would be doing it sooner than that , perhaps to step on the bounce that the democrats might have after their convention?

DONATELLI: You know, uh, Senator McCain is going to make his decision when he's comfortable making it. And I honestly can't tell you if that's going to be the second night of the convention, before the convention, or tomorrow. All I can tell you is that he's giving serious thought. This is an important choice, and he'll make the decision, he'll announce it when he's comfortable doing so.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

MITCHELL: Ok, he's in Iowa today, he's in Las Vegas tomorrow. I think it's a safe bet it's not going to be tomorrow.

--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~
You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail ryan@campaigntodefendamerica.org with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.
-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Jake Sullivan" <jake.sullivan@gmail.com>
To: "Eizenstat, Stuart" <seizenstat@cov.com>
Date: 3/17/2015 12:24:22 PM
Subject: Re: Iran Nuclear Agreement

Stu - can we talk Thursday afternoon?

On Mar 17, 2015, at 7:02 PM, Eizenstat, Stuart <seizenstat@cov.com > wrote:

Dear Jake,

As I have mentioned, for over three years I have chaired the Iran Task Force of the Atlantic Council, the first year as co-chair with Chuck Hagel. We have done extensive work of the Iran nuclear issue, Iranian internal politics and their foreign policy goals, publishing more than a dozen papers.

Along the lines of the previous notes to you about the emerging Iran Nuclear Agreement, it appears increasingly clear there will be a framework agreement by or before March 24, which will set the parameters in some detail of the obligations of Iran and the phase-out of sanctions. The sanctions relief will entail not only the exercise of presidential waiver authority in congressionally imposed sanctions, but the U.S. going to the UN and seeking sanctions relief there, as well. The latter would have the force of international law.

Obviously, with the 47 Republican Senator letter, Bibi's congressional speech, the distinct possibility Bibi will be the prime minister again (exit polls as of this moment are 27-27 between Likud and Labor, and Bibi can more easily get to 61 seats than Herzog), and that the Saudis, Egyptians, Gulf States, as well as Israel and most of the organized Jewish community, will have great problems with the Agreement, this presents a very difficult issue for Secretary Clinton.

I start with the premise that having been Secretary of State and being involved in earlier phases of the negotiations, and being a Democrat, she has to endorse the outcome. But permit me to suggest that she should take a harder line on a number of issues.

She could say something along these lines, subject to modification when the details are published:

"Given the development of Iran's nuclear program, this Agreement, while far from perfect, offers the best way to constrain Iran from getting a bomb. It reduces the number of active centrifuges enriching uranium, and places limits on the number and quality of centrifuges for the next 10 (or 15 years). It would send most of the enriched uranium out of Iran for reprocessing in ways that makes it highly unlikely it could be used to make a bomb. It would limit enriched uranium to low levels (around 5%). It also places strict limits on the heavy-water plutonium plant at Arak, which would potentially be another way for Iran to develop a nuclear weapon. It would limit the underground facility at Fordow to research and development. It provides for intrusive 24/7 inspections by the respected International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA), under the additional Protocol of the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty. And sanctions would be only gradually withdrawn, based upon Iranian performance (check on details). It creates a one year (check) breakout period, in which the U.S. and our allies would have notice if Iran decided to pursue a nuclear weapon. Moreover, 10 (or 15) years is a long time and Iran's conduct may moderate.

Without this Agreement, Iran would be free to develop its plutonium facility at Arak; would continue to increase the number and sophistication of its centrifuges (indeed has another 10,000 waiting on line); would not be subject to intrusive inspections; and could make more progress toward a nuclear weapon. It has added more centrifuges during the course of the severe sanctions already imposed.

Because we already have the most comprehensive sanctions ever exacted in peacetime against Iran (its private banks out of the SWIFT clearance system; the Central Bank of Iran on the sanctions list; the EU taking no Iranian oil exports; etc.), it is difficult to see any set of additional sanctions which would lead to a better result. While we must keep the military option on the table if Iran moves forward with a weapons system, this Agreement is the best opportunity to avoid the need for military action.

We also have to recognize that one of the reasons sanctions helped bring Iran to the negotiating table is that we were able to forge a partnership with the European Union. If we fail to endorse this Agreement, there is a real possibility the EU would remove its sanctions, and the U.S. would be left alone, with sanctions that would be less effective.

At the same time, there are important gaps in the Agreement. It does not cover Iran's ballistic missile program, which would not exist if Iran simply wanted a civilian nuclear program. It does not require Iran to answer the IAEA's questions about its potential military-related testing of equipment, which was one of the reasons for the UN sanctions (check on final product). It does not permit full inspection at military facilities, like Parchin. It leaves Iran with an industrial-size nuclear facility. And at the end of the 10 (or 15) year period, Iran would be unconstrained.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Therefore, while this Agreement is an important step forward to limit Iran's nuclear weapons ambitions, we must take additional steps to assure that Iran does not pursue a breakout strategy either during or after the expiration of the Agreement. The U.S. strategy should include the following:

1. The toughest sanctions possible should be given to the next President to employ if Iran cheats during the course of the Agreement.

2. Even after the expiration of the Agreement, Iran should know that if it pursues a nuclear weapons strategy, the U.S. would consider this unacceptable, and would take all actions necessary to prevent it.

3. The U.S. should insist that Iran "come clean" and answer all of the IAEA's questions to their satisfaction.

4. The U.S. should do everything possible to limit Iran's development of long-range missiles.

5. The U.S. should assure our friends and allies in the region, Israel, Saudi Arabia, the countries of the Gulf Cooperation Council, Egypt, Jordan, and others that this Agreement will not lead to across-the-board cooperation with Iran on issues like Iraq, Syria, Lebanon, Gaza, Afghanistan, where directly or through surrogates Iran is acting in ways contrary to U.S. national security interests and those of our friends and allies. Iran has provided the equipment and training of IEDs and other weapons which have killed American soldiers. Their interests and ours diverge in important ways. We will never forsake our friends, and should begin immediate consultations to provide defense arrangements to reassure them of our continued support and constancy. We will do everything possible to limit Iran's efforts at regional hegemony at the expense of our friends and allies. We will build up our forces in the Persian Gulf to demonstrate this."

Jake, these are some preliminary thoughts. But I do believe Secretary Clinton cannot afford to take a pass on this Agreement, or simply endorse it without these caveats.

Best wishes,

Stu Eizenstat

Stuart Eizenstat

Covington & Burling LLP
One CityCenter, 850 Tenth Street, NW
Washington, DC 20001
(202) 662 5519 (tel) | (202) 778-5519 (fax)
seizenstat@cov.com
www.cov.com

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Gregory Rosalsky" <grosalsky@progressivemediausa.org>
To: "Greg Rosalsky" <GRosalsky@progressivemediausa.org>
Date: 6/25/2008 1:20:35 AM
Subject: [big campaign] '08 Daily News Clips - 6/25

08 Election Daily News Clips
June 25th, 2008

Candidate Tracking:

All times in Eastern Standard Time
1:30pm McCain: Speech in Las Vegas, NV
- Tracking scheduled for this event
2:15pm Bush: Attends National Security Advisor's Meeting with UN Security Council Reps at White House

2:30pm McCain: Finance Luncheon in Las Vegas, NV

5:00pm McCain: NV HQ Opening in Las Vegas, NV

5:15pm Bush: Makes Remarks at Max M. Fisher National Republican Award Dinner

News Clips:

MORE FALLOUT FROM CHARLIE BLACK COMMENTS

McCain Adviser May Have Struck a Nerve (Washington Post 6/25/08)
By Jonathan Weisman and Anne E. Kornblut
Sen. Barack Obama and his surrogates continued to criticize Charles R. Black Jr., a top adviser to Sen. John McCain, on Tuesday for saying a terrorist attack before the November election would help the presumptive Republican nominee... Obama dispatched Richard Ben-Veniste, a member of the bipartisan 9/11 Commission, to hold a conference call with reporters in which he called Black's comments "a candid and very disappointing glimpse into the thinking of one of McCain's closest advisers."
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/06/24/AR2008062401331.html?nav=hcmodule

No. 1 Faux Pas in Washington? Candor, Perhaps (NYT 6/25/08)
By Michael Cooper
It was the journalist Michael Kinsley who changed Washington's understanding of gaffes with his observation that a gaffe occurs not when someone lies, but when they say what they really think. And more than a few politicians and pundits were put in mind of the classic Kinsleyian gaffe this week after Charlie Black, a senior adviser to Senator John McCain, was quoted in a magazine interview saying that another terrorist attack in the United States would "be a big advantage."
http://www.nytimes.com/2008/06/25/us/politics/24cnd-memo.html?ref=politics

Analysis: Chiding aide, McCain forgets own remark (AP 6/24/08)
By Glen Johnson
John McCain wasted no time disawoving comments by an aide who suggested a terrorist attack on U.S. soil would boost his presidential campaign. McCain may have wanted to take a moment to consult the history books before he spoke. In ways both overt and subtle, the Republican presidential contender has been making much the same point as senior adviser Charlie Black, who backed off Monday after he was quoted as saying an attack "certainly would be a big advantage to him."
http://news.yahoo.com/s/ap/20080624/ap_on_el_pr/mccain_terrorism

McCain Battles 'Unforced Errors' to Stay on Message (ABC News Blog 6/24/08)
By Jack Tapper
Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., is having trouble staying on message -- or, more specifically, his campaign is.McCain had hoped to spend the early part of this week discussing energy and the environment but instead the

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Republican presidential candidate found his message muddled when one of his top advisers told Forbes magazine in an upcoming issue that a new terror attack on Americans "certainly would be a big advantage to him."
http://www.abcnews.go.com/GMA/Vote2008/story?id=5233012&page=1

Charlie Black Reveals McCain Campaign Strategy (Houston Chronicle Blog 6/24/08)
Charlie Black, chief strategist for John McCain, made some surprisingly frank comments in an interview with Fortune Magazine, surprising only in the fact that someone in the McCain campaign would openly say what they are thinking. Mr. Black referred to the assassination of Benazir Bhutto as an "unfortunate event" but acknowledged that "it helped us" referring to the timing of the assassination coinciding with the New Hampshire primary. He also said of a future terrorist attack; "Certainly it would be a big advantage to him (McCain)."
http://www.chron.com/commons/persona.html?newspaperUserId=desperado&plckController=PersonaBlog&plckScript=personaScript&plckElementId=personaDest&plckPersonaPage=BlogViewPost&plckPostId=Blog%3AdesperadoPost%3A089da9be-32cc-4b09-8a7d-cf2f00573ffc

Team Obama Keeps Heat on Over Black Comments (Washington Post Blog 6/24/08)
By Anne E. Kornblut
Obama advisers have seized on Charlie Black's controversial remark on terrorism - that an attack would be politically beneficial for his client, Sen. John McCain - as an obviously tone-deaf gaffe. On Tuesday, even after Black, a senior adviser to McCain, apologized, the Obama team portrayed it as a policy misstep as well, arguing that the campaigns should be talking about the substance of terrorism policy rather than its political impact.
http://blog.washingtonpost.com/the-trail/2008/06/24/team_obama_keeps_heat_on_over.html

Who Said This? (National Journal Blog 6/24/08)
By Jennifer Skalka
"It's very helpful to the president," remarked a GOP pol in an October 2004 report about the release of a new Osama bin Laden tape. A hint, it wasn't Charlie Black. It was John McCain, commenting in a 10/30/04 AP story.
http://hotlineblog.nationaljournal.com/archives/2008/06/who_said_this.html#more

National security events helping Republicans (Politico 6/24/08)
By Jonathan Martin
Reaching into their oppo files, Dems point out that McCain has been more candid about the obvious advantage a national security event would provide the GOP. In the closing days of the 2004 campaign, McCain said this about bin Laden's video message: "I think it's very helpful to President Bush," said McCain, R-Ariz., while stumping in Stamford for U.S. Rep. Christopher Shays. "It focuses America's attention on the war on terrorism. I'm not sure if it was intentional or not, but I think it does have an effect."
http://www.politico.com/blogs/jonathanmartin/0608/National_security_events_helping_Republicans.html

Charlie Black's Position Is Secure, For Now (The Atlantic Blog 6/24/08)
By Marc Ambinder
Democrats hope to pressure McCain strategist Charlie Black to resign, but so far, McCain is having none of it, according to two people with knowledge of the situation. As of last night, "Internally, McCain is supporting Charlie," said one of those people. Black recongizes the gravity of his mistake, people close to him said.
http://marcambinder.theatlantic.com/archives/2008/06/charlie_blacks_position_is_sec.php

MCCAIN NEWS

Santa Barbara fumes over McCain drilling plan (LA Times 6/25/08)
By Maeve Reston and Michael Finnegan
John McCain came to California promoting an array of ideas to spur the market for clean cars and otherwise reduce carbon emissions. But in this coastal city, the site of a disastrous oil spill in 1969, the presumptive Republican presidential nominee was dogged by critics at nearly every turn for his recent embrace of offshore drilling.
http://www.latimes.com/news/politics/la-na-campaign25-2008jun25,0,1618946.story

McCain Has Plan to Make Government More Green (Washington Post 6/25/08)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

By Juliet Eilperin and Lyndsey Layton
Sen. John McCain pledged yesterday that he would make the federal government more environmentally friendly, while Sen. Barack Obama mocked his rival as crafting energy policies that merely pander to voters, in the latest skirmish over which presidential candidate is better prepared to tackle the nation's energy and environmental problems.
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/06/24/AR2008062401412.html

Obama Assails Remarks by McCain on Offshore Oil Drilling (NYT 6/25/08)
By Michael Powell and Michael Cooper
Senator Barack Obama took a poke at his Republican opponent on Tuesday, saying that for Senator John McCain to talk of a "psychological benefit" from expanded offshore drilling is to define that policy as a gimmick.
http://www.nytimes.com/2008/06/25/us/politics/25campaign.html?ref=politics

McCain's Fine Line of Security (WSJ 06/25/08)
One of Sen. John McCain's main strategies for overcoming the deficit he and his party face in opinion polls is to make the election about national security and terrorism... Even so, Sen. McCain risks accusations from Democrats that he is following the Bush administration by playing into the politics of fear.
http://online.wsj.com/article/SB121435467915401859.html?mod=rss_Politics_And_Policy

McCain aides seek undecideds, non-partisans for town halls (USA Today 6/25/08)
By David Jackson
Instead of picking crowds of committed supporters to fill his town hall meetings, aides to Republican John McCain say they are hiring specialists to find undecided and not overly partisan voters. That's a contrast from the last Republican presidential campaign in which President Bush's aides and the Secret Service screened out opponents and emphasized loyal GOP supporters.
http://www.usatoday.com/news/politics/election2008/2008-06-24-McCain-screen_N.htm

McCain calls for energy-efficient government (AP 6/24/08)
Republican John McCain said Tuesday the federal government should practice the energy efficiency he preaches, pledging as president to switch official vehicles to green technologies and do the same for office buildings.
http://www.msnbc.msn.com/id/25351310/

Californians Object to McCain's Drilling Plan (NYT Blog 6/24/08)
By Michael Cooper
The McCain campaign sometimes makes a virtue of Senator John McCain's propensity for telling people not only what they want to hear, but also what they don't. It certainly seemed like many of the people he met in California this week did not want to hear about his newfound support for off-shore drilling.One of his donors expressed concern about it at a fund-raiser. Anti-drilling protesters stood outside his campaign event here Tuesday morning, raising the specter of the devastating 1969 oil spill here that helped launch the modern environmental movement.
http://thecaucus.blogs.nytimes.com/2008/06/24/californians-object-to-mccains-drilling-plan/#more-5458

California Official's "Straight Talk" On Drilling (CBS News 6/24/08)
By Clifden Kennedy
Senator McCain had some interesting company at his environmental briefing today. At most campaign events, people appearing onstage with the candidate support whichever plan he is promoting. But that wasn't the case today.
http://www.cbsnews.com/blogs/2008/06/24/politics/fromtheroad/entry4206202.shtml?CMP=OTC-RSSFeed&source=RSS&attr=FromTheRoad_4206202

Someone Didn't Get The Memo (National Journal Blog 6/24/08)
By Adam Aigner-Treworgy
Usually John McCain's panel discussions feature a stage full of experts in a given field telling McCain how great his proposals would be for the country. But at today's discussion about energy at the Museum of Natural History here, one panelist didn't get the memo. Michael Feeney, the executive director of the land trust for Santa Barbara County and a professional land conservationist, took issue with some of McCain's environmental policies, accusing the candidate and fellow panelist CA Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger of being too willing to compromise on environmental standards in devising energy solutions.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

http://hotlineblog.nationaljournal.com/archives/2008/06/someone_didnt_g.html#more

Obama/McCain: 'Psychological' Benefit? (MSNBC Blog 6/24/08)
By Domenico Montanaro
Yesterday, McCain admitted that his offshore drilling proposal would probably have mostly "psychological" benefits, NBC/NJ's Adam Aigner-Treworgy reports. At a town hall in Fresno that primarily focused on energy issues, McCain was asked a question about the price of gas and the viability of various short-term solutions.
http://firstread.msnbc.msn.com/archive/2008/06/24/1163504.aspx

Another lobbying headache for McCain? (Chicago Tribune Blog 6/24/08)
By James Oliphant
Former Homeland Security secretary Tom Ridge, a national co-chair of John McCain's campaign, failed to properly disclose he was working on behalf of the Albanian government, a Washington newspaper reported Tuesday. The Capitol Hill newspaper Roll Call reported that Ridge, who formed a strategic consulting company after leaving government, signed a $500,000 lobbying contract with Albania in 2006 but didn't file required documents about the deal until this month.
http://www.swamppolitics.com/news/politics/blog/2008/06/another_lobbying_headache_for.html

Ridge Files Very Late for Albania (Roll Call 6/24/08)
By Anna Palmer
For almost two years former Homeland Security Secretary Tom Ridge failed to register a nearly half-million-dollar lobbying contract that he had with the government of Albania.
http://www.rollcall.com/issues/53_157/news/26197-1.html

For John McCain's Mom: Another Day, Another Speeding Ticket (Washington Post Blog 6/24/08)
By Mary Ann Akers
Even skyrocketing gas prices aren't slowing down Roberta McCain, the indefatigable 96-year-old mother of Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) The would-be first mother -- and yes, she fully expects her Johnny to win the presidency in November -- is still speeding around like a NASCAR driver on the last lap. At a cocktail party held at the luxurious home of GOP super lobbyist Wayne Berman recently, Mrs. McCain gave the Sleuth some advice: "Don't speed up there (in Chevy Chase)."
http://blog.washingtonpost.com/sleuth/2008/06/for_john_mccains_mom_another_d.html

Tancredo Questions McCain (Washington Post Blog 6/24/08)
By Jonathan Weisman
He may be the presumptive nominee of the Republican Party, but John McCain has yet to heal all the wounds on his right flank. Rep. Tom Tancredo (R-Colo.), a failed presidential rival of McCain's and an anti-illegal immigration gadfly, launched into the senator from Arizona for meeting in secret with Latino leaders last week in Chicago.
http://blog.washingtonpost.com/the-trail/2008/06/24/tancredo_questions_mccain.html

Undue North? (National Journal Blog 6/24/08)
By Adam Aigner-Treworgy
McCain Hands Dems Political Opening With Visit To Canada... Republican presidential candidate John McCain had some observers scratching their heads last week over his decision to head north to Ottawa to deliver remarks on the economy and U.S. trade policy. For his part, Democrat Barack Obama was quick to take up the issue, saying on Friday that it was "interesting" that McCain "chose to talk about trade in Canada instead of in Ohio or Michigan."
http://www.nationaljournal.com/njonline/no_20080624_3113.php

McCain's EBay Model for Jobs Finds Few Buyers Among Economists (Bloomberg 6/24/08)
By Hans Nichols
John McCain's model for ginning up the economy isn't Keynesian or Milton Friedmanite. It's EBay Inc. The presumptive Republican presidential nominee regularly asserts that 1.3 million people worldwide ``make a living off EBay.'' He holds up the figure as evidence the world's largest Internet auctioneer is a model for job and economic growth... This affection for EBay as an engine for job creation, however, confounds economists such as Betsey Stevenson, a professor at the University of Pennsylvania's Wharton School of Business in Philadelphia.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

http://www.bloomberg.com/apps/news?pid=20601103&sid=aJXBcBPLYnWY&refer=us

D.N.C. Sues McCain Over Campaign Loan (NYT Blog 6/24/08)
By Leslie Wayne
The Democratic National Committee filed suit today in U.S. District Court in Washington challenging Senator John McCain's decision to opt out of the federal public financing system in his primary race.
http://thecaucus.blogs.nytimes.com/2008/06/24/dnc-sues-mccain-over-campaign-loan/

DNC Files Lawsuit over McCain Financing (MSNBC Blog 6/24/08)
By Mark Murray
With so much attention on Obama's reversal on public financing, liberal bloggers like Arianna Huffington and Josh Marshall have wondered why McCain's own apparent flip flop on the subject hasn't received as much scrutiny. Well, the Democratic National Committee is trying to change that by filing a lawsuit in US District Court in DC to force the Federal Election Commission to investigate McCain's decision to opt in the public matching funds system for the primaries, secure a loan based on those public funds, and then withdraw from the system after becoming the GOP front-runner.
http://firstread.msnbc.msn.com/archive/2008/06/24/1163808.aspx

Splintered conservatives hurt McCain (Politico 6/24/08)
By Allan J. Lichtman
With America's attention riveted on the battle between Barack Obama and Hillary Rodham Clinton, few noticed that presumptive Republican nominee John McCain limped through his party's late primaries. McCain won 73 percent of the vote in Pennsylvania, 72 percent in Kentucky, 70 percent in Idaho and 70 percent in South Dakota. McCain's problem with the Republican base is not his lack of conservative credentials...

McCain Staffer Turns His Candidate Into A Joke The Whole Internet Can Enjoy (Huffington Post 6/24/08)
By Jason Linkins
...Mark Soohoo, who is ostensibly part of John McCain's "internet team" was explaining to the assembled that despite the outward appearance that McCain hasn't learned how to use Google - and is thus still unaware that his campaign's BFF Charlie Black has this annoying hobby of repping for bloodthirsty dictators - the candidate has plenty of what we used to call "computer literacy." But then: DAG! Here comes blogger (and former John Edwards internet director) Tracy Russo, gettin' all up in Soohoo's grill, funnin' on McCain! That led Soohoo to utter these immortal words, "John McCain is aware of the internet."
http://www.huffingtonpost.com/2008/06/24/mccain-staffer-turns-his_n_109052.html

McCain aware of Internet and its traditions (Politico 6/24/08)
By Ben Smith
Here's the video from that instant classic -- for a small class of tech-and-politics junkies -- moment at yesterday's Personal Democracy Forum, at which McCain aide Mark Soohoo gamely defended his boss's lack of computer skills against the incredulity of former Edwards blogger Tracy Russo. Fortunately for McCain, snarky tech-and-politics junkies were probably already lost.
http://www.politico.com/blogs/bensmith/0608/McCain_aware_of_Internet_and_its_traditions.html
To View Video: http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=tYs8X0D

McCain travels to Colombia, Mexico (Chicago Tribune Blog 6/24/08)
By Jill Zuckman
As if the extended presidential campaign weren't enough of a giant road trip, Sen. John McCain will take his show south of the border next week during the Fourth of July Congressional recess. McCain will travel to Colombia and Mexico with best buddies (and Senators), Lindsey Graham and Joe Lieberman. The trio will meet with the presidents of each country, as well as Cabinet members, foreign ministers and law enforcement officials.
http://www.swamppolitics.com/news/politics/blog/2008/06/mccain_travels_to_colombia_mex.html

CAP launches McCain U (Politico 6/24/08)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

By Ben Smith
The Center for American Progress Action Fund -- the political arm of John Podesta's think tank-- just sent out an email announcing that next Monday it will host "McCain University."Basically, reporters who haven't done the left-leaning half of their homework can spend a half-day listening and questioning progressive policy wonks (and Elizabeth Edwards).
http://www.politico.com/blogs/bensmith/0608/CAP_launches_McCain_U.html

A Look At John McCain's Media Spending (The Atlantic 6/24/08)
By Marc Ambinder
According to research compiled by one Democratic media buyer, John McCain is spending roughly $1.5 million a week on television advertising across the country with an average buy rate of about 400 gross ratings points per market. A McCain campaign spokesman would not say whether the Democrat's compilation reflects their purchasing trends, although an Obama campaign adviser, when shown the data, said that it comports with what they're seeing.
http://marcambinder.theatlantic.com/archives/2008/06/a_look_at_john_mccains_media_s.php

Will Pro-Choice Women Back McCain? (Time 6/23/08)
By Amy Sullivan
The 2008 presidential race may have been branded a "change" election, but abortion rights advocates have seen this movie before. Once again they face a Republican nominee who supports abortion restrictions yet is widely viewed as moderate and unthreatening to pro-choice voters. Eight years ago, it was George W. Bush who convinced pro-choice Republican and independent women that he was a safe bet, asserting that "America is not ready to ban abortions." This time, according to a poll released last week by NARAL Pro-Choice America, voters have a fuzzy sense of John McCain's views on abortion — which is just the way the McCain campaign wants it.
http://www.time.com/time/printout/0,8816,1817314,00.html

OPINIONS AND EDITORIALS

I'm for McCain, but not the GOP (USA Today 6/25/08)
By Ralph Peters
The Republicans go awry — and disgrace 'conservatism' — when it comes to Big Oil. support John McCain for president. But that doesn't mean I support the Republican Party. Had the GOP nominated anyone else this year, I'd be struggling to rationalize a vote for the Democrats in November.
http://blogs.usatoday.com/oped/2008/06/im-for-mccain-b.html#more

Does McCain Understand Markets? (RCP 6/25/08)
By John Stossel
"I believe there needs to be a thorough and complete investigation of speculators to find out whether speculation has been going on and, if so, how much it has affected the price of a barrel of oil. There's a lot of things out there that need a lot more transparency and, consequently, oversight." Those are the words of presidential candidate John McCain. This man is the Republican?
http://www.realclearpolitics.com/articles/2008/06/bless_the_speculator.html

Conservatives and Their Carnival of Fraud (WSJ 6/25/08)
By Thomas Frank
...The ideological assumption was only barely concealed: Whatever "big government" could do, the private sector could do better, cheaper and faster. There was another unspoken ideological angle: Every federal job privatized was a job pried from the grip of the hated Washington bureaucracy. Every dollar contracted out meant that much less for bureaucrat unions and that much more for friendly companies, well-connected lobbyists and corporate political action committees. In the Bush era, the idea was pushed to a sort of extreme, with each of our great national initiatives – the Iraq occupation, Katrina reconstruction and the Department of Homeland Security – largely entrusted to private contractors.
http://online.wsj.com/article/fighting_words.html

Taking Ownership of Iraq? (NYT 6/25/08)
By Thomas L. Friedman

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

...One of the first things I realized when visiting Iraq after the U.S. invasion was that the very fact that Iraqis did not liberate themselves, but had to be liberated by Americans, was a source of humiliation to them... When someone else has to liberate you in your own home, that is humiliating — and humiliation, I believe, is the single-most underestimated force in international relations, especially in the Middle East. That also helps explain why Iraqis initially never took ownership of their governing institutions, like the Coalition Provisional Authority, or C.P.A. ...People have to fight and win their own freedom, and that's what gives their institutions legitimacy.
http://www.nytimes.com/2008/06/25/opinion/25friedman.html?ref=opinion

Can't-Do Government (Washington Post 6/25/08)
By Paul C. Light
We've seen the federal government at its worst over the past six months. Consider the controversies over contaminated tomatoes and meat, tainted toys, toxic trailers, counterfeit Heparin, aircraft groundings, veterans' care, missing warheads and unrelenting contract fraud... Congress and the presidential candidates have yet to connect the dots: The next president will inherit what Alexander Hamilton called a "government ill executed."
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/06/24/AR2008062401215.html

More Phony Myths (NYT 6/25/08)
By Maureen Dowd
Karl Rove was impressed with Barack Obama when he first met him. But now he sees him as a "coolly arrogant" elitist...The cheap populism is really rich coming from Karl Rove.... Rove is trying to spin his myths, as he used to do with such devastating effect, but it won't work this time. The absurd spectacle of rich white conservatives trying to paint Obama as a watercress sandwich with the crust cut off seems ugly and fake.
http://www.nytimes.com/2008/06/25/opinion/25dowd.html?ref=opinion

Medicare Savings vs. the Lobbyists (NYT 6/25/08)
To cut costs and reduce fraud in one corner of the sprawling Medicare program, Congress called for competitive bidding on medical equipment that is provided to elderly and disabled Americans and set a sensible schedule for phasing in the program... With those companies about to start selling their wares next month, Congress has bowed to pressure from the losing bidders. The House approved legislation Tuesday that would terminate the contracts and delay the launch for 18 months. In the Senate, key committee leaders are leaning toward a delay.
http://www.nytimes.com/2008/06/25/opinion/25wed1.html

McCain's Misguided Strategy? (NYT Blog 6/25/08)
By Michael A. Cohen
As the 2008 general election heats up, one of John McCain's strongest political advantages is his opponent Barack Obama's lack of political experience. No surprise there: when Mr. McCain began his political career, Mr. Obama was still a college student. But lately, Mr. McCain seems to be taking the experience argument in an extreme direction: intimating that Mr. Obama doesn't actually know, well, much of anything....By continually attacking Mr. Obama's understanding of policy issues, John McCain runs the risk of actually helping the Democrat neutralize the experience issue.
http://campaignstops.blogs.nytimes.com/2008/06/24/mccains-misguided-strategy/index.html?ref=opinion

Triple $$$ Ranch (New York Observer 6/24/08)
By Jason Horowitz
John McCain used to be Lincoln Chafee's kind of Republican. In 2001, Mr. McCain and Mr. Chafee were the only two Republican senators to vote against George Bush's tax cuts. Now, Mr. McCain favors making them permanent, and Mr. Chafee thinks the Arizona senator has lost the right to call himself a maverick.
http://www.observer.com/2008/triple-ranch

America looks to a nuclear-free world (Financial Times 6/24/08)
By John Kerry
When candidates agree, it is not always front-page news. Election coverage hinges on conflict. Effective governance works differently. The next president must work to build consensus to get things done. Nuclear security is an excellent place to start; in fact, a remarkable bipartisan consensus is emerging that can help the 44th president revolutionise America's policy towards nuclear weapons.
http://www.ft.com/cms/s/6bf6c51e-41fd-11dd-a5e8-0000779fd2ac,Authorised=false.html?_i_location=http%3A%2F%2Fwww.ft.com%2Fcms%2Fs%2F0%2F6bf6c51e-41fd-11dd-a5e8-

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

0000779fd2ac.html%3Fnclick_check%3D1&_i_referer=http%3A%2F%2Frealclearpolitics.com%2F&nclick_check=1

BUSH NEWS

Vietnamese Premier Meets With Bush, Gates (Washington Post 6/25/08)

By Dan Eggen

President Bush met with the prime minister of Vietnam yesterday to discuss closer ties on trade and greater religious freedom, signifying another step forward in the slow warming of relations between the United States and its communist former enemy.

http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/06/24/AR2008062400963.html

Bush cancels S Korea trip after street protests over beef imports (Financial Times 6/25/08)

By Andrew Ward and Daniel Dombey

Weeks of street protests in South Korea against the resumption of US beef imports have forced George W. Bush to cancel a trip to the country next month.

http://www.ft.com/cms/s/0/2a970adc-424f-11dd-a5e8-0000779fd2ac.html

Bush helps GOP take in $750,000 at VA fundraiser (AP 6/24/08)

President Bush's appearance at a Republican National Committee reception Tuesday boosted his fundraising total for the year to about $66 million. More than 100 people attended the evening fundraiser, which raised $750,000 for the RNC.

http://ap.google.com/article/ALeqM5i_f6QlcJVrUasGmrIII1QL-0ZNBgD91GMT6G0

Anti-Bush Tour Bus Makes Its Debut (The Hill's Blog 6/24/08)

By Chris Good

Americans United for Change has long opposed many of President Bush's policies, but this year it's found a new way to say it–with a 28-ton bus. The group today launched its Bush Legacy Bus, a rolling museum dedicated to the "worst policy failures" of the Bush administration. The bus will travel the country for the next five months, stopping in 150 cities and bearing a simple message: that Bush's policies have wreaked havoc on America.

http://briefingroom.thehill.com/2008/06/24/anti-bush-tour-bus-makes-its-debut/

Bush To Filipino President: "I Am Reminded Of The Great Talent Of The -- Of Our Philippine-Americans When I Eat Dinner At The White House" (Huffington Post 6/24/08)

President Bush met with Filipino President Gloria Macapagal Arroyo today at the White House. Arroyo was in Washington while her country tries to recover from a typhoon that devastated coastal areas and flipped a ferry carrying over 800 passengers last week. Before discussing aide for the Philippines, Bush couldn't resist beginning the sober meeting with a quip about a Filipino member of his kitchen staff.

http://www.huffingtonpost.com/2008/06/24/bush-to-filipino-presiden_n_108985.html

OTHER TOP NEWS

Evangelical Leader Attacks Obama on Religious Views (NYT 6/25/08)

By Larry Rohter

Just days after Senator Barack Obama met quietly with religious leaders, including the son of the Rev. Billy Graham, another of the evangelical movement's most prominent names, James C. Dobson, has sharply attacked Mr. Obama, accusing him of having "a fruitcake interpretation of the Constitution" and twisting the meaning of both the Old and New Testaments.

http://www.nytimes.com/2008/06/25/us/politics/25dobson.html?ref=politics

3 U.S. Soldiers Killed by Bomb in Mosul Region (NYT 6/25/08)

By Richard A. Oppel Jr

Three U.S. soldiers and an interpreter were killed by a roadside bomb in Ninewa Province on Tuesday night in the second large explosion to strike the Mosul region in a day and further evidence that Sunni Arab guerrillas remain very active in the northern city despite recent Iraqi military operations.

http://www.nytimes.com/2008/06/26/world/middleeast/26baghdad.html?hp

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Obama asks donors to help Clinton with debt (AP 6/24/08)
Democrat Barack Obama on Tuesday asked his finance team to help Hillary Rodham Clinton pay off a debt of at least $10 million from her failed presidential campaign, setting the stage for joint appearances by the two former rivals later in the week.
http://www.msnbc.msn.com/id/25357545/

Bill Clinton announces support for Barack Obama (LA Times 6/24/08)
By Michael Muskal
Former President Bill Clinton, whose comments during his wife's unsuccessful presidential campaign angered the Barack Obama camp, announced his support for the Illinois senator's candidacy for president this morning.n
http://www.latimes.com/news/la-na-campaign25-2008jun25,0,1119667.story?track=rss

The Greenest Show on Earth: Democrats Gear Up for Denver (WSJ 06/24/08)
By Stephanie Simon
As the Mile-High City gears up to host a Democratic bash for 50,000, organizers are discovering the perils of trying to stage a political spectacle that's also politically correct.
http://online.wsj.com/article/SB121434145793701111.html?mod=rss_Politics_And_Policy

Largest labor organization poised to endorse Obama (CNN 6/24/08)
By Emily Sherman
The AFL-CIO, the nation's largest labor organization, is poised to throw its support behind Sen. Barack Obama and launch a broad grassroots mobilization effort in support of the Democratic presidential nominee.
http://politicalticker.blogs.cnn.com/2008/06/24/largest-labor-organization-poised-to-endorse-obama/

Will Obama's name help a Republican senator? (CNN 06/24/08)
By Alexander Mooney
...Oregon Sen. Gordon Smith, one of the most vulnerable Senate Republicans, is stressing his history of working with the presumptive Democratic nominee in a new campaign ad hitting airwaves Tuesday.
http://politicalticker.blogs.cnn.com/2008/06/24/will-obamas-name-help-republican-senator/

Color Oregon blue? (Politico 6/24/08)
By Ben Smith
A fairly stunning new ad from Oregon's Republican senator Gordon Smith leaves little doubt as to which way the wind is blowing there.In the ad, Smith, running hard away from Bush, associates himself at length and explicitly with Obama. "Who says Gordon Smith helped lead the fight for better gas mileage and a cleaner environment?" the female narrator asks. "Barack Obama."
http://www.politico.com/blogs/bensmith/0608/Color_Oregon_blue.html

Can Iraq Sink Obama? (Washington Post Blog 6/24/08)
By Chris Cillizza
Could positive developments on the ground in Iraq force Barack Obama to reconsider his position on the war in Iraq? And, if so, how would such a reconsideration impact the current dynamic between Obama and John McCain? ... The situation in Iraq then, at least according to the party strategists we talked to, is a win-win for Obama...
http://blog.washingtonpost.com/thefix/2008/06/can_iraq_sink_obama.html?nav=rss_blog

Violence spikes in eastern Afghanistan (Chicago Tribune Blog 6/24/08)
By Aamer Madhani
In a sobering assessment of the situation in eastern Afghanistan, a top U.S. general said today that attacks have increased by 40 percent this year in the large swath of area controlled by American troops.
http://www.swamppolitics.com/news/politics/blog/2008/06/violence_spikes_in_eastern_afg.html

NBC: U.S. Commanders In Afghanistan 'Complained To Us' That They Lack Resources Because Of Iraq (Think Progress 6/24/08)
On NBC Nightly News last night, anchor Brian Williams reported that on a recent trip to Afghansistan, "several U.S. commanders complained" to NBC that they lack "resources, aircraft, soldiers and support because of the war in Iraq."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

http://thinkprogress.org/2008/06/24/nbc-afghanistan-iraq/

Left-leaning Justice Department applicants were denied interviews, report finds (LA Times 6/24/08)
By Richard B. Schmitt
Two officials illegally allowed political considerations to come into play when screening applicants for the department's honors program and summer internships, the Justice investigation finds.
http://www.latimes.com/news/la-na-justice25-2008jun25,0,977076.story?track=rss

American Envoy Is Linked to Arms Deal Cover-Up (NYT 6/24/08)
By Eric Schmitt
An American ambassador helped cover up the illegal Chinese origins of ammunition that a Pentagon contractor bought to supply Afghan security forces, according to testimony gathered by Congressional investigators. A military attaché has told the investigators that the United States ambassador to Albania endorsed a plan by the Albanian defense minister to hide several boxes of Chinese ammunition from a visiting reporter. The ammunition was being repackaged to disguise its origins and shipped from Albania to Afghanistan by a Miami Beach arms-dealing company.
http://www.nytimes.com/2008/06/24/washington/24arms.html?_r=1&partner=rssnyt&emc=rss&oref=slogin

POLL

Obama holds 12-point lead over McCain, poll finds (LA Times 6/25/08)
By Doyle McManus
A Times/Bloomberg Poll says that in a two-man contest, 49% of respondents favor Barack Obama, while 37% support John McCain. With Ralph Nader and Bob Barr added to the mix, Obama holds 15-point edge.
http://www.latimes.com/news/la-na-poll25-2008jun25,0,3900845.story?track=rss

Bush's approval his new low: 23 percent (Think Progress 6/24/08)
Only 23 percent of Americans said they approve of President Bush's job performance in a new Los Angeles Times/Bloomberg survey, which is a new low for him in that poll. Seventy-three percent of respondents said they disapproved of the job Bush is doing.
http://thinkprogress.org/2008/06/24/bushs-approval-hits-new-low-23-percent/

Survey on Religion Offers Good News for Democrats (WSJ Blog 6/24/08)
By Steven Waldman
Buried in the spectacularly deep U.S. Religious Landscape Survey are some statistics of great interest to politicos, especially on the three big religion-and-politics questions of 2008. The God Gap Is Gone – In past elections, voters who were the most religious clearly broke for the Republicans, and Democrats were increasingly seen as hostile to religion. ven now, 43% of those who attend church weekly or more identify themselves as Republicans compared with 40% who call themselves Democrats, and it's still the case that the more religious you are, the more likely you are to prefer Republicans. But by a variety of other measures, the survey by the Pew Forum on Religion & Public Life found that Democrats have pulled even or ahead among the religious... http://blogs.wsj.com/politicalperceptions/2008/06/24/survey-on-religion-offers-good-news-for-democrats/

--
Gregory E. Rosalsky
Progressive Media USA
202-609-7691 (office)
707-484-3796 (cell)
GRosalsky@progressivemediausa.org
--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~
You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail ryan@campaigntodefendamerica.org with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.
-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "William Fontenot - Clean Water Action" <activist@cleanwater.org>
To: john.podesta@gmail.com
Date: 6/29/2010 6:41:43 PM
Subject: A Clean Energy Future Without Offshore Drilling

Clean Water Action logo with wave background

Offshore Drilling Should be Off the Table

Dear Mary,

A flawed energy policy affects us all

Brown pelicans covered in oil from the BP disaster in the Gulf of Mexico; photo courtesy International Bird Rescue Research Center

Make a donation today to help Clean Water Action fight for a clean energy future without offshore drilling!

GRAPHIC: Donate now button

Brown pelicans covered in oil from the BP disaster in the Gulf photo courtesy International Bird Rescue Research Center

As a resident of the Gulf Coast, I have seen - firsthand - the oil that has been washing up in the wetlands of coastal Louisiana for over a month. If the ocean currents and winds follow their normal patterns, between now and the end of the year, tar balls will be washing up on coastal beaches from Florida to Maine.

The BP oil drill spill disaster in the Gulf of Mexico is a horrible reminder of what can happen with energy policies that make oil company profits more important than water protection and community well-being.

Mary, we can - and must - act now to win new energy policies that put water protection first. Expanded offshore oil drilling is simply not worth the risk to our water, our health and our economic well-being.

The BP spill is devastating proof of the high cost that comes with our dependence on oil and other dirty energy sources. We will pay the price for Big Oil's reckless behavior for years to come: damaged health, ravaged coastal economies, destruction of entire ecosystems and the fish, birds and other animals and not just here in Louisiana.

Help Clean Water Action fight for a clean energy future today!

Energy technologies which degrade and deplete the nation's water resources must be phased out. Our energy needs can be met with clean energy that will not result in disasters like the oil spill here in the Gulf coast. By moving away from the old, dirty energy technologies and fuels of the past, we can curb global warming pollution, and create jobs and build strong local economies.

Last weekend, Clean Water Action staff and members in Florida, New Jersey, California, and other places around the country, participated in Hands Across The Sand, a national day of action to draw a literal line in the sand against off shore oil drilling in coastal waters.

Demonstrations like this make visible Clean Water Action's commitment to promoting smarter energy policies all across the U.S. and opposing dirty energy practices including new offshore drilling. As we have throughout our history, we will continue to oppose offshore drilling in Florida, California, New Jersey and Virginia, as well as natural gas drilling in Pennsylvania. In New England and elsewhere, Clean Water Action is a lead player in promoting energy efficiency and renewable energy programs.

But our clean energy campaign doesn't stop there. We are telling Congress the U.S. must curb global warming and usher in a clean energy future - but not with dirty, expensive and unsafe technologies, like coal and nuclear power or more offshore oil drilling.

With your on-going financial support, Mary, Clean Water Action can continue to push for smart energy choices. Together, we can win a new energy policy that protects drinking water and puts public health and natural resource protection first.

Yours for Clean Water,

William "Willie" Fontenot
Board Member
Baton Rouge, Louisiana

Willie served on the Clean Water Action Board from 1989 to 2007 and now currently serves on the Board of Clean Water Fund. During much of his professional career, Willie worked in the Louisiana Attorney General's office assisting grassroots groups across the state and region. Willie has close personal and professional ties to many of the communities, leaders and local organizations on the front lines of responding to the BP oil spill disaster.

Contact Us

National Office
1010 Vermont Ave NW,
Suite 1100
Washington, DC 20005-4918
202-895-0420

GRAPHIC: Contact Us button

You are receiving this message because you or someone using your e-mail address, john.podesta@gmail.com, gave us permission to send it. Not interested anymore? unsubscribe now .

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "The Common Good" <patriciaduff@thecommongood.net>
To: podesta@law.georgetown.edu
Date: 10/30/2015 4:02:33 PM
Subject: New News! (10/30/2015) de·moc·ra·cy di-ˈmä-krə-sē

noun - a system of government by the whole population or all the eligible members of a state, typically through elected representatives.

Week ending October 30, 2015

Weekly roundup about our democracy and The Common Good community

- Boots on the ground in Syria with a small US Special Ops deployment there
- International confab, including US, Russia, Saudi Arabia & Iran, seeks a political solution for Syria
- Paul Ryan in as Speaker of the House; Congress approves two year deal on the budget
- Post-debate - rising fortunes for Rubio and Cruz?
- Get an extra hour of sleep. Set your clocks back Halloween night!

Carson tops Trump: Carson 26, Trump 22, Rubio 8, Bush 7, Fiorina 7, Cruz 4, Huckabee 4, Paul 4, Kasich 4 CBS/NY Times Poll [More]

Deep GOP divide on issues from taxes to guns, drifting toward Ben Carson: According to the NYTimes and CBS News poll, "The churn in the field suggests more volatility" ahead. Jonathan Martin and Megan Thee-Brenan, New York Times [More]

Iowa up for Clinton: Mrs. Clinton was ahead of Mr. Sanders by 41% among likely caucus voters in a Monmouth University poll and by 38% in a Loras College survey. Patrick Healy, New York Times [More]

2016 Campaign

Post-CNBC debate Rubio, Cruz looking good: "Though the polls still show Donald Trump and Ben Carson on top, even before Wednesday night, it's become increasingly common for commentators to theorize that Cruz and Rubio are on the rise — and will end up being the two most formidable contenders for the nomination." Andrew Prokop , Vox [More]

Jeb Bush campaign in death spiral?: "[T]he defiant candidate tried to reassure panicked supporters he can get off the ground and dust himself off in the wake of his disastrous debate performance. 'It's not on life support,' the former Florida governor told reporters. 'The end is not near.' ...Matthew Dowd, (TCG Speaker) the chief strategist for George W.'s 2004 campaign: "Jeb has no reservoir of positive support." Philip Rucker, Dan Balz (TCG Speaker) and Ed O'Keefe, Washington Post [More]

New Republican frontline shaping up?: "[Paul] Ryan is the new House speaker and right now

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

[Marco] Rubio is the most likely presidential nominee. The shape of the presidential campaign is coming into focus…Of all the candidates, Rubio has done the most to harvest the work of Reform Conservatism, which has been sweeping through the think tank world. In a year in which many candidates are all marketing, Rubio is a balance of marketing and product. If Ryan and Rubio do emerge as the party's two leaders, it will be the wonkiest leadership team in our lifetime. That's a good thing." David Brooks, Op-Ed, New York Times [More]

Ted Cruz said he raised $1.1 million in the 24 hours after the debate. The campaign also said it has 77,000 volunteers on the ground, with 6,000 in the first four voting states. Katie Zazima, Washington Post [More]

RNC dumps NBC for primary debate: "After the partisan debacle that was CNBC's Wednesday night Republican presidential debate, Reince Priebus, Chairman of the Republican National Committee, fired off a letter to NBC News announcing that the left-wing network will be booted from participating in the upcoming February 26 debate in Houston, Texas." John Nolte, Breitbart News [More]

GOP campaigns plot revolt against RNC: "[C]ampaigns are planning to gather in Washington...to plot how to alter their party's messy debate process - and how to remove power from the hands of the [RNC]... [M]any of the campaigns told POLITICO that...It was time ... to begin discussing among themselves how the next debates should be structured and not leave it up to the RNC and television networks." Alex Isenstadt, Politico [More]

The Economy

Wages ought to go up as the economy improves, pushing inflation up - but it's not going to according to script: " Federal Reserve policy makers expect the job market will improve to the point where it starts pushing inflation higher. But there is no sign of this happening yet." Justin Lahart, Wall Street Journal [More]

US companies to post first decline in earnings and sales since the recession: "From railroads to manufacturers to energy producers, businesses say they are facing a protracted slowdown in production, sales and employment that will spill into next year...Analysts expect the index's companies to book a 2.8% decline in per-share earnings from last year's third quarter, according to Thomson Reuters. Sales are on pace to fall 4%—the third straight quarterly decline. The last time sales and profits fell in the same quarter was in the third period of 2009." Theo Francis and Kate Linebaugh, Wall Street Journal [More]

The risk of right-wing authoritarian European populism: "The recent victory of the conservative Law and Justice (PiS) party in Poland confirms a recent trend in Europe: the rise of illiberal state capitalism, led by populist right-wing authoritarians..[M]acro and structural economic policies that boost aggregate demand, job creation and growth, reduce income and wealth inequality, provide economic opportunity to the young, and integrate rather than reject refugees and economic migrants will be needed...Failure to act decisively now will lead to the eventual failure of the peaceful, integrated, globalized, supra-national state that is the EU, and the rise of dystopian nationalist regimes." Nouriel Roubini (TCG Speaker), Project Syndicate [More]

Clinton on Colbert: I would let the big banks fail: 'If you're president and the banks are failing, do we let them fail?' asked Colbert ... 'Yes, yes, yes, yes, yes, yes, yes,' Clinton said emphatically." Dan Merica, CNN [More]

Foreign Affairs/National Security

US backs off hardline on Syrian President's Future: "The Obama administration entered a crucial round of international talks on Syria's war prepared to accept a deal that leaves President Bashar al-Assad in place for several months or more during the transition to a new government. The U.S. shift on the dictator's future caps months of backtracking on the most significant obstacle to a resolution of the Syrian conflict. While U.S. officials once argued Mr. Assad couldn't take part in a political transition, they have gradually eased that stance, eventually signaling he wouldn't have to step down immediately.." Carol E. Lee (TCG Speaker) and Adam Entous, Wall Street Journal [More]

Iran invited to participate Middle East conference: (TCG Speaker) Secretary of State John Kerry's biggest challenge is to try to make peace between Saudi Arabia and Iran, rivals who are using

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Syria as a proxy war for Mideast dominance: "The inclusion of Iran in the talks represented the first time that the United States has chosen to formally engage the Iranians diplomatically on the Syria issue. It also came a little more than three months after Iran signed a historic nuclear accord with the United States and other powers that promised to end Iran's economic isolation in return for limits on its nuclear enrichment, suggesting an effort to broaden the discussion beyond that successful negotiation." Thomas Erdbrink, Sewell Chan, and David E. Sanger, New York Times [More]

American Mideast allies leaning more toward Russia: "Prince Turki al-Faisal, Saudi Arabia's former ambassador to Washington and former intelligence chief, said as much Friday at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington. There he gave President Vladimir Putin credit for outmaneuvering the U.S. and said Russia was now in a position to demand attention and respect." Josh Rogin and Eli Lake, Bloomberg [More]

China ends one-child policy: "From now on, Chinese couples will be allowed to have two kids. Chinese authorities are 'actively taking steps to counter the aging of the population', a massive problem for China. The UN projects that the share of the Chinese population over 60 is increasing at...the [fastest rate] in the world." Zack Beauchamp, Vox [More]

China naval chief says minor incident could spark war in South China Sea: "China's naval commander told his U.S. counterpart that a minor incident could spark war in the South China Sea if the United States did not stop its "provocative acts" in the disputed waterway, the Chinese navy said on Friday...China has rebuked Washington over the patrol, the most significant U.S. challenge yet to territorial limits China effectively claims around its seven artificial islands in one of the world's busiest sea lanes." Ben Blanchard and Andrea Shalal, Reuters [More]

Domestic Affairs

Senate approves two-year bipartisan budget agreement: "The Senate voted to approve a two-year budget deal that would increase spending limits and avert a damaging default, essentially ending the budgetary battles that have defined President Obama's relationship with Congress in recent years. The legislation passed by a vote of 64-35 after overcoming objections from conservative senators, including presidential candidates Rand Paul (R-Ky.) and Ted Cruz (R-Texas), that forced a rare series of votes at 1 a.m. Obama has until Nov. 3 to sign the agreement before the debt-limit deadline set by the Treasury Department." Kelsey Snell, Washington Post [More]

Ryan takes gavel with focus on overhauling taxes: The House elected Republican Rep. Paul Ryan as its speaker, catapulting one of its youngest members to the top job in hopes that a policy-oriented fiscal conservative could give the party a fresh start after years of strife." John D. McKinnon and Siobhan Hughes, Wall Street Journal [More]

SC police deputy fired for his rough handling of teenager girl: "Deputy Ben Fields went too far when he picked up the 16-year-old and hurtled her across a classroom before arresting her, Richland County Sheriff Leon Lott told a news conference..A civil rights probe by the Federal Bureau of Investigation and Justice Department into the arrest is under way and the state law enforcement division also is investigating." Harriet McLeod, Reuters [More]

US Student national exam scores plummet: "Fourth-graders and eighth-graders across the United States lost ground on national mathematics tests this year, the first declines in scores since the federal government began administering the exams in 1990. ... Eighth-grade [reading] scores dropped ... fourth-grade performance was stagnant." Emma Brown, Washington Post [More]

ObamaCare not signing up enough enrollees: "Recruitment for 2015 is roughly 70% of the original projection, but ObamaCare will be running at less than half its goal in 2016. HHS believes some 19 million Americans earn too much for Medicaid but qualify for ObamaCare subsidies and haven't signed up...for every person who's allowed to join and has, two people haven't." Editorial, Wall Street Journal [More]

Books & Film

Book: My Life on the Road: (TCG Speaker) Gloria Steinem's new book "abounds with fresh insights and is as populist as can be... One minute Steinem is writing about stewardesses on the shuttle, the next on women who taught Gandhi. Now she's railing against Betty Friedan, whose focus on white middle-class feminism Steinem argues damaged the movement." Rachel Shteir. Boston Globe [More]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Films worth seeing: Trumbo depicts the human toll on Hollywood's many writers, directors and actors blacklisted for their political beliefs following hearings before the US House Committee on UnAmerican Activities, with Bryan Cranston as Dalton Trumbo, one of the Hollywood Ten who wrote a number of Oscar-winning films (Roman Holiday, Spartacus) and Helen Mirren as the town accuser-in-chief, Hedda Hopper. Famous stars, studio chiefs and writers of the era are by turns heroes or knaves during this Cold War story of character and courage.

Suffragette , starring Meryl Streep and Carey Mulligan, "tracks the story of the foot soldiers of the early feminist movement, women who were forced underground to pursue a dangerous game of cat and mouse with an increasingly brutal State...Radicalized and turning to violence as the only route to change, they were willing to lose everything in their fight for equality."

UPCOMING EVENTS:

Jason Kander, Missouri Secretary of State

Tuesday, November 3, 2015

Remarks: 3:00-4:00pm

RSVP

Congressman Joseph P. Kennedy III

Monday, November 9, 2015

Lunch & remarks: 12:00-1:30pm

Executive Members only.

Limited seating available. Please register by Monday, November 2nd, 2015.

RSVP

Ambassador Melanne Verveer

Empowering Half the World

Wednesday, December 9, 2015

Reception & remarks: 6:15-7:45pm; Dinner & conversation: 8:00-9:30pm

RSVP

The Rt. Honorable David Miliband

Fallout: Ramifications of the Great Refugee Crisis

Wednesday, January 27, 2016

Reception & remarks: 6:15-7:45pm; Dinner & conversation: 8:00-9:30pm

RSVP

Thank you TCG Digest contributors: TCG Staff: Isabelle Lehner, Isaac Getlan, and our interns, Tracey Pennito, Justin Vacura, and Samar Nadi.

Visit our website www.thecommongoodusa.org, Facebook, and our Twitter @TheCommonGood. JOIN IN by sending us your ideas, news, and reactions to admin@thecommongood.net .

###

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Congressman Joseph P. Kennedy III

Monday, November 9, 2015

Lunch & remarks: 12:00-1:30pm
Executive Members only.

RSVP

Ambassador Melanne Verveer

Wednesday, December 9, 2015

Reception & remarks: 6:15-7:45pm; Dinner & conversation: 8:00-9:30pm

RSVP

The Rt. Honorable David Miliband

Wednesday, January 27, 2016

Reception & remarks: 6:15-7:45pm; Dinner & conversation: 8:00-9:30pm

RSVP

Thank you TCG Digest contributors: TCG Staff: Isabelle Lehner, Isaac Getlan and our interns Samar Nadi, Tracey Pennito and Justin Vacura.

Visit our website www.thecommongoodusa.org, Facebook, and our Twitter @TheCommonGood. JOIN IN by sending us your ideas, news, and reactions to admin@thecommongood.net.

###

This email was sent to podesta@law.georgetown.edu
why did I get this? unsubscribe from this list update subscription preferences
The Common Good · 115 East 57th St · Suite 1010 · New York, NY 10022 · USA

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Mills, Cheryl D" <MillsCD@state.gov>
To: Doug@presidentclinton.com john.podesta@gmail.com
Date: 8/4/2009 5:11:22 PM
Subject: FW: background briefing on north korea, internal transcript

Can't recall if I sent.

From: Vietor, Thomas F. [mailto:Thomas_F._Vietor@who.eop.gov]
Sent: Tuesday, August 04, 2009 11:57 PM
To: Mills, Cheryl D; Abedin, Huma; Reines, Philippe I
Subject: FW: background briefing on north korea, internal transcript

This is the backgrounder we just did

From: Eckert, Ellen E.
Sent: Tuesday, August 04, 2009 11:55 PM
Subject: background briefing on north korea, internal transcript

THE WHITE HOUSE

Office of the Press Secretary

Internal Transcript August 4, 2009

PRESS BACKGROUND BRIEFING ON NORTH KOREA
BY SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL

Via Conference Call

10:45 P.M. EDT

MR. McDONOUGH: Hey, everybody. Thank you very much for waiting for us, and apologies for making you wait. We do appreciate very much the opportunity to get on the phone here and just talk you through a little bit of what's transpired over the last couple days.

I do think it's worth noting that earlier tonight, between 8:30 p.m. and 9:00 p.m. eastern time, the President did call family members of both Euna Lee and Laura Ling to express his relief that their families will be reunited here shortly.

I'm going to turn it over to one of my colleagues -- senior administration official colleagues here to talk through several important data points as it relates to the last several days and then we'll open it up to your questions, mindful of the fact that it's late in the night here and everybody wants to get some rest. I'd just remind everybody that this call is on background and let me turn it over to my senior administration official colleague.

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL: Good evening and thanks for joining us.

I want to not just go back a couple of days, but go back a few months here to give some context to the events of today in Pyongyang. Today's events reflect an awful lot of work over a couple of months on behalf of two United States citizens who were detained in North Korea and also the very fine work of President Clinton and his team in North Korea today.

As I think most of you know, on March 17, 2009, North Korea border guards seized and detained two American journalists, Laura Ling and Euna Lee, while they were filming for former Vice President Al Gore's Current TV along the China-North Korean border. Since their being detained the President and Secretary of State directed that we in the administration take every appropriate step to look out for the safety of these Americans and expedite their release.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

On June 8, 2009, Laura Ling and Euna Lee were convicted on charges brought by the North Koreans and were sentenced to 12 years of hard labor in a labor camp. As the State Department has briefed -- and the set-up here, as you know, we don't have relations, formal diplomatic relations with the North Koreans, so that we have in Pyongyang what's called a protective power, a protecting power, and it's the Swedish government.

The Swedish ambassador in Pyongyang, acting on our behalf, provided consular services and got mail and medicine to the two women. At our request Sweden also pressed very hard to ensure their safety and good treatment, and were very appreciative of that good work by the Swedes, especially Ambassador Mats Foyer in Pyongyang.

Through the Swedish ambassador and other channels, as I said, we repeatedly pressed the North Koreans to agree to the quickest posture release of the two journalists and the guarantee of their well-being in the meantime. During this time we in the State Department maintained very close contact with the families of the two journalists, talking to them daily, briefing them on efforts each week. And as you know, Secretary Clinton met with the families in person in May.

In response to our many requests, the North Korean authorities at a point during the spring began allowing Ms. Ling and Ms. Lee to call their families periodically, and family members, they shared their readouts of these calls with us. Often Ms. Ling and Ms. Lee reported what the North Korean officials were telling them.

In mid-July, during one such phone call, Ms. Ling and Ms. Lee shared what the North Koreans had told them -- that they would be willing to grant them amnesty and release the two Americans if an envoy in the person of President Clinton would agree to come to Pyongyang and seek their release.

This, as I said, was reported by family members to us, and to Ms. Ling and Ms. Lee's employer, former Vice President Al Gore. Both the families of former [Vice] President Gore asked us in the United States government to assist in seeing if President Clinton could go on a humanitarian mission, and if he did, whether such a trip would be successful in securing the release of Ms. Ling and Ms. Lee.

The National Security Advisor and our team here did quite a bit of due diligence on this issue through a variety of channels and a variety of means to seek a judgment -- to make a judgment as to whether or not if in fact President Clinton did go to Pyongyang, that he would be able to successfully secure the release of our two American journalists there. As I said, we did a lot of due diligence on this through a variety of channels, and worked this issue very hard.

During the weekend of the 24-25 of July, the National Security Advisor spoke with President Clinton about his willingness to take on this mission and as we indicated, Vice President Gore, on behalf of the families, had already been in touch with President Clinton about this.

So the families and Vice President Gore made their appeal to Bill Clinton to go to Pyongyang. We spoke to him over that weekend. President Clinton indicated that he would be willing to undertake this mission as a private, humanitarian mission if there were a reasonable chance of getting Ms. Ling and Ms. Lee released. We continued to do our due diligence on this issue. We considered the request carefully. We tested directly with the North Koreans repeatedly. We sought and received North Korea's agreement in fact that a visit by President Clinton would secure the release of Ms. Ling and Ms. Lee.

During the course of these discussions, it was insisted that the North Koreans acknowledge, as former President Clinton's visit was not any part of a negotiation, it was not in any way connected to the nuclear issue or other issues that we have a government-to-government basis with the DPRK, including their noncompliance with international obligations and behaviors that have been the subject of Security Council resolutions and statements and actions by our government and other governments in the international community.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The North Koreans confirmed to us directly that they accepted his visit in a private capacity that exclusively focused on the humanitarian purpose of releasing the two Americans. On this basis, President Clinton proceeded to make the logistical arrangements to go to North Korea to seek the -- secure their release.

In advance of departure, President Clinton did talk directly with the families and with Vice President Gore, where they repeated his request that he make this trip.

I should also point out that we in the administration, prior to President Clinton making the trip, consulted directly with allies to ensure that they understood what the trip was about and what it wasn't about. Consistent with the humanitarian nature of the trip, we offered President Clinton's good (inaudible) in pressing North Korea on humanitarian concerns of other countries, including South Korean citizens and abducted Japanese citizens.

In advance of the departure, we also conferred with China and Russia and our other partners in the six-party talks to make sure, again, as I said, that they fully understood what the trip was and what it wasn't; that they fully understood specifically the unofficial, humanitarian character of the trip.

As you all know by now, President Clinton and his party have left North Korea. They're on their back to the United States. We've been in touch with them. We can report that the two journalists are enormously relieved and in seemingly very good health.

And with that, Denis, I'd be glad to answer any questions as to what we know about this and what we can tell folks about our efforts to date.

Q Yes, when you say that you tested the idea with the North Koreans repeatedly, do you mean there were direct talks between the U.S. and North Korea or was that also conducted through an intermediary?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL: I don't want to get into the details of how this has gone. I can tell you, though, that after the two journalists in conversations with their family members indicated that North Korean officials had told them that if President Clinton visited as an envoy on a private mission that they would be released, that we, through a variety of means, tested that proposition and to our satisfaction were convinced that in fact the North Koreans would, in response to President Clinton visiting Pyongyang would release the journalists. I don't want to get into the details of exactly how we communicated, the back and forth.

I can tell you though that we became convinced through our contacts that in fact this would be the result, and it was based don that that we could advise President Clinton that his trip was likely to be successful.

Q Thank you very much. I just really wanted to take a step back and look at policy overall to North Korea. How is it possible to maintain that North Korea is deepening its isolation as a result of the nuclear program when you just had this very high-level, albeit private, visit by a former President of the United States? I know that you're insisting that these are two wholly separate tracks, but doesn't it at least complicate your message that North Korea is isolating itself still further?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL: We, in undertaking this project -- and I will tell you and we can tell you after talking to our colleagues who were in Pyongyang over the last day, can tell you that we made clear in every communication we had with the North Koreans, and President Clinton made clear in all his conversations, that this was a purely private humanitarian mission aimed solely at the release of the two American journalists -- and that in fact was completely separate from issues between North Korea and the international community. It was made crystal clear, the separation here. That's point one.

Point two is that the United States and its international partners continue to pursue aggressively the goal of a verifiable denuclearized Korean Peninsula. The United States -- and as you've seen over recent weeks, having secured a new Security Council Resolution, 1874, fully intends and has to successfully implement that resolution. You've seen a number of instances -- a couple of instances of that in recent weeks and we'll continue to implement that resolution vigorously.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

I have to tell you, as Secretary Clinton said after her trip to the ASEAN meeting last week, that I don't know of a time when the Koreans have been more isolated. I don't know of a time when there's been such cooperation among the international community with respect to actual implementation -- not just adoption, but implementation of an important and tough U.N. resolution. And we will continue on that path.

So I -- you know, it's just the facts. It's in the performance. So it was both in the communications with North Korea about what this was and what this wasn't, and we had one goal in mind, which was in the U.S. interest, which was to seek to release of these two Americans. That's what it was, and we've been very clear about what it wasn't. It in no way indicates -- and we've been -- that's why I also wanted to underscore the consultations that we had with allies before the mission to make sure we were absolutely clear here as to what it was and what it wasn't. And it wasn't in any way about our disagreements with the DPRK with respect to its conduct or with respect to our intention to vigorously enforce the resolution and to vigorously seek the denuclearization of the Korean Peninsula.

Q If I could follow up on that --

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL: Sure, of course, go ahead, sorry.

Q The other argument, of course, is that -- is there any possibility that at a time when North Korea has indicated it may be willing to get back to some kind of talks with the U.S., that this might create a certain positive momentum by cooling tensions? Is there any overlap in that sense?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL: Yes, we have indicated quite clearly, in coordination with our partners in the six-party talks, that the Koreans have two paths to consider here. They can consider the path of provocative behavior, continuing to pursue their nuclear program, and they will face deepening isolation. There's another path, which is they actually implement irreversibly the steps that they've agreed to implement to date, and that they can come back into talks. But the two paths are quite clear here, and we feel that those paths remain in front of them.

So, you know, to answer to your question directly, that's up to the North Koreans, as it has been. Provocative behavior, continued pursuit of the nuclear program, continued violation of U.N. Security Council resolutions will result in their facing the kind of unified international community isolation that they're facing at this moment. A path that says that they re-embrace the irreversible denuclearization of the North Korean Peninsula, and engage in a way that indicates the irreversible taking of the steps that they've agreed to take in 2005 and beyond would put it on a different path. That's our firm view going forward here, and it's up to them.

Q Thank you.

Q Hi, there. I won't use your name, but nice to talk to you. Can you tell us about the conversations between former President Clinton and Kim Jong-il? I mean, to what degree did they discuss the nuclear program? Who brought it up first? What can you tell us?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL: Margaret, I can't -- you know, we don't have a detailed readout on exactly what happened. I can give you a couple of things here, though.

Number one, of course the principle discussion was around seeking the release of the journalists. Point one.

Point two, I can give you a couple of details which we've learned in our conversation with the folks on the airplane before getting on the phone with you all; that President Clinton and his team did engage in an hour-and-fifteen-minute meeting with President Kim Jong-il this -- I guess yesterday afternoon, right, and then had a dinner which lasted a little over two hours. So the total amount of time that they were speaking -- or in meetings or in dinners with each other was about a little over three hours and 15 minutes. And I don't have a readout on the particulars of what was discussed at this point.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Q Was the nuclear issue at least discussed?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL: I don't know the answer to that question, you know. President Clinton -- I'm sure he gave him -- I'm sure President Clinton gave President Kim his views on denuclearization, and his views are well known with respect to denuclearization.

And President Clinton, as you know, Margaret, has a history here of both being quite tough, where we went through some very serious episodes with the North Koreans, as you know when you covered in the 1990s, but also entered into agreements and with President Kim's father.

And President Clinton's view on denuclearization and on the question of whether or not pursuit of nuclear weapons will make the North Koreans safer or -- more safe or less safe are well known. But again I'd be speculating at this point, given the short conversations we've had with them to go beyond that.

But I can tell you this, though, one other thing that one of my colleagues just reminded me of here, is that in addition to discussing, Margaret, the U.S. journalists, he also discussed and we know pressed very hard -- and we heard this from our debrief, our short debrief from the plane -- he did press very hard on the positive things that could flow from the release of the South Korean detainees and entering into talks and to really -- seeking the release of Japanese abductees. So I can tell you with confidence that both those issues were raised.

Q Good evening, gentlemen. Let me ask this. In this sequence of events did President Obama speak either directly to former President Clinton or Vice President Gore as this process moved along? And for a while there was this sort of public spat between the North Korean government and Secretary of State Clinton about her characterization of North Korea's isolation and it I guess is maybe consistent with North Korea's own behavior, but it just seems interesting that that kind of spat would be going on while it appears, based on your timeline, that these other very significant conversations were going on in back channels about the release of these two journalists. Can you address both of those issues?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL: I can, Major. With respect to conversations that President Obama has had, former Vice President Gore has been directly, vigorously, and constantly involved in trying to seek the release of his colleagues at Current TV. And Vice President Gore has been, as I said, pretty tireless in this effort, and I think if you talk to the families of the two journalists they'll tell you that. And that includes being in touch quite frequently with members of the United States government -- and I do believe he did have at least one conversation with President Obama. Point one.

Point two on your question is that President Obama has not spoken to President Clinton about this mission or about this issue. President Clinton has had, as you would expect, conversations with members of the national security team and in preparation -- well, two things: One, in determining the bona fides of the offer -- that is, whether or not we could assure him that if he undertook this visit, as I said earlier, that in fact it would succeed, and we did tremendous amount of due diligence on that, and we did talk to him obviously about that.

And secondly, prior to his trip, he was -- as we would do with any other prominent American undertaking such a trip, we did sit down with him on two occasions, the last one being last Saturday at his residence in Washington --

Q Would these be face to face?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL: Yes, absolutely. There were telephone conversations, but there were at least two face-to-face briefings, Major. One on the issue, as I said, of the bona fides of the offer, but the second, as we would do with any prominent American or any American who undertook such a trip, we did last Saturday. He did sit down with members of the interagency team and experts on the Korean issue to receive a briefing on the issues and on the current circumstance in Korea. And that's, as I said, that last briefing took place at his residence in Washington, D.C., last Saturday.

Q Last Saturday?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL: Yes.

Q And on the spat?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL: Remind me of the spat?

Q Oh, the -- you'll remember, there was this kind of dialogue, official commentary from the North Koreans comparing the Secretary of State to a child or a young girl or a schoolgirl or something like that, and it just seems odd that that kind of highly undiplomatic language was going on at the same time it appears, based on your timeline, that very high-level and intense back-channel diplomacy was going on about the two journalists.

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL: Yes, both those things were going on at the same time. That's just a fact.

Q Anything unusual or striking about that in your mind?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL: No, I just think, as I said earlier to the question from the Financial Times, that we are engaged in an effort, worked with the international community, with respect to the North Korean nuclear program and other issues. And those efforts are important and they continue. But we also had an effort underway to -- as we had from March of 2009 -- an effort underway to seek the release of American citizens, which we consider to be one of our obligations. And as you know, we take that really seriously here.

Q Very good, thank you.

MR. McDONOUGH: Why don't we take one more?

Q Hi. Can you just clear up whether there was an apology or sign of contrition from former President Clinton towards the North Koreans as the official media has reported? And how much of a sort of bounty do you expect to receive in terms of the kind of intelligence the former President was able to gather about the state of Kim Jong-il's health, possible succession moves, and what's going on inside North Korea?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL: With respect to the first question, the answer is no. With respect to the second, I'm not going to comment on that.

MR. McDONOUGH: All right, everybody. Sure appreciate you getting on the phone with us here and I'm sure we'll be in touch on this and other issues. But let me just reiterate here in closing that this is a briefing on background and we sure appreciate you're taking the time to be with us.

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL: Thanks for your patience, everybody, and I apologize for being so late.

END 11:10 P.M. EDT

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: jpalmieri@hillaryclinton.com
To: "John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
Date: 4/29/2015 4:47:27 AM
Subject: Fwd: It's out there

Fyi

Sent from my iPhone

Begin forwarded message:

From: Tony Carrk <tcarrk@hillaryclinton.com >
Date: April 29, 2015 at 11:25:34 AM EDT
To: Jennifer Palmieri <jpalmieri@hillaryclinton.com >, Brian Fallon <bfallon@hillaryclinton.com > Subject: It's out there http://dailycaller.com/2015/04/29/firm-co-founded-by-hillarys-campaign-chair-lobbies-for-russias-uranium-one/

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Mike Palamuso" <mike_palamuso@lcv.org>
To: bigcampaign@googlegroups.com
Date: 9/7/2010 6:05:48 AM
Subject: [big campaign] Memo: Flat Earthers

TO: Interested Media

FROM: Gene Karpinski, League of Conservation Voters President

RE: Republican Senate Candidates: Global Warming Deniers

DATE: 9/7/10

The failure of the U.S. Senate to act on a comprehensive climate change and clean energy bill before the August recess makes it highly unlikely that such legislation will pass this year – which only serves to underscore the importance of the make-up of the U.S. Senate following this November's midterm elections.

Unfortunately, a disturbing trend has emerged this year among the Republican Senate candidates running as challengers or in open seat races: a refusal to accept the sound and settled science that man-made carbon pollution is causing the planet to warm. Simply put, these candidates are full-fledged global warming deniers. If they win, the number of card-carrying members of this "Flat Earth Society" will rise exponentially in the world's greatest deliberative body.

To be clear, despite an orchestrated misinformation campaign – funded in large part by the oil industry and other corporate polluters – independent scientific bodies across the world have found that climate change is unequivocal and driven largely by human activities, primarily the burning of fossil fuels and the clearing of forests. Worse yet, the impacts are occurring far faster than the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change projected in its comprehensive 2007 report. Arctic sea ice is melting faster than anticipated. We just witnessed the hottest decade, hottest year, and hottest 6 months in the history of recorded temperature. The devastating floods in Pakistan and the forest fires in Russia are yet the latest reminders of the deadly impact of a warming world.

Yet most of the Republican candidates looking to join the U.S. Senate have taken positions on climate change that are decidedly outside of the mainstream. A few samplings are included below:

Wisconsin: Ron Johnson

"I absolutely do not believe that the science of man-caused climate change is proven. Not by any stretch of the imagination. I think it's far more likely that it's just sunspot activity, or something just in the geologic eons of time where we have changes in the climate."

(8/19/10), http://www.jsonline.com/multimedia/video/?bcpid=13960334001&bctid=590004292001

New Hampshire: All Republican Senate Candidates

It was symbolic when the six Republican candidates for U.S. Senate stood up together side-by-side during a debate Wednesday. It resembled their positions on major issues. … All said man-made global warming hasn't been proven.

8/18/10, http://www.fosters.com/apps/pbcs.dll/article?AID=/20100819/GJNEWS_01/708199891/-1/FOSNEWS

Alaska: Joe Miller

"We haven't heard there's man-made global warming."

8/10, http://newsminer.com/view/full_story/9239938/article-Joe-Miller-on-the-issues

Pennsylvania: Pat Toomey

"There is much debate in the scientific community as to the precise sources of global warming."

6/14/10, http://www.post-gazette.com/pg/10165/1065472-84.stm

Nevada: Sharon Angle

"I don't, however, buy into the whole ... man-caused global warming, man-caused climate change mantra of the left. I believe that there's not sound science to back that up."

5/26/10, http://www.nytimes.com/cwire/2010/05/26/26climatewire-reid-in-fistfight-could-take-more-punches-fr-84354.html

California: Carly Fiorina

(Asked "Is climate change real?") "I'm not sure. I think we should have the confidence and courage to test the science."

3/18/10, http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=YH8ig-lSk30

Colorado: Ken Buck

"I'll tell you, I have looked at global warming, now climate change, from both sides. While I think the earth is warming,

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

I don't think that man-made causes are the primary factor." Buck said. "I am one of those people that Al Gore refers to as a skeptic."

3/10, http://vimeo.com/10208210 (~24:00)

Florida: Marco Rubio

"I don't think there's the scientific evidence to justify [climate change]."

2/13/10, http://www2.tbo.com/content/2010/feb/13/na-rubio-questions-climate-change/

Kentucky: Rand Paul

"…[climate change] may or may not be true, but they're making up their facts to fit their conclusions."

2/10, http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=cmqozUC4VWk (~3:00)

Missouri: Roy Blunt

"There isn't any real science to say we are altering the climate path of the earth."

4/29/09, http://www.humanevents.com/article.php?id=31656

We hope you choose to write about this issue in the sixty days remaining before the elections.

# #

Contact:
Kate Geller
Press Secretary, League of Conservation Voters
202-785-8683
Kate_geller@lcv.org

--
You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail dubois.sara@gmail.com with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Ryan Duncan" <ryan@progressiveaccountability.org>
To: "Big Campaign" <bigcampaign@googlegroups.com>
Date: 8/12/2008 4:24:25 AM
Subject: [big campaign] Media Monitoring Report - Morning 08/12/08

Main Topics: Foreign Policy, Response to Russia/Georgia Conflict, Hard Line Against Putin, Rove Response to McCain Lobbyists

Summary: McCain continues to play up conflict in Georgia, with a hard line stance on Russia. Leaks reveal Hillary's campaign downfall was characterized by divisions within her top campaign associates, as well as a recommendation by her chief campaign adviser to focus un the "un-American-ess" off Barack Obama. Vice presidential speculation continues to run rampant.

Morning news was dominated by Olympic coverage. Russia reported a ceasefire in Georgia amidst Georgian claims that attacks continue. The price of oil is at a 3-month low at $113 a barrel, as the U.S. dollar is gaining value. North Vietnam is still plagued with flooding and landslides from recent tropical storms, and a road side bomb in Afghanistan killed at least 14 people. In the U.S., a West Palm Beach video reveals a man being abused by local police, and the Rockefeller impersonator mystery has been solved.

Highlights:
1. CNN: As McCain Attempts to Push His Foreign Policy Experience In Wake of Russia/Georgia Conflict, He Flubs Georgia's President Name
2. FNC: Pawlenty Approves of McCain's Hard Line on Russia and Sites His Foreign Policy Experience
3. FNC: McCain's Early Hard Line Against Russia/Putin Highlighted on Fox and Friends
4. FNC: Rove Plays Down Importance of McCain Lobbyists, Rick Davis, and DHL Scandal

Highlights No Clip:
1. WHTM (ABC) - Harrisburg, PA: "It's hard trying to do the lord's work in the city of Satan. But the fact is its' a lot harder now. It's a lot harder now because people aren't putting their country first. They're putting the party first. We want them to put their country first."

Clips:
Highlight #1
As McCain Attempts to Push His Foreign Policy Experience In Wake of Russia/Georgia Conflict, He Flubs Georgia's President Name (CNN 08/12/08 6:49am)
KIRAN CHETNY: That deadly conflict that unfolded yesterday, John McCain saw an opening. […]

ED HENRY: […] With Russian tanks running deeper and deeper into Georgia, John McCain is trying to seize upon the issue to show he's better prepared to be commander and chief. Appearing in Pennsylvania with Tom Ridge, the former homeland security secretary, John McCain tried to showcase his own foreign policy credentials.

MCCAIN: The United States and our allies should continue efforts to bring a resolution before the United Nations Security Council, condemning Russian aggression.

HENRY: With Barack Obama vacationing in Hawaii, McCain has the stage to himself to try to show he has the experience to handle a crisis, and claim he was ahead of the curve months ago when he started denouncing Russian leader Vladimir Putin anti-democratic muse.

MCCAIN: We must remind Russia's leaders that the benefits they enjoy from being part of the civilized world require their respect for the values, stability, and peace of the world.

HENRY: […] McCain's offensive harkens back to the 3am ad Hillary Clinton ran in the democratic primaries to suggest Obama was not up to the job.

[3am ad shown]

HENRY: The ad didn't work for Clinton, but the McCain camp thinks the issue may resonate more in the general election with independent voters concerned about security. Though McCain's claim to have a handle on national security could be slightly undermined by mispronouncing the name of Georgian President Mikheil Saakashvili three times. […] An ABC News/Washington Post poll found last month that when asked who they trust more to handle an unforeseen crisis, 50 percent said McCain, 41 percent said Obama. A 9 point edge for the Republican, but not necessarily as big as one might expect. For example, when asked who they trust to handle the economy, 54 percent said Obama, 35 percent said McCain. A 19 point edge for the Democrat.

Highlight #2
Pawlenty Approves of McCain's Hard Line on Russia and Sites His Foreign Policy Experience (FNC 08/12/08 7:20am)
BRIAN KILMEADE: […] Will Senator McCain's hard line stance on foreign policy carry over to the White House if he gets elected in November? […] So far Senator McCain has said that he thinks the objectives of the Russian's is regime change in Georgia. Do you think that he's been on target so far?

TIM PAWLENTY: Well one of the advantages of having experience in military and national security matters is you get the wisdom that comes with it, as he correctly called the need for a change in strategy in Iraq with the surge. I think he's correctly calling this situation. He said when he looked in the eyes of Vladimir Putin he saw a K, a G, and a B. I think he senses correctly that Russia still has an aggressive posture in terms of its foreign policy. And this could be, very well, an example of that. So Senator McCain's response, an aggressive response as it relates to the U.N., as it relates to NATO, as it relates to sending the Secretary of State to Europe, I think are the right steps and it reflects his wisdom and experience in dealing, not just with this region, but dealing with the people involved. And I think that's a big benefit to him.

Highlight #3
McCain's Early Hard Line Against Russia/Putin Highlighted on Fox and Friends (FNC 08/12/08 6:36am)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

[…]
BRIAN KILMEADE: You know, a month ago John McCain came out and said, you know, I don't buy, I think Russia is still a threat, in fact, I'd kick them out of this group of 8. And everybody thought, woah, Senator McCain calm down. Where's this coming from? Now you know exactly where he's coming from. He says and he's been buddies with the now current President of Georgia since he was a student over in America. Now that he became President, they're in constant contact. And he says they are looking to throw this guy out because he's for democracy and freedom and they don't want that in the door step. So now all of a sudden, in terms of what we can actually do to Russia, people are saying we could kick them out of the group of eight. John McCain said that a month ago!

[…]

KILMEADE: With yet, also, John McCain at the same time said I looked into the eyes of Vladimir Putin's eyes and I see K.G.B. And that's exactly what he is!

Highlight #4
Rove Plays Down Importance of McCain Lobbyists, Rick Davis, and DHL Scandal (FNC 08/11/08 9:17pm)
[…]
SEAN HANNITY: I want to get back to the issue of lobbyists, because I know this keep coming up in the campaign. John McCain wanted to do a campaign financer for him. I mentioned his lobbyist on Georgia. He's got Randy Ulshuler, founder of Office Tiger, that gets companies to go and do business overseas, like in India. You've got Rick Davis, a lobbyist for DHL, who made a deal with Airborne express to bring DHL into Ohio… lost 282 jobs. This has gotta hurt John McCain in a general election.

KARL ROVE: Well, first of all, Rick Davis, I'm not holding a brief for lobbyists. If I ever get to be a lobbyist, you know, do something to me. […] Rick Davis' job was to encourage a merger between a U.S. company and a German company and an expansion of their facility inside the United States. The issue inside Ohio is that they expanded the facility and now their thinking of closing the facility… I don't know if I see it as outsourcing jobs. But look, there are people on both sides of the campaign, on both parties who are lobbyists. That's the way a lot of politics happens. I wish it were different, but it is the way it is. I wouldn't get in there and start throwing mud at McCain over lobby associations without then realizing what kind of lobby associations there are among democrats, particularly congressional democrats. … Senator Harry Reid's own son is a lobbyist.
[…]

--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~

You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail ryan@campaigntodefendamerica.org with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.
-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Evan Whitbeck" <evan@progressiveaccountability.org>
To: bigcampaign@googlegroups.com
Date: 7/15/2008 3:43:01 PM
Subject: [big campaign] Media Monitoring Report - Evening 07/15/08

Main Topics: Economy, Foreign Policy, Afghanistan and Iraq, Drilling

Summary of Shift: On the domestic front the economy continues to be the top concern; President Bush spoke today, trying to assuage American's fears as Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac still teeter. Meanwhile, General Motors, facing tough prospects, cuts thousands of jobs. In foreign affairs, Afghanistan, with its increasing violence, took over for Iraq. The candidates sparred over the correct course of action and Afghanistan was used as a springboard to the debate over the efficacy of the surge and withdrawal timetables in Iraq. Lawyers for a detainee released Guantanamo interrogation tapes and new studies show that our children, poor or not, are getting fatter.

Highlights

1) Bush's economy speech
   a. CNN: Bush continues to push that the economy is doing well
   b. CNN: Bush talks government bailouts, gas prices, oil exploration and Obama's trip to Iraq
   c. CNN: Bush says we are already "surging" and have "surged" in Afghanistan
   d. CNN: Bush: "I'm not an economist . . . I'm an optimist . . . I am 62. I'm having trouble remembering a lot of things
2) Foreign policy
   a. CNN: Begala calls out Fiorina for working with Ahmadinejad, Iran
   b. CNN: Dana Bash investigates McCain's claim that "I know how to win wars"
   c. MSNBC: The surge's efficacy debated, McCain is no Eisenhower
   d. MSNBC: McCain's Czechoslovakia mistake on Hardball
   e. ABC: New polls show McCain with foreign policy advantage, Obama winning on economy
   f. MSNBC: Matthews brings up McCain's "Bomb-Iran" joke during discussion on Iran policy
3) CNN: Investigation of Cindy as John's "Meal Ticket" and the impact of Busch deal on McCain's fortune and campaign
4) MSNBC: McCain stresses his closeness to Bush in clips from 2003 to the present
5) CNN: Rep. Boehner distances himself and Republicans from McCain's energy policies
6) FNC: High gas prices help McCain on drilling

Clips

Highlight #1

Bush Continues To Push That the Economy Is Doing Well (CNN, 07/15/08, 10:23am)

GEORGE BUSH: Our citizens are rightly concerned about the difficulties in the housing markets and high gasoline prices and the failure of the democratic congress to address these and other pressing issues. Yet, despite the challenges we face, our economy has demonstrated remarkable resilience. While the unemployment rate has risen, it remains at 5.5 percent, which is still low by historical standards. And the economy continued to grow in the first quarter of this year. The growth is slower than we would have liked, but it was growth nonetheless. We saw the signs of a slowdown early and enacted a bipartisan economic stimulus package. We have now delivered more than $91 billion in tax relief to more than more than 112 million American households this year. It's going to take some time before we feel the full benefit of the economic stimulus package, but the early signs are encouraging. Retail sales were up in May and June, and should contribute and will contribute to economic growth. In the months ahead, we expect more Americans to take advantage of these stimulus payments, and inject new energy into our economy. The bottom line is this, we are going through a tough time. But our economy is continually growing, consumers are spending, businesses are investing, exports continue increasing, and American productivity remains strong. We can have confidence in the long-term foundation of our economy and I believe we will come through this challenge stronger than ever before.

Bush Talks Government Bailouts, Gas Prices, Oil Exploration, Obama's Trip to Iraq (CNN, 07/15/08, 10:33am)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

REPORTER: […] Are there other entities that are so crucial to stability, that they would require government action to show support for them?

GEORGE BUSH: Government action, if you are talking about bailing out, if your question is should the government bailout private enterprise, the answer is no it shouldn't. And by the way, the decisions on Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac, I hear some people say it is a bailout, I don't think it is a bailout. The shareholders still own the company. That's why I said we want this to continue to be a shareholder-owned company. In this case, there is a feeling that the government will stand behind mortgages through these new entities. And therefore we felt a special need to step up and say that we are going to provide, if needed, temporary assistance through either debt or capital. In terms of private enterprises, I do not think the government ought to be involved with bailing out companies. I think the government should create conditions so that companies can survive. I have listed four. One of the things I am deeply troubled about is the people that think it is okay to raise taxes during these times. It would be a huge mistake to raise taxes right now.

[…]

REPORTER: Mr. President, in February you were asked about Americans facing the prospect of $4 per gallon gasoline, and you said you' d had not heard of that at the time.

GEORGE BUSH: I have heard of it now.

REPORTER: Gas prices are now approaching $5 per gallon, in some parts of the country. Offshore oil exploration is obviously a long-term approach, what is the short-term advice for Americans? What can you do now to help out?

GEORGE BUSH: First of all, there is this psychology in the oil market that basically says that supplies are going to stay stagnant while demand rises. And that is reflected somewhat in the price of crude oil. Gasoline prices are reflected. The amount of gasoline, the price at the pump is reflected in the price of crude oil. And therefore, seems like it makes sense to me to say to the world, that we going to use new technologies to explore for oil and gas in the United States. Offshore oil, Anwar, oil shail projects, to help change the psychology, to send a clear message that the supplies of oil will increase. Secondly, obviously, good conservation measures matters. I have been reading a lot about how the automobile companies are beginning to adjust. Consumers are beginning to say, now wait a minute, I don't want a gas guzzler anymore, I want a smaller car. So, the two need to go hand in hand. There is no immediate fix. This took us a while to get to this problem, there is no short-term solution. I think I was in the rose garden where I issued this brilliant statement, if I had a magic wand, but the president doesn't have a magic want. You just can't say, low gas. It took us awhile to get here, and we need to have a good strategy to get out of it.

REPORTER: What about the strategic petroleum oil reserve, what about opening up that?

BUSH: The strategic petroleum oil reserve is for emergencies, but that doesn't address the fundamental issue. And we need to address the fundamental issue, which i frankly, have been talking about since I first became president, which is a combination of using technology to have alternative sources of energy but, at the same time, finding oil and gas here at home. Now is the time to get it done. I heard somebody say, well it's going to take seven years. Well if we had done this seven years ago, we would be having a different conversation today. i am not suggesting that it would have completely, you know, changed the dynamics in the world, but it certainly would have been, we would be using more of our own oil and spending less money overseas.

[…]

REPORTER: And we know you prize loyalty, and I ask, I wonder if you feel betrayed by Scott McClellan' assessment of the war in Iraq. And moving forward, since there have been positive signs on the ground in Iraq, Senator Obama is also about to take a trip there. What would be your advice to him as he tries to assess the situation on the ground?

BUSH: I have had no comment, no comment now on Scott's book. Secondly, I would ask him to listen carefully to Ryan Crocker and General Petraues. There is a temptation to let the politics at home get in the way with the considered judgment of the commanders. That is why i strongly rejected an artificial timetable of withdrawal. It is kind of like an arbitrary thing. We will decide, in the halls of Congress how to conduct our affairs in Iraq based upon polls and politics, and we will impose this on people. As opposed to listening to our commanders, and our diplomats, and listening to the Iraqis for that matter. The Iraqi's have invited us to be there. But they share a goal with us, which is to get our troops out as conditions permit. Matter of fact, that is what we are doing. Return on success has been the strategy of this administration. And our troops are coming home, but based upon success. So I would ask that whoever goes there, whatever elected official goes there, to listen carefully to what is taking place. And understand that the best way to go forward is to listen to the parties actually on the ground. That is hard to do, I understand for some in Washington, there is a lot of pressure. You got these groups out there, moveon.org , banging away on these candidates, it is hard to kind of divorce yourself from the politics. I am glad that all, a lot of these elected officials are going over there. Cause they are going to get an interesting insight. Something that you don't get from just reading your wonderful newspapers, listening to your t.v. shows.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Bush Says We are Already "Surging" and Have "Surged" In Afghanistan (CNN, 07/15/08, 10:44am)
REPORTER: Should Americans expect a troop surge in Afghanistan?

GEORGE BUSH: We are surging troops in Afghanistan. We will analyze the situation, of course, and make a determination based on the conditions on the ground. But we did surge troops. We surged troops, France surged troops, I said in Bucharest, we'll add more troops. And then, of course, we have to make sure that the strategy works. Have a counter-insurgency strategy that not only provides security but also provides economic follow up after the security has been enhanced. The question really facing the country is will we have the patience and determination to succeed in these very difficult theaters. And I understand exhaustion. And I understand people getting tired. But I would hope that whoever follows me understands that we are at war. And now is not the time to give up in the struggle against this enemy. And that while there has not been an attack on the homeland, that is not to say that people do not want to attack us. And safe havens become very dangerous for the American people, and we need to deny that safe haven. And at the same time, win the struggle by advancing democracy. This is an ideological struggle that we are involved in. These people kill for a reason. They want us to leave, they want us to, you know, not push back, they do not want democracy to succeed. And yet, if given a chance, democracy will succeed. And so these two theaters are the big challenges of the time, and the war itself is a challenge.

Bush: "I'm not an economist... I'm an optimist... I am 62. I'm having trouble remembering a lot of things." (CNN, 07/15/08, 11:05am)
GEORGE BUSH: Whether the economy will turn around? I'm not an economist, but I do believe that we are growing, and I can remember, this press conference here, people yelling recession this, recession that, as if you're economists. I'm an optimist. I believe there are a lot of positive things for our economy. But I will tell you, it is not going the way it should, and I am sorry people are paying as high of gasoline prices as they are.

[…]

BUSH: What was the question? I am 62. I'm having trouble remembering a lot of things.

REPORTER: It was about Afghanistan, sir.

BUSH: Good, I remember it now.

Highlight #2
Paul Begala Talks National Security, Calls Out Carly Fiorina for Working With Ahmadinejad, Iran (CNN, 07/15/08, 4:44pm)
WOLF BLITZER: This is the one area, as you know Paul, national security, where John McCain polls really well against Barack Obama. And some suggest whenever Obama has to deal with this, he sort of falling into a trap laid by the McCain campaign. What do you think?

PAUL BEGALA: I think tactically McCain wins the day, because he's stronger on national security in the eyes of the voters. But I think what Obama's trying to do is be strategic. He can't allow that gap to continue. That strength gap, that national security gap. So he, I think, is willing to sacrifice the day. The news of the day should have been the economy, right?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

[…]

KEVIN MADDEN: […] This is exactly the type of terrain, the issue terrain, that John McCain wants. Where he wins here, is that John McCain has a certain degree of clarity here. And what Barack Obama is doing is re-litigating his position on Iraq. He's changed it in the last couple of days. He's using rather amorphous language. He's trying to win on nuance. Where as John McCain can go and make a very black and white issue, and that's where John McCain wins. He looks more like a commander in chief, and the judgment of voters right now in a lot of these polls we're seeing, is that John McCain wins that debate.

BLITZER: And the McCain campaign is really ridiculing this passage. This excerpt from Senator Obama's speech today dealing with Iranian President Ahmadinejad. […] The McCain campaign is saying, why would you meet with this guy who calls for Israel's destruction, says it's nothing more than a stinking corpse?

BEGALA: Right, that is the extension of the Bush policy. We only meet with our friends. Well, guess what? We don't have any more friends, to speak of, around the world. I think, Barack Obama has the better of the argument here. But here's the thing we should look for. When will he counter attack? If John McCain is so all-fire opposed to the Iranians, why is his chief economic advisor, Carly Fiorina, a woman who when she ran HewlettPackard as CEO, HewlettPackard was selling computers to the Iranian regime! A terrorist regime. Counter-attack Barack! If I was advising him I would say, make Carly Fiorina the Ahmadinejad. She's already participated in a company that was selling equipment to the Iranians. Computers, at that!

MADDEN: […] This, again, is where John McCain can win. It becomes a question of whether or not you have the experience, whether or not you have the readiness to take over the oval office and to be commander in chief. And Barack Obama is going to continue to lose that.

BLITZER: What about the argument that Senator Obama made today. It was a major part of this speech, when he said, you know what? Talk about national security judgment. Senator McCain was wrong back in October, November 2002 in supporting this war in Iraq. The biggest strategic blunder in recent years. I was right in opposing this war in Iraq, and all of the negative consequences, the trillion dollars Senator Obama says that have occurred. The 4,000 Americans plus, who have been killed, wouldn't have happened if Senator McCain among others wouldn't had been a cheerleader for this war.

MADDEN: Well, I think that that is an effort by the Obama campaign to make what they believe is their most compelling argument. But I think a lot of Americans right now are not going to be making a judgment on this election at this time based on whether or not we ought to be re-litigating when we went in. But instead, what's your plan for going forward? How are you going to achieve success?

BLITZER: Is it just history?

MADDEN: Who has the best credentials to do that?

BLITZER: Politically, put on your strategic political hat, can he make the case as he tried to do repeatedly against Hillary Clinton, I was right in opposing this war, she was wrong in voting for it. And now he'd have to make the same case against McCain.

BEGALA: It certainly worked in the primaries against Senator Clinton and his other opponents.

BLITZER: Does it work in the general election?

BEGALA: I think yes. I think it's good to go right at the other fella's strength. Don't make it the entire campaign, but go right at that. And John McCain, not just Dick Cheney, John McCain said we will be greeted as liberators. John McCain said, at one point, the war would last a month or two. It was John McCain, who was part and parcel, of misleading us into this war, and I think that is an important thing. It also has the strategic advantage of linking again, once more, to George

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

W. Bush, the most unpopular president of modern times.

[…]

BEGALA: This is where, now, John McCain is chasing Barack. Obama comes out today, as he has said for months, and said Afghanistan, al-Qaeda, Pakistan, that' where we need to be. Well guess what, Senator McCain almost never mentions Afghanistan. And just a month ago, he said we have sufficient forces in Afghanistan. Then Obama says we need more troops in Afghanistan. It's McCain now chasing Barack, saying well I guess Barack's right, we do need more troops in Afghanistan.

MADDEN: I think John McCain has shown he does have the experience, he knows a lot more about Afghanistan and this, whole entire theater on the war on terror, than Barack Obama does. […]

[…]

BEGALA: […] I thought Obama's best line today was when he said, McCain says when violence is up the troops have to say, and when violence is down the troops have to stay. McCain wants troops there a hundred years.

Dana Bash Investigates McCain's Claim That "I know how to win wars." (CNN, 07/15/08, 8:06pm)
DANA BASH: John McCain was supposed to talk, once again today about the economy. But aids scrabbled to move up a speech about Afghanistan in order to offer a contrast to Obama's address today. They saw it as a chance to play on what McCain aids believe is their turf, foreign policy.

Experience is his calling card, and on a day both candidates talked national security, John McCain laid this down as a basic test.

JOHN MCCAIN: I know how to win wars.

BASH: He offered proof. A new proposal for Afghanistan, where violence has spiked.

MCCAIN: And I'll turn around the war in Afghanistan just as we have turned around the war in Iraq. With a comprehensive strategy for victory.

BASH: McCain was an earlier supporter of the military surge in Iraq, which he repeatedly tells voters is working. He said he would apply those lessons to Afghanistan. More troops and a better strategy for how to use them.

[McCain Clip Shown]

BASH: But this was as much about slamming Obama's war plans as praising his own. Obama wants to take troops out of Iraq and send them to Afghanistan.

MCCAIN: Senator Obama will tell you that we can't win in Afghanistan without losing in Iraq. In fact, he has it exactly backwards. It is precisely the success of the surge in Iraq that shows us the way to succeed in Afghanistan BASH: He mocked Obama for outlying his plan for Afghanistan before ever visiting the country.

[McCain clip shown]

BASH: Later on his bus, McCain continued to hit Obama on his national security credentials. McCain reminded reporters that Obama is chairman of the Senate Committee that oversees NATO which has command in Afghanistan, but Obama has never held a hearing.

The Surge's Efficacy Debated, McCain is No Eisenhower (MSNBC 07/15/08 5:03pm)
PAT BUCHANAN: . . . I thought John McCain clearly won the day today when he came out and said, I know how to win wars, Barack Obama opposed the surge, we would have been defeated in Iraq, I supported the surge, we're winning in Iraq, I will win in Afghanistan, this is the way to do it. I think he's on his strongest ground, it's Eisenhower vs. Adlai battle here Chris. I think it's McCain's strongest ground . . . I do believe he had the stronger, simpler, clearer, more focused day.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

[. . .]

MARK GREEN: . . . I see this Chris as good policy, which is Obama, vs. good biography from McCain. Hence the public is split on who to trust more.

CHRIS MATTHEWS: . . . let's look at what McCain said today . . .

JOHN MCCAIN: . . . it's by applying the tried and true principles of counterinsurgency used in the surge, that Sen. Obama opposed, that we will win in Afghanistan . . . I know how to win wars. I know how to win wars . . . I know how to do that.

MATTHEWS: Pat, are you saying that we've won the war in Iraq? . . . what wars has John McCain won? List them. Name the wars that we have won under his leadership or in his view.

BUCHANAN: . . . the American people believe the surge has worked, it is working—

MATTHEWS: No it hasn't, the American people haven't been asked the right question . . .

[. . .]

MATTHEWS: . . . have we won?

BUCHANAN: . . . by the loudness of your argument and the intensity, you are suggesting that McCain indeed has a powerful point. We are winning in Iraq, violence is down, American casualties are down—

MATTHEWS: That's not the strategy.

BUCHANAN: McCain is saying that strategy is working, that strategy will succeed.

MATTHEWS: At what?

BUCHANAN: In ending and succeeding in Iraq.

MATTHEWS: Succeeding at what?

[. . .]

MATTHEWS: Pat, I just want to know what you're talking about . . .

BUCHANAN: . . . the overthrow of Saddam Hussein . . . the placement of a regime that's more pro American . . . the ability to go home and say this is no longer an anti-American, anti-Western country . . .

[. . .]

GREEN: . . . John McCain made no sense in the clip you just ran . . . he said the success of the surge in Iraq, his words, show how we can win in Afghanistan . . . we don't have the troops to replicate in Afghanistan what we did in Iraq. Second, on the surge succeeding . . . if the Yankees are beating the Red Sox, 6-1 in the eighth and the Red Sox score one run, then the Red Sox aren't winning, they're still behind 6-2 . . .

BUCHANAN: . . . there's unquestionably, the surge has worked and I think the American people see it as working and they do see McCain by something like 7 to 4 or 7 to 5 as a far stronger man to lead the country and there is a clarity to that argument he is making whether you agree with its substance and ultimate results or not .

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

. . "I know how to win wars" is very powerful. It is Ike vs. Adlai.

GREEN: . . . it was Bush who said that the success of the surge will be measured by less violence and political rapprochement. The first, I agree. The second simply has not happened.

BUCHANAN: . . . Maliki has made tremendous gains . . . that's why he's saying the Americans can maybe start going home . . . if the Americans see that and McCain picks up on that: We're moving in the right direction, we're moving out of Iraq, now I'm going to win Afghanistan the way I run Iraq. The substance aside, it is a powerful political message for November . . .

[. . .]

MATTHEWS: . . . I want to respond on Eisenhower and some history here. Gen Eisenhower was elected in 1952 to end a war, which he did in Korea. Gen Eisenhower refused to go into Viet Nam in 1954 despite the urgings of others, including Richard Nixon. He refused to go into the Suez campaign in the Middle East in 1956 despite the good intentions towards Israel. Let me just make this point, Gen Eisenhower was a man of peace, who knew how to restrain US foreign policy in the interest of US foreign interest. Pat, you know this. Why are you going back with this ridiculous comparison between a hawk like McCain and man of strength and restraint like Eisenhower? You know they are two very different men.

BUCHANAN: I agree with you . . .

McCain's Czechoslovakia Mistake on Hardball (MSNBC 07/15/08 5:29pm)
CHRIS MATTHEWS: John McCain would like you to think that he's the foreign policy expert in this election. Well, he may need a history refresher. At least when it comes to one region. Check out this exchange yesterday:

JOHN MCCAIN: I was concerned bout a couple of steps that the Russian government took in the last several days. One of those is reducing the energy supplies to Czechoslovakia. Apparently that is reaction to the Czech's agreement with us concerning missile defense.

MATTHEWS: You have a problem there. Czechoslovakia hasn't existed for over fifteen years. It split up into the Czech Republic and Slovakia in 1993. Apparently, it seems that no one gave McCain the head's up. Here he is at a town hall, just this afternoon.

MCCAIN: I regret some of the recent behavior that Russia has exhibited and I'll be glad to talk about that later on, including reduction of oil supplies to Czechoslovakia after they agreed with us on a missile defense system.

MATTHEWS: Czechoslovakia was of course that country that Hitler began grabbing in 1938 and took all of in 1939.

New Polls Show McCain with Foreign Policy Advantage, Obama Winning on Economy (ABC, 07/15/08, 6:40pm)
CHARLES GIBSON: […] Foreign policy was the focus of the day. John McCain said he would send 10,000 more troops to join the fight in Afghanistan. Barack Obama said the war in Afghanistan would be at the top of his foreign policy agenda, and defended his call to withdraw all combat troops from Iraq in 16 months. Foreign policy also dominated our latest ABC News poll. […] On the foreign policy issue, it's not particularly good news for Barack Obama.

GEORGE STEPHANOPOULOS: Well, it shows that questions about his experience in foreign policy are probably the single biggest hurdle between Barack Obama and the White House. Look at this question about knowledge on world affairs, 63 percent say John McCain is more knowledgeable over 26 percent for Barack Obama. And then who do you trust to handle an unexpected foreign crisis? The 3am question, 50 John McCain, 41 Barack Obama. The Obama campaign knows that he has this big foreign trip coming up, they have to show him doing the job to calm these questions.

GIBSON: But on the economy, much better news for Obama.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Single biggest for John McCain, between him and the White House right now. Look at these numbers, 54 percent trust Barack Obama to handle the economy, only 35 percent trust John McCain. A 19 point advantage, everyday of bad news on the economy, I mean the Obama campaign will never admit it, but it's good news for his campaign.

GIBSON: All right, it's still a long ways away from Election Day. But we did ask about the horse race.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Yeah, you have to ask that question.
GIBSON: And?

STEPHANOPOULOS: Among registered voters, Barack Obama has an eight-point lead. 50 to 42. But look at this number, you trade it over to likely voters, those most likely to vote, it's down to 49 to 46. Only a three-point lead. We dug into that Charlie, and it shows that Barack Obama's most committed partisans, beyond African American voters, are young voters. Voters under 30. In March, 66 percent of them said they would vote no matter what. That is down to 46 percent right now, their enthusiasm has been dampened a bit over the course of this campaign.

[…]

Matthews Brings Up McCain's "Bomb-Iran" Joke During Discussion on Iran Policy (MSNBC 07/15/08 5:55pm)
CHRIS MATTHEWS: Here's what John Bolton, Bush's former Ambassador to the U.N. . . . wrote today in The Wall Street Journal: "Instead of debating how much longer to continue five years of failed diplomacy, we should be intensively considering what cooperation the U.S. will extend to Israel before, during and after a strike on Iran. We will be blamed for the strike anyway . . . " . . . going to war with Iran, is this going to be an issue come October?

PERRY BACON: . . . neither Sen. McCain nor Sen. Obama, we're fighting two wars now, I think they won't discuss starting a third . . .

MATTHEWS: . . . John McCain has been very clear on this, saying if they move towards weaponization, we ought to strike.

JILL ZUCKMAN: Well, Sen. McCain is very concerned about Iran; he talks about it a lot. I think actually though . . . McCain and Obama are both supportive of multi lateral talks . . . I think the difference comes more from McCain not wanting to engage in direct talks . . . this is a substantive disagreement and they're having a substantive debate and it's the real deal and they're both coming at it from different areas.

MATTHEWS: . . . John McCain was caught making a joke on this, saying his policy towards that region was "bomb-bomb-bomb-Iran," like in Barbara-Ann from the Beach Boys. But clearly he is a hawk on this matter.

KAREN TUMULTY: . . . John McCain is certainly more forceful right now in how he talks about this. He talks about the need to start imposing sanctions right now on Iran . . .

Highlight #3
CNN Investigates McCain's "Meal Ticket" and Impact of Busch Deal on McCain's Fortune and Campaign (CNN, 07/15/08, 8:44pm)
CAMPBELL BROWN: So there could be some political fallout to this weeks big deal in the beer industry. The Belgium company InBev is buying Anheuser-Busch for $52 million bucks. Cindy McCain just happens to run one of the biggest Anheuser-Busch distributers in the country, beyond what she stands to make in the deal, red flags are already starting to go up on how a McCain presidency would affect his wife's business.

DAVID MATTINGLY: Fair to say, Cindy McCain, is not only a wife to Senator John McCain, she is also his meal ticket. Her reported 2006 income of more than 6 million dollars exceeded her husband's earnings 16 times over. That money pays for a wealthy lifestyle of high-end condos, an Arizona ranch, flying in a corporate jet, and more.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

KEN VOGEL: He wouldn't be able to afford that if not for her. Politically, he is in Congress arguably because her company and her wealth funded his first Congressional campaign and has certainly been helpful in subsidizing his presidential campaign.

MATTINGLY: It's a lifestyle built on beer. Cindy McCain is on the chair of one of the biggest Anheuser-Busch distributers in the country. A company founded by her father with a value estimated at more than $100 million. In Congress, Senator McCain has been able to avoid a conflict of interest by staying out of the family business and excusing himself from beer related issues. But critics of that industry doubt that a President McCain would be able to stay so hands-off.

BRUCE LIVINGSTON: It would not be possible, the corporation of which Cindy McCain is an owner of has lobbied ten times in the last 8 years on various issues that have gone to Congress and that have gone to executive branch agencies.

MATTINGLY: As President, Senator McCain would run a mammoth beaurocracy with regulatory control over alcohol sales, distribution, and consumption. The next administration would probably have to deal with issues of beer taxes, labeling, maybe even the politically sensitive international merger just announced involving the giant Anheuser-Busch. These are all issues that could create a conflict because they could have an impact on the McCain family bottom line.

Though she does not run the day to day operations, Cindy McCain's Hensley & Co. website links to a newsletter calling for a rollback in the Federal beer tax. And this 2005 letter posted on the internet by the Los Angeles Times shows company executive Andrew McCain. Yes, that is the Senator's son lobbying against a Federal beer labeling proposal.

[...]

JAMAL SIMMONS: Of course there are red flags. The real question is not so much about what Cindy McCain does for a living, because she can do whatever she wants to do for a living, this is America. The question is whether or not John McCain is going to lead a transparent government, and he so far is not leading a transparent campaign. Here's what I mean. He hasn't talked about how much he pays, or why he doesn't pay full fair for those airplane flights he flies around in that jet. He doesn't talk about what's going to happen to Cindy McCain if he goes into the White House. And so the question is, of course he listens to somebody like Phil Gramm who thinks that the economy is all in our heads, or that economic problems are all mental, because John McCain he has eight houses, they spend $750,000 on credit cards in one month, and he's flying around the country in this corporate jet. He's not in touch with where most of Americans are.

[...]

BROWN: McCain has used his wife's fortune to help fund his campaign, providing a private plane to travel around the country. [...] Does he have an obligation to be open with people about this if you want to be president of the United States?
[...]

GLORIA BORGER: There is sort of a basic issue of transparency here, because this is sort of the bedrock of John McCain's campaign, which he wants to be open. His wife has only released the first two pages of her 2006 tax returns. And I remember in covering the 2004 campaign when Teresa Heinz Kerry who is also a very wealthy women, wealthier than Cindy McCain, did not want to release her taxes, republicans were complaining about it.

[...]

SIMMONS: That month where he was spending $750,000 dollars on credit card debts was from March 2007 until the beginning of, middle of 2008, and that's when they were spending all this money on credit cards. They would not have been able to keep the John McCain campaign alive had he not had this personal wealth.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Highlight #4

McCain Stresses His Closeness to Bush from 2003 to Present (MSNBC 07/15/08 8:03pm)

RACHAEL MADDOW: Part of the McCain campaign strategy for victory in November is making seem as if he never, not once, supported the Bush administration's failed strategy in Iraq . . .

JOHN MCCAIN: You know, over the last year Sen. Obama and I were part of a great debate about the war in Iraq. Both of us agreed that the Bush administration had pursued a failed policy there and we had to change course.

RACHAEL MADDOW: McCain might be learning how to use the internets but how the internets can be used against him must still be on his "to-figure-out-list." The wonders of the Google and the blogosphere have provided a long list of examples where McCain and Bush have appeared to be one and McSame in the war in Iraq. Our list, by no means the definitive and complete edition, working backwards, we begin in March, when on Mike Gallagher's talk radio show where McCain said, quote, "No one has supported Bush on Iraq more than I have." Then in February, when he was endorsed by Bush 41 and asked by our correspondent, Kelly O'Donnell, about the backing of that other, less popular, President Bush, McCain claimed some policy differences with the current president, but decidedly, definitely not on Iraq.

JOHN MCCAIN: As any president that follows, one has different views on particularly specific issues but I am proud of the president's strategy in Iraq. It is succeeding.

MADDOW: In the summer of 2006, when Iraq was in the midst of a civil war, McCain still had every confidence in the president.

DAIVD GREGORY: Do you have confidence in the president and his national security team to lead the war at this stage?

JOHN MCCAIN: I do. I do. I have confidence in the president and I believe that he is well aware of the situation.

GREGORY: Despite all the misjudgments you think have been made?

MCCAIN: Yes.

MADDOW: In June of 2005, when Tim Russert tried to give McCain a chance to distance himself from president Bush and his war in Iraq, McCain wouldn't take that chance.

TIM RUSSERT: The fact is, you are different from George Bush?

MCCAIN: No, no. The fact is that I am different but the fact is that I have agreed with President Bush far more than I have disagreed. And on the transcendent issues, the most important issues of our day, I have been totally in agreement and support of President Bush. My support for President Bush has been active and very impassioned on issues that are important to the American people. And I am particularly talking about the war on terror, the war in Iraq, national security, national defense, support of men and women in the military, physical discipline, a number of other issues. So I strongly disagree with any assertion that I've been more at odds with the President of the United States than I have been in agreement with him.

MADDOW: At the Republican convention, four years ago this summer, McCain admired the president as much as every and believed in his mission in Iraq as strongly as ever.

MCCAIN: I believe as strongly today as ever the mission was necessary, achievable and noble. [applause] For his determination to undertake it and his unflagging resolve to see it through to a

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

just end, President Bush deserves not only our support but our admiration. [applause]

MADDOW: At last, but certainly not least, in the conflict's early weeks, the same man who now cannot tell the difference between Sunni and Shia, believed they had a peaceful history of coexistence that would continue.

MCCAIN: There is not a history of clashes that are violent between Sunnis and Shias, so I think they can probably get along.

Highlight #5
Rep. John Boehner Distances Himself and Republicans From McCain's Energy Policies (CNN, 07/15/08, 4:17pm)
WOLF BLITZER: Senator McCain has been outspoken in his determination to deal with global warming in contradiction to some of the republicans out there who have some doubts about the whole science of that.

JOHN BOEHNER: I think that John McCain's position is not really very different than most Republicans. […] The fact is, that we have had climate change. Clearly, humans have something to do with it. And we ought to begin reducing our CO2 emmisions. […]

Highlight #6
High Gas Prices Helping McCain on Drilling (MSNBC 07/15/08 4:21pm)
NEIL CAVUTO: Now usually, Americans blame the party that's in the White House for their pain but look at these numbers, in less than a month McCain has closed the gap on Sen. Obama, turning a fifteen point deficit into a dead heat there nationally . . . how do you make sense of that Scott? If McCain is supposedly the candidate for whom the economy's not his specialty?

SCOTT RASMUSSEN: Well, there's a couple of things in that. First of all, everybody puts the question about John McCain; party of what we're seeing is a little bit of concern about Barack Obama. But in the short term what we're also seeing is the impact of higher gas prices. The American people want to energy prices to come down . . . and John McCain said, let's go find some more energy and Obama said no.

[. . .]

RASMUSSEN: . . . through the vast majority of the country they support John McCain's decision on offshore drilling and they'll support any effort to find more energy . . .

--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~
You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail ryan@campaigntodefendamerica.org with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.
-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "t r u t h o u t" <messenger@truthout.org>
To: podesta@law.georgetown.edu
Date: 10/12/2014 10:18:44 AM
Subject: The Continuing Saga of Anti-Indianism in America: Critique of a Bestseller

View Recent Newsletters

Tell a friend about Truthout!

Donate Today!

Truthout is a 501(c)3 nonprofit organization; donations are tax deductible.

Sunday, 12 October 2014

truthout

The Continuing Saga of Anti-Indianism in America: Critique of a Bestseller and the Reviewers Who Praise It

Four Arrows, Truthout: Bob Drury and Tom Clavin's heralded biography of Red Cloud, The Heart of Everything That Is: The Untold Story of Red Cloud, An American Legend, reflects strong anti-Indian bias that seems to fly beneath the radar of mainstream reviewers.

Read the Article

Columbus Day and the Sanitization of History

Owen McCormack, Truthout: The strife that has engulfed Christopher Columbus' legacy in recent years has put the concept of an Indigenous People's Day at the forefront of discussion. Each year, the question is raised: What are we celebrating about his life?

Read the Article

ISIS vs. Ebola: A Blank Check to Bomb ISIS While Funding to Fight Ebola Is Slashed

Michael Meurer, Truthout: A stunning disproportion in spending to bomb ISIS versus money allocated to fight Ebola and protect public health highlights a fatal distortion in US priorities and an historic failure of presidential and Congressional leadership.

Read the Article

In Which the Authors Interview Ralph Nader in the Bathtub

Allison Kilkenny and Jamie Kilstein, Simon & Schuster: #NEWSFAIL - the first book by the co-founders and hosts of "Citizen Radio" - is a sometimes hilarious, sometimes deadly serious clarion call in support of independent media and independent thinking.

Read the Excerpt

Banksy: Graffitist of the White Bourgeoisie

BuzzFlash

The Buzzflash commentary for Truthout will return soon.

You Do Not Have the Right to Declare Ferguson a First Amendment-Free Zone

Read the Article at BuzzFlash

The New US Price Tag for the War Against ISIS: $40 Billion a Year

Read the Article at The Fiscal Times

Asset Seizures Fuel Millions in Police Spending

Read the Article at The Washington Post

How a SWAT Team Upended My Baby's Life - and Got Away With It

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Arianne Shahvisi, Truthout: Middle-class outrage at the recent removal of Banksy's graffiti in an area of poverty and racial tension indicates how disconnected the bourgeoisie are from the realities of working-class life in Britain, and is an example of the appropriation of subversive art forms by the elite.

Read the Article

Truthout Interviews Candice Bernd on Police Retaliation Against "Cop Watch" Groups

Ted Asregadoo, Truthout: Candice Bernd discusses police retaliation against cop monitoring groups. In Austin, Texas, the police department is trying to classify one group as a "domestic extremist" threat in order to shut down the organization.

Watch the Interview

A Life-and-Death Struggle for Asylum in the US

Susan Ferriss, The Center for Public Integrity: As federal officials rush to prioritize resolution of minors' applications, members of Congress are aggressively attacking the current asylum system as well as children's claims they actually face mortal threats.

Read the Article and Listen to the Audio

How Does Your State Rank on Greenhouse Gas Emissions?

John Light, Moyers & Company: The Environmental Protection Agency recently released a breakdown of who in the US contributes the most to climate change - by state, by sector and even by individual business.

Read the Article

Read the Article at Salon

The Biggest Political Donors: 12 People Who Have Given Millions

Read the Article at The New York Times

Snowden Documentary Confirms Existence of New National Security Whistleblower

Read the Article at Common Dreams

St. Louis' Pride and Unrest: Cardinals October vs. "Ferguson October"

Read the Article at the Los Angeles Times

Banning Medical Pot Makes No Sense

Jill Richardson, OtherWords: Why deny a cancer or AIDS patient a medication that reduces suffering? Because a healthy person somewhere might use it recreationally for pleasure? Let's reform our laws to give patients relief.

Read the Article

Schools Need to Learn the Importance of Recess

Jesse Hagopian, The Seattle Times: Unfortunately, Seattle is following a national trend in reducing recess time in primary grades as school districts obsess about raising test scores. This obsession is driven by the federal education policy of the No Child Left Behind Act and the Race to the Top Fund.

Read the Article

This week in SpeakOut:

Reprieve states that Mylan pharmaceuticals, a major supplier to the National Health Service, is at risk of becoming involved in death row executions in the United States; Elle Kurancid argues that, in regard to climate action, the difference between "inextricably bound" and "nonbinding" is the difference between life and death; John LaForge looks at the United States' recent (and not-so-recent) love affair with nuclear weapons; Lawrence Davidson warns that the legitimacy of a nation is dependent on its commitment to human rights, and that the United States' lack of such a commitment calls the state's legitimacy into question; Ramzy Baroud examines the different narratives used by those when discussing the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and concludes that much of the Western media only see the status quo Palestinian and the adversarial Palestinian; D.H. Garrett implores the United States to welcome immigrants with open arms in a heartfelt poem; and more.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Read the Articles

Support Truthout with a tax-deductible donation

Please add messenger@truthout.org to ensure you receive our messages

Truthout is a proud member of the New spaper Guild/CWA, Local 36047

Subscribe | Unsubscribe

Privacy Policy

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Robert Creamer" <creamer2@aol.com>
To:	"Robert Creamer" <creamer2@aol.com>
Date:	9/11/2013 1:30:21 AM
Subject:	[big campaign] New Huff Post from Creamer-Ultimate Reason to Support Resolution Authorizing Use of Military Force to Stop Chemical Weapons in Syria: It's Working http://www.huffingtonpost.com/robert-creamer/ultimate-reason-to-suppor_b_3905940.html

Ultimate Reason to Support Resolution Authorizing Use of Military Force to Stop Chemical Weapons in Syria: It's Working

The ultimate reason to support the Congressional resolution to authorize the use of military force to stop chemical weapons use in Syria is clear: it's working.

Over a year ago, the U.S. proposed that Syria turn over its chemical weapons for destruction by the international community and join the chemical weapons treaty that bans their possession or use. Syria refused, and Russia refused to demand that it do so.

Today they have both said yes. There is only one reason. They hope to stop the use of military force that President Obama has proposed to degrade their ability to deliver these weapons -- and make the regime pay a price for the indiscriminate slaughter of 1,400 adults and children using chemical weapons containing poison sarin gas.

Many of my fellow Progressives – who like me were strong opponents of the Iraq War -- support President Obama's request for Congressional authorization to use force to sanction chemical weapons use in Syria and deter its future use. They include Congressman Keith Ellison, the Co-Chair of the Congressional Progressive Caucus; former anti-war Presidential Candidate Howard Dean, progressive columnists E.J. Dionne and Gene Robinson; and of course House Speaker Nancy Pelosi.

But for those who do not want to see the use of military force in Syria, the best thing they can do to assure that the military action is not needed, is to support the Congressional resolution authorizing the President to use military force if necessary. That is the absolute best way to make certain the Syrian regime actually gives up its chemical weapons once and for all -- and that there is no need for the U.S. to take military action to force Assad to comply.

As the President argued last night, we need to make certain that the Russians and Syrians are absolutely convinced that if they do not make good on their new promise to turn over Syrian chemical weapons, military action will ensue – it's that simple.

Three additional arguments have been used over the last few days that need to be addressed:

1). Some have argued that it is never justified to use force to counter malicious use of violence.

There are some Progressives who are truly pacifists – who feel that the use of force and violence is never justified.

I respect the convictions of those who hold pacifist views, but I do not agree with them.

When Governor Orville Faubus of Arkansas refused to allow the integration of the schools in Little Rock, Arkansas in 1954, it would have been easier for the rest of America to simply shake our collective fingers and decry racism. It would have also been more popular. Instead the federal government sent troops from the National Guard to enforce the desegregation order with the threat of force.

Some times the threat – or actual use of force – is necessary – especially to prevent violence.

That's why we empower police departments with the ability to use the force of arms when necessary to prevent violent acts.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

2). Some politicians worry that supporting the President's proposal is simply too unpopular. They should remember that polls showed the public opposed the possible bombing campaign in 1999 that was aimed at protecting Kosovars from ethnic cleansing as well. A Gallup poll in February 1999 showed that 45% of the public opposed the proposed bombing compared with only 43% who supported it.

After the campaign was successful at achieving its goals, that opposition turned into public support, and the issue played very little role in the November 2000 Congressional elections.

3). Some opponents say simply, the use of poison gas in Syria is just not our problem. Let someone else worry about it, they say.

In fact, of course, nothing could be further from the truth. If the use of chemical weapons and other weapons of mass destruction can occur with impunity any where on our small planet, they will be used more and more frequently in military conflicts. And if they are, they pose a massive danger for human beings everywhere.

If Assad can get away with using these weapons with impunity that will ultimately endanger us all.

But assume for a moment it were possible to isolate their use, so that it would never impact those of us thousands of miles away from the suburbs of Damascus. Can we just ignore the suffering of those who are its victims?

There was another story about the road to Damascus where the hero of the tale did not ignore an injured foreigner who lay suffering by the roadside. That of course was the story of the Good Samaritan – the quintessential story that is at the center of the Christian New Testament. It was the story Jesus used to explain what it meant to "love your neighbor as yourself."

Can we sit by and ignore the cries of people in foreign lands who are slaughtered in Rwanda, or ethnically cleansed in Kosovo, or gassed by the Nazis? I don't think so. And sometimes getting involved is not always clean and sterile. Sometimes it is messy and inconvenient and difficult.

Robert Creamer is a long-time political organizer and strategist, and author of the book: Stand Up Straight: How Progressives Can Win, available on Amazon.com . He is a partner in Democracy Partners and a Senior Strategist for Americans United for Change. Follow him on Twitter @rbcreamer.

--
--
You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group. Moderated by Aniello, Lori and Sara.

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.

You received this message because you are subscribed to the Google Groups "big campaign" group.
To unsubscribe from this group and stop receiving emails from it, send an email to bigcampaign+unsubscribe@googlegroups.com.
To post to this group, send email to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com.
For more options, visit https://groups.google.com/groups/opt_out .

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "t r u t h o u t" <messenger@truthout.org>
To: podesta@law.georgetown.edu
Date: 12/12/2014 7:40:06 AM
Subject: Uruguay Takes on London Bankers, Marlboro Mad Men and the TPP

View Recent Newsletters

Tell a friend about Truthout!

Friday, 12 December 2014

truthout

Donate Today!

Truthout is a 501(c)3 nonprofit organization; donations are tax deductible.

Uruguay Takes on London Bankers, Marlboro Mad Men and the TPP

Michael Meurer, Truthout: Uruguay is the unlikely protagonist in a fight to defend democratic self-government and national sovereignty against an emerging transnational governing order controlled by multinational corporations and banks through global trade agreements such as the Trans-Pacific Partnership.

Read the Article

Can a New "Progressive ALEC" Advance Effective Police Reform Through Municipal Governments?

Candice Bernd, Truthout: Local Progress, a network of hundreds of local elected officials from around the nation, recently convened in New York just a day after ALEC's new American City County Exchange held its own winter conference. One of the network's main policy goals for cities: police reform.

Read the Article

Convicted With No Evidence by an All-White Jury, Black Community Leader Faces Life in Prison

Victoria Collier and Ben-Zion Ptashnik: For decades, Rev. Edward Pinkney has been a highly irritating thorn in the side of the Whirlpool Corporation and the power structure in Michigan, a state where racial and economic divisions are ugly and stark. Now, the 66-year-old black activist, convicted of a felony by an all-white jury, faces life in prison at his upcoming sentencing.

Read the Article

Three College Endowments Are Doing Fine a Year After Divesting From Fossil Fuels

A.C. Shilton, YES! Magazine: On college campuses nationwide, the key argument against divestment - or removing all investments from oil, coal and natural gas companies - has been that it's not economically feasible. But those colleges that have already done it

BuzzFlash

In New Federal Spending Bill, Rich Strengthen Hold Over Government and We Get Lumps of Coal

Mark Karlin, BuzzFlash at Truthout: The poobahs of both parties have decided to up political contribution fees as the cost of "doing business" in the nation's capital.

Read the BuzzFlash Commentary

Elizabeth Warren Goes to War

Read the Article at Salon

Nobody Wants Pollution, so Why Is There so Much of It?

Read the Article at BuzzFlash

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

say the risk is minimal.
Read the Article

South of the US Border, the War on Drugs Is Really a War on People

Dawn Paley, AK Press: If there really was a war on drugs, it wouldn't make for very good media fodder: Bullet-riddled packets of cocaine don't bleed, and so probably wouldn't lead. As we shall see, in Mexico, Colombia and elsewhere, the primary victims of the so-called war on drugs are poor people.
Read the Excerpt

Amy Goodman | "We Are Like the Walking Dead": Latin American Indigenous Groups Decry Corporate Destruction of Land

Amy Goodman, Democracy Now!: As the United Nations Climate Conference in Peru enters its final phase, thousands of people marched in downtown Lima on Wednesday to call for action on global warming. We hear from some of the voices who took to the streets: frontline indigenous and rural communities.
Watch the Video and Read the Transcript

Congress to Reinstate Taxpayer Subsidies for Reckless Derivatives Trading

Mary Bottari, PR Watch: Congress is poised to roll back a key taxpayer protection contained in the 2010 Wall Street reform bill.
Read the Article

Drones and Discrimination: Kick the Habit

Kathy Kelly, Voices for Creative Nonviolence: "On December 10, International Human Rights Day, federal Magistrate Matt Whitworth sentenced me to three months in prison for having crossed the line at a military base that wages drone warfare. The punishment will be an opportunity to speak with people trapped by prisons in the US."
Read the Article

US War Debt Is Over $2 Trillion, Obama Wants to Spend More, but Is That the Answer?

Pierce Nahigyan, Thought Catalog: The ultimate costs of the US wars in the Middle East will accumulate long after they have officially ended. All told, Harvard calculates that the price tag for these conflicts will double and potentially triple. That means $4 trillion at its most conservative and $6 trillion at its highest.
Read the Article

Citigroup Wrote the Wall Street Giveaway the House Just Approved

Read the Article at Mother Jones

Rick Santorum Announced He's Running for President and Nobody Noticed

Read the Article at Mediaite

"Are You Listening?" Ten Highlights From a Generational Moment

Read the Article at The Nation

Booted From Occupy Central, Hong Kong's Pro-Democracy Protesters Take on New Battlefields

Read the Article at Global Voices

George W. Bush Knew About CIA Torture, Says Dick Cheney

Read the Article at the Sydney Morning Herald

Civil Society Support for Marshall Islands Against Nuclear Weapons

Julia Rainer, Inter Press Service: Ahead of the December Vienna Conference on the Humanitarian Impact of Nuclear Weapons, activists from all over the world came together in the Austrian capital to participate in a civil society forum organized by the International Campaign to Abolish Nuclear Weapons.
Read the Article

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Richard D. Wolff | Economic Update: Mainstream Economics vs. Critical Economics

Richard D. Wolff, Truthout: This week's episode provides updates on Mexican farm exploitation, Grenoble taking down advertising, US teachers being underpaid and the cutting of workers' pensions. We also respond to listeners on Harvard and Yale as full participants in capitalism's defects. Finally, we analyze modern "economics" as a discipline.

Listen to the Audio Segment

Support Truthout with a tax-deductible donation

Please add messenger@truthout.org to ensure you receive our messages

Truthout is a proud member of the New spaper Guild/CWA, Local 36047

Subscribe | Unsubscribe

Privacy Policy

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Milia Fisher" <mfisher@hillaryclinton.com>
To: "John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
Date: 6/29/2015 9:52:47 AM
Subject: Re: Ben Gemen policy background

Welker is heading back to DC in the afternoon so we're going to a shoot for a coffee close to the personal office around 10:15. Your first meeting in the personal office is just the NH polling call at 11:00 am.

Since we're starting senior staff early at 12:30 pm we will have a room where you Kristina, Jake, Huma, Robby, Jen, Joel, Mandy, and Jim can take the NH polling call from the personal office.

Let me know if that all sounds OK.

On Mon, Jun 29, 2015 at 4:15 PM, Milia Fisher <mfisher@hillaryclinton.com > wrote:
> Yep, will do. Welker seems intent on meeting you at some point so we may try to reschedule for tomorrow if it works for you. Do you plan on coming back to the office after the series of HRC meetings ends at 4:30?
>
> On Mon, Jun 29, 2015 at 4:12 PM, John Podesta <john.podesta@gmail.com > wrote:
> > Let Jen and Kristina know that I am blowing off ABC.
> >
> > On Jun 29, 2015 4:08 PM, "Milia Fisher" <mfisher@hillaryclinton.com > wrote:
> > > Also- Trevor just followed up again with the following on the SCOTUS ruling:
> > >
> > > "One more thing to flag. John is certainly aware of today's Supreme Court decision presenting a near-term obstacle for Mercury regulations. He may be asked about it, and he could underscore his confidence that the Obama administration will take the necessary steps to comply and fully implement the regulations, but should there be a delay, HRC will do so as President.
> > >
> > > Of note, These pollutants are dangerous primarily to women and their fetuses. They have never been regulated. It's been 25 years since the toxics provisions were adopted by Congress in 1990. The regulations are long overdue."
> > >
> > > On Mon, Jun 29, 2015 at 4:00 PM, Milia Fisher <mfisher@hillaryclinton.com > wrote:
> > > > Yep, you're all good to call him at 5:00 or even later if it takes you longer to get here or home. His best number is his desk line: 202-266-7429
> > > >
> > > > On Mon, Jun 29, 2015 at 3:56 PM, Milia Fisher <mfisher@hillaryclinton.com > wrote:
> > > > > Yep I have a number and I will call him now to ask. Will circle back.
> > > > >
> > > > > On Mon, Jun 29, 2015 at 3:54 PM, John Podesta <john.podesta@gmail.com > wrote:
> > > > > > Can you call Ben and see if I can cal him at 5:00
> > > > > > Get a number.
> > > > > >
> > > > > > On Jun 29, 2015 3:19 PM, "Milia Fisher" <mfisher@hillaryclinton.com > wrote:
> > > > > > > Trevor just followed up with the below. His cell is 917-755-5446 just in case you want to call.
> > > > > > >
> > > > > > > _____
> > > > > > >
> > > > > > > We've also found it successful when chatting with folks to frame energy/climate as integral to each of her four fights:
> > > > > > >
> > > > > > > - investing in clean energy that will power the economy of the future
> > > > > > >
> > > > > > > - protecting families from pollution
> > > > > > >
> > > > > > > - safeguarding our country from the impacts of climate change and reducing our oil dependence
> > > > > > >
> > > > > > > - preventing those who want to keep us trapped in the energy economy of the past from distorting our political process.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

On Mon, Jun 29, 2015 at 3:14 PM, Milia Fisher <mfisher@hillaryclinton.com > wrote:

Hi John-

Here's the policy background Trevor Houser sent over for the Ben Gemen interview. Policy memo attached and at the bottom in plain text. All printed for you in the office as well in case you're able to make it in.

Thanks,
Milia

Note From Trevor Houser:

"Not sure if comms gave John background, but the reporter has been asking about HRC's process for a climate and enviro policy. Jake and the team felt now was an appropriate time to work with Ben Geman on that story in an effort to:

1) underscore how seriously she takes these issues;
2) Climate and Environment are top priorities for the campaign; and
3) The campaign is leading a deliberate and thoughtful policy process that has sought input from a large number of experts and key stakeholders in the environment, clean energy, and conservation communities.

The one other thing I would flag for John is that if Ben asks whether we would support a permanent extension of the PTC/ITC we need to hedge given out solar/renewable targets. Those imply a $10-$15 billion per year price tag by 2020 and $25-$35 billion per year by 2027 if extended at current levels. May need to call for "extending and improving" or something like that."

Secretary of State Record

As Secretary, Hillary fought hard to mobilize a global response to climate change. She immediately created the first high-level post at the State Department dedicated exclusively to climate diplomacy (the US Special Envoy for Climate Change)

She put climate squarely on the agenda during her first trip as Secretary to Beijing

Hillary worked to feature climate change in the annual US-China Strategic and Economic Dialogue meeting

She helped to hammer out the breakthrough that led to the Copenhagen Accord, which, among other things, was the first international agreement in which all of the major economies – including China – committed to reduce their greenhouse gas pollution.

In addition, she worked hard as Secretary to build new coalitions to combat emissions from methane and other super-pollutants that damage the climate, as well as to launch a clean cookstove initiative that is bringing not only health but climate benefits.

In pursuing these international agreements, and the leadership we are showing at home and abroad, the United States now has a much stronger hand to play in the upcoming negotiations in Paris.

To: John Podesta, Jake Sullivan, Maya Harris and Dan Schwerin

From: Energy and Climate Team

Date: June 29, 2015

Re: Energy, Climate and Environment Policy Platform

This memo provides a brief overview of our proposed energy, climate and environment policy platform. We have developed six major policy initiatives that together offer a comprehensive strategy for a) protecting American families from pollution, b) powering the economy of the future, c) delivering energy and climate security that lasts, and d) responsibly stewarding our country's natural bounty and beauty. We are finalizing separate white papers with more detail on each of the six initiatives.

Our platform is designed to make the US the clean energy superpower of the 21st century and a global leader in the fight against climate change, and to do so in a way that provides economic opportunity and security for all Americans. We will have half a billion solar panels installed across the country by 2020 and generate enough renewable energy to power every home in the country within 10 years. During that time we will reduce US oil consumption by 20% and partner with other countries bring global oil demand growth to a halt [note: this is a proposed target we haven't yet discussed as a group].

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The next decade is critical if we are going to successfully transition to a clean energy economy, deliver security that lasts, and prevent catastrophic climate change. The following is an ambitious and achievable plan of attack.

1. Smart Standards

We will fight efforts to roll back environmental protections in favor of polluters. We will defend and extend common-sense standards that make our air and water cleaner, safeguard the health of our families, reduce energy waste, driven clean energy deployment and fight global climate change. This includes full implementation of the Clean Power Plan, extension of efficiency standards for cars, trucks, airplanes and appliances, better building codes, mandatory disclosure of fracking chemicals and methane regulations on oil and gas production.

2. Clean Energy Challenge

Standards set the floor, not the ceiling. We can and must go further. We will form a new partnership with states, cities and rural communities that are ready to lead, providing competitive grants to those that exceed federal guidelines, remove barriers to clean energy access and entrepreneurship, and invest in innovative solutions that reduce energy costs, protect public health and cut carbon pollution.

As part of this bargain, we will guarantee that every agency within the federal government is working in concert to ensure Americans have the tools and resources they need to succeed. That includes investing in new technologies, both in our labs and through our tax code, and ensuring that we are maximizing the clean energy potential of public lands and public buildings. We will expand successful innovation initiatives, like ARPA-e, cut those that fail to deliver results, and ensure that public R&D supports private sector entrepreneurialism, small business creation and employment growth.

3. Modernizing North American Infrastructure

We must improve the safety and security of existing energy infrastructure in North America and ensure that the new infrastructure we build is consistent with the clean energy economy we are seeking to create. We will launch a major initiative to repair, replace and better regulate our existing pipeline and rail network to protect our families, communities, and outdoor economy from the risk of oil spills and explosions and protect the climate from fugitive methane emissions. And we'll negotiate a North American Climate Compact with Canada and Mexico that guides future infrastructure investment on the continent through ambitious emission reduction commitments, coordinated policy action, and strong accountability mechanisms.

Security that Lasts

The recent growth in domestic oil and gas production provides important economic and geopolitical benefits, but it doesn't solve the energy-related security issues that have plagued our country for decades. US gasoline prices will continue to be set by the global market, no matter how much oil we produce, leaving our economy vulnerable to supply disruptions elsewhere in the world. In addition, the more oil and other fossil fuels we burn, the more risk we bear – both to our economy and our national security - from higher sea levels and increasingly devastating storms, heatwaves and droughts.

The only way to truly safeguard our country is to reduce the amount of oil consumed both at home and around the world and make our investments, our communities and our infrastructure more resilient to climate-related risks. We will take actions necessary to drive down oil consumption in the US, and will partner with other countries to halt the growth in global oil consumption within the next ten years. We will lead the world in combatting climate change, build resilient infrastructure and ensure American families, businesses and investors have actionable information on the kinds of risks they face.

Collaborative Stewardship

We are still developing the public lands/conservation leg of the platform, which will include the following components:

1. Royalty reform: Raise the on-shore oil and gas royalty rate on public lands to match that charged on private lands in Texas and other states and close the loophole in coal royalty policy that costs taxpayers hundreds of millions of dollars per year.

2. Leasing: Take areas too sensitive for energy production, like the Arctic, off the table.

3. LWCF: Fully fund the Land and Water Conservation Fund

4. Outdoor economy: Support the growth of the outdoor economy by protecting national parks and forests and improving access to public lands for hunters and anglers and other types of recreation.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A Just Transition

As we build the energy economy of the 21st century, we cannot turn our backs on the workers and communities in the coalfields who kept the lights on and factories running during the 20th century. We will ensure that the retirement benefits of coal miners and their families are secure, invest in carbon capture, utilization and sequestration technology, and launch a major workforce and local economic development initiative for coalfield communities from Central Appalachia to the Powder River Basin.

We will also address the legacy costs fossil fuel combustion in communities disproportionately impacted by the resulting air pollution. We will provide block grants to states, cities and rural communities that develop innovative economic development and public health solutions for vulnerable communities as part of their clean energy strategy, such as the SB 535 program in California.

--
Milia Fisher
Special Assistant to the Chair
Hillary for America
mfisher@hillaryclinton.com
o: 646.854.1198 c: 858.395.1741

--
Milia Fisher
Special Assistant to the Chair
Hillary for America
mfisher@hillaryclinton.com
o: 646.854.1198 c: 858.395.1741

--
Milia Fisher
Special Assistant to the Chair
Hillary for America
mfisher@hillaryclinton.com
o: 646.854.1198 c: 858.395.1741

--
Milia Fisher
Special Assistant to the Chair
Hillary for America
mfisher@hillaryclinton.com
o: 646.854.1198 c: 858.395.1741

--
Milia Fisher
Special Assistant to the Chair
Hillary for America
mfisher@hillaryclinton.com
o: 646.854.1198 c: 858.395.1741

--
Milia Fisher
Special Assistant to the Chair
Hillary for America

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

mfisher@hillaryclinton.com
o: 646.854.1198 c: 858.395.1741

--
Milia Fisher
Special Assistant to the Chair
Hillary for America
mfisher@hillaryclinton.com
o: 646.854.1198 c: 858.395.1741

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Wilson Center - Middle East Program" <mep@wilsoncenter.org>
To:	podesta@law.georgetown.edu
Date:	9/9/2015 4:08:16 AM
Subject:	INVITATION: 9-11 "Iran's Nuclear Chess: After the Deal"

To view this email as a web page, click here

Middle East Program | Wilson Center

Iran's Nuclear Chess: After the Deal

As the U.S. Congress considers the nuclear agreement concluded between the P5+1 and Iran, please join us for this meeting to assess its terms and prospective implementation, as well as the implications should the agreement not be implemented. The meeting will feature the updated edition of the monograph by Robert Litwak, vice president for scholars at the Wilson Center and a former director for nonproliferation on the National Security Council staff in the first Clinton administration in conversation with New York Times Correspondent David Sanger.

Author:
Robert Litwak
Vice President for Scholars and Academic Relations and Director, International Security Studies, Woodrow Wilson Center

Commentator:
David Sanger
National Security Correspondent, The New York Times, and former Public Policy Scholar, Woodrow Wilson Center

RSVP NOW » Forward to a Friend

RSVP NOW

Friday, September 11, 2015
9am - 10am

6th Floor Flom Auditorium

Directions

Wilson Center
Ronald Reagan Building and International Trade Center
One Woodrow Wilson Plaza
1300 Pennsylvania, Ave., NW
Washington, D.C. 20004

Phone: 202.691.4000

mep@wilsoncenter.org

Privacy Policy

© Copyright 2015, The Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars , All Rights Reserved.
Subscriber: podesta@law.georgetown.edu | Manage your Subscriptions | Unsubscribe from All

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Angel Urena" <aurena@hillaryclinton.com>
To:
Date:	12/5/2007 2:18:05 AM
Subject:	Hispanic Media Clips
Attachments:	120507_clips.doc

<<120507_clips.doc>>

Hispanic Media Clips

Wednesday, December 5, 2007

NPR Debate - The discussion of immigration during yesterday's NPR/Iowa Public Radio debate was in sharp contrast to the Republican debate last week in which the GOP candidates tried to outmaneuver each other on who would be tougher on illegal immigrants. The Democratic candidates said they were not willing to encourage Americans to arrest illegal citizens, reports Univision Online, El Nuevo Herald, El Paso Times, Houston Chronicle, La Voz (AZ), and El Diario La Estrella, in the Spanish language version of an AP article. "They are embedded in our society," said Senator Clinton. "If we want to listen to the demagogues and the calls for us to begin to try to round up people and turn every American into a suspicious vigilante, I think we will do graver harm to the fabric of our nation than any kind of person-by-person reporting of someone who might be here illegally," she added. In regards to Iran, the Democratic presidential candidates pilloried President Bush for saying "nothing's changed" in the wake of a new intelligence report concluding that Iran abandoned its nuclear-weapons program in 2003, reports El Nuevo Herald, in a story for McClatchy news service. "He should seize this opportunity and engage in serious diplomacy, using carrots and sticks," New York Senator Hillary Clinton said during the two-hour debate in Des Moines.

Small Businesses – "Small businesses create nearly half of all private jobs in the country, but most of the times these same businesses seem to be invisible to the 2008 presidential candidates," writes Yolanda Arenales in an opinion piece for El Diario La Prensa. Fabiola Rodriguez-Ciampoli said that one of Senator Clinton's "most significant proposals would be the creation of tax credits so that businesses can offer their workers healthcare."

Peru FTA – With strong bipartisan vote of 77-18, the Senate concluded yesterday with the process of ratification of the free trade agreement between the US and Peru, reports El Nuevo Herald, La Opinion, La Voz, Houston Chronicle, Diario La Estrella and New York Daily News, in an AP article by Nestor Ikeda. The article mentions that Senator's Clinton, Obama and Biden and Republican Senator John McCain, did not vote. Campaign spokesperson Fabiola Rodriguez-Ciampoli said that "Senator Clinton has expressed her support for the agreement in the past, and that she was not in the Senate to vote because she was in Iowa, along with other Democratic candidates, for a debate."

NPR Debate

Democratic rivals talk immigration during debate - Rivales demócratas hablan de inmigración, durante debate
Univisión – 12/04/07

Democratic rivals talk immigration during debate -Rivales demócratas hablan de inmigración, durante debate
El Nuevo Herald - 12/04/07

Democratic rivals talk immigration during debate -Rivales demócratas hablan de inmigración, durante debate
El Paso Times - 12/04/07

Democratic rivals talk immigration during debate -Rivales demócratas hablan de inmigración, durante debate

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Houston Chronicle - 12/04/07

Democratic rivals talk immigration during debate -Rivales demócratas hablan de inmigración, durante debate
La Voz (AZ Central) - 12/04/07

Democratic rivals talk immigration during debate -Rivales demócratas hablan de inmigración, durante debate
Diario La Estrella - 12/04/07

Iran divides Democratic candidates - Tema de Irán divide a candidatos demócratas
El Nuevo Herald – 12/05/07

Small Businesses

Small businesses, the forgotten - Pequeños negocios los olvidados
El Diario (New York) – 12/05/07

Peru FTA

US Senate ratifies FTA with Peru - Senado estadounidense ratifica TLC con Per El Nuevo Herald – 12/04/07

US Senate ratifies FTA with Peru - Senado ratifica el Tratado de Libre Comercio entre EU y Perú
La Opinión Digital - 12/04/07

FTA between the US and Peru ratified; Senate votes 77-18 in favor - TLC EEUU-Perú ratificado; Senado vota a favor 77-18
La Voz (AZ Central) - 12/04/07

US Senate ratifies FTA with Peru - Senado estadounidense ratifica TLC entre EEUU y Perú
Houston Chronicle - 12/04/07

FTA between the US and Peru ratified; Senate votes 77-18 in favor - TLC EEUU-Perú ratificado; Senado vota a favor 77-18
Diario La Estrella - 12/04/07

US approves FTA with Peru - Estados Unidos aprueba tratado de libre comercio con Perú
New York Daily News - 12/04/07

Contributions to Hillary Clinton for President
are not deductible for federal income tax purposes.

Paid for by Hillary Clinton for President

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "t r u t h o u t" <messenger@truthout.org>
To: podesta@law.georgetown.edu
Date: 10/14/2014 9:13:57 AM
Subject: Dahr Jamail | Iraqi Doctors Call Depleted Uranium Use "Genocide"

View Recent Newsletters

Tell a friend about Truthout!

Tuesday, 14 October 2014

truthout

Donate Today!

Truthout is a 501(c)3 nonprofit organization; donations are tax deductible.

Dahr Jamail | Iraqi Doctors Call Depleted Uranium Use "Genocide"

Dahr Jamail, Truthout: Contamination from depleted uranium munitions is causing sharp rises in congenital birth defects, cancer cases and other illnesses throughout much of Iraq, according to numerous Iraqi doctors.

Read the Article

The Death Penalty, Missouri and the Continued Devaluing of Black Life

William C. Anderson, Truthout: Death penalty states like Missouri have been treating their predominantly black death row prisoners like test subjects while protests over the worth of black life continue in Ferguson and around the country. Although there hasn't been as much protest around those condemned to death, their lives matter, too.

Read the Article

Pesticide Use by Farmers Linked to High Rates of Depression, Suicides

Brian Bienkowski, Environmental Health News: Some research suggests that the chemicals that farmers and their workers spread on fields may alter certain brain chemicals, and that chronic exposure to low levels of herbicides over time may raise the risk of depression.

Read the Article

Laura Flanders | From Indigenous Socialism to Colonial Capitalism, Examining Native History of a Settler State

Laura Flanders, Truthout: Roxanne Dunbar-Ortiz, author of An Indigenous People's History of the United States, argues that an understanding of the history and functioning of the settler state is essential to all of us.

Watch the Video and Read the Transcript

AIG Bailout Trial Bombshells: The Repellent Hank Greenberg May Have a Case

Yves Smith, Naked Capitalism: Hank Greenberg,

BuzzFlash

International Small Farmer Movement Calls Free Trade a Threat to Food Security

Mark Karlin, BuzzFlash at Truthout: There's a new wave of free trade agreements coming down the pike - unless they are defeated by an uprising of those concerned about unsustainable farming, climate change, corporate interests superseding sovereignty, unfair labor practices and many more perilous threats.

Read the BuzzFlash Commentary

Welcome to the United States; What Flavor of Torture Would You Like?

Read the Article at BuzzFlash

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

the former CEO of AIG, is hardly a sympathetic figure. Yet in his lawsuit against the governmental team that led the AIG bailout, he may come out looking better than the defendants.

Read the Article

"Hands Up! Don't Shoot!": Gesture, Choreography and Protest in Ferguson

Anusha Kedhar, The Feminist Wire: Unlike other slogans, "Hands up! Don't shoot!" is not just voiced. It is also embodied. Contained within the phrase is both a plea not to shoot, as well as the bodily imperative to lift one's hands up. The hands up gesture "has been transformed into a different kind of weapon."

Read the Article

Is This "American Exceptionalism"?

The Daily Take Team, The Thom Hartmann Program: While jingoistic politicians might argue that the United States is the greatest country in the world, the facts really speak for themselves: We aren't and inequality is to blame. The United States will only be exceptional when all Americans have an equal shot at success.

Read the Article

Building an Ark: How to Protect Public Revenues From the Next Meltdown

Ellen Brown, The Web of Debt Blog: A publicly owned bank can provide security from risk while generating a far greater return on the local government's money. As we peer into the jaws of another economic meltdown, moving our public funds into our own banks is an investment we can hardly afford not to make.

Read the Article

A Trip to Kuwait (on the Prairie): Life Inside the Boom

Laura Gottesdiener, TomDispatch: In the US heartland, thousands of workers shaken loose from other worlds have been heading for boom times in North Dakota and elsewhere in our fracklands. The author reports from the front lines of this fossil fuel extraction boom.

Read the Article

Sunshine State Uses Fees to Prevent Sun From Shining on Judicial Records

Alison Fitzgerald, The Center for Public Integrity: When the Center for Public Integrity requested records from Florida's 17th judicial circuit regarding the procedures and policies surrounding foreclosure cases, officials were more than happy to comply - for a price. A price of $132,348, to be exact.

Read the Article

On the News With Thom Hartmann: Pollution Inequality Worse Than Income Inequality in the US, and More

In today's On the News segment: Most of us know how bad income inequality has become in the United States, but pollution inequality is even worse;

Whistleblower Cop: Fellow Officers Getting "Gang Tattoos" to Celebrate Their Shooting Victims

Read the Article at The Free Thought Project

Creationists' Ark Park Tax Subsidy Threatened by Bigoted Hiring Practices

Read the Article at BuzzFlash

The Worsening Ebola Crisis

Read the Article at The New York Times

Red Dawn: The GOP's Growing Monopoly on State Government

Read the Article at Mother Jones

Will the Right to Be Forgotten Inspire Repressive Regimes to Expand Internet Censorship?

Read the Article at Global Voices

Christian Right's Vile PR Sham: Why Their Bizarre Films Are Backfiring on Them

Read the Article at Salon

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

researchers have discovered a new way to see the features hidden deep under water; humans aren't the only multilingual species; and more.

Watch the Video and Read the Transcript

Company That Sues Soldiers Pledges Reform, Changes Name

Paul Kiel, ProPublica: USA Discounters, promising to change how it pursues military debtors, will now be known as USA Living. The Virginia-based retailer was the focus of an investigation in July into its lending practices to service members.

Read the Article

Support Truthout with a tax-deductible donation

Please add messenger@truthout.org to ensure you receive our messages

Truthout is a proud member of the New spaper Guild/CWA, Local 36047

Subscribe | Unsubscribe

Privacy Policy

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Sara DuBois" <sara@progressiveaccountability.org>
To: bigcampaign@googlegroups.com
Date: 8/6/2008 6:56:46 AM
Subject: [big campaign] Tracking Update: McCain Company Tour in Jackson, OH 08/06/08

Hello All,
Unfortunately, our tracker was not allowed into this closed event. But good news: we were able to capture the event via online streaming video (and our tracker, Lee, got footage outside the event). Below are the notes from our effort.

Big Highlights

- McCain tries to exit wrong side of platform, has to walk back the other way
- McCain calls for an "economic surge" since the surge in Iraq has succeeded
- Supporters/undecideds outside event say they're disappointed the event is closed

Jackson, OH: McCain Company Tour 08/06/08
(Disclaimer: The following are notes, not direct quotes. If you'd like a quotable transcript or video of any part below, please email us.)

Background details

- about 10 supporters gathered outside to see McCain's bus pull up
- Meghan McCain accompanied him into event
- McCain's tone was noticeably unenthusiastic/rote
- According to interviews with local people (not at event) conducted by tracker,
    - Next-door to Merillat, where McCain spoke, is Meridian plant, which closed down in 2006 and fired all its employees - bitterness in community [footage available]
    - Merillat is non-union, according to a local restaurant worker
- 3 Interviews with supporters/undecideds at the event expressed disappointment that event was closed [footage available]
- McCain speaks at podium with about 20 employees standing behind him on platform
- Tries to exit platform wrong way - has to walk back the other way

Notes from Speech (not included in prepared remarks)

- Thanks Karen Strauss, John Lewis, State Sen John Kerry
- Great people here at the company - hard times, hurt by housing industry- but spirit of hope - their msg to me is it's time get economy moving again
- Concludes with TY for your hard work and your outstanding dedication to safety
- Jokes next time I'll wear the proper shirt [all employees wearing casual/Hawaiian shirts, etc]

LINK TO FULL REMARKS: http://thepage.time.com/mccain-remarks-after-touring-ohio-plant/

[Please see Senator John McCain's remarks as they are prepared for delivery in Jackson, Ohio today. Senator McCain will deliver the following remarks following his tour of the Merillat Kitchen Cabinet Plant:]

It's time to get America's economy moving again. Companies like Merillat and families across Ohio face challenges in their business and around the kitchen table. Our energy prices are too high. We are losing jobs. Our housing market is in decline. The cost of everything is going up, and in the face of this, Washington is on vacation.

Now is the time for action. We need an "all of the above" plan to address our energy crisis with alternative energy, drilling and nuclear power. We need to crack down on those who have abused our credit market and caused this housing decline. And we need to take action to support American businesses so that we stop jobs from going overseas and create more jobs here at home.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

America has the second highest business tax rate in the entire world. Is it any wonder that jobs are moving overseas when we are taxing them out of the country? Unfortunately Senator Obama's plans would raise taxes on businesses even more. He has promised tax increases on income, tax increases on investment, tax increases on small businesses. This is exactly the wrong strategy. Raising taxes in a bad economy is about the worst thing you could do because it will kill even more jobs when what we need are policies that create jobs.

What we need today is an Economic Surge to keep jobs here at home and create new ones. [paraphrase--not in prepared remarks: The surge in Iraq was so successful, we need to have an economic surge here at home] We need to reduce the tax burden on businesses that choose to make their home in the U.S. We need to open new markets to U.S. products. We need to reduce the cost of healthcare. And we need to end the out of control spending in Washington that is putting our debt on the backs of our children.

Now is the time for action, and when I am President, we are going to get it done.

--
Sara DuBois
Tracking / Communications Manager
ProgressiveAccountability.org
sara@progressiveaccountability.org
202-609-7681 (office)
410-967-7306 (cell)

--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~
You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail ryan@campaigntodefendamerica.org with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.
-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Clinton Foundation Press Office" <press@clintonfoundation.org>
To: "Clinton Foundation Press Office" <press@clintonfoundation.org>
Date: 12/22/2015 1:35:30 PM
Subject: Clinton Foundation News & Guidance

Hi all - we wanted to give you some updates on recent events, Foundation work, and announcements in the news.

Clinton Foundation removed from Charity Navigator "Watchlist"
Today, Charity Navigator announced they had removed the Clinton Foundation from their Watchlist. Read the statement under "Archived Watchlist:" https://www.charitynavigator.org/index.cfm?bay=search.profile&ein=311580204#.VnmRVvkrLIU.

> "In accordance with our policy for removing charities from the CN Watchlist, Charity Navigator removed the Bill, Hillary & Chelsea Clinton Foundation from the Watchlist in December 2015 because the charity provided publicly accessible information regarding their amended tax Forms for 2010, 2011, 2012 and 2013. This information, along with the public memorandum submitted addressing the other issues raised in the Watchlist entry, meets our requirements for removal."

The Chronicle of Philanthropy published an article on the announcement. The article includes Clinton Foundation president Donna Shalala's statement regarding the change. Read the article here: https://philanthropy.com/article/Charity-Navigator-Removes/234700.

> In response to Charity Navigator's move, the president of the Clinton Foundation, Donna Shalala, said: "The Clinton Foundation is committed to making a difference across the globe, excellence in our operations, and remaining accountable to our supporters and the public. Today's action by Charity Navigator affirms that commitment. We are well positioned to build on our successes and expand our impact in the years ahead."

Clinton Development Initiative and Visa announce new partnership
This week we announced a new partnership between the Clinton Development Initiative (CDI) and Visa to help farmers in Rwanda conduct business through digital transactions. CDI's work in Rwanda focuses on helping farmers improve their livelihoods through better training, improved connection to markets and inputs, and stronger linkages between farmers and stakeholders. This work, coupled with Visa's expertise in global electronic payment, will allow farmers to take a larger role in agricultural financing. Read a piece in AllAfrica about the partnership: http://allafrica.com/stories/201512170253.html

> "Rwandan farmers are set to benefit from a partnership between Clinton Foundation and Visa, a global payments technology company which will enable them conduct business transactions digitally.
>
> The partnership by the two entities will connect individual farmers and cooperatives with financial institutions, retailers, processers, buyers and other producers consequently creating a digital payments ecosystem.
>
> These connections aim at helping improve farmers' financial security and empower them economically to make purchases with greater knowledge and ease."

Share the article on TWITTER: https://twitter.com/ClintonFdn/status/677151210294636545
Share the article on FACEBOOK: https://www.facebook.com/ClintonFoundation/posts/890582651063177

Clinton Giustra Enterprise Partnership profiled in GOOD Magazine
The Clinton Giustra Enterprise Partnership's CEO Mark Gunton was profiled as one of GOOD's "local globalists" who is helping to turn the U.N.'s global goals into reality. The piece explains how CGEP's transformative work to promote inclusive and sustainable industry helps break down barriers for farmers and female entrepreneurs in Latin America and Haiti.

> "Since its inception in 2007, CGEP, which develops and manages 'social enterprises that foster sustainable economic development,' has impacted 400,000 people worldwide, generated over $4 million in sales, increased the incomes of more than 23,000 farmers and entrepreneurs by training and connecting them with larger markets, provided job training to over 3,000 youth, and equipped upwards of 1,300 women with entrepreneurial training and opportunities."
>
> "CGEP's goal is poverty alleviation at scale. 'I hope that in 20 years, we would have replicated our enterprise models over 200 times and transformed the lives of millions of people. I also hope that we would have introduced a new enterprise model that focuses on low-cost health delivery, in a way similar to our distribution model, that has a great need but also great potential in the developing world. I believe our work will pave the way for other NGOs, social enterprises, development finance institutions, and others to engage individually and collectively in market-driven, sustainable solutions to developmental challenges and shift away from traditional reliance on donor funds.'"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Share the article on TWITTER: https://twitter.com/ClintonFdn/status/674339475129049088
Share the article on FACEBOOK: https://www.facebook.com/ClintonFoundation/posts/886884191433023

Tips from Too Small to Fail on the importance of talking, reading, and singing to babies
A recent post on Mother.ly, titled "Talking is teaching: 5 creative ways to help your baby learn today" incorporates tips from Too Small to Fail on how simply talking, reading, and singing to children can help improve babies' brain development.

"The more words children hear spoken to them by parents and caregivers from birth, the more words they learn. They can then become better communicators with others, and are better prepared to read and learn."

CGI commitment converts animal waste into energy
An article published in Quartz discusses Sistema Biobolsa , a CGI commitment-maker that develops and installs "biodigesters" to convert animal waste into energy and fertilizer. With the help of CGI, Sistema Biobolsa aims to scale up their commitment.

"And they're not stopping any time soon. With the help of private investors and high-profile partners like the Clinton Global Initiative and the Nature Conservancy, Sistema Biobolsa plans to expand their reach into the most underserved parts of Latin America, the Caribbean, and Africa. Their mantra is simple: There is no waste, only resources. It's an elegant solution to a problem not enough people know exists."

Read a Clinton Foundation blog post authored by the co-founder of Sistema Biobolsa: https://www.clintonfoundation.org/blog/2015/10/05/creating-renewable-energy-organic-waste
Share the blogpost on TWITTER: https://twitter.com/ClintonGlobal/status/674340685558886400

Clinton Health Matters Activation Summit to explore "Communities as Centers of Health Innovation"
We're excited to announce that we will be returning to the Coachella Valley, where President Clinton and Chelsea Clinton will host the Clinton Health Matters Activation Summit. The anchor event of the Clinton Health Matters Initiative will bring together more than 400 leaders in healthcare, technology, business, education, and government to highlight systemic approaches to chronic disease prevention nationwide. Read a story in the Desert Sun on what to expect at the 2016 summit.

"The Clinton Health Matters Initiative Activation Summit, now going into its fifth year, aims to bring together leaders in health care and other fields to discuss ways to address chronic diseases nationwide."

Share the announcement on TWITTER: https://twitter.com/ClintonFdn/status/674617004687548416

#NotThere named finalist for best nonprofit campaign of the year
PR Week announced that the No Ceilings' "#NotThere " campaign is a finalist for their "nonprofit campaign of the year" award. On International Women's Day, "Not There" used data compiled and released on NoCeilings.org to engage hundreds of thousands of Americans on the progress girls and women have made over the last twenty years, and the gaps to gender equality that still remain. The winner will be announced on March 17.

In Case You Missed It:

Television host Conan O'Brian will be participating in this year's CGI U meeting, which is taking place at the University of California, Berkeley from April 1-3, 2016. Watch a clip of Conan discussing his involvement with CGI U.

Clinton Foundation president Donna Shalala authored a piece for Elite Daily on ways young people can get involved in social good.

The Clinton Health Matters Initiative announced progress with their Northeast Florida Blueprint for Action to decrease rates of preventable disease in the region. Read the front page story in The Florida Times-Union.

A piece in the Des Moines Register argues that more women are needed in STEM-related fields and references the Clinton Foundation's No Ceilings report when discussing the gender imbalance in STEM.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Brian Fallon" <bfallon@hillaryclinton.com>
To: "John Anzalone" <john@algpolling.com>
Date: 10/4/2015 8:24:51 AM
Subject: Re: BS and guns

Circling back around on guns as a follow up to the Friday morning discussion: the Today show has indicated they definitely plan to ask bout guns, and so to have the discussion be more of a news event than her previous times discussing guns, we are going to background reporters tonight on a few of the specific proposals she would support as President - universal background checks of course, but also closing the gun show loophole by executive order and imposing manufacturer liability.

On Friday, October 2, 2015, John Anzalone <john@algpolling.com > wrote:

> Here is the BS interview last night on tragedy/guns last night I referenced on the call where he punts on gun manufacturer liability. He also keeps using the term "sensible" gun legislation
>
> MSNBC's All in With Chris Hayes: Bernie Sanders on Gun Control and Oregon Shooting
>
> Link: http://mms.tveyes.com/PlaybackPortal.aspx?SavedEditID=5d507cd6-3074-4f06-aabe-41c26000012a
>
> Rough Transcript
>
> CHRIS HAYES: i just spoke with presidential candidate Bernie Sanders, vermont senator, and i asked him for his reaction to today's mass shooting.
>
> BERNIE SANDERS: you know, chris, i saw the president's statement. and i know him well enough to know that this was very personal for him, that he is disgusted, he is angry, he is sick and tired, as we all are, of sending our condolences to the families of people who have been murdered in cold blood. and the president is right. condolences are not enough. we've got to do something. we have to stop shooting at each other. we need sensible gun control legislation. and by the way, we need to significantly improve mental health services in the united states of america. and i pledge to do everything that i can in both of those areas.
>
> CHRIS HAYES: yeah, if you were elected president is this something that would be a priority for you? have you thought about how you go about putting in place the policies that could reduce the amount of mass shootings we see?
>
> BERNIE SANDERS: well, i don't think anyone has all the answers, but i think some of the components are first of all guns should not be in the hands of people who should not have them. people who have criminal records, people who are mentally ill. and that means we need a very strong instant background check system. number two, we have a huge loophole right now in gun legislation in that unlicensed gun dealers can sell guns at these gun shows. that's the gun show loophole, which has to be eliminated. and in my view, which is somewhat controversial, i don't think in this country we should be selling or distributing weapons of mass -- weapons that are designed just to kill people, automatic weapons, military type weapons. and that's what i voted for. but what we need, chris, as a nation is to get beyond the shouting. some people want to ban every gun in america and some people believe in nothing at all. i think the vast majority of the american people, as the president indicated, including gun owners, and i know that's true here in vermont, want sensible gun control legislation and they also believe that we should have more access to mental health facilities and counselors than we presently do. the bottom line is if somebody is suicidal, somebody is homicidal, you've got to make sure that person gets care and attention immediately, not two months from today.
>
> CHRIS HAYES: you reference that your constituents in vermont, a state of course you represent, that's a state that it's my understanding of the statistics has relatively high levels of gun ownership, relatively low levels of gun violence. compared to some other states.
>
> BERNIE SANDERS: yeah.
>
> CHRIS HAYES: you also -- you voted for some gun safety legislation and against others. you voted for the brady bill, for instant background checks, against a bill that would have allowed lawsuits against gun companies. has your thinking on this evolved over time? have you been influenced in how you think about it in discussions with your constituents who are gun owners?
>
> BERNIE SANDERS: well, i think we are all disgusted and horrified by these mass killings. and as the president indicated, we're tired of sending condolences and we know that it could happen tomorrow, it could happen again a month from now. i have voted as i said a moment ago for what i think is the most important provision, and that is strong instant background checks to make sure that people who should not have guns do not have guns. and i have voted to eliminate this gun show loophole, which is what we have got to do. and i think, chris --
>
> CHRIS HAYES: but the fact --
>
> BERNIE SANDERS: -- that at the end of the day --
>
> CHRIS HAYES: if i could just say, senator --

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

BERNIE SANDERS: yes.

CHRIS HAYES: there's two things about this. one is it strikes me it may prove to be a more difficult policy problem than we're prepared to admit about keeping guns out of the hands of the wrong people. and it may be that that isn't enough. the sort of items that you've indicated, that if we need to take a more robust approach like, say, in australia or england, which the president mentioned today.

BERNIE SANDERS: well, i don't -- i don't know that anybody knows what the magic solution is. what we do know is the current situation is not tenable. it is clearly not working. and as the president indicated we can and must do a lot better. i believe -- i'll tell you what else i believe. you can sit there and say i think we should do this and do that states in this country where but you've got a whole lot of people want virtually no gun control at all. and if we are going to have some success we are going to have to start talking to each other. and here's what i think is the good news, that i think there is a consensus for serious gun control including among people who own guns. and i think that's what we have to bring about. and the fact we have folks in congress who don't even want us to get information about shootings in this country and fatalities, that's pretty crazy stuff. so i think the job is to bring people together and say yes, we've got to move forward, we've got to move forward aggressively, stop the shouting and let's work together to do something that's realistic.

CHRIS HAYES: senator Bernie Sanders.

John Anzalone
Partner
Anzalone Liszt Grove Research
(o) 334.387.3121
Website | Twitter | LinkedIn | Facebook

From: Kate Offerdahl <kofferdahl@hillaryclinton.com >
Date: Friday, October 2, 2015 at 6:01 AM
To: Amanda Renteria <arenteria@hillaryclinton.com >, Brian Fallon <bfallon@hillaryclinton.com >, "caitlin@grunwald-communications.com" <caitlin@grunwald-communications.com >, Christina Reynolds <creynolds@hillaryclinton.com >, Dan Schwerin <dschwerin@hillaryclinton.com >, David Binder <david@db-research.com >, Ellen Esterhay <ellen.esterhay@gmmb.com >, Huma Abedin <ha16@hillaryclinton.com >, Jake Sullivan <jsullivan@hillaryclinton.com >, Jennifer Palmieri <jpalmieri@hillaryclinton.com >, Jim Margolis <Jim.Margolis@gmmb.com >, Joel Beneneson <Jbenenson@bsgco.com >, John Anzalone <john@algpolling.com >, John Podesta <jp66@hillaryclinton.com >, John Podesta <john.podesta@gmail.com >, Karen Finney <kfinney@hillaryclinton.com >, Kristina Schake <kschake@hillaryclinton.com >, Mindy Grunwald <gruncom@aol.com >, Marlon Marshall <mmarshall@hillaryclinton.com >, Maya Harris <mharris@hillaryclinton.com >, Mike Vlacich <mvlacich@hillaryclinton.com >, Milia Fisher <mfisher@hillaryclinton.com >, Mona Thinavongsa <Mona@algpolling.com >, Oren Shur <oshur@hillaryclinton.com >, Robby Mook <re47@hillaryclinton.com >, Sara Latham <slatham@hillaryclinton.com >, Sawsan Bay <sbay@hillaryclinton.com >, Shannon Currie <scurrie@bsgco.com >, Teddy Goff <tgoff@hillaryclinton.com >, Tony Carrk <tcarrk@hillaryclinton.com >, Varun Anand <vanand@hillaryclinton.com >, Heather Stone <hstone@hillaryclinton.com >
Subject: Accomplishments for 8AM

Dear all,

Please see the below foreign policy accomplishments, for discussion on today's 8am call.

Thanks!
Kate

She has a long list of accomplishments, but to name 3…:

- She built the toughest sanctions regime on Iran in history, twisting arms in China, Russia, and dozens of other countries, to force Iran to the negotiating table. And when pressure started working, she sent her closest aides to explore a deal that would cut off Iran's path to a nuclear weapon.

- She personally negotiated an end to Hamas rockets raining down on Israel in 2012 and worked to build stronger defense programs for Israel, including upgrading the Iron Dome rocket defense system, which has saved the lives of so many Israelis.

- She fought to make women's rights a priority in international relations. She stood up against sex trafficking of women and children, intervened in Saudi Arabia to prevent child marriage, and led the fight for a UN Security Council resolution to combat sexual violence against women and children around the world that passed unanimously.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

...And 3 more....

- She oversaw negotiation and worked to ensure ratification of the New START treaty, which will make the world safer by reducing U.S. and Russian nuclear arsenals to their smallest size in 50 years.

- She helped build the unprecedented global effort to combat climate change, joining with President Obama to stand up to the Chinese in Copenhagen and get them to take responsibility for the first time, resulting in last year's major climate agreement.

- She stood up to Russia, China, and Iran on internet freedom and fought for the "freedom to connect" around the world.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Zayneb Shaikley" <zshaikley@clintonfoundation.org>
To:	"Hannah Richert - PC" <hannah@presidentclinton.com>
	"Bruce Lindsey" <blindsey@clintonfoundation.org>
	"Laura Graham" <lgraham@clintonfoundation.org>
	"Stephanie Streett" <sstreett@clintonfoundation.org>
Date:	12/21/2012 9:17:17 AM
Subject:	Biweekly Report for WJC
Attachments:	Biweekly Report 12.21.12.docx

Hannah,
Attached and below is the latest biweekly report for President Clinton.
Please let me know if he has any questions or comments.
Happy holidays!
Zayneb

Biweekly Report
William J. Clinton Foundation
December 21, 2012

MAJOR DOMESTIC INITIATIVES

Alliance for a Healthier Generation (AHG)

Kaiser Permanente has awarded the Alliance a $5.3 million grant to expand the Healthy Schools Program in six new markets. This is embargoed until the formal announcement in early 2013.

Senior Alliance team members continue to meet with the ABA, Coke, PepsiCo and Dr Pepper Snapple about expanding Alliance nutrition guidelines to afterschool programs and other child-focused settings.

Clinton Health Matters Initiative (CHMI)

Mayor Steve Pougnet of Palm Springs has raised more than $200,000 to support local CHMI efforts in the Coachella Valley. The Desert Healthcare Foundation has agreed to match these finds and to administer the funds in partnership with the Foundation.

The CHMI has amassed more than 20 pledges to showcase at the Health Matters conference in January.

With the support of GE, CHMI will add Houston to its list of focus communities in early 2013. This is embargoed information.

MAJOR INTERNATIONAL INITIATIVES

Clinton Development Initiative (CDI)

Rwanda (CHDI)

Construction of the soybean factory is 70 percent complete and is projected to be complete in June/July 2013. The boiler arrived at the site last week. From December 22 to January 2, work on the site will be put on hold for the holidays.

Regarding the AGRA project, planting is now complete and crops look good in the areas that received rains. The AGRA representative who visited the site last week was very pleased with the progress on the field and the way CHDI has set up its demos. CHDI's report for the AGRA project last semester has been sent to the AGRA headquarters.

Clinton Giustra Sustainable Growth Initiative (CGSGI)

CGSGI is concluding 2012 with some key accomplishments, including:

- Completion of over 47,000 cataract surgeries in Peru with the 50,000 goal expected to be reached by March, 2013 and at a cost of $160/surgery, which is $40 less per surgery than the original targeted cost of $200.

- Training and certification of 5,300 construction workers in Colombia, exceeding the 5,000 target.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- Investment approval of two new ventures in Cartagena, Colombia including 1) creation of a Manpower Training Center that will train over 20,000 low income residents over the next ten years for jobs in the hospitality and other sectors and 2) creation of a Supply Chain Impact Enterprise for the purchase and collection of produce, fish and seafood from small vendors and producers for market and distribution to hotels, restaurants and supermarkets. This new venture will create over 1,000 jobs and impact over 4,000 beneficiaries.

- Restructuring of CGSGI's strategy to achieve scalable, sustainable and measurable results in poverty reduction through the creation of supply chain impact and distribution enterprises that provide poor communities gainful access to markets.

- In addition to the supply chain impact enterprise being formed in Cartagena, CGSGI is developing new projects or pilots that will lead to other potential impact enterprises including a hotel supplier network in Cusco, Peru, a small supplier network for one of Peru's largest supermarkets, and the piloting of an agro value chain opportunity in India with the prospect of benefitting 10,000 farmers.

As you know, CGSGI also hosted a successful Fair Trade summit in December along with the Skoll Foundation and the Avina Foundation. Approximately 40 stakeholders attended including representatives from corporate bodies (e.g. Green Mountain Coffee, Whole Foods, Walmart), NGOs (e.g. Heifer International, Catholic Relief Services), and beneficiaries from Rwanda, Haiti, Costa Rica, and Ecuador. The goal of the summit was to discuss the collaboration and commitments required to take Fair Trade's impact to scale. Both you and Frank Giustra participated in the Summit.

Clinton Global Initiative (CGI)

On Thursday, December 20, New York City Comptroller John Liu announced in his State of the City address that an additional $1.5 billion or more has now been allocated for the AFL-CIO/AFT CGI America Commitment by New York City public employee pension funds. The funds making these additional allocations represent the NYC Local of the Teamsters, AFSCME, and Transportation Workers Union as well as the Firefighters and Police. This should bring the total raised for the entire commitment well above $4 billion out of the $10 billion original commitment. This follows up on your announcement in a press conference last week of a $1 billion allocation to new investments in infrastructure projects.

On Friday, December 14, as part of the year-round programming in the Response and Resilience Track, CGI held a convening to discuss where collaboration is most needed as we transition from immediate response to reconstruction post Hurricane Sandy. Mayor Mitch Landrieu of New Orleans shared lessons learned from Hurricane Katrina. John Liu, Comptroller of the City of New York, and other federal, state and city government officials from New Jersey and New York along with more than 40 CGI members attended.

Zayneb K. Shaikley
Associate Counsel & Initiative Liaison | William J. Clinton Foundation
77 Water Street, New York, NY 10005
Direct: 917.720.0295 | Mobile: 646.873.0244
zshaikley@clintonfoundation.org | www.clintonfoundation.org

This e-mail, and any attachments hereto, is intended only for use by the addressee(s) named herein and may contain legally privileged and/or confidential information. Any unauthorized use or dissemination of this message in whole or in part is strictly prohibited. If you have received it by mistake please notify the sender by return e-mail and delete this message from your system.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "German Marshall Fund" <press@gmfus.org>
To: podesta@law.georgetown.edu
Date: 6/23/2015 6:00:00 PM
Subject: GMF's World Wire: NATO, Russia, and the West | Conversation with U.S. Air Force Sec | Tech Entrepreneurship

If you have problems viewing this email, you can view it as a web page. To view the mobile-friendly web page click here

G | M | F The German Marshall Fund of the United States
STRENGTHENING TRANSATLANTIC COOPERATION

Our Organization | Our Work | Our Events | Our Experts | Support GMF

GMF's World Wire

June 24, 2015

After Ukraine, NATO's Chance for a New Normal

Derek Chollet
Listening to politicians and pundits on both sides of the Atlantic, it would be easy to conclude that U.S.–European relations are suffering a major crisis. Yet the reality is better than it seems, and at the same time more complicated. | Defense One

READ MORE

What's Ahead for Russia and the West?

Joerg Forbrig
An optimistic era in Russian-Western relations has ended. Several scenarios for the changing relationship between the West and Russia are outlined.

READ MORE

Transatlantic Academy 2016 Fellows Announced

The Transatlantic Academy announced its new 2015-16 fellows who will research "Russia and the West," producing recommendations that outline Western policy options regarding Russia.

READ MORE

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Tweet of the Week

@braderstorf :
If you read one explanation of where #TPP stands, make it this one from @The_Dialogue board member Jim Kolbe @gmfus http://www.gmfus.org/blog…

RETWEET

Conversation with U.S. Secretary of the Air Force

On June 17, GMF hosted a conversation in Brussels with U.S. Secretary of the Air Force Deborah Lee James. James offered her vision of the global security challenges.

READ MORE

Challenges of Tech Entrepreneurship

On June 18, GMF hosted a roundtable discussion with board member Chris Schroeder in Berlin on the opportunities and challenges of tech entrepreneurship.

READ MORE

Policy Leadership Civil Society

Follow

Strengthening Transatlantic Cooperation

Our Organization
About GMF
Career Opportunities
Press Room

Our Work
Leadership
Policy
Civil Society
Research & Analysis
Transatlantic Academy

Our Events
Major Conferences & Forums
Recent & Upcoming Events

Our Experts
Find an Expert

Manage preferences | Forward email | Unsubscribe | Subscribe

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Milia Fisher" <mfisher@hillaryclinton.com>
To: "John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
Date: 5/1/2015 4:15:15 AM
Subject: Re: TWEETS 5/1

BREAKING: "The state attorney of Baltimore, in a unexpected announcement, said Friday that she had probable cause to file homicide, manslaughter and misconduct charges against the police officers in the death of Freddie Gray, who died after sustaining a spinal cord injury while in police custody.

In a news conference Friday, the state attorney, Marilyn J. Mosby, said that the death of Mr. Gray had been ruled a homicide and the police had been negligent in his death.

“We have probable cause to file criminal charges,” Ms. Mosby said. As Ms. Mosby spoke outside the War Memorial here, dozens of police officers dressed in riot gear stood nearby."- NYT

Her statement has been met with an outpouring of support on Twitter. Including:

TWEET:

Commend efforts of @MarilynMosbyEsq to seek justice for Freddie Gray and for the youth of Baltimore.

Note: "justice for the youth of Baltimore" echoes a line from her press statement. Could wait until HRC makes a statement if you're worried about getting out ahead of her.

On Fri, May 1, 2015 at 10:25 AM, Milia Fisher <mfisher@hillaryclinton.com > wrote:

> Note: my new goal is to send a second round of Tweets in the PM to respond to campaign developments throughout the day.
>
> TWEETS 5/1
>
> New study: ice-loss in Antarctica increased 6 bil tons/year each year from 2003 to 2014. Cap melting faster than ever. tp://bit.ly/1JegM3y (140)
>
> If you can't keep track of Schweizer's fabrications, distortions in "Clinton Cash" @MediaMatters can help: http://bit.ly/1GCbj3A (137)
>
> RETWEETS 5/1
>
> Suggestion from KLC:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

US Dept of Interior @Interior · 22h

Check out the Share the Experience photo contest winner: Polar bears at Arctic #WildlifeRefuge by Gregory Teller

193 226 View more photos and videos

--
Milia Fisher
Special Assistant to the Chair
Hillary for America
mfisher@hillaryclinton.com
o: 646.854.1198 c: 858.395.1741

--
Milia Fisher
Special Assistant to the Chair
Hillary for America
mfisher@hillaryclinton.com
o: 646.854.1198 c: 858.395.1741

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Sara DuBois" <sara@progressiveaccountability.org>
To: bigcampaign@googlegroups.com
Date: 10/28/2008 4:44:11 AM
Subject: [big campaign] Tracking Update: McCain/Palin Rally in Hershey, PA 10/28/08

Hello All,
Just got off the phone with our tracker, Jacob, on the ground in Hershey, PA. Below are the notes from our call.

Big Highlights
[McCain Highlights]

- 2 mavericks don't always agree, but it's a lot of fun
- Says Obama has made a lot of promises. first he said people making less than $250k would benefit from his plan, then this weekend he announced in an ad that if you're a family making less than $200k you'll benefit -- yesterday in PA Biden said tax relief should only go to "middle class people -- people making under $150k/year."
    - Says It's interesting how their definition of rich has a way of creeping down. At this rate, it won't be long before Senator Obama is right back to his vote that Americans making just $42k / year should get a tax increase
- says Obama wants to punish the successful, I want to make people successful.
- Chides: no one will delay World Series w/ an infomercial when I'm president
- Repeats Palin will reform old-boy network just like she did in AK
- Vows we'll fool the pundits and win PA - this state is independent and thats why we're gonna win
- Brings up obama's comments 7 yrs ago for "resdistributive change" -- Repeats line that Obama will be Redistributionist-in-Chief

[Palin Highlights]

- disrupted by Obama demonstrators -- repeats standard line that she's tempted to have them stay and learn something from all of you

Hershey, PA: McCain / Palin Rally 10/28/08
(Disclaimer: The following are notes, not direct quotes. If you'd like a quotable transcript or video of any part below, please email us.)

Background details

- about 8000-9000 ppl (75% full, seats in 2nd tier and behind press risers mostly empty)
- People wearing Obama shirts stood up during Palin's speech w/ signs and were escorted out
- Tracker didn't see any demonstrators outside the event
- Mike Duhaime spotted walking around the press risers
- Before event, lights went down and videos of Palin speech excerpts (ppl being excited about her) and McCain biography (focusing on his time as POW and being tortured, McCain tells 'cross-in-the-dirt' story) were shown
- Intros
    - Tom Corbitt (AG) gives intro remarks - I cant wait to hear from McCain, and I definitely can't wait to hear from Palin (crowd roars)
    - State Rep. Jeff Poppola
- Straight Talk Express bus pulls into stadium to "Eye of The Tiger" -- Cindy, John, Sarah and Todd descend
- Cindy McCain intros McCain

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Speech Highlights
[Palin Highlights]

-
- Thank you so much. Thank you PA. It is so good to be here with you and to be here with the next first lady of the US first lady, Cindy McCain
- Alaska's first dude, commercial fisherman, production operator, great dad, 4 time world champion of Iron Dog.
- You are such a welcoming and patriotic state, I know we have patriots here. Raise your hands if you are veterans, let us honor you. We thank you for your service and sacrifice
- Come down to the wire here. PA, ready to carry this state to victory? Make John McCain next Pres? Send us to Washington to shake things up?
- A week from today will be our time for choosing [booing] [John McCain]
- I don't know, when we hear protests like that, tempted to tell security to let them stay so they can learn a thing or two from you.
- Need a leader with experience, good judgment, isn't afraid to use the word victory. Served for 22 yrs, POW. Kind of man I want as commander in chief.
- We know that when it comes to national security it is a given it must be JM.
- On our economy, you have such a choice. Our opponent not being candid. Not mean-spirited, not negative campaigning to call someone out on their record. In fairness to you, our voters. Hiding being agenda of redistributing your hard-earned money. Takes your money and gives it away according to politicians' priorities. JM, tax cut.
- Gotta hand it to Joe the Plumber. Got our opponent to state his intentions in plain language. Spread the wealth. Govt. taking your money, from small business, and doling it out. Joe Biden calls it patriotic. Joe the Plumber says it sounds like socialism. Not the time to experiment like that.
- Joe the chocolate maker. "I am Joe-mama". Yesterday, Tito Munos owns small construction company. "Tito the Builder" Not happy with roughing up Joe the Plumber. Tito question of his own, wants to know, why the heck are you going after Joe the Plumber? He has a future. He wants something else. Why is that so wrong? Immigrant from Columbia. Everything is possible in America. I made it, and Joe can make it bigger than me. Born in Columbia, but made in the USA [USA]
- Tito isn't only McCain supporter who feels that way. Small business owners here with us. If you know what hard work feel like, and if you don't want your dreams dashed by Obama, then you're Joe the Plumber too. And we're all in this together. Doesn't sound like too many of support Barack the Wealth Spreader. His attempt to distribute stifles entrepreneurial spirit that makes this greatest country on earth
- John McCain will lower your taxes, double child tax deduction, capital gains tax, cut business tax to keep businesses in America.
- Set this nation on course to energy independence. Drill here, drill now. [drill baby drill]. That's right, drill baby drill, and mine baby mine. Because we need American resources, brought to you by American ingenuity, by American workers.
- Our opponents put our faith in govt. John and I put our faith in you. We believe in R.R., forward movement of freedom, not constant expansion of govt. We believe that the best of America not all in DC. Here in kindness and courage of everyday Americans. Grow our food, teach our children, fight our wars. This is where the goodness is . America is not the problem. America is the solution. Shining city on a hill that Reagan used to speak of. Someone that inspires us with heroic deeds, not just words.
- PA, if you believe in what we believe in, shake up Wall Street, get economy on track, win the war- we need your votes. A week from now you're going to hear our opponents say they will fight for you. There is only one man in this race who has ever really fought for you. Only one man with the courage to keep on fighting for you.

[McCain Highlights]

-
- Thank you, thank you. Isn't this just going to be a marvelous vp of America? You know, I couldn't be more pleased because of your enthusiasm. One place not enthused, old boy network. Palin will show them reform, like she did in AK. When two Mavericks join up, we don't believe in everything. Todd broke his arm and finished the race, do you think he's afraid of anything in DC?
- Cindy McCain. A word of gratitude. Tom Ridge, best governor. Friend and comrade.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- Wonderful to fool the pundits. We're going to win on November 4th. We can't spend the next 4yrs like the last 8. Waiting for luck to change at home and abroad. I've been fighting, have the scars to prove it. If I'm elected, will shake up Washington. I'm not afraid of the fight, I'm ready for it. Hold the line on taxes, cut them, double the child deduction, cut capital gains tax, cut business taxes. Raising taxes makes bad economy worse. Keeping taxes low creates jobs. Senator Obama will spend another trillion of your money. I going to make govt. live on a budget, just like you do. Freeze govt spending, except for defense, vets, social security, healthcare. Veto every pork barrel earmark bill. You will know their names. [no more pork] No more pork, that's right. Not going to bail out bankers and brokers that got us into this mess. Take care of people devastated by excess of wall street. Mortgage plan to your neighbor doesn't default. Stay with American dream of staying in your home.
- We're going to stop sending billions overseas to countries that don't like us very much . We're going to stop it. In debate, I paid a great appreciation to Obama's eloquence, gotta pay attention to his words. he said he did blah, blah,blah. We don't need to consider off shore drilling. Says for nuclear fuel, doesn't want to store or reprocess. We've been sailing navy ships around the world and its safe. Creating 45 new nuclear powerplants- create jobs. Clean coal will lead us, will create millions of jobs. Us and PA on coal reserves. [We want coal] You've got coal, that's right. And you've got independence, and you've got judgment
- We learned over last two weeks Senator Obama's plans because Joe asked him. When Senator Obama says he wants to spread the wealth around. Joe didn't ask for Obama to come to his house, to become famous, for political attacks form Obama campaign. Joe dream American dream. Attack on him is attack on small businesses. We need to support small businesses, not tax them. After months of campaign eloquence, we find out the real. Obama said the tragedy of civil rights movement, it didn't bring back redistributive change. Favors higher taxes on investment for fairness. [impassioned] Nothing fair about driving economy into the ground. More interested in controlling wealth than creating it. I'm going to create wealth for all Americans, by creating opportunity.. Sen Obama redistributionist in chief. I run for commander in chief. Obama spread the wealth, I create the wealth. Senator Obama punish the successful, I want to make people successful.
- Senator Obama has made a lot of promises. First he said people making less than 250,000 dollars would benefit from his plan, then this weekend he announced in an ad that if you're a family making less than 200,000 dollars you'll benefit -- but yesterday, right here in Pennsylvania, Senator Biden said tax relief should only go to "middle class people -- people making under 150,000 dollars a year." It's interesting how their definition of rich has a way of creeping down. At this rate, it won't be long before Senator Obama is right back to his vote that Americans making just 42,000 dollars a year should get a tax increase. We can't let that happen.
- We can't let democrats take control of Washington. We need pro-growth, not pro-spending. Fundamental difference, both disagree with Pres Bush, difference he thinks taxes too low, I think too high. Next pres won't have time to get used to the office.
- I will bring troops home with victory and honor, not defeat. Ever heard victory pass Obama's lips? My friends, we're winning in Iraq. We'll win in Afghanistan. S
- Senator Biden warned, Senator Obama with an intl. crisis. I've been tested, Senator Obama hasn't. Senator Biden said Jack Kennedy tested during Cuban missile crisis. I was on USS enterprise, I know, I don't need to be tested. Already know Obama won't have right response, wrong response the entire campaign. Sit down unconditionally with bad leaders.
- We will win in Afghanistan, our troops will come home. They will be proud, you will be proud. Pundits wrote us off, as they have before. Obama mapping out details with Pelosi and Reid to raise your taxes, measuring his drapes, planning his address. No one will delay World Series with a statement when I'm president. Guess I'm old fashioned about these things, I 'll let voters decide outcome. Someone who will fight to the end. Others way to love this country, I don't back down when the stakes are high. My friends, I know you're worried. Moment of national crisis that will decide our future. Will we lead economy, will our military stay strong, will our children''s future be brighter than ours. Yes we'lll be safer, yes we'll be stronger. I choose to fight. Fight for new direction, what's right for America, get economy out of ditch, fight for ideals of people. Fight for justice. Stand up and fight, America is worth for fighting for. Nothing is inevitable. Let's win this election and get this country moving again. [impassioned]
- [hugs Palin]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

--
Sara DuBois
Tracking / Communications Manager
ProgressiveAccountability.org
sara@progressiveaccountability.org
202-609-7681 (office)
410-967-7306 (cell)

--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~
You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail lori@progressiveaccountability.org with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.
-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Sarah Stephens" <sarah@democracyinamericas.org>
To: john.podesta@gmail.com
Date: 9/18/2015 11:44:34 AM
Subject: As Francis Takes Flight to Cuba, Obama Revises the Rules

Having trouble viewing this message? Click Here

September 18, 2015

Dear Friends,

Pope Francis will land in Cuba tomorrow for a three-day visit for what the Vatican has called a "complex trip."

In the run-up to his visit, Cubans were able to prescreen a video from the Pontiff whose message was direct, open, and clear:

> "I would like to convey to you such a simple message. I think it's important and necessary. Jesus loves you very much. He seriously loves you. He carries you in his heart and knows better than anyone what each of us needs and craves, what our deepest wishes are. And he never abandons us. And when we don't behave as he wishes, he is always there, ready to comfort, to give us new hope, a new opportunity, a new life. He never leaves. He is always there."

Like John Paul II and Benedict XVI before him, Pope Francis is visiting Cuba believing he can make a difference - in the lives of faithful Cubans and in the normalization process between the U.S. and Cuban governments that was able to launch, in part, because of his support.

There's a sign in the John F. Kennedy Presidential Library in Boston - One person can make a difference, and everyone should try - quoting a speech that today exemplifies the leadership that Pope Francis is trying to provide.

Much has been written about Francis's imminent trip to the island that demonstrates his seriousness of purpose and illustrates the ripple effects his visit can have.

The commentary reminds us that he is the first South American to lead the Roman Catholic Church, a native speaker of Spanish, the author of a book about John Paul II's 1998 visit to Cuba, and someone who has dedicated his papacy, as Andrew Chesnut reminds us, "to the periphery."

It is from this vantage point that Cardinal Jaime Ortega says the pontiff is paying "special deference" to the Cuban Catholic Church at a time when, as the Miami Herald reported , "interesting perspectives are being opened in our national life by the new possibilities of dialogue and mutual listening taking place between the United States and Cuba for the good of both countries and all of Latin America."

The opening, which Pope Francis helped make possible, is not the only motivating force in his visit, but it is present in its political and pastoral dimensions. The Pope is expected to raise his voice in favor of ending the U.S. embargo against Cuba - if not on the island, perhaps later in Washington or in New York at the United Nations where he will address the General Assembly - because, as the Vatican secretary of state, Cardinal Pietro Parolin said, 'the Holy See had always opposed the trade and economic embargo against

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Cuba because it hurts ordinary people most.'

This is consistent with his history of John Paul II's visit. As Nick Miroff writes, "the book was critical of Cuba's version of authoritarian socialism, but it echoed John Paul's call for an end to the punitive U.S. trade embargo."

In his journey to and across Cuba, Pope Francis will elevate the role that Cuba's Catholic Church is playing in the pews, the places outside of Church, and the halls of power.

Quoting again the Miami Herald, "Since John Paul's visit in 1998 and Benedict's 2012 trip, the church has been consolidating its strength on the island and building on those papal visits to gain more space for its activities, which range from educating Cuba's budding private entrepreneurs in its Cuba Emprende program to running soup kitchens for the elderly and after-school programs for children."

Cardinal Ortega will be by the Pope's side, and for good reason. As Reuters explains, "Ortega negotiated the release of 126 political prisoners in 2010 and 2011. He also played a role last year in Cuba's detente with the United States, leading to the renewal of diplomatic relations after 54 years of Cold War hostility."

That has made the Cardinal controversial among U.S. hardliners who don't appreciate the extent to which the church has become "the largest non-governmental organization in Cuba," again quoting Reuters. In 2012, the director for Radio and TV Martí, Carlos Garcia-Perez, called Cardinal Ortega "a lackey" just ahead of Pope Benedict's visit, and the Cardinal has been under fire for his role in creating greater space for expression in Cuba.

It may be politically inconvenient to see the Church erase the black-and-white imagery with which hardliners describe Cuba, but that has not discouraged pilgrims from Miami, hopeful about the Pope's message of reconciliation, from making the trip to Cuba (some for the very first time) in order to hear and see Francis say Mass.

In fact, the last two Papal visits have changed Cubans' lives. Dionisio Garcia, the archbishop of Santiago de Cuba and president of the Cuban Bishops' Conference, told Reuters, "Things have improved for all religions. I believe the state's mentality has changed. There is more tolerance at the moment for religious practices. Not everything one would want, but it has changed for the better."

Not everything is better. Ahead of the Pope's visit to Cuba, Cuban police arrested protesters from The Ladies in White, as NBC News reported, but these detentions gain greater visibility because the Pope is about to land for a three-day trip to Cuba.

Three time zones away from the Kennedy Library, Senator Marco Rubio closed the debate at the Ronald Reagan Presidential Library with the other candidates running for president, saying he'd fly Air Force One to Israel, South Korea and Japan, to show our allies "we stand with them."

Then, he'd fly to China "not just to meet with those adversaries of ours that are there, but also to meet with those that aspire to freedom and liberty within China." He said he'd fly into Moscow, meeting both with Putin and his opponents.

But, ultimately, he'd never go to Cuba on Air Force One, until its people "could choose its leaders and its own destiny."

It's a mighty contrast with how Pope Francis defines his leadership. He is acting to make a difference now; not to dictate Cuba's future from Rome (or have it dictated from Washington), but to put the pen in the hands of the Cuban people so they can write their own.

The Pope's plane lands in Havana tomorrow. Someday, Air Force One will land there, too. We suspect we will see it arrive before January 20th, 2017. Aboard will be a president who made significant changes in U.S. policy toward Cuba even today.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This week in Cuba News..

U.S.-CUBA RELATIONS
U.S. issues new rules boosting travel, trade with Cuba; Countries close to pacts on mail service and flights
CDA Urges Secretary Kerry Halt to BBG's Regime Change Sitcom
New school to be built at Guantánamo Bay according to U.S. Navy contract announcement
Sony Music Entertainment signs major deal to distribute Cuban music worldwide
IN CUBA
Pope will touch on Cuba embargo during US-Cuba trip
"Social cleansing" and dissident arrests continue prior to papal visit
CARICOM seeks scientific collaboration in Cuba this week
CUBA'S FOREIGN RELATIONS
President Raúl Castro will speak at UN General Assembly in New York
Jose Cabañas Appointed as Ambassador to the United States
China and Cuba sign memorandum to boost cooperation in tourism sector
Recommended Reading
The State of Cuba, Azam Ahmed and Victoria Burnett , The New York Times
Memo to Pope Francis: Cuba Wasn't All That Catholic Even Before Castro , Tim Padgett, WLRN
Pope of the Periphery Puts Cuba Front and Center , Andrew Chesnut, The Dialogue
Recommended Viewing
The Moral Perspectives and Policy Priorities of Pope Francis , John L. Allen Jr., Council on Foreign Relations
U.S. Kayakers Paddle from Cuba to Key West , WSJ

U.S.-CUBA RELATIONS

U.S. issues new rules boosting travel, trade with Cuba ; Countries close to pacts on mail service and flights

The Obama administration today issued new regulations further easing restrictions on travel to Cuba and doing business in Cuba, changes that will benefit people and businesses in the U.S. and on the island. Restrictions on certain remittances to Cuba have been entirely removed according to new Office of Foreign Assets Control (OFAC) regulations.

Press reports also indicate that the U.S.-Cuba have agreed to the resumption direct mail service, with a civil aviation pact nearing completion. In a related development, Verizon Wireless announced it will be the first U.S.-based wireless company to offer roaming services in Cuba, beginning next week.

The new rules will be implemented on Monday, September 21.

According to the Associated Press , what is driving this progress is an agreement at talks that took place in Havana last week: "delegations from each side established a plan to settle a half-century of economic and legal disputes within the next 15 months."

Reuters reported the new rules:

- Allow U.S. companies to establish offices in Cuba
- Permit joint ventures between U.S. and Cuban firms and establish subsidiaries with Cuba
- Make it easier for airlines and cruise ships to import parts and technology to Cuba to improve the safety of their operations

According to the Wall Street Journal , the new rules also permit "U.S.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

telecommunications companies to open locations as well as bank accounts in Cuba."

The Department of Commerce's Bureau of Industry and Security has also updated its regulations "to authorize exports and re-exports of commodities and software to individuals and private sector entities in Cuba that will be used to develop software that will improve the free flow of information." OFAC further authorized the "employment of Cuban nationals to develop mobile applications."

The new rules governing trade will intensify commercial relations between Cuba and the U.S., invest more U.S. businesses in the process of normalizing trade relations, and build on the actions taken by President Obama in the wake of his historic December 17 announcement of restored diplomatic relations with Cuba.

The Associated Press explained the logic behind the changes:

> "Efforts to expand business, tourism and other exchanges have run into an overlapping thicket of U.S. laws and hindrances, not to mention an uneven response from Cuba's political leaders, the U.S. official said.
>
> "Many U.S. travelers still need to go on supervised group trips. Routine airline service hasn't satisfied various federal conditions. Cruise ships and ferries are still trying to finalize regular maritime routes with Cuban authorities. Credit card and other companies still can't transfer payments to Cuba. Telecommunications companies haven't been able to set up shop and get equipment to the island 90 miles south of Florida. And Cuba's government isn't even running its Internet connections anywhere near capacity levels.
>
> "The new U.S. rules should help cut through some of these bureaucratic hurdles, the official said, though he declined to describe all the legal changes in concrete terms."

According to news reports, "citizens of both the U.S. and Cuba will be able to send and receive letters and packages directly to one another for the first time since 1963."

A prospective agreement between the U.S. and Cuba on civil aviation would enable U.S. carriers to offer regularly scheduled commercial flights to the island, adding to the options for travelers who are now permitted to fly on federally-approved charter services. The U.S. and Cuba have not updated their bilateral agreement for flights since 1953. Additional flights would link logically to reforms expanding travel to Cuba.

The Washington Post reported today that for people-to-people or non-tourist travel - "visitors to Cuba for a wide range of allowed purposes, including business, religious, educational and people-to-people exchange - can now include family members, and travelers can open Cuban bank accounts."

Companies are continuing to use the reforms announced by the Obama administration in January to offer new services in Cuba.

On Thursday, Verizon Wireless said it will provide roaming service that will help make visits and business in Cuba easier. Verizon customers will be able to talk on the phone, send messages, and use data through the company's Pay-As-You-Go International Travel option, according to Miami Herald. Customers using a World Device can add the Pay-As-You-Go International Travel option "to stay connected while in Cuba."

Verizon Wireless joins other communications ventures like IDT Corp which reached an agreement in March with Cuba's Empresa de Telecomunicaciones de Cuba S.A. (ETECSA) to provide direct international long distance communication by telephone.

Most recently, on Wednesday, President Obama urged businessmen to pressure Congress to lift the Cuban embargo, emphasizing the "significant economic opportunities" created by renewed relations reports Fox News Latino.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

CDA Urges Secretary Kerry Halt to BBG's Regime Change Sitcom

The Center for Democracy in the Americas (CDA) wrote Secretary of State John Kerry urging him to stop the project initiated by the Broadcasting Board of Governors to fund a ten-episode situation comedy to ridicule the leaders of Cuba's government and civil society.

We wrote about the BBG program in last week's news blast .

Secretary Kerry also serves on the Broadcasting Board of Governors by virtue of his office.

CDA questioned why the U.S. government was planning to fund programming transmitted to Cuba that ridicules the Cuban leadership at the same time that President Obama and the Secretary are working to reorient U.S. policy toward engagement and respect and away from previous efforts to undermine the Cuban government.

"More than a waste of tax dollars is at stake," Sarah Stephens, executive director of CDA said in her letter to the Secretary, the BBG program risks "confusing the overwhelming majority of Cubans, who want normalization to take place, and emboldening hardliners in Cuba who do not."

Earlier this week, Tracey Eaton , who unearthed the BBG solicitation titled "OCBSatire," reported that the deadline for submitting for programming proposals had been extended from Monday September 14th until today.

The New York Times and Pundit Wire also wrote about the regime change sitcoms. A piece about the controversial program appeared under Sarah Stephens' byline in the Huffington Post .

New school to be built at Guantánamo Bay according to U.S. Navy contract announcement

On Wednesday, the U.S News and World Report reported that the U.S. Navy is seeking a contractor to build a new school for dependents of U.S. civilian and military personnel working on base at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba.

Despite Cuban calls for the return of the base, Administration officials including both Roberta Jacobson , the Assistant Secretary of State for the Bureau of Western Hemisphere Affairs and National Security Advisor Susan Rice have said that Guantánamo Bay is not up for negotiation.

Although the Obama Administration continues to consider ways to close the Guantánamo Bay detention center, the administration contends that Guantánamo Naval Base still has "operational value" and new construction is likely a sign of the Administration commitment to maintaining the base.

On Saturday, the Houston Chronicle reported that efforts to close the detention center, a campaign promise of President Barack Obama in 2008, remain "frustrating." According to U.S. officials familiar with the process, Secretary of Defense Ashton Carter recently notified Congress of two prisoner transfers, and has four more files set to go to Congress by the end of the month. Under the 2014 Defense Department authorization law , Congress has 30 days to review the transfers before they become public. Arrangements must be made to transfer the remaining 116 prisoners out of Guantánamo Bay prison before it can be closed.

The U.S. has occupied the forty-five square acre land adjacent to Guantánamo Bay since 1898 as part of the imposition of the Platt Amendment following the Spanish-American War. The U.S relies on the 1934 Treaty of Relations between the U.S. and Cuba as the basis for doing so.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Sony Music Entertainment signs major deal to distribute Cuban music worldwide

On Tuesday, Billboard reported that Afo Verde, Sony Music chairman and CEO for Latin America, Spain and Portugal and Mario Angel Escalona Serrano, managing director of the Cuba's Empresa de Grabaciones y Ediciones Musicales (EGREM), signed a historic deal licensing EGREM's music catalog for global distribution. The catalog includes over 30,000 songs and 2,300 albums dating from 1964 according to OnCuba.

The agreement, signed in the historic Areíto studio 101, where Cuban artists have recorded since the 1940s, allows Sony to "expand international awareness and appreciation of Cuban culture, Cuba's rich musical heritage and its many wonderful artists" according to Doug Morris, chief executive officer of Sony Music Entertainment. EGREM's managing director echoed Morris saying that the deal would "give new impulsion to the worldwide diffusion of Cuban music."

Recordings included in the catalog are by artists like Bola de Nieve, Elena Burke, Ibrahim Ferrer, Compay Segundo, Celina Gonzalez, Cesar Portillo de la Luz, and Guillermo Rubalcaba, as well as groups like Aragon, Irakere and Los Van Van. While parts of this catalog have been licensed previously, this is the first time that a multinational company has acquired access to the entire catalog as part of a multi-year agreement.

EGREM is the largest record label in Cuba with 95 percent of the market. Sony made this agreement pursuant to the "informational materials" exemption under U.S. sanction rules for Cuba administered by the Office of Foreign Assets Control (OFAC). This exemption applies to music and other works of art and is intended to promote free expression.

IN CUBA

Pope will touch on Cuba embargo during US-Cuba trip

Pope Francis leaves Rome for Cuba on Saturday, where a meeting with Fidel Castro is "likely" but still not scheduled.

On Thursday, September 17, a video of Pope Francis' message to the people of Cuba aired on Cuban TV, according to Cuba's state media. Gustavo Andujar, director of the Felix Varela Cultural Center (one of the main community outreach arms of the Archdiocese of Havana), told Associated Press that the state "has been coming to grips with the reality that they can't guarantee everything to everyone from cradle to the grave, " adding "More and more spaces are opening up each day."

During a trip lasting a total of 9 days, Pope Francis will visit three cities in Cuba (Havana, Holguín, and Santiago) and three in the U.S. (Washington, New York, and Philadelphia), reports La Nación. The schedule can be viewed here .Vatican officials say there is no symbolic significance in the Pope's decision to deliver most of his speeches in the U.S. in Spanish, but the decision to combine the U.S. and Cuba trip is more than coincidental; it is a way for the Pontiff to express support for the rapprochement between the U.S. and Cuba.

Pope Francis' remarks at the White House and first ever speech by a pope to Congress will be in English. The Vatican opposes the embargo; a position that the U.S. Catholic Bishops Conference has expressed publicly for decades; their website has letters, statements, and testimonies on U.S.-Cuba relations dating back to 1989.

Pope Francis will deliver homilies in Spanish at a canonization in Washington, the Catholic Church's world family conference in Philadelphia, and Madison Square Garden, where Cuban American singer Gloria Estefan will sing at a headline show hosted by Archdiocese of New York before Pope Francis' September 25 Mass.

"Social cleansing" and dissident arrests continue prior to papal visit

Today, Cuba's Commission on Human Rights and National Reconciliation expressed "profound indignation" regarding the "social cleansing" of Cuba prior to the papal visit. In their press release, the commission estimates that thousands of poor and homeless

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Cubans have been removed from the streets in anticipation of foreign press surrounding Pope Francis' visit.

The commission explains that government actions are concentrated in Havana, Holguín and Santiago de Cuba- three locations in which Pope Francis will give a mass. Commission representatives ask that the Pope request the immediate release of those detained during the government's clean-up operation.

On Monday, El Nuevo Diario reported that Roberta Jacobson, Assistant Secretary of State for Western Hemisphere Affairs tweeted that she was "Disturbed to see detentions of ladies in white exercising right to non-violent protest in #Cuba ahead of Papal visit." Jacobson's tweet came in response to arrests this past Sunday of 50 individuals participating in a Ladies in White protest according to Reuters . Detentions following mass have become common for the Ladies in White. Ladies in White leader Berta Soler told Reuters individuals with the organization plan to attend masses that Pope Francis will lead in Havana and Holguin while he is in Cuba from Sept. 19-22. The organization has asked to meet with the Pope but it is unclear if this is on the agenda according to PanAm Post .

Sunday's arrests came on the heels of a decision by Cuba's government to release over 3,500 prisoners prior to the papal visit in a gesture of goodwill as we reported here . Groups like #CubaNow expressed concern that the release did not include any political prisoners while calling the overall release "progress."

Jacobson's tweets echo previous concerns she expressed on Twitter like, "We will always speak out against violations of international human rights. These attacks can never be justified. #cuba." At the first meeting of the bilateral commission between the U.S. and Cuba this past Friday, the U.S. and Cuba agreed to a tentative timeline for continued discussion on key topics like human rights according to the U.S Department of State.

CARICOM seeks scientific collaboration in Cuba this week

Members of the Committee on Science, Technology and Innovation of the Caribbean Community (CARICOM) travelled to Cuba on Monday to discuss collaboration according to the Latin American Herald Tribune. Cuban news sources report that experts from CARICOM will meet with officials of the Cuban Ministries of Science and Agriculture, as well as visit the Center for Genetic Engineering and Biotechnology, and the Center of Molecular Immunology.

The three-day delegation is headed by Professor Harold Ramkissoon, who is the director of the regional scientists' network, CARISCIENCE. The government of Grenada organized the trip; however, Cuba is not a CARICOM member. CARICOM comprises Antigua and Barbuda, Bahamas, Barbados, Belize, Dominica, Grenada, Guyana, Haiti, Jamaica, Montserrat, St. Lucia, St. Kitts and Nevis, St. Vincent and the Grenadines, Suriname and Trinidad and Tobago.

The U.S. is also interested in scientific collaboration with Cuba on topics like Cuba's cancer vaccine. Frances Colón, acting science and technology adviser to U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry, gave an interview in May during which he voiced strong interest for increased collaboration noting, "We should empower innovators wherever they are, because solutions can come from anywhere and will more often than not be an idea that is developed and tested by teams that span national and institutional borders. Given our proximity and shared challenges, U.S.-Cuba cooperation can benefit the people of both countries which is why we continue to pursue it."

CUBA'S FOREIGN RELATIONS

President Raúl Castro will speak at UN General Assembly in New York

On Tuesday, the United Nations announced that President Raúl Castro will address the UN General Assembly on September 28 reports Reuters . This is President Castro's first visit as head of state and his only visit since 1959.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A meeting between Presidents Obama and Castro on the sidelines of the General Assembly is not officially planned. The leaders first encountered each other at Nelson Mandela's memorial service in 2013 where they shook hands . This April, they met in Panama at the historic seventh Summit of the Americas which included Cuba for the first time since its inception in 1994.

The UN General Assembly meeting begins on September 25th. Pope Francis will give the opening speech of the meeting during his official visit to the U.S after visiting Cuba.

On Wednesday, Cuba's Foreign Minister Bruno Rodríguez confirmed that Cuba would again present a resolution before the international community calling for the end of the embargo. According to Rodríguez, the resolution contains two paragraphs applauding renewed bilateral relations between the U.S. and Cuba and President Obama's support for ending the embargo.

During his press conference on Wednesday, Rodríguez explained that "Cuba appreciates and recognizes U.S. President Barack Obama's proposals towards lifting the blockade." However, Rodriguez estimated the total damage to Cuba from the embargo has been $121 billion, "an exorbitant figure for a small economy."

Cuba has presented similar resolutions before the UN for over 20 years. Last year, the General Assembly voted overwhelmingly in support of ending the embargo with 188 countries voting in favor. Only the U.S. and Israel voted against the resolution.

Univisión reports that 140 heads of state will participate in this year's UN proceedings. In celebration of its 70th anniversary, the UN General Assembly agenda includes a special summit where world leaders will approve global development goals for the next 15 years.

Jose Cabañas Appointed as Ambassador to the United States
The Republic of Cuba has formally appointed Dr. José Ramón Cabañas, who previously held the post of Chief of the Cuban Interests Section in Washington DC, to serve as Ambassador to the United States. Ambassador Cabañas joined Cuba's Foreign Ministry in 1984.

He holds a B.A. in International Political Science from the Institute of International Relations "Raúl Roa García" in Havana, Cuba. He is the author of "Radio Martí: Una nueva agresión" ("Radio Martí: A New Agression").

The ambassador succeeded Jorge Bolaños, who started at the Interests Section just before President Obama's first term

China and Cuba sign memorandum to boost cooperation in tourism sector
On Wednesday, a memorandum of understanding to increase collaboration in the tourism sector was signed by Cuban Tourism Minister Manuel Marrero and head of China's National Tourism Administration Li Jinzao, visiting the island with a business delegation.

In June, Air China announced that it would begin operating direct flights from Beijing to Havana beginning this fall, bringing more Chinese tourists to the island. Cuba and China are creating joint ventures to diversify options for tourists by boosting real estate development and building golf courses .

Overall, China and Cuba's bilateral trade was worth $1.3 billion in 2014, with over $1 billion of that made up of Chinese exports to Cuba (mainly mechanical consumer goods, such as refrigerators, buses, and pick-up trucks, according to China's Foreign Ministry).

Recommended Reading

The State of Cuba , Azam Ahmed and Victoria Burnett, The New York Times
The feature highlights Cuba's change and contradiction through photos and paragraph entries on topics such as race, political freedom, tourism, private sector growth, economic growth, trade, and migration.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Memo to Pope Francis: Cuba Wasn't All That Catholic Even Before Castro , Tim Padgett, WLRN
Even before Fidel Castro's communist revolution, Catholicism wasn't incredibly vibrant in Cuba, according to Padgett. One explanation is the Church aligned with the Spanish crown during Cuba's fight for independence.

Pope of the Periphery Puts Cuba Front and Center , Andrew Chesnut, The Dialogue
Cuba has been one of the focal points of the Vatican attention in Latin America. While the Catholic Church is a highly respected institution on the island, only 27% of Cubans are Catholic and most of them are cultural Christians.

Recommended Viewing

The Moral Perspectives and Policy Priorities of Pope Francis , John L. Allen Jr., Council on Foreign Relations
John L. Allen Jr., associate editor of the Boston Globe, discusses Pope Francis's moral perspectives and policy priorities in advance of the papal visit to the United States, as part of CFR's Religion and Foreign Policy Conference Call series.

U.S. Kayakers Paddle from Cuba to Key West , WSJ
U.S Olympians left Cuba to cross the Florida Straits to Key West on Friday, September 11. The American team attempted the 30-40 hour nonstop journey with the realization that "the symbolism is more important than the journey itself."

Until next time,

The Cuba Central Team

DONATE NOW THROUGH Network for Good

Like our work? Consider a monthly donation!

The Cuba Central Newsblast is produced by the Center for Democracy in the Americas (CDA). CDA is devoted to changing U.S. policy toward Cuba and the other countries of the Americas by basing our relations on mutual respect, fostering dialogue with those governments and movements with which U.S. policy is at odds, and recognizing positive trends in democracy and governance. For more information, check out the CDA website . You can also like us on Facebook or follow us on Twitter .

© 2015 Center for Democracy in the Americas. All rights reserved.

CUBACENTRAL Center for Democracy IN THE AMERICAS

Forward email

SafeUnsubscribe

This email was sent to john.podesta@gmail.com by sarah@democracyinamericas.org
|
Update Profile/Email Address | Rapid removal with SafeUnsubscribe ™ | About our service provider.

Trusted Email from Constant Contact FREE Try it FREE today.

Center for Democracy in the Americas | PO Box 53106 NW | Washington | DC | 20009

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Jacob Roberts" <jroberts@progressivemediausa.org>
To: bigcampaign@googlegroups.com
Date: 6/10/2008 3:57:29 PM
Subject: [big campaign] Media Monitoring Report - Evening 06/10/08

Main Topics: McLobbyists, McAnti-Choice, McBush, McCan't rally the base

Summary of Shift: Tomatoes continue their reign of deadly terror on a sick nation amidst an enormous salmonella outbreak. The cable programs cover McCain extensively as their campaign focus remains strong. Minnesota receives much attention in the midst of its devastating flood.

Highlights
1. In interview McCain says he would extend unemployment benefits
2. Fiorina interviews
   a. Explains why she outsourced to Ireland, says Exxon-Mobil would benefit from McCain's tax policy
   b. Advocates for McCain's economic policy while attacking Obama
3. McCain and the right to choose
   a. Boxer slams McCain on women's issues
   b. McCain has kept his stance ambiguous to garner women's votes
   c. Emily's List call points to future troubles McCain will have with women's vote
4. Culvahouse
   a. Olbermann covers FEC complaint as part of McLobbyist story
   b. McLobbyist becomes part of the Obama VP story
   c. Fox News mentions the Culvahouse controversy, follows with McCain explanation
5. McBush problems persist
   a. Rising fuel costs and oil tax breaks link McCain to Bush, says Schuster
   b. Lizza concludes McCain has grown closer to Bush during election
6. Problems with the GOP enthusiasm persists
   a. Krauthammer mocks McCain's Carter attack
   b. Paul to hold his own convention
7. McCain and the economy
   a. Greenberg approves enthusiastically of McCain's plan to drill offshore
   b. McCain gets decent marks from CNBC's Larry Kudlow
8. Epstein alleges Obama's plans will hurt future retirees
9. Jindal repeats that he is not interested in VP position
10. The lighter side
   a. Jeanne Moost takes a sardonic look at McCain's green backdrop
   b. McCain's beer slip and 'It's a Google' remark
11. Robert Gates on CNN: We have no interest in permanent bases in Iraq [no clip]
12. Keith Olbermann did an extensive segment on Kucinich's effort to impeach Bush [No Clip]
13. Rachel Maddow debunks McCain's new attack calling Obama "Carter's second term", says "mostly what this does is remind Americans that John McCain was 40 in 1976" [No Clip]
14. "Hardball Big Number": Only 8% of Big Bush Donors Have Given to McCain [No Clip]
15. "CBS Evening News" and "NBC Nightly News" aired the back and forth between McCain and Obama on taxes [No Clip]

Clips
Highlight #1
In CNBC Interview, McCain Says He'll Extend Unemployment Benefits, Discusses Paying for Iraq and for his Budget Proposals (CNBC 06/10/08 2:16pm)
Part 1
MARIA BARTIROMO: We are in a slow growth period, plus we're facing inflation, oil, food. What's your plan to take us out of this?

JOHN MCCAIN: […] We have to keep taxes low. We have to make sure that we go to alternate fuels. I think wind, solar, nuclear has got to be accelerated. […] We have to make sure that we're not going to increase taxes. We've got to maintain our commitment to free trade. I know that you know that one of the really small bright spots, and maybe it has to do with the weakness of the dollar, which is a concern, is our exports […].

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Senator Obama said he wants to unilaterally, unilaterally renegotiate the North American Free Trade Agreement. I am a free trader. The Colombian Free Trade Agreement. What message do we want to send? […] It opens up […] markets for […] American workers and goods and services. And we profit by importing from them as well. So we've got to re-emphasize our commitment to free trade. But we're gonna have to become independent on foreign oil. We have to extend the unemployment benefits. […] There's a lot of things we'll have to do to think outside the box because we all know Americans are hurting […]

BARTIROMO: […] You want to cut taxes. Here we are in the middle of a war, which you say is important to our national security. Why not ask people to pay for it?

MCCAIN: […] Sen Obama […] wants to increase capital gains taxes. There's 100 million people who have some kind of investment. […] The Iraqis will pick up a greater amount of the costs. As we succeed, and we are winning […], that will bring those expenses and costs down over time. […] If we did what senator Obama wanted to do, […] it would have been a lot more expensive in more than dollars.

BARTIROMO: […] What is your energy policy? Give us specific incentives that are going to get people to conserve and get automakers to make the products people want, fuel efficiency.

MCCAIN: […] investment in pure research and development. […] We need to […] make those research and development tax credits permanent […] We have to accelerate the whole process of building nuclear power plants. […] Clean coal technology is vital. […] We can become independent on foreign oil. […]

BARTIROMO: Where does the money come from, senator? I mean, right now we've got a $500 billion deficit that we're looking at. Even if you look at eliminate earmarking, that's only $60 billion. […]

MCCAIN: […] Reduce spending. Stop the growth of spending. In the 1980s we break the growth of spending and, therefore, we embarked, along with tax reductions, on one of the biggest eras of prosperity […] In all due respect […] $60 billion is a great deal of money […] Senator Obama has been involved in tens of millions of pork barrel projects. I've never asked for one or received one. […] We're gonna scrub every agency of government and make them justify their existence and if they can't they will go out of existence.

BARTIROMO: […] Name three programs you would cut right now.

MCCAIN: […] I voted against the farm bill, ethanol subsidies, start with that. Funding for a whole bunch of different defense acquisitions, which is very large. The sugar—
[…]

Part 2:
MCCAIN: We are very wealthy Americans in agribusinesses while Americans are struggling to stay in their homes. Help me out. (laughs)

BARTIROMO: […] The other day a senior Israeli official indicated that if Iran built nuclear weapons, Israel would attack it. […] What would you do in that scenario?

MCCAIN: I don't think we can afford to have Iran with nuclear weapons. […] We can join together and there's movement in this direction with all of our "democracies"--a league of democracies--impose meaningful trade, economic, diplomatic and every other kind of sanction on what is a very weak economy. […] Finally, […] I'd have lots of communications with the Iranians as we do now, but to sit down across the table without preconditions with Ahmadinejad, as senator Obama wants to do, I think would be a mistake of enormous proportions.

BARTIROMO: […] What's a bigger risk to the American people today? The slowdown or inflation?

MCCAIN: I think they are both inextricable. […] I'm very worried about the strength of the dollar. We all know when the dollar weakens the price of oil goes up, and by the way, could I mention one other thing, the gas tax holiday that I proposed? […] I think you're out of touch with America […] when you don't support such a thing and it was just a break. […]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

BARTIROMO: You mentioned trade deals. […] What do you tell people who feel displaced by what's been going on with the rest of the world? […]

MCCAIN:. […] I tell them that unilaterally renegotiating any agreement with another sovereign nation is a serious threat to the entire fabric of international relations, particularly with china. […] I also tell them that I'm going to have a program for education and retraining of workers that works. […] There are green technologies. I believe in the fundamental strength of our economy, but I also know full well how tough these times are. […]

BARTIROMO: […] How are you going to get young people to vote for you?

MCCAIN: […] We've got to do a lot more appearances on "Saturday night live" […] and a lot of venues that Americans don't get up to watch the Sunday morning talk shows. But most […] I've got to convince them, and I've got a lot of work to do, [..] that i will hand to them a generation to this next generation a world that is safer and more prosperous […]

BARTIROMO: Tell me how you increase confidence in the U.S. and create friendships that were lost over the last few years?

MCCAIN: One of the first things that I would do is declare that the USA will never torture another person who is in the custody of the USA. […] I would also say that I would close Guantanamo Bay. I would also say that I will work together with our allies, our traditional allies, and we will come up with hemispheric trade agreements. I would love to see a US-EU free trade agreement […] I have personal relationships with these leaders all around the world. […] I've been involved in these issues for a long, long time.

Highlight #2

Fiorina Speaks about Outsourcing, US Presence in Iraq and Tax Breaks for Big Oil (CNN 06/10/08 5:13pm)

WOLF BLITZER: Joining us now is the former hewlett-Packard CEO, Carly Fiorina. She's a top McCain adviser. She chairs the republican national committee's victory campaign as well. […] Here's the main charge that Barack Obama is leveling against John McCain when it comes to the economy. Listen to this BARACK OBAMA: I've said that John McCain is running to serve out a third Bush term, but the truth is when it comes to taxes, that's not being fair to George Bush. Senator McCain wants to add $300 billion more in tax breaks and loopholes for big corporations and the wealthiest Americans, and he hasn't even explained how to pay for them.

CARLY FIORINA: Well, first, while it's a good line, I think it betrays a fundamental misunderstanding of how the economy works on Barack Obama's part. The reality is that John McCain has proposed to lower the business tax rate from 35% to 25%. That's because we have the second highest tax rate in the world and that motivates businesses to take jobs overseas, which they have done. So, the tax rate in Ireland is lower. The tax rate in Singapore is lower. The tax rate in china is certainly lower. We need a competitive tax rate so businesses bring jobs back home.

BLITZER: Does it also include as Obama said Exxon-Mobil and the other big oil companies who are awash in record profits?

FIORINA: Well, his proposal to levy a windfall profits tax against oil companies will only do two things for the American consumer; limit supply and raise prices. Neither of which is very good. I'm talking about the tax rate for all businesses.

BLITZER: Including Exxon-Mobil and the other big corporations. [...] is Obama right when he says under a McCain administration Exxon-Mobil would get additional tax breaks?

FIORINA: No. What John McCain proposes is to lower the tax rate on all businesses. So that it is more in their interests to put jobs here in the US.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

BLITZER: But no exemption for big oil and -- and no exemption for big oil, then.

FIORINA: No, no exemption for any businesses. On the other hand, big oil companies go where the oil is. So, you're not going to change their behavior much in terms of the tax rate, but you will change a manufacturing company's behavior. We sent jobs to Ireland when I was at Hewlett-Packard because the tax rate in Ireland was lower.

BLITZER: I understand the need to cut taxes if you want to compete globally, which is the point you're trying to make but—

FIORINA: Barack Obama doesn't understand that.

BLITZER: I'm sure he understands that but he also says Exxon-Mobil has got these billions and billions of dollars in record profits. They can afford to not necessarily get additional tax cuts.

FIORINA: But that isn't what Barack Obama's proposing. What Barack Obama's proposing is to tax the profits of oil companies. That's a different proposal and taxing the profits of oil companies would do two things—it would raise the price of oil, and it would lower the supply.

So, it's not a good proposal for the American consumer. On the other hand, John McCain said, 'I'm going to give the consumer a summer gas tax holiday by suspending the federal gas tax,' and Barack Obama opposed that even though the American trucking association is for it.

BLITZER: Hillary Clinton supported it as well and he opposed it.

FIORINA: So do the majority of Americans.

BLITZER: Here's another charge that he makes. I'll play this clip and then we'll discuss it. Listen to this OBAMA: At a time when we're fighting two wars, when millions of Americans can't afford their medical bills or their tuition bills, when we're paying more than $4 a gallon for gas, the man who rails against government spending wants to spend $1.2 billion on a tax break for Exxon-Mobil.

BLITZER: All right, we were just discussing that, but the $1.2 billion tax break that he says Exxon-Mobil would win as a result of reducing the corporate tax rate structure across the board, is that an accurate number?

FIORINA: No, I don't know where he gets those numbers. It was $300 billion. It was $1.2 billion. By the way, yesterday he said he could pay for all his programs and less than 24 hours later he said if the tax increases would hurt the economy, he would consider postponing them because they clearly would hurt the economy.

I can't make Barack Obama's numbers add up but I will tell you this, having studied John McCain's numbers for quite a few weeks now, he will balance the budget by the end of 2013 and he is proposing a set of tax measures that will help small businesses grow, which is vitally important because small businesses create most of the jobs in this country.

BLITZER: He […] made reference to the cost of the war in Iraq right now. Here's how he phrased it in another part of this presentation. I'll play this for you.

OBAMA: I have a different vision for the future. Instead of spending $12 billion a month to rebuild Iraq, I think it's time we invested in our roads and schools and bridges and started to rebuild America.

BLITZER: You could do a lot of money with -- you can do a lot of good things with $12 billion a month.

FIORINA: There's no question and there's no question that the Iraq war is costing a lot of money and there's no question as well that as the troops are reduced over time in Iraq that John McCain will put those savings toward budget deficit reduction but it's also true that Barack Obama has proposed no plan for how he is going to get out of Iraq successfully without creating genocide. He's created no plan—spoke of no plan, about what he's going to do on the ground now. So, to rhetorically link transportation in this country and the war in Iraq, it's a nice speech but it's not real.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

BLITZER: I guess the question is how much longer will the American taxpayers have to shell out $12 billion a month or hundreds of billions of dollars a year or whatever it costs?

FIORINA: Well, I think they will have to continue to shell money out until we have a way to bring our troops home and leave a stable democracy in place. I think that is the sensible thing to do now, given the interests we have at stake in Iraq, in Iran, and in the Middle East and there's no question that we need to invest more in the infrastructure of this country but to simply say, 'I'm going to yank the troops out immediately and put that money over to the federal budget,' betrays a misunderstanding of how the federal budget is put together, and also it's a naive approach to a very complex situation on the ground in Iraq.

Fiorina Attempts to Link Obama to Bush on Energy Bill, Discusses McCain-Big Oil Relationship, Corporate Tax Break (MSNBC 06/10/08 3:34pm)
NORAH O'DONNELL: […] Answer that charge that Barack Obama just laid out that John McCain has proposed $300 billion in tax breaks and he doesn't have a way to pay for it. […]

CARLY FIORINA: Well, it betrays a misunderstanding on Barack Obama's part of how the economy works. […] The U.S. has the second highest tax rate in the world for businesses. And what that means is that businesses are motivated to take their jobs overseas where the tax rates are lower. For example, to Ireland, to Singapore, to China. […] So it's not a corporate loophole. What John McCain is proposing is to make our tax rate here in the U.S. competitive so that American businesses bring jobs back home.

O'DONNELL: How do you pay for it without ballooning the deficit?

FIORINA: Well absolutely you can't balloon the deficit. And that's why John McCain has not only proposed a series of economic plans that will restore prosperity to our economy, but a series of programs to bring real reform to Washington. Washington has to be reformed. The size of government has ballooned 55% in the last eight year alone. […]

O'DONNELL: Let me ask you how John McCain would respond to like a Democratic campaign ad which just said, you know, when George Bush took office gas was $1.47 a gallon. It's now $4 a gallon, and you're planning on voting for another Republican. How does John McCain make an argument against that?

FIORINA: Well I think he one of the arguments he would make against that is a President doesn't have a lot to do with the price of gas. But […] more importantly what he would say is, why is it then that Barack Obama voted with Vice President Cheney and President Bush on this recent energy bill, which John McCain opposed? Why is it then that a Democratic Congress, which has the lowest approval ratings of Congress--even lower almost than President Bush--that Barack Obama has sided with that Democratic Congress? I think there's lot office evidence to suggest that John McCain is not President Bush and I think there's evidence as well to suggest that Sen Obama, who has voted to increase taxes 94 times in 3 short years in the U.S. Senate is a fairly traditional tax-and-spend liberal.

O'DONNELL: […] In the Senate today. There was an effort by the Democrats to impose a windfall profits tax on the oil companies, the Democrats say that since President Bush took office the oil companies have made over $600 billion. John McCain voted against that. Is John McCain on the side of Big Oil companies like George Bush and Dick Cheney?

FIORINA: No, that's not exactly balanced question, I would say, Norah. But, look, […] if we want to wean ourselves off of foreign oil, […] then oil companies must be motivated and incented to look for and refine more oil. And you don't achieve that motivation by taxing their profits. Again, this betrays in my judgment as a businesswoman, a fundamental misunderstanding on Barack Obama's part about how the economy actually works and how businesses make decisions.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

O'DONELL: […] And as always, we play devil's advocate on the show. That's how we try to elicit good answers from our guest.

FIORINA: I understand.

Highlight #3
Barbara Boxer Slams McCain on Women's Issues (CNN 06/10/08 6:14pm)
BARBARA BOXER: […] I double-checked John McCain's record. He has a zero on a woman's right to choose. Now you have to be pretty, pretty far right to be a zero on a woman's right to choose and—

WOLF BLITZER: He opposes abortion rights and Obama supports abortion rights. that's important for a lot of women, and men as well […].

BOXER: […] He wants to criminalize the right to choose. He wants to overturn Roe v. Wade. That will take us back to before the '70 s. He has a zero record on funding the victims of domestic violence. He has a zero record on equal pay for equal work.

He didn't even show up for the last vote we had on equal pay for equal work. So the fact is, yes, there's some people who are hurt and they feel bad, and I get it. Look, I've been in tough campaigns myself where I have had to support someone who won a primary and I was sad about it, but you've got to look at where we are. This isn't about me, it's not about the angry voter—and by the way, as far as women are concerned, the women shouldn't be angry, they should be proud because that glass ceiling has been shattered. Hillary said it herself. It's been shattered by her and shattered by Barack.

[…] I think things are so bad in this country right now whether you look at gas prices, food prices, the war in Iraq, you know, the foreclosure situation, people can't afford tuition, we have all of these terrible domestic problems, and we have a war with no end in sight, and our, you know, the way people view us in the world has never been lower. The table is set for a democratic victory, and I do believe that we democrats, the independent voters and many republicans really want change.

BLITZER: One final question about California. Some are suggesting, given around Schwarzenegger's popularity out there, twice-elected republican, moderate republican, working now hard for John McCain, he can maybe help that state go republican this time around. Is that a dream that the republicans have or is there any seriousness to it?

BOXER: Well, of course it's a dream that they have but I would like to shatter it at this very moment by saying that Arnold has—I like him as a person, but his ratings now are way down in the 30s , about 34, maybe low 40s, but more like upper 30s. The republicans are very unpopular at home. George Bush is unpopular.

[...] California is suffering mightily from many of the problems. Recession, housing problems, the war in Iraq, we've lost more than any other state. So we want change. So of course the republicans will try. I will never take California for granted for 30 seconds but at the end every time day, we'll be bluer than ever because we have a great candidate. They have a candidate who would take us back to the past, doesn't rep the future and that's what I think.

BLITZER: The McCain campaign is immediately responding to something we just heard Senator Boxer say regarding the senator's claiming that McCain gets a zero on women's issue. The McCain campaign sent CNN this statement, and let me read it to you.

"Senator Barbara Boxer is misguided. Not only is she off base in many of her charges about John McCain's record, Senator Boxer ignores the fact that Barack Obama opposes school choice for families, flexible health care for women but supports unconditional meetings with rogue leaders and higher taxes on family budgets. All of those are key issues for women."

Immediate response from the McCain campaign.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Carlson Says McCain's Appeals on Women's Issues and on McSame as Carter Weak, But Women Don't Know Where McCain Stands (MSNBC 06/10/08 1:23pm)
MARGARET CARLSON: […] Women don't really know where John McCain stands. Because he's not a movement conservative, and he's not pro-life in an intense way. […]

ANDREA MITCHELL: Well he's been pro-life all of his legislative.

CARLSON: His votes are all pro-life. But he's not, like, in the movement. And Tony Perkins yesterday was telling me how his lack of intensity makes them doubt him but makes women think, oh he's not gonna appoint judges we don't like. And he once said, he wouldn't overturn Roe v. Wade. He once said that; that's not necessarily his policy. But he did give a speech a few months ago about the judges he would appoint. […] A very tough speech. So, you know, is he going to keep it hazy, hoping that women don't quite get it? […] The only time [women] want Republicans is when they're scared. And if there's a national security event, that helps McCain with women. But I don't think issues do.

MITCHELL: And right now they're more scared about prices at the pump and at the food store.
[…]

[photograph of Hillary and McCain on a boat c/o johnmccain.com]

MITCHELL: Let's took a look right now at the John McCain website, which so clearly shows the appeal he is trying to make, trying to show himself and Hillary Clinton, talking about how affectionate they are […]. Does that work?

CARLSON: […] I just don't know if a few snapshots are going to help you […]
[…]
MITCHELL: Who has a better message to the American voter right now on energy? […]

(video clip of McCain)

MITCHELL: He's trying to remind people of the Carter years, the 70s, the gas lines. […] Who remembers that, though?
[…]
CARLSON: The Bush Third Term is far more frightening.

Michael Crowley Brings Up CAP-Emily's List Tomorrow As Proof that Democratic Women Won't Vote for McCain (MSNBC 06/10/08 5:45pm)
MICHAEL CROWLEY: I think five months is a long time [for the party to heal and for Democratic women to rally to Obama]. Your already starting to see, just on my way over, the Center for American Progress are doing a press call, Ellen Malcolm of Emily's List, Debbie Wasserman-Schultz, who's a prominent Hillary Clinton Supporter, press conference on John McCain's record on women's issues. And you're gonna hear the word Supreme Court, Supreme Court, Supreme Court.

CHRIS MATTHEWS: Well Ellen Malcom's out there already?

CROWLEY: She's coming out...

MATTHEWS: Good to see her engaged again.

CROWLEY: It's not an Obama campaign event, Center for American Progress. But the issue is John McCain's record on women. They're not gonna be saying positive things.

MATTHEWS: That's faster than I thought.

Highlight #4
Olberman Highlights McCain's Lobbyist Hypocrisy With Culvahouse, and Donnelly's FCC

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Complaints (MSNBC 06/10/08 8:39pm)
KEITH OLBERMAN: Of course there is issue with taking a legitimate issue and inflating it beyond reason. Senator McCain's own man on this job, the one who will vet his vice presidential hopefuls, is former Reagan White House council Arthur Culvahouse. He has been a Washington lobbyist until about a month before joining the McCain campaign. That according to the newspaper, The Hill.

Mr. Culvahouse, a partner at the law firm of Olmeldehy & Myers and in that capacity he has lobbyist for various organizations since 1999, like Lockheed Martin in 1999 and TimeWarner in 2003, and as recently as 2004 he lobbied for Fannie Mae. All this according to public record. So if the accusations of the unpaid vetters are going to be an issue in this campaign, it would still seem Obama's hands are the cleaner. Especially in so much that ABC News reported today that a watchdog group has filed a complaint with the Federal Election Commission, asking for investigations of payments by a lobbying firm to McCain's Finance Director, Susan Nelson. And a separate inquiry into how a computer company, partially controlled by McCain campaign director Rick Davis, wiped out about 10 percent of the debt the McCain campaign still owed it.

McLobbyist, Arthur Culvahouse Gets Some of the Spotlight in Obama Story (CNN 06/10/08 7:27pm)
BRIAN TODD: Obama's campaign also points out a once high-powered lobbyist, Arthur Culvahouse who once lobbied for Fannie Mae is heading McCain's vice-presidential search team and a lower-level McCain advisor [either Wayne Berman or John Green] once lobbied for a sub-primer lender.

LOU DOBBS: […] The issue here is the role of lobbyists and the role of influence in Washington. Neither of these candidates to this point have done nearly even close to enough, in my opinion, to push back the influence of lobbyists on their campaign staffs let alone on the administration of one of these two senators.

McCain in Hot Seat Over Reports of Former Lobbyist Assisting in Vetting Vice Presidential Candidates (FNC 06/10/08 7:09pm)
SHEPARD SMITH: But now questions over one of the people reportedly helping McCain vet his candidates for vice president. Reports surfacing that the former White House Reagan council is a former lobbyist, serving McCain despite the candidate's anti-lobbyist stance. James Rosen is in the DC newsroom. James this all seems like tit-for-tat but what's the McCain camp saying about this in particular?

JAMES ROSEN: Tit-for-tat on the campaign trail? Shocking! McCain campaign communications director Jill Haselbaker, we spoke with her a few moments ago, she said, "The McCain campaign does not discuss its vice presidential process at any level. And has therefore never confirmed that Arthur Culvahouse, the former Reagan White House council that you mentioned, a former lobbyist as well, is in fact assisting the campaign in vetting possible running mates. The issue, Haselbaker went on to say, as political operatives will, is the hierocracy of the Obama campaign. Attacking Hillary Clinton for her chief strategist Mark Penn's Countrywide ties, despite the ties of Jim Johnson to that same corporation.

Highlight #5
"Hardball" Does Segment on Bush's Ineptitude on Energy Policy; Schuster: Rising Fuel Prices and His Tax Cuts for Big Oil Are a "Big Problem for John McCain" (MSNBC 06/10/08 5:15pm)
CHRIS MATTHEWS: [...] If you drive a car you know that energy prices seem like they're out of control right now. It was never supposed to be this way. In the Bush-Cheney Administration and that was the word, Big War Cheaper Gas. And the impact on the 2008 race could be huge [...]

DAVID SCHUSTER: Today the average price of gasoline went up again [...] The four dollar mark for gasoline is another blow to the legacy of President Bush, a former oil man, who just five months ago scoffed at predictions prices would reach this high [...] Energy policy was supposed to be President Bush's strength. While running for president in 2000 he spoke of his industry experience and declared that if oil supplies got tight he would get countries in the Mideast to "open up the spigot." And vice-president Cheney, who ran energy giant Halliburton before joining Bush, was so confident at his expertise that he led an energy task force in secret and dismissed all criticisms. But gas prices today are more than twice what they were when President Bush and Vice-President Cheney took office [...]

Voter anger over rising fuel prices could be a big problem for John McCain. On top of being tied politically to President Bush, McCain is proposing tax breaks for energy corporations. McCain says they will help the companies invest in crucial research that could locate new energy sources and lower prices. And today McCain attacked Barack Obama for proposing new taxes on corporations and individuals [...]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Olbermann pokes fun at McCain's "Beer" gaffe, Explores McBush Economics and McCain's Flip-Flop on the Bush Tax Cuts (MSNBC 06/10/08 8:20pm)
KEITH OLBERMANN: [...] And for a second it sounded like he was supporting the reintroduction of prohibition [...]

[Video of John McCain]

JOHN MCCAIN: Too many Republicans in Congress became indistinguishable from the big spending Democrats that they used to oppose. The only power of government that could stop them was the power of the veto and it was rarely used. If that authority is entrusted to me I will use the veto as needed, I will veto every single beer, er bill with earmarks.

OLBERMANN: Or beer marks. McCain's slip on the 18th amendment was possibly a Freudian reference to his wife's wealthy family, which owns a beer distributorship [...]

RYAN LIZZA: [...] McCain has had a long evolution over the last eight years on tax cuts. In 2000 he represented a completely different wing of the Republican Party. He ran to the left of George Bush on taxes, he was a deficit hawk, during the run up to the war the same thing. He was arguing that we shouldn't cut taxes in wartime. As he came closer and closer to his party's nominee he became more doctrinaire on this issue and look, let's be frank he couldn't have been elected, he couldn't have won the nomination unless he had changed his position on tax cuts and embraced the Bush tax cuts [...]

OLBERMANN: But that necessarily leads him to the position where he opposed the tax cuts, the Bush tax cuts when they were popular and now he's defending them when they're not popular [...]

Highlight #6
Krauthammer Mocks McCain's Carter Third Term Quote, Wants McCain to Push for Drilling in Arctic (FNC 06/10/08 6:44pm)
CHARLES KRAUTHAMMER: McCain's okay with making this claim with a teleprompter. But when he's on his own, all he does is repeat slogans, is that Obama's a tax and spend liberal as in the 60s and the 70s. I wouldn't bring up the 60s and 70s, because first of all, nobody under 50 remembers the 60s, in fact a lot of the people over 50 don't remember the 60s for other reasons. And secondly, the 60s was a time of prosperity. And the 70s, you know, Republicans were in office until January of 77.

So it's a hard argument to make, and then he says Obama's going to be the third Carter campaign. Well that doesn't really ring a lot because the last Democratic administration wasn't Carter it was Clinton and his economy was relatively strong. I think McCain has to get away, look, he'll fight Obama to withdraw on taxes. But he's got to do a bold thing, and I think he can win the economic argument by going after energy and gas.

That's what's hurting, that's why American's are angry, high gas prices. He ought to say, two years ago with gasoline at $2 dollars a barrel I was against drilling. Conditions have changed, I have changed. Obama isn't the guy who changes, he's stuck in the past. We have to drill in the arctic, we have to drill domestically. And every American understand if you get American supply, we're going to be energy independent and the price will come down. It's a case he can make, the Republicans are making in Congress, but McCain has disarmed himself.

Ron Paul to Hold His Own Convention, Claims Republican Party Has Lost Its Way and is Losing the Election (FNC 06/10/08 4:35pm)
RON PAUL: [...] I think that we've lost our way, our party is weak, we're losing our numbers, we're losing the election. And I think it's because we've lost our way. We've changed our foreign policy, we essentially act like democrats. So, no, I'm not driven in any way by anger as much as frustration that I think the Republican party doesn't even live up to it's platform. If you look at what I stand for and for what I vote, I'm really pretty darn close to the Republican platform and what they profess they believe in.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

NEIL CAVUTO: Well, philosophically they say that you're going to be hurting John McCain by doing this. Do you care?

PAUL: Yeah, but we're not going to be hurting our philosophy. We're going to be asking them to reconsider their positions on taxes, on the environment, on immigration, and all these positions that the party has drifted from. And certainly I've always challenged the foreign policy of the last several years. I'm still defending George Bush's foreign policy of 2000 where he won on a humble foreign policy with no nation building and no policing the world. So all I'm asking for is the people, the republicans and conservatives, to look at what we're saying and ask the party to come back to its roots.
[…]

Highlight #7
Greenberg Applauds McCain's Economic Ideas and Plans to Drill Offshore (CNBC 06/10/08 8:30pm)
HANK GREENBERG: Look I think McCain has got a very good energy policy. One, he would like to see us drill more offshore, where we have lots of oil off the coast of Florida and California. And I think his plan to share the revenues with the states, where before they have resisted, I hope they will not now.

The second, he wants a lot of alternative energy sources. Wind, solar, bio-fuel, all of that. These are all things, in the meantime, while we're spending a lot of money on research to accelerate new sources of energy. He's got a comprehensive policy rather than just a distorted policy. It's a very comprehensive plan. And I think it'll work.

Kudlow Grades McCain's Economic Speech Well, Wants More Oil Drilling And Support for Corporations (CNBC 06/10/08 8:51pm)
LARRY KUDLOW: I think McCain gave a good speech today John. It's basically a supply side speech on taxes and spending cuts. I think he's got to stay with it, stay with it and hammer home the differences. I think McCain needs to drill more oil, that's a big winner. I think he should quit bashing corporations. The main thing is, today was a really important speech for McCain. You could see he was all lit up in Maria's interview, he knows he did good. Can he hammer it home John? Can he make the sale?

Highlight #8
Julian Epstein Claims Obama's Plan to Tax Big Oil Will Hurt American's Retirement Plans (FNC 06/10/08 5:52pm)
JOHN GIBSON: Now Obama and McCain are squaring off against this, how will they find themselves arguing which one is better to get us out of a soft hole?

JULIAN EPSTEIN: Well McCain is definitely better and I'll tell you why Obama's is the wrong answer. Today in the senate you saw Democratic senators trying to raise the taxes on big oil. It's very easy to say, let's tax the profits on big oil. But what people don't understand is that a lot of these large pension funds, that a lot of your viewers right now have their retirement plans invested in, have put their investments in Exxon Mobil. This is a really big deal, they need to look and see where their money is.

GIBSON: So you're saying, you tax the company, you tax the shareholder value, you lose your retirement.

EPSTEIN: If you tax the company you tax the shareholders.

GIBSON: I'm not sure if I'm accepting that.

Highlight #9
Jindal Denies Interest in Being McCain's V.P. But Supports His Tax Plans (FNC 06/10/08 5:27pm)
MEGYAN KELLY: The thing that people know about you is isn't he on the short list for McCain's v.p.? What's the answer to that Governor?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

BOBBY JINDAL: Well, look. I've got the job that I want. I enjoy being governor. We've cut taxes 6 times, reformed our ethics laws and we have a lot more work to do right here in Louisiana. I'm supporting john McCain. I want him to be elected president. I think he will be selecting someone else. I've got the job I want. I'm honored to have been elected by the voters of Louisiana, during a very historic time. This is the best chance we'll have in our lifetime to fix the problems in our state, and I want to be a part of leading that effort.

KELLY: Let me ask you, Gov. Ted Strickland of Ohio just came out today, in respect to Obama's short list of Vice Presidential candidates, "If asked I will not run." As James Rosen put it, "a Sherman-esque answer". Will you say the same?

JINDAL: Look, I think that Senator McCain will ask somebody else, I think whoever he asks will say yes. I think he'll get his first choice. I think it be rude and presumptuous of me to turn down something, I've not been offered. We enjoy the Senator's visits down here, he was down here last week as well. I hope he continues to come down to Louisiana and other states as he makes his case to the American people. This is an important election, and I hope voters are paying attention. We got two likeable senators who have served our nation well. But they have fundamental differences on their policies and on their views. They need to pay attention.

KELLY: They really do, including on taxes. You mentioned that you have passed six tax cuts in just the last five months in your state, managed to get those passed. John McCain is now in favor of extending the bush tax cuts, wanting to make them permanent. Barack Obama is not. How do you see the issue?

JINDAL: This is such a fundamental issue. Today in Louisiana we passed our largest income tax ever. Over $300 million dollars going back to the tax payers. We've eliminated taxes on debt, new equipment, utilities. It's encouraging investment, encouraging the creation of jobs. We're in a 30 year low in unemployment, our economy's growing faster than the country's. You look at the two senators records, Senator Obama wants to raise capital gains taxes, income taxes, energy taxes. I worry about the impact that will have on our economy. I think we got two different views on the world.

KELLY: Help them understand why you say that is a problem. Cause I think a lot of middle-income voters hear that, capital gains tax and raising the income tax on the wealthy and they think right on, I want that.

JINDAL: Well, there are two problems with that. Number one, be suspicious. Whenever they talk about raising taxes like energy taxes or capital gains, or income taxes, we the average taxpayers end up paying more. The super wealthy almost have these ways to avoid paying these taxes.

Remember, it is the average American worker and taxpayer that gets the short end when they start raising your taxes. Secondly, you have a fundamentally different view of the world, one that says control spending, cut out the earmarks, the wasteful spending so you can cut our taxes, leave more dollars in our pockets. It comes down do you trust taxpayers or government to spend your money more wisely? I trust taxpayers, I trust the American families as their struggling to pay for their education, healthcare, gasoline, their mortgages. Cut their taxes and let them keep more of their own dollars and help the economy grow. We just believe in Louisiana that when you cut taxes and you control government spending, you can grow your economy and leave more money in the hands of America's hard-working families.

Highlight #10
Jeanne Moost Takes a Look at the Response to McCain's Green Backdrop (CNN 06/10/08 6:57pm)
WOLF BLITZER: The world may little note nor long remember what he said but critics certainly can't forget the setting for this particular John McCain speech. It had some of them feeling a little green around the gills. […]

JEANNE MOOST: […] Never has a color been so maligned. Called 'the lime green monster' by the left and 'dumb green puke' background even by the right all on a night when McCain's speech was being compared to Obama's. [Moost summarizes Colbert's invitation for viewers to insert their own backgrounds into the McCain speech and the ensuing responses.]

A senior McCain advisor says the green screen will not be returning. The campaign realizes it was a horrible visual. And look what the senator stood in front of Tuesday.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

MCCAIN: I will veto every single beer—bill with earmarks.

MOOST: If only they could get him to read a teleprompter better. Perhaps the ultimate insult about the white-haired candidate with the green background: it'll make you look like the cottage cheese in a lime jell-o salad.

McCain: Impressed with the Internets; Stumbles Comically in Speech (CNN 06/10/08 4:57pm)
WOLF BLITZER: […] McCain went on to say, 'It's remarkable what you can find out these days on the Internet.' […] he meant to say he would veto every bill with earmarks but the words 'bill' and 'earmarks' somehow morphed into [beer]. An honest mistake but it might raise some eyebrows in Cindy McCain's family that made it's fortune on beer distribution across the country.

--
Jacob Roberts
Media Analyst
PMUSA
(c) 208.420.3470
--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~
You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail ryan@campaigntodefendamerica.org with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.
-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Jeremy Funk" <funk@americansunitedforchange.org>
To:	bigcampaign@googlegroups.com
Date:	6/5/2008 8:50:35 AM
Subject:	[big campaign] McBush Judgment Problem Confirmed by New Senate Intelligence Committee Report

AMERICANSUNITED FOR CHANGE

www.americansunitedforchange.org
FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE CONTACT: Jeremy Funk, 202.470.5878
DATE: June 5th, 2008

McBush Judgment Problem Confirmed by New Senate Intelligence Committee Report

New U.S. Senate Intelligence Committee bipartisan Phase II report on pre-Iraq war intelligence concludes Bush Administration pre-Iraq war statements "on numerous occasions, misrepresented the intelligence and the threat from Iraq"

"The war, the invasion was not a mistake" -- Senator John McCain [NBC, Meet the Press, 1/06/08]

McCain Parroted Bush's Iraq Talking Points from Day 1

http://www.mccainsource.com/

McSame on...	Bush White House	McCain
... WMDs	Bush Insisted Iraq Had Weapons of Mass Destruction. During an address to the nation in March of 2003, Bush said, "Saddam Hussein has had a long history of reckless aggression and terrible crimes. He possesses weapons of terror. He provides funding and safe haven to terrorists who would willingly use weapons of mass destruction against America and other peace-loving countries." He added, "We will not wait to see what terrorists or terrorist states could do with weapons of mass destruction." [The President's Radio Address, 3/7/03; emphasis added]	McCain: Hussein Continues To Acquire, Amass And Improve On His Arsenal of Weapons of Mass Destruction. During a floor debate on the floor of the senate, McCain said, "Saddam Hussein continues to acquire, amass, and improve on his arsenal of weapons of mass destruction. He continues to attempt to acquire a nuclear weapon. These are all well-known facts. So if you believe that Saddam Hussein....is not going to abandon his request for his weapons, then the longer we wait, the more dangerous he becomes." [Asheville Citizen-Times, 10/13/02; emphasis added]
... Being Greeted As Liberators	Cheney Said, "I Really Do Believe We Will Be Greeted As Liberators." While appearing on NBC's Meet the Press, Vice President Cheney said, "I really do believe that we will be greeted as liberators. I've talked with a lot of Iraqis in the last several months myself, had them to the White House. The president and I have met with them, various groups and	McCain Said "The Iraqi People Will Greet Us As Liberators." While appearing on NBC's The Today Show, McCain said, "But I believe, Katie, that the Iraqi people will greet us as liberators. I believe that they will have an opportunity over time, and it will be difficult, to realize the same hopes and dreams and aspirations that every person in the world has and individuals, people who have devoted their lives from the outside to trying to change things inside Iraq." [NBC, "Meet the Press," 3/16/03; emphasis added]	deserves the opportunity to live in a free and open society." [NBC, "The Today Show," 3/20/03; emphasis added]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

... A Mission Accomplished	Standing Under A "Mission Accomplished" Banner, Bush Declared An End To Major Combat Operations. While giving a speech aboard the USS Abraham Lincoln and standing under a giant "Mission Accomplished" banner, Bush announced, "Major combat operations in Iraq have ended." [Associated Press, 5/2/03; emphasis added]	McCain Said Capture Of Saddam Hussein Was A "Mission Accomplished." During an interview on ABC News "This Week" McCain was asked about the capture of Saddam Hussein and the effect on US Forces. McCain said, "Their morale could not be higher. This is a mission accomplished. They know how much influence Saddam Hussein had on the Iraqi people, how much more difficult it made to get their cooperation. Every member of the military and civilian over there are rejoicing today. It was interesting to see Ambassador Bremer's emotion. It was well- deserved." [ABC, "This Week," 12/14/03; emphasis added]

McCain's "Judgment" on Investigating Intelligence Failures: Deny, Deny, Deny

McCain Voted Against Requiring The President To Submit A Report Regarding Pre-War Intelligence. In 2003, McCain voted to table an amendment that would withhold $50 million in intelligence funding from the bill until the president submits a report on the role executive branch policymakers had on the development and use of intelligence relating to the war in Iraq. The report would have to be submitted to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, the House International Relations Committee and the Appropriations, Armed Services and Intelligence committees of both chambers. The motion to table passed 62-34. [H 2658, Vote #287 , 7/17/03]

McCain Voted Against Creating Iraqi Intelligence Commission. In 2003, McCain voted to table an amendment that would establish a 12-member independent bipartisan commission to examine and report on the role of policy makers in the development and use of intelligence related to Iraq and Operation Iraqi Freedom. The commission would be required to submit a report to the president and Congress within nine months of its first meeting on its findings and recommendations. The amendment also would authorize $5 million for the commission. The motion to table passed 67-32. [S 1689, Vote #395, 10/17/03]

McCain Voted Against Creating Iraqi Intelligence Commission. Senator McCain voted to table the Corzine Amendment, which would have created a 12-member independent commission to investigate the development and use of intelligence leading up to the war in Iraq. McCain voted yea. Motion to table passed 51-44. [HR 2658, Vote # 284 , 7/16/03]

McCain Would Have Done "Nothing" Differently In The Run Up To The War

2003: McCain Said He Would Have Done "Nothing" Differently In The Run-Up To War If He Were President. During an appearance on The O'Reilly Factor, Bill O'Reilly asked, "All right, Senator, if you were president, what would you have done differently in the run-up to this war?" McCain said, "Nothing." He added, "The president has handled this, in my view, skillfully." [Fox News, "The O'Reilly Factor," 3/18/03]

McCain: "The War, The Invasion Was Not A Mistake." In 2008, Tim Russert quoted Bush who said that he would have gone into Iraq even if there were no weapons and asked McCain if he would have gone into Iraq. McCain said, "I--

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

yes, but the point is that if we had done it right, it's been well chronicled in many, in many books, you and I wouldn't be even discussing that now. The mishandling after the war. …The war, the invasion was not a mistake. The handling of the war was a terrible mistake." [NBC, Meet the Press, 1/06/08]

McCain Said The U.S. Invaded Iraq For Oil. During a town hall meeting in Denver, McCain said, "My friends, I will have an energy policy that we will be talking about, which will eliminate our dependence on oil from the Middle East that will prevent us from having ever to send our young men and women into conflict again in the Middle East." [Associated Press, 5/2/08]

2004: McCain: "I Still Believe That We Did The Right Thing By Going In There Because Saddam Hussein Had Weapons Of Mass Destruction." Appearing on NBC's "Meet the Press" in April of 2004, McCain said, "But I still believe that we did the right thing by going in there because Saddam Hussein had weapons of mass destruction, had used weapons of mass destruction. If he was still in power, he would be trying to acquire those weapons of mass destruction. Now let's set that aside and say that the greatest threat that we face is a use of weapons of mass destruction against the United States by a terrorist organization." [NBC News, "Meet the Press," 4/11/04]

Coming In June, AUFC's Bush Legacy Bus Tour – Click Here and Stay Tuned: http://www.bushlegacytour.com

---
Jeremy J. Funk
Press Secretary, Americans United for Change
Office: 202.470.5878
Mobile: 605.366.3654
funk@americansunitedforchange.org
www.americansunitedforchange.org

Jeremy J. Funk
Press Secretary, Americans United for Change
Office: 202.470.5878
Mobile: 605.366.3654
funk@americansunitedforchange.org
www.americansunitedforchange.org

--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~

You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail ryan@campaigntodefendamerica.org with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.
-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Burns Strider" <burns.strider@americanbridge.org>
To:	CTRFriendsFamily <CTRFriendsFamily@americanbridge.org>
Date:	12/9/2014 2:38:58 AM
Subject:	Correct The Record Tuesday December 9, 2014 Morning Roundup

Correct The Record Tuesday December 9, 2014 Morning Roundup:

Headlines:

Sacramento Bee opinion: Karen Skelton: "'Mockingjay' script offers tips for Hillary Clinton's campaign"

"Clinton is the right leader for this campaign at the right time."

Detroit News: "Mark Schauer looks back at failed bid"

"Schauer said he intends to get involved with the likely 2016 presidential campaign of Hillary Clinton. He co-chaired Clinton's 2008 Michigan campaign."

Washington Post: "A crowded GOP field for 2016 encounters donors reluctant to commit early"

"The upheaval on the right stands in stark contrast with the coalescing of major Democratic financiers behind the expected candidacy of former secretary of state Hillary Rodham Clinton."

MSNBC: "Hillary Clinton adds paid speech in March, complicating 2016 timeline"

"Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton has added a paid speech to her calendar in mid-March, complicating the time-frame for when she might announce a potential second run for the presidency."

Wall Street Journal blog: Washington Wire: "Hillary Clinton's March Speech Raises Timing Questions"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Hillary Clinton is scheduled to deliver a paid speech in March 2015, a point on the calendar that raises questions about when she will announce her decision on running for president and whether she intends to leave the Democratic Party uncertain of her plans until next spring."

The Hill blog: Ballot Box: "New race, old faces for Hillary"

"At a recent Ready for Hillary meeting in New York, many of the same players — including Harold Ickes, who served as senior adviser in the 2008 campaign, and even older hands such as James Carville and Paul Begala, who worked in the Bill Clinton White House — addressed hundreds of donors and supporters… Other former Clinton aides who are now involved in the pro-Clinton super-PACs Ready for Hillary and Correct the Record were also in attendance."

Politico: "Big Labor eyes Hillary warily"

"Their dilemma will be whether any of the underdog candidates can gain enough traction to nudge Clinton toward policies they want discussed, such as how to grow the middle class."

New York Times: "MoveOn.org Looks to Nudge Elizabeth Warren Into 2016 Presidential Race"

"The liberal group is poised to spend $1 million on a campaign to draft Senator Warren, the Massachusetts Democrat, into the 2016 presidential race, an indication of an appetite among some activists for a more progressive alternative to Hillary Rodham Clinton."

Politico Magazine: "Can the Left Launch Its Own Tea Party?"

[Subtitle:] "After the midterm debacle, liberal insurgents say it's time to upend the Democratic Party."

Wall Street Journal column: WSJ's Bret Stephens: "Hillary Clinton's Empathy Deficit"

"Her problem is that she appears to be a singularly lousy empathizer."

Articles:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Sacramento Bee opinion: Karen Skelton: "'Mockingjay' script offers tips for Hillary Clinton's campaign"

By Karen Skelton

December 6, 2014, 3:00 p.m.

If you're a "Hunger Games" fan, you probably saw "Mockingjay – Part 1" over the Thanksgiving weekend, the third of the four-part movie franchise starring Jennifer Lawrence as the revolutionary leader Katniss Everdeen. As Hillary Rodham Clinton's inner circle now hunkers down to plot her probable presidential campaign, they would do well to memorize the script.

In the movie, Everdeen becomes the face of the populist revolution against the "Capitol" and its control over the fictional nation's economic and social infrastructure. In the 2016 presidential race, it is possible for Clinton to become the face of another bottoms-up economic revolution, one that makes history by forcing a dysfunctional and out-of-date government to do something about expanding the middle class. This revolution requires government to see the economy through the lens of women, which has never been done before.

Clinton is the right leader for this campaign at the right time. Recognizing the central economic role of women and girls has been a through line of her work for 40 years, as a young attorney, first lady, United States senator and secretary of state, where she championed an unprecedented number of programs to advance women's entrepreneurship and empowerment.

But there is nothing inevitable about this plot. No serious political operative or casual observer or hopeful friend thinks Clinton is going to have an easy time being elected president.

Her vulnerability lies in appearing inauthentic and unconnected to the very people she can help most. These are anxious voters far removed from Washington politics, marching to and from work, juggling child care and elder care, just trying to make ends meet. How can she let them know she understands what their life is really like when she's lived most of the last 30 years in a celebrity bubble?

Clinton's global iconic status has unfortunate consequences for a presidential candidate running on issues of fairness and economic mobility. Clinton cannot truly be connected to most people, and people cannot get traction with her, when they are separated by the motorcades, rope lines, security detail and staff surrounding her.

Clinton is tightly scripted and scheduled, with few opportunities to live like people whose vote she needs, people who grocery shop, drive cars and exercise with friends. In the bubble, there are handlers everywhere, pushing elevator buttons, handing you breath mints, whispering supporters' names into your ear before meticulously organized "meet and greets" with "real people." I know. I've done this duty hundreds of times as an inside-the-bubble staffer.

While a lot of Clinton's handling and separation is necessary and inevitable, it comes at a cost, especially to her. It deprives her of the connections to people who nourish her emotional memory bank and who will introduce her to stories that matter, because they illustrate the policy changes she speaks to. Without this sustenance, candidates become automated, less authentic and less appealing to voters. Voters stay home.

Confronting this problem of inauthenticity is where Everdeen and her team help Clinton most.

"Think of those incidents when Katniss Everdeen genuinely moved you … made you feel something real," instructed the revolution's tortured campaign consultant, played by Woody Harrelson. "You'll see that it was when no one told her what to do. She was unscripted."

When did Clinton make you feel something real? How about the moment in New Hampshire when she teared up at a local diner after the grueling Iowa caucuses she lost? Or the pure delight of looking into her infant granddaughter's eyes?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

These unscripted moments gave us a genuine view – and they are the moments that matter most to voters. It is no coincidence that Clinton came from behind to win the New Hampshire primary.

To lead the revolution she is so capable of leading, she must, like the Mockingjay, look for opportunities of spontaneity. There's a risk mistakes are made in unscripted moments – "we were broke after we left the White House" comes to mind – but they are mostly avoidable when caution is exercised.

And that is now her greatest challenge: to get into the field and be with the people who form the storyline of her narrative about women and America's economy. Clinton's folks should figure out how to use this time to allow her to go back to a stripped-down version of her life. How can she make a few anonymous visits to locations where men and women are living middle-class lives, being with them as they head to work at a minimum-wage job as caretakers in hospitals, waitresses or line mechanics?

It might take ingenuity and discreet planning to get someone as recognizable as the pope into normal life settings, but it might be one of the campaign's most important and fun assignments. Think of the decoys and disguises. It is all about seizing the opportunity to let Hillary return to Hillary.

Clinton, with her emotions recharged, will speak to fairness with renewed hunger and authenticity. Like the impassioned Jennifer Lawrence, when Clinton says "join the fight," Americans likely will.

Detroit News: "Mark Schauer looks back at failed bid"

By Chad Livengood

December 8, 2014

Lansing — One month after losing the race for governor, Mark Schauer is still searching for answers as to why Democrats stayed home on Election Day and passed on a chance to unseat Republican Gov. Rick Snyder.

Michigan Democratic Party leaders have begun analyzing election data to figure out which voters turned out to the polls or returned an absentee ballot and which ones did not.

Turnout in the Nov. 4 general election was 3.18 million, nearly 80,000 fewer voters than the 2010 election turnout when Republicans took control of all three branches of state government. Schauer and other Democrats never envisioned turnout being worse than 2010.

"The mystery is why turnout was less than 2010," Schauer said Monday in a wide-ranging interview with The Detroit News. "I think if we had had a turnout anywhere close to turnout in 2006, I'd be Gov.-elect Mark Schauer right now. I have no doubt about that."

The 2006 contest was a national wave election for Democrats, drawing a record 3.8 million voters to cast ballots in Michigan and carrying then-Gov. Jennifer Granholm to re-election victory over Republican businessman Dick DeVos.

"The evaluation that I'm interested in is why Democrats don't vote in midterm elections near to the level that they do in presidential elections,"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Schauer said.

In one of his first interviews since losing the election, Schauer said he believes his campaign “controlled the narrative” on education funding and Snyder’s controversial tax on some pension income.

But as campaign manager BJ Neidhardt reminded him after the 4 percentage point loss: “There are no moral victories.”

“I agree completely. We lost,” Schauer said in an interview at the Michigan Laborers District Council’s office in Lansing. “But if I had a crystal ball, it would be about figuring how we can better connect with those voters that didn’t vote and turn them out.”

Schauer, a former congressman and state legislator from Battle Creek, said he’s participating in a “post-mortem” study of election data with other Democratic Party leaders.

But Schauer says he has no future political “agenda,” only an interest in helping his party win races in future midterm elections when the balance of power in Lansing is determined.

“It’s unlikely I’ll be on the ballot again as a partisan candidate,” said Schauer, 53.

Bobby Schostak, chairman of the Michigan Republican Party, said Schauer’s search for answers about the lackluster Democratic turnout may be fruitless.

“It really is no mystery as to what happened here,” Schostak said Monday. “We turned out our voters, we had a better candidate and we had Michigan recovering under this governor.”

The Secretary of State’s Office released the qualified voter file Thursday, detailing who voted and who did not. Political operatives in both parties are scouring over the data, comparing the names of voters who cast ballots with the ones they appealed to this fall through door knocking, phone calls, emails and social media.

Based on that data, the Michigan Republican Party has determined that about 250,000 Republicans who didn’t vote in 2010 cast ballots this year, which may have aided Snyder as it was assumed he would lose some Democratic and independent votes he won in 2010.

Snyder defeated Schauer by about 128,000 votes.

“Not only did we get our folks vote, but I’m sure we got some soft Democrats to vote with us as well,” Schostak said. “We knew going into 2014 that we have to be focused on turning out our base.”

Schauer’s one regret

Schauer said one of his only regrets of the campaign was skipping a press conference after his Oct. 12 debate with the governor at Wayne State University.

Snyder and Schauer had both agreed to talk to reporters separately after the debate co-sponsored by The Detroit News.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Schauer said he skipped the appearance because he wanted to spend time backstage with his wife, sister and family before heading to another late-night event.

“If I had a do-over in the campaign, that would be it,” Schauer said. “I regret not sharing my positive feelings about the debate with the press.”

Schauer later added jokingly: “I should have taken my victory lap.”

Schauer defends campaign approach

During the campaign, some fellow Democrats joined Republicans in criticizing Schauer’s lack of a specific governing plan.

They said he was not offering enough specifics about how he would pay for repeal of a tax on pension income that generates $350 million for the state’s coffers or how he would put more money into K-12 education without raising taxes.

Schauer defended his campaign’s approach.

“I don’t think there’s any question that we provided more specifics in a more specific jobs plan than Rick Snyder did about what he would do in a second term,” Schauer said. “I would challenge anyone to say what did Rick Snyder promise in a second term, other than more of the same.”

Schauer conceded, though, that Snyder’s work to turnaround the city of Detroit aided his re-election campaign with voters in the suburbs.

“It seems clear that the governor had an advantage in the critical counties of Oakland and Macomb,” Schauer said.

‘I’ve moved on from that’

Schauer’s race for governor was his 10th bid for public offices, which have included the Battle Creek City Commission, the state House and Senate and U.S. House of Representatives.

Schauer lost re-election to Congress in 2010 to Republican Tim Walberg, swept out of office after one term by the same wave that helped put Snyder in office.

After that, he went to work for the Michigan Laborers. He has resumed consulting for the labor union and is weighing future job options in Michigan or out-of-state, but did not elaborate.

“I’m exploring some other ways to be engaged in public service,” he said. “I haven’t made any big decisions yet on any changes professionally.”

Schauer said he intends to get involved with the likely 2016 presidential campaign of Hillary Clinton. He co-chaired Clinton’s 2008 Michigan campaign.

On the campaign trail this fall, Schauer at times exerted more enthusiasm for being governor than Snyder sometimes does.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“It was a job that I felt I was ready for, I was excited about, I was passionate about,” Schauer said Monday. “But look, I’ve moved on from that.”

Washington Post: “A crowded GOP field for 2016 encounters donors reluctant to commit early”

By Matea Gold and Tom Hamburger

December 8, 2014, 7:44 p.m. EST

Efforts by potential Republican presidential candidates to win over wealthy donors have set off a series of contests for their support that could stall the GOP race for months.

In Florida, allies of former governor Jeb Bush and Sen. Marco Rubio are tussling over many of the same donors. In Texas, bundlers are feeling pulled by Bush, Gov. Rick Perry and Sen. Ted Cruz. Perry and Cruz are also competing for the backing of wealthy evangelical Christians, as are Indiana Gov. Mike Pence, Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal and former Arkansas governor Mike Huckabee.

Despite the appeals, which have stepped up in recent weeks, many top donors have committed to being noncommittal, wary of fueling the kind of costly and politically damaging battle that dominated the 2012 primaries. Senior party fundraisers believe that most campaigns will not be able to fully set up their fundraising operations until at least the spring.

A telling sign of the mood can be seen in the attitude of casino mogul Sheldon Adelson, one of the GOP’s biggest donors, who has expressed reluctance about engaging in the early primary fight. Instead, he and his wife, Miriam, are likely to set up their own super PAC to influence 2016 congressional campaigns as well as the White House race.

The hesitancy among the party’s financial patrons about jumping into the White House race right away could hamstring the ability of some candidates to ramp up their campaign operations and quickly break out of a pack of hopefuls that could number as many as two dozen.

Veteran fundraisers said there is a widespread desire among donors to pool their funds with other like-minded contributors, so as not to undercut their impact. Many are holding back from picking a candidate until Bush signals whether he will run.

With so many potential candidates — but no clear front-runner — the early maneuvering has had the effect of “just freezing” many donors, who are meeting with candidates but not making an early commitment, said Dan Senor, who advised GOP presidential nominee Mitt Romney in 2012.

“You would be hard pressed to find any invisible primary going back decades that was this fluid,” Senor said. “This is going to be chaotic and cluttered for some time.”

Establishment Republicans contemplating bids by figures such as Bush, Perry, Romney and New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie are pondering how to whittle the field to one of them, worried that a drawn-out primary process could produce a weakened GOP nominee.

“It’s really important for those donors who share the center-right philosophy to try to clear the field,” said Bobbie Kilberg, a longtime Republican fundraiser in Virginia who, with her husband, raised more than $4 million for Romney’s 2012 campaign. “We have to have one candidate we can all get behind."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Doing their homework

The discussions are not just about rallying around a single candidate but also about how to pick the strongest one.

"There is a heightened awareness of the need for further and deeper homework on candidates and how they are going to win," said one major GOP fundraiser who spoke on the condition of anonymity to describe private talks.

The upheaval on the right stands in stark contrast with the coalescing of major Democratic financiers behind the expected candidacy of former secretary of state Hillary Rodham Clinton. Operatives running a network of independent groups poised to flank her campaign began soliciting financial commitments the day after last month's elections. Billionaire media mogul Haim Saban, a longtime Clinton backer, recently said he would spend "whatever it takes" to get her into the White House.

The prospect of Clinton's financial might has spurred anxious conversations among GOP donors about identifying early funding for the opposition-research group America Rising and others to take aim at Clinton while the Republican primaries are underway.

"There will be a coalition of people who are going to really focus on making sure the Democratic candidate is not able to take a huge advantage over the Republican, as happened in 2012," said Ron Weiser, a former Republican National Committee finance chairman. "If Hillary is the Democratic candidate, she will be in a position of being able to define the leading Republican candidate long before it's clear who has won. The same must be done to Hillary in order to be sure she doesn't gain an advantage."

The prospective 2016 candidates face more intense pressure than ever to raise substantial sums of money, with GOP strategists predicting that the winner will need at least $75 million to get through the first three primaries — and $1 billion by Election Day.

In a field of as many as 23 Republican candidates, raising that kind of money will not be easy.

"It's a very large field of very competent candidates, and there's just so much money to go around," Kilberg said.

GOP White House hopefuls began reaching out to party donors in earnest as soon as this year's midterm elections were over. Sen. Rand Paul (Ky.) held strategy sessions in Washington with advisers and supporters last month. Perry is inviting hundreds of wealthy Republicans to dinners he is holding in a tent outside the Austin governor's mansion this month. Aides to Christie and Bush, among others, have individually contacted wealthy party backers.

The perennial discussions about assembling a national finance team have been accompanied by conversations about which billionaires will fund candidate-specific super PACs.

The Adelson effect

Wealthy donors such as Adelson "have an amazing ability to affect an outcome," said one party fundraiser. "What if one of them plops $50 million into one of the primary candidates?"

At a gathering of major donors to the Republican Governors Association last month in Boca Raton, Fla., aides to some of the prospective candidates hinted to contributors that Adelson was behind them as a way to signal momentum, according to people in attendance.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In fact, while the casino mogul has been meeting privately with the top prospective candidates for months, he is holding off on making any commitments, his associates said. “He is meeting with everybody,” says Andy Abboud, his top political adviser. “But any decision about 2016 candidates is a long ways down the pike.”

This week, Adelson was scheduled to host a dinner in Las Vegas with Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker and top Republican donors. The event follows private conversations he has had in recent weeks with Christie, Huckabee, Cruz and Jindal.

While Adelson and his wife assess the field, they are taking steps to dramatically change the way they spend their political money. After contributing nearly $100 million in 2012, largely to independent groups that backed GOP candidates, the couple are leaning toward setting up their own super PAC, as the New York Times first reported.

The decision to create an independent political operation follows an informal study by Adelson’s staff of spending in the 2012 and 2014 federal elections.

“We found a lot of inefficient and wasteful spending,” said a person close to Adelson,who asked not to be identified by name.

Adelson has become convinced that a shift to direct giving would permit the couple “to participate more directly in individual congressional campaigns without going through” the committees controlled by party leaders, the Adelson associate said.

Adelson is not alone in his cautious posture toward the 2016 White House race.

“The adage of jumping on the bandwagon early doesn’t apply this presidential cycle,” said Richard Hohlt, a Washington lobbyist who has served on the finance committees of GOP candidates since the days of Ronald Reagan. Hohlt has been attending meetings with potential 2016 candidates since the fall and says that he senses a noticeable hesitancy in the donor community.

“What most of us have learned in the last two cycles is that you need to verify the effectiveness of the campaign organization and the ability of the candidate to get across the finish line,” he said. “With so many candidates potentially running, most of us are thinking, ‘It is better to keep our powder dry.’”

MSNBC: “Hillary Clinton adds paid speech in March, complicating 2016 timeline”

By Alex Seitz-Wald

December 8, 2014, 5:25 p.m. EST

Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton has added a paid speech to her calendar in mid-March, complicating the time-frame for when she might announce a potential second run for the presidency.

On March 19, Clinton will give the keynote address at a conference organized by the New York and New Jersey chapter of the American Camp Association. The conference bills itself as the largest gathering of camp professionals in the world.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Susie Lupert, the group's executive director, confirmed to msnbc that Clinton will be paid for her appearance. "She is being paid for this speech. We went through the regular channels," Lupert said. Lupert stopped short at specifying how much, however.

The timing of Clinton's potential 2016 presidential run remains very much up in the air. The first time Clinton ran for president, she announced her candidacy on January 20, 2007. Many Clinton allies and observers had expected a similar announcement date, but the addition of paid speeches deeper into 2015 complicates the matter.

Clinton could run and continue to collect money for speeches, but her speaking fees – which range up to $300,000 – have been controversial and would likely be a political headache. She could also cancel the appearances after an announcement. But the fact that she's adding new bookings shows that Clinton has not fully made up her mind on timing, or even if she'll run, Clinton allies say.

Asked about timing at a recent gathering of the pro-Clinton super PAC Ready for Hillary, former Clinton White House political director Craig Smith said no one really knows. "I've given up on speculating on that. There's the get in early crowd, the get in late crowd. All I know is I've got to keep going until the day she decides," said Smith, who is now advising Ready for Hillary.

The former secretary of state will also give what appears to be a paid speech in Silicon Valley in late February, as Politico first reported, and two speeches in Canada sponsored by a bank.

Her scheduled appearance in March at the camp association may be more in keeping with themes Clinton will likely include if she runs for the White House. "The camp business is all about youth development and learning outside of school," Lupert said. And Clinton's "passion for youth development is clear. The importance of early education is clear. And she just seems to fit really well with what we are trying to do in this industry."

The Tri-State CAMP Conference, which will be held at the Atlantic City Convention Center in New Jersey, expects to draw 3,000 camp professionals, camp staff, youth development professionals, and "out of school" experiential educators, according to a press release.

Lupert said her group considered that Clinton might be running for president, but said they have long wanted to bring her to their conference. "It's something that we obviously considered," she said, while stressing that the non-profit is "completely non-political."

The date for conference was set three years in advance.

Clinton's spokesperson did not immediately respond to a request for comment.

Wall Street Journal blog: Washington Wire: "Hillary Clinton's March Speech Raises Timing Questions"

By Peter Nicholas

December 8, 2014, 8:18 p.m. EST

Hillary Clinton is scheduled to deliver a paid speech in March 2015, a point on the calendar that raises questions about when she will announce her decision on running for president and whether she intends to leave the Democratic Party uncertain of her plans until next spring.

The American Camp Association, New York and New Jersey said Monday that Mrs. Clinton will address its conference in Atlantic City on March

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

19. She will be paid for the appearance, said Susie Lupert, executive director of the association. Ms. Lupert wouldn't disclose the sum. Mrs. Clinton typically receives speaking fees in the range of $200,000 to $300,000.

"We often have high profile people and it seemed like, wow, if we could get someone like her at this moment , that would be a real coup for our organization," Ms. Lupert said in an interview on Monday. When Mrs. Clinton agreed to appear, "we were thrilled," she added.

She said her association began discussions with Mrs. Clinton over the summer. A spokesman for Mrs. Clinton's office didn't immediately respond to a request for comment.

The association describes itself as a nonprofit group that aims to promote "the quality of the summer camp experience."

Mrs. Clinton has said she is mulling a presidential bid but won't announce her plans until the new year.

In the 2008 presidential race, she announced her candidacy in January 2007. Were she to stick to that timetable in the 2016 election cycle, she would announce her plans next month.

She is running well ahead of other prospective Democratic candidates in early polling and she is widely expected to run.

But it would seem unlikely that she would be an announced candidate for president and still be delivering paid speeches. Were she to do that, she would open herself to criticism that her interests are divided. She would also be vulnerable to criticism that private interests were trying to curry favor with a potential president of the U.S. by paying her speaking fees.

Such considerations would suggest that she won't announce her candidacy until at least the spring of 2015 – after she is done with her paid speeches.

But waiting that long poses another set of complications. Some Democrats say that that Mrs. Clinton has effectively frozen the field – that potential candidates can't raise money or actively begin running until they know whether she's in the race. Were she to bow out, that could leave some lesser-known prospective Democratic candidates at a disadvantage, forcing them to mount a campaign at a comparatively late date in the calendar.

The Hill blog: Ballot Box: "New race, old faces for Hillary"

By Amie Parnes

December 9, 2014, 6:00 a.m. EST

Just a few months before many expect Hillary Clinton to announce a second bid for the White House, the players in her orbit look a lot like the ones who surrounded her the first time she ran for president.

And that's a worry to many Clinton supporters, who fear a 2016 run could fall victim to some of the same dysfunctions as her 2008 bid.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton's 2008 campaign was infamous for infighting at the staff level — complete with epic outbursts at staff meetings and power struggles throughout the operation.

"I don't think it'll be much different," said one top Democratic strategist. "While some people won't be returning, the core group will be the same as 2008 and I don't see it changing much."

While Clinton only has a staff of about a half-dozen currently working for her, hundreds of former Clintonites, from her East Wing and Senate days as well as from her last campaign, are itching for an announcement so they can pounce for Round 2.

One of Clinton's biggest strengths is also one of her biggest weaknesses, say veteran Clinton-watchers: loyalty to a fault.

She and her husband, former President Bill Clinton, have built an endless Rolodex from their days in Arkansas to Hillary Clinton's time at the State Department and value loyalty in staff. In turn, ex-staffers support the former first couple to no end.

That creates a problem, says a former aide.

"They have these fan boys and fan girls who go all the way back to Arkansas, former staff, longtime friends, donors, acquaintances," the ex-aide said. "You don't need all those people to provide advice or run a campaign."

Separately, a Democratic strategist said Clinton's first campaign was "too ridden by faction" and included too many people "fighting for their piece of the pie."

"They need a 'come to Jesus' moment where they realize some pretty significant mistakes were made in 2008 and they've gotta find a way to change it," the strategist said of the Clinton team, adding that Hillary Clinton needed to "get rid of some of the dead wood" and add some new blood to the operation.

At a recent Ready for Hillary meeting in New York, many of the same players — including Harold Ickes, who served as senior adviser in the 2008 campaign, and even older hands such as James Carville and Paul Begala, who worked in the Bill Clinton White House — addressed hundreds of donors and supporters. Throughout the day-long meeting, the halls at the Sheraton Times Square hotel felt like a Clinton reunion, with the likes of Craig Smith, a former senior adviser to Clinton's 2008 campaign, and Jonathan Mantz, who served as Clinton's finance manager in 2008, among the familiar faces.

Other former Clinton aides who are now involved in the pro-Clinton super-PACs Ready for Hillary and Correct the Record were also in attendance.

Clinton allies say that good staffers shouldn't be disqualified from working on the 2016 campaign just because they worked on the losing 2008 bid.

"All of her former, current and potentially future staff should have grown up and wisened up," one former Clinton aide said. "Tools have changed, campaigns have changed, the electorate has changed, the whole world has changed.

"Involvement in 2008 should not be a disqualifier, but a resistance to shaking up the status quo should," the aide added.

Clinton herself seemingly learned some of these lessons while doing post-mortem sessions.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Patti Solis Doyle, who was Clinton's first campaign manager before she was let go in the middle of the grueling Democratic primary, and strategist Mark Penn, whose ties went back to Bill Clinton's White House days, are not expected to play roles during a 2016 campaign. Both were blamed by people in the Clinton inner circle for an arrogance at the top of her 2008 campaign.

When Clinton went to the State Department the following year, she surrounded herself with many longtime Senate and campaign aides — but she also brought in and relied upon a number of staffers outside her close-knit network.

It is unclear how many aides to President Obama might go on to work for Clinton's would-be campaign, but some have already made inroads.

Mitch Stewart, for example, who served in key roles during Obama's 2008 and 2012 campaigns, currently serves as an adviser for Ready for Hillary. And Jim Messina, Obama's former campaign manager, is the co-chairman of Priorities USA, another political action committee backing Clinton.

And when Clinton rolled out her book, Hard Choices, earlier this year, Tommy Vietor, a longtime Obama spokesman, helped manage her press.

Even if many of the same aides reemerge this year, political observers say Clinton can run a successful campaign.

"In 2008, there were too many colonels and no general to deploy and discipline the colonels and their troops," said Cal Jillson, a professor of political science at Southern Methodist University. "There is nothing like getting beat ... to instill a little discipline the next time around."

Politico: "Big Labor eyes Hillary warily"

By Maggie Haberman and Mike Elk

December 9, 2014, 5:32 a.m. EST

[Subtitle:] Union leaders vow they won't be taken for granted in 2016.

Frustrated by President Barack Obama and wary of Hillary Clinton's perceived closeness to Wall Street, several leading figures in organized labor are resisting falling in line early behind the former secretary of state as the inevitable Democratic presidential nominee.

Top officials at AFL-CIO are pressing its affiliates to hold off on an endorsement and make the eventual nominee earn their support and spell out a clear agenda. The strategy is designed to maximize labor's strength after years of waning clout and ensure a focus on strengthening the middle class, but it could provide an opening for a candidate running to Clinton's left to make a play for union support.

"We do have a process in place, which says before anybody endorses, we'll talk to the candidates," AFL-CIO President Richard Trumka said in an interview. That could postpone an endorsement until the second half of 2015, he said.

"The big question we want to know is, 'What's the agenda?'" added Trumka. "We don't want to hear that people have a message about correcting the economy — we want to know that they have an agenda for correcting the economy. If we get the same economic [plan] no matter who the president is, you get the same results."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The plan doesn't mean that someone other than Clinton will win the unions' backing, though some labor leaders are holding out hope that Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.) will run for president, and others speak highly of Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley and Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.). But it is a warning shot to Clinton or any other potential Democratic hopeful not to take labor for granted.

For Clinton, who's been battered in the media over the past year for her paid speeches, jet-setting travel demands and questions of whether she truly understands the new economic populism of the progressive left, labor could be a key validator. And at a moment when economic populism is dominating discussion and Democrats are worried about how to relate to the middle class again, the efforts to stave off endorsements could be troublesome for Clinton.

Her backers are mindful of the need to have a strong showing among labor groups, especially after 2008, when a divided labor movement gave lift to then-Sen. Barack Obama.

The former New York senator showed how mindful she is of the concerns of the Democratic base on the economy during a late-October appearance in Massachusetts on behalf of failed gubernatorial hopeful Martha Coakley. Embracing the populism of Warren, who spoke just before her, Clinton made a clunky statement that "corporations and businesses don't create jobs."

But Trumka's hopes of a united front may be difficult to achieve for a number of reasons. Major unions such as SEIU aren't part of the AFL-CIO and tend to operate independently when it comes to politics. There's significant doubt within organized labor whether any of the alternative candidates can gain enough traction to make an endorsement meaningful.

And Clinton has strong, long-standing relationships with some unions, which could allow her to pick up support earlier than Trumka's process calls for.

"There's a sense that people — the members who have talked to me about it — they feel very close to her," said Randi Weingarten, the president of the American Federation of Teachers, an AFL-CIO member and a longtime supporter of Clinton.

"They feel like she's their colleague, that she's their champion, that she is someone who worked doggedly in 2008 or worked doggedly as their senator," said Weingarten, who used to helm the teachers union in New York City. She added that her own union has an endorsement process that she will adhere to.

Weingarten is also on the board of the reconstituted super PAC Priorities USA, which plans to support Clinton in a primary if necessary, according to people familiar with its plans.

The labor movement has suffered a string of defeats since the 2008 fiscal collapse. Efforts to reel in major pension obligations in several states, including blue states like New York and California, have often pitted unions against governors.

In the two years after the fiscal collapse, public-sector unions in particular became public enemy No. 1, targeted by Republican governors including New Jersey's Chris Christie and Wisconsin's Scott Walker.

Labor leaders have repeatedly been disappointed by Obama. They had high hopes after he declared in 2007 that he would "walk on the picket line with you" if bargaining rights were threatened. But once he took office, Obama never pressed for labor's top priority during the election: the Employee Free Choice Act. The measure would have made it easier for workers to form unions but was opposed by Senate Republicans and a few Senate Democrats.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Labor later lost a standoff with the White House in a 2010 Arkansas primary, when Sen. Blanche Lincoln defeated the union-backed candidate, then went on to lose in the general election. And labor leaders were again dismayed by Obama's muted comments when Walker moved successfully to curtail collective-bargaining rights. In recent months, organized labor, particularly unions that represent manufacturing workers, has been angered by Obama's push for the proposed Trans-Pacific Partnership trade agreement, which some have dubbed "NAFTA on steroids."

AFL-CIO, the massive umbrella group for other major unions, is staging a series of forums on wage stagnation in the coming months. The first one, in January, will feature as the keynote speaker Warren, who some progressives are pleading with to run. Trumka has frequently praised Warren's efforts to address income inequality.

Some smaller unions are also taking a look at O'Malley, who will soon leave office, and Sanders. Their dilemma will be whether any of the underdog candidates can gain enough traction to nudge Clinton toward policies they want discussed, such as how to grow the middle class. They also want to hear how she speaks about Wall Street and efforts to reel in big banks.

The labor movement splintered in 2007, during the run-up to the primaries. Back then, Clinton was the overwhelming favorite for the nomination, and AFSCME, a major public-sector union, supported her in October of that year, at a moment when then-Sen. Obama was on the rise. But SEIU went on to endorse Obama in early 2008, giving him a critical lift.

This time, much of organized labor is willing to let the nomination process play out for a while.

"Labor would love to see her have to [work for] the nomination and not have it given to her," said one labor official, who has worked with Clinton in the past and asked to speak anonymously in order to be candid. "I think she has to deal with our issues first before she gets our support, and we're laying off on an early endorsement."

Every major labor figure interviewed pointed out that the Democratic field is still unformed and that Clinton is not yet a candidate.

AFSCME President Lee Saunders, who worked with Clinton when he was in charge of the union's embattled New York affiliate, District Council 37, signaled his group is heeding Trumka's call not to rush.

"I believe that she understands the plight of the middle class," Saunders said of Clinton. But, "we'll have to see if she's going to wrap her arms around that and make it a major issue."

Communications Workers of America President Larry Cohen said there is concern within the labor movement about too little competition for the Democratic nomination. The worry, he said, is that "the next candidate will do more of the same as they raise $2 billion mostly from [big] donors for their campaign. We need fundamental reform, and it is not in sight."

Cohen said his union is devoting more attention to electing local officeholders who back its policies, as opposed to focusing on the White House. The 2008 election "was a clear signal that billion-dollar presidential politics will not lead to change without a much deeper movement across our nation."

To some extent, Clinton, if she runs, will have to bear the brunt of labor's pent-up frustration with Obama. But there's also wariness of the policies her husband put in place as president, such as the North American Free Trade Agreement. And as secretary of state, Clinton led the negotiations for the proposed Trans-Pacific Partnership deal, which is opposed by many manufacturing unions, including the Steelworkers and the Teamsters. Officials from both unions declined to comment for this story.

Steve Rosenthal, a former AFL-CIO political director, stirred the pot on that very question in an op-ed on Huffington Post shortly after the midterms, suggested that labor change its entire approach to elections.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"The only way to help the party that won't help itself is to stop giving it all your campaign money," he wrote. "Instead, unions and progressive groups should lead the way — stop preaching and start practicing what we have always said the party should do: invest in a national campaign aimed at mobilizing millions of Americans committed to voting only for candidates who support a new, populist, all-inclusive American economic agenda. If we start this parade, other progressives — and the Democratic Party and its candidates — will follow."

Some unions are giving O'Malley and Sanders a look. Since the beginning of September, labor interests, primarily construction unions, have given $122,000 to a pro-O'Malley political action committee.

Leaders of Change to Win, an umbrella group consisting of Teamsters, SEIU and UFW, see Sanders as a forceful advocate for union issues, noting his presence at union halls and on the picket line of a fast-food strike last week. They want to see other presidential candidates embrace strike actions by low-wage workers.

"The Democratic Party economic agenda is bankrupt," Change to Win Deputy Director Joseph Geevarghese said. "The only way that workers can have power is through a robust system of collective bargaining, and that is not a central pillar of the Democratic Party's economic platform."

Trumka said he has spoken with Clinton and does not expect she will take labor for granted.

"I think she's very astute, and I don't think she would do that," he said. "It's not about us; it's about the agenda. They can take me for granted all they want."

New York Times: "MoveOn.org Looks to Nudge Elizabeth Warren Into 2016 Presidential Race"

By Jonathan Martin

December 8, 2014

WASHINGTON — Some Democrats are "Ready for Hillary." MoveOn.org is ready for Elizabeth Warren.

The liberal group is poised to spend $1 million on a campaign to draft Senator Warren, the Massachusetts Democrat, into the 2016 presidential race, an indication of an appetite among some activists for a more progressive alternative to Hillary Rodham Clinton.

MoveOn.org's executive director, Ilya Sheyman, said the group planned to open offices and hire staff in Iowa and New Hampshire, the states that kick off the presidential nominating process, and ultimately to air television ads in those states. The group will begin its push with a website, "Run Warren Run," allowing supporters to sign a petition urging Ms. Warren to pursue a White House bid and featuring a video about her.

"We want to demonstrate to Senator Warren that there's a groundswell of grass-roots energy nationally and in key states and to demonstrate there's a path for her," Mr. Sheyman said. He added that the effort was not being made in coordination with Ms. Warren and that the group advised her staff about it only last weekend.

Ms. Warren, who is entering her third year in the Senate, has fast become a favorite among liberal activists for her unapologetic brand of economic populism, but she has also repeatedly denied any interest in pursuing the presidency.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"As Senator Warren has said many times, she is not running for president," said Lacey Rose, Ms. Warren's press secretary, regarding the draft effort.

Such comments have not, however, dissuaded her admirers. MoveOn.org is set to survey its eight million members for one day starting Tuesday, with the expectation that they will affirm its support of the effort to nudge Ms. Warren into the race. She is well regarded by the group, having gotten its support in her 2012 race and joining members on conference calls during her time in the Senate on such issues as student loan debt.

Mrs. Clinton is a popular figure among Democrats and enjoys a wide lead in early polls, but some progressives are wary of her style of politics and believe that widening income disparities in the country call for a more confrontational figure.

Ms. Warren, a former Harvard law professor, is the most sought-after candidate among this liberal bloc, but others could fill the void if she remains on the sidelines. Former Senator Jim Webb of Virginia has already opened an exploratory committee, and Senator Bernie Sanders, a liberal independent from Vermont, and Gov. Martin O'Malley of Maryland have also discussed presidential bids.

Asked about Mrs. Clinton, Mr. Sheyman said the group's effort was unrelated "to any other candidate," but added that MoveOn.org members want a Democratic nominee who fits the moment.

"Voters are looking for bold solutions about how you fix a rigged system in which middle- and working-class families are falling behind," he said.

Whether there is significant energy behind the "Run Warren Run" effort may be known soon: MoveOn.org is planning a kickoff on next Tuesday in Des Moines.

Politico Magazine: "Can the Left Launch Its Own Tea Party?"

By Bill Scher

December 8, 2014

[Subtitle:] After the midterm debacle, liberal insurgents say it's time to upend the Democratic Party.

Even as they publicly condemn Tea Party Republicans as hostage-taking legislative thugs, the truth is that some Democrats are quietly jealous of them. Think of it: the Tea Party gang gets to intimidate party leaders, threaten legislation, block nominees, shut down the government and default on the debt if they don't get their way. They cause major trouble.

Boy, does that sound good.

The extreme right has power, and that's something the left hasn't had much of for a long time. But in the aftermath of the party's disastrous midterm performance, it's very possible that the Democratic Party leadership will be facing its own Tea Party-style insurgency from the other side of the spectrum. "You're going to get a fight within the Democratic Party. There is a substantial disagreement coming up," Rep. Jerry Nadler, an outspoken Congressional Progressive Caucus member, recently told the Wall Street Journal.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The only question is, how serious a fight will it be? Will it be a polite spat that results in what has happened most often before—the fast marginalization of the left, with the best elements of the various critiques being stitched together by a centrist Hillary Clinton, or whoever is the nominee in 2016? Or are the populists ready to stage their own grassroots rebellion, setting their sights on eradicating all corporate influence from the Democrats and undermining any attempt by President Obama to compromise with Republicans by any means necessary?

Progressive activists such as the feisty Progressive Change Campaign Committee would love to be able to instill some of their own intraparty fear, sharpen their populist pitchforks and prod Democratic leaders leftward. And there is reason to believe this could be their moment.

The rebels offer a message about the chronic unfairness of the system so potent that even the Koch brothers aren't above poaching it (a recent ad from the Kochs' political arm chastised newly deposed Sen. Mary Landrieu for flying in private jets, even though the brothers have a few of their own.) The new liberal insurgency issavvy enough to stress issues that poll well and relate to the economic anxieties gripping the electorate, such as increasing Social Security benefits and shrinking the size of Wall Street, instead of chasing stale leftist pipe dreams like nationalizing the health insurance industry. And they have the good fortune of going up against rivals unable to match the intensity of their focus, with a sitting president managing a never-ending list of crises, a 2016 Democratic front-runner who is congenitally cautious, and an incoming Republican majority distracted with figuring out how to keep a government open.

With progressive Sen. Elizabeth Warren's ascension to the Senate Democratic leadership, momentum would appear to be with the populists, and they will likely have multiple opportunities in the next Congress to plant their flag. Already Warren – who often refrains from personal attacks against leaders of the Democratic establishment – is turning opposition to Obama's Treasury undersecretary nomination of Wall Street investment banker Antonio Weiss into a populist rallying cry.

And despite the recent jousting between the White House and the Republican leadership (not to mention the White House and the Senate Democratic leadership), there are several policy matters on the horizon where Obama's, Boehner's and McConnell's interests could converge. But since most areas of potential compromise will likely fail to unify the Republican caucus, congressional Democrats will have leverage to shape deals, or sabotage them.

Another potential flashpoint for populists is a budget deal. Any bill passed this month to keep the government open will only run as long as the end of the fiscal year in September, if not earlier. (Also of note, last year's debt ceiling suspension is up in three months.) At some point in 2015, Obama and the Republican majority are going to have reach agreements on spending levels if government agencies are to stay open. With discretionary social spending already cut by 15 percent since Republicans took over the House in 2011, any additional cuts will be hard for Democrats to swallow. If Obama chooses to trade additional cuts to win something else, congressional Democrats could opt to play their own shutdown card.

Also on tap is surveillance reform, an issue that animates liberals as much as civil libertarians of the Tea Party. If no bill is passed by June 1, the Patriot Act sections that provide the legal basis for the controversial metadata collection program and the "roving" wiretap program will expire. As libertarian-minded Republicans have already balked at the mild NSA reform that passed the House (but failed to clear the Senate) earlier this year, Democratic votes will likely be needed, and could be withheld.

***

If a Tea Party of the Left rises, it will be something that we haven't experienced on the national scene for a long time. Ever since Bill Clinton moved the Democratic Party to the center in the early 1990s, and certainly through much of the Obama era, most elected Democrats were reluctant to play hardball.

For example, in March 2010 the Congressional Progressive Caucus chose not to follow through on its 2009 threat to vote against any health care bill that didn't give consumers the choice of a government-run health insurance plan, supporting an Affordable Care Act that saved private insurers from competing with the federal government. Immediately after the 2010 midterms, the House Democratic caucus initially supported a nonbinding resolution declaring opposition to Obama's deal with the Republicans to temporarily extend the Bush tax cuts, but Speaker Nancy Pelosi still put it on the floor and a majority of her caucus voted for it.

By 2011, with Obama now trying to work with a Republican majority in the House, Democratic willingness to buck the President increased, yet was still limited. House Democrats split evenly over the bipartisan deal that swapped spending cuts for a higher federal debt limit. But few Democrats were serious about risking a debt default; the 95 “no” votes surely would have been fewer if passage wasn’t already assured. And the split did not cause a deeper rift and did not hamper Obama’s 2012 re-election bid.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

However, once Obama’s days on the ballot were over, and Democratic fates were no longer intertwined with his, populists began to feel out opportunities to more openly oppose any presidential rightward leanings. Sen. Warren led a pressure campaign to prevent Obama from nominating Larry Summers to the Federal Reserve. Immigration advocates antagonized Obama as “deporter-in-chief” instead of taking Obama’s advice and training their fire on obstructionist Republicans.

Still, Democrats stopped short of a scorched-earth, Tea Party-style insurgency. Some progressives wanted Democrats to thwart the December 2013 post-shutdown budget deal over its exclusion of long-term unemployment benefits, in effect threatening their own shutdown. But in the end, only 32 House Democrats broke ranks. And despite their unease over the President’s offer to swap higher tax revenues for reducing Social Security benefits by rejiggering the cost-of-living formula, only 40 Democratic House members signed a pledge to vote against any such deal.

Moreover, there were no Tea Party-style populist primary challenges of incumbent Democrats of any significance in 2014, prompting Brookings Institution’s Walter Shapiro to declare, “the Democrats appear to have swapped their rambunctious heritage for a hefty dose of Xanax.”

The same could be said for Democrats’ approach to the November election. They did not embrace the proud Obama message bragging on how the Gross Domestic Product, private sector job creation and corporate profits all have grown during the past six years. After crediting the Democrats’ “new foundation” of public “investments,” health care reforms and Wall Street “rules,” Obama contended we should build on his record of activist government to tackle the remaining problem of stagnant wages. Nor did Democrats go all-in on the combative Warren message that eschewed praise of the incrementally improved system, bypassing the Obama record to excoriate a fundamentally broken system: “The game is rigged.”

Democrats by and large passed on any pointed, overarching vision, and instead ran on a “populist lite” platform of higher minimum wages, equal pay, birth control access, lower student loan rates and closing corporate tax loopholes, with some paeans to bipartisanship and fiscal restraint thrown in the mix.

But now, since no single big-picture approach was fully tested in 2014, Democrats of all stripes are free to insist their preferred narrative lights the path to a successful 2016 and beyond. The race to define the Democratic Party of the future is on.

There will be several testing points along the way. Beyond those issues with hard deadlines in 2015 is the higher-hanging fruit of corporate tax reform. President Obama and Republican leaders expressed interest in finding common ground after the midterms – with Obama linking the issue to a priority nearer to his heart, job-creating infrastructure spending. There are several factors that suggest such a grand bargain could happen. Bipartisan legislation already exists that would set up a public-private infrastructure loan fund with money collected from corporate profits now stashed in offshore bank accounts, via “repatriation” of the cash with a one-time discount tax rate. The concept has been backed by strange bedfellows such as former President Bill Clinton and Sen. Rand Paul.

But there is a reason this deal wasn’t struck already. Any corporate tax reform acceptable to Obama involves offsetting the cost of lower rates by closing loopholes, sparking a myriad of fights between corporations that has yet to be resolved. And Warren’s populists see the president’s supposed “repatriation” gambit – if corporations bring back money from overseas they’ll get tax breaks — as a perfect example of how “the game is rigged” Progressives see it as a giant handout to corporations leavened only by the few crumbs of infrastructure they will reportedly be obligated to invest in. Even if Obama, Boehner and McConnell could pull off this deal, a Democratic Tea Party could partner with Republicans and scotch Obama’s hope to add to his legacy a literal concrete achievement.

In the populists’ wildest dreams, Democrats would band together with Republicans steamed at Obama’s executive actions to derail legislation giving the president “fast-track” trade negotiation authority. The bill would allow trade agreements signed by Obama to be submitted to Congress without any opportunity for amendments or filibusters. Trade proponents see fast-track as a critical precursor to securing economically beneficial regional agreements with Asia and Europe, whereas Warren sees another case of how the game is rigged to serve “Wall Street, pharmaceuticals, telecom, big polluters [and] outsourcers.”

However, for Democrats to have leverage on trade, Republicans have to be divided. To date, Republican support for Obama’s trade deals has been strong, with near unanimous support for the South Korea, Panama and Colombia agreements. This month, Republican leaders have been striving to keep the executive action controversy separate from their fast-track push, and the U.S. Chamber of Commerce – which significantly funded the Republican midterm victories — will be lobbying their clients heavily. Republicans would have to snub their own patrons for a Democratic Tea Party to stymie Obama's trade agenda.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

While trade may be too big a reach, the other issues appear to give the populists strong opportunities to make their mark. But with opportunities come risks.

Populists can make the case that the public is with them on reining in Wall Street, demanding corporations pay their fair share of taxes, and opposing unfair trade deals. But last year Tea Party Republicans thought they could win a shutdown showdown because polls showed opposition to Obamacare. They were wrong. Republicans suffered major public opinion damage for instigating the shutdown and were forced to cave in the subsequent budget agreement.

Furthermore, the Democratic base is far more open to compromise than the Republican base. In a post-election Pew poll, only 32 percentof Republican voters wanted the new Congress to work with President Obama. But 52 percent of Democratic voters wanted Obama to work with the incoming Republican majority. Democrats are more inclined to see compromise itself as a public good, a fealty to the cult of bipartisanship that drives progressive activists nuts. If Democratic base voters get squeamish over reflexively oppositional tactics, the attempt to launch a progressive populist uprising could fizzle.

The lesson is: There are limits to how much confrontation the public will tolerate, a fact of political life that Tea Party Republicans still have difficulty accepting — witness the conservative rationalizations that the shutdown helped Republicans win the midterms, leaving out the fact that Republicans prudently refused an opportunity to shut it down again one month prior to Election Day. Fighting on principle can earn respect, but putting gamesmanship ahead of governing will not.

If copying the Tea Party handbook is fraught with danger, where does that leave the Warrens and the Nadlers? One alternative to maximum congressional confrontation is maximum public communication. Selling the populist worldview and winning the argument in the court of public opinion is more important than fighting each and every legislative skirmish to the bitterest of ends. If a Democratic Tea Party is going to improve upon the Republican version, more strategic thinking will have to be applied regarding what battles to pick and when it's time to stand down.

The Washington Post's Dana Milbank recently recoiled at the recent friction within Democratic ranks. Noting the difficulties the Republican majority will have resolving its fissures, he argued, "Democrats should be exploiting those, not rehashing old fights [and] thwarting themselves." But Milbank ignores the fact that tussles between populists and centrists inside the Democratic big tent have proven constructive, leading to compromises that form the heart of Obama's liberal legacy: the Recovery Act, Affordable Care Act and Dodd-Frank bank reform. Tension over proposed centrist reforms that the populists helped stall, such as with Social Security and trade, have yet to tear the party apart.

One of the oddities of the past six years is that the Democrats have carried the burden of managing the broader ideological spectrum within their rank-and-file, yet Republicans are the ones who have suffered the most from intraparty warfare. The greater acceptance among Democratic base voters for compromise and diversity of opinion are the poles that have kept up their tent.

That acceptance will give the populists plenty of running room when seeking to win the debate with voters, but will also constrain them from employing the most confrontational tactics inside Congress. Populists need not muzzle their vision or surrender their votes, but neither do they need to read Green Eggs and Ham on the Senate floor to move the Democratic Party in their preferred direction.

Wall Street Journal column: WSJ's Bret Stephens: "Hillary Clinton's Empathy Deficit"

By Bret Stephens

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

December 8, 2014, 7:09 p.m. EST

Hillary Clinton is being pilloried by pundits on the right for saying, at a recent speech at Georgetown, that America's leaders should "empathize" with America's enemies. But what's so wrong about that?

"This is what we call smart power," she said, using the phrase that was supposed to define her tenure as secretary of state. "Using every possible tool and partner to advance peace and security. Leaving no one side on the sidelines. Showing respect even for one's enemies. Trying to understand, in so far as psychologically possible, [and] empathize with their perspective and point of view."

As a matter of politics, "empathize" was a lousy word choice, a reminder that Mrs. Clinton is as tin-eared as she is ambitious: Expect a GOP political attack ad if and when she runs for president.

But empathy isn't sympathy. Understanding an enemy's point of view does not mean taking their side. Respect is not solidarity. "If you know the enemy and know yourself, you need not fear the result of a hundred battles," Sun Tzu teaches in "The Art of War." "If you know yourself but not the enemy, for every victory gained you will also suffer a defeat. If you know neither the enemy nor yourself, you will succumb in every battle."

It's good advice. Mrs. Clinton isn't wrong to adopt it. Her problem is that she appears to be a singularly lousy empathizer.

In April 2005 Vladimir Putin said the collapse of the Soviet Union was "the greatest geopolitical catastrophe of the century." In 2006 a Russian dissident in London was poisoned by polonium—a nuclear attack in miniature—leading to a breakdown in relations between London and Moscow. In 2008 Russia invaded Georgia. That same year, educational manuals for Russian social-studies teachers took the view that Joseph Stalin was "the most successful Soviet leader ever."

What about the Great Terror of the 1930s, in which millions of Soviet citizens were killed by Stalin's henchmen? That, according to the manual, happened because Stalin "did not know who would deal the next blow, and for that reason he attacked every known group and movement." Commenting on the Terror, Mr. Putin allowed that the killing was terrible "but in other countries worse things happened."

Such was the man Mrs. Clinton had every reason to "understand" when she arrived at the State Department in 2009. What conclusions was she supposed to draw about someone whose core ambition was to restore the reputation, and the former borders, of the old Soviet Union? That the time had come to clink glasses and announce a reset?

Or take Iran. In her most recent memoir, Mrs. Clinton asks: "If Iran had a nuclear weapon tomorrow, would that create even one more job for a country where millions of young people are out of work? Would it send one more Iranian to college or rebuild the roads and ports still crumbling from the war with Iraq a generation ago? When Iranians look abroad, would they rather end up like North Korea or South Korea?"

These are the kinds of questions that often confound Americans who too easily assume that the things democratic politicians want for their people are the same things dictators want for themselves. South or North Korea? That's easy: Tehran's ties to Pyongyang run deep because both capitals see themselves resisting American imperialism. Nuclear weapons or a better economy? That's easy, too, since the former allow you to bully your neighbors and dominate the region, while the latter merely create a growing middle class demanding greater civic and political freedoms.

If Mrs. Clinton made a serious effort to see things from the ayatollahs' point of view, maybe she'd get this. If she had real respect for them, she wouldn't suppose that they are merely too stupid, or blinded by prejudice, or stuck in the past, to understand their own values and self-interest. Why do liberals who celebrate diversity seem to think that, deep down, all people want the same things?

Here's another question: If Mrs. Clinton is at least prepared to attempt a show of empathy for the Putins and Khameneis of the world, why so little empathy for American allies? In March 2010 a minor Israeli official announced the approval of some additional construction in a Jerusalem neighborhood, mischaracterized as a "settlement," when Vice President Joe Biden was in the country. It was an ordinary bureaucratic bungle by the Israeli government.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

So what did Mrs. Clinton do? She called Israel's Benjamin Netanyahu to yell at him. "I told the Prime Minister that President Obama had viewed the news about East Jerusalem as 'a personal insult to him, the Vice President, and the United States,' " as she recounts in her memoir.

Such has been the pattern of the Obama administration, whose foreign policy record Mrs. Clinton cannot escape or finesse: misplaced understanding toward our adversaries, shrill lectures for our friends. The next president needs to make it the other way around.

Calendar:

Sec. Clinton's upcoming appearances as reported online. Not an official schedule.

· December 16 – New York, NY: Sec. Clinton honored by Robert F. Kennedy Center for Justice and Human Rights (Politico)

· January 21 – Saskatchewan, Canada: Sec. Clinton keynotes the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce's "Global Perspectives" series (MarketWired)

· January 21 – Winnipeg, Canada: Sec. Clinton keynotes the Global Perspectives series (Winnipeg Free Press)

· February 24 – Santa Clara, CA: Sec. Clinton to Keynote Address at Inaugural Watermark Conference for Women (PR Newswire)

· March 19, 2015 – Atlantic City, NJ: Sec. Clinton keynotes American Camp Association conference (PR Newswire)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Robert Creamer" <creamer2@aol.com>
To:	"Robert Creamer" <creamer2@aol.com>
Date:	9/1/2013 2:46:52 PM
Subject:	[big campaign] New Huff Post from Creamer-Why Congress Should Approve the President's Request to Punish the Use of Chemical Weapons

http://www.huffingtonpost.com/robert-creamer/a-progressive-perspective_b_3854243.html

A Progressive Perspective: Why Congress Should Approve the President's Request to Punish the Use of Chemical Weapons

I began my work in politics and the Progressive Movement working for civil rights and the end of the Viet Nam War in the 1960's. And I worked hard to end one of the greatest foreign policy outrages of my lifetime – the War in Iraq.

I believe that U.S. military and covert actions to support the status quo in Central and South America, Africa and Asia were utterly indefensible.

But I also believe that there are times when the use of military force is not only justified – but required.

Bashar al Assad cannot be allowed to use chemical weapons to kill 1,400 people – over 400 children – in the plain site of the entire world – with impunity. It's that simple.

Since the end of World War I – almost a century ago – there has been a worldwide consensus that human society will not allow combatants in conflicts to use chemical or biological weapons. After World War II, nuclear weapons were added to the list.

These true weapons of mass destruction present a danger far beyond their effects on the immediate combatants – or even the innocent bystanders – of a particular conflict. If the world allows and thereby legitimates their use, it will unleash forces that could endanger huge swaths of human society – and even the existence of humanity itself.

While chemical weapons cannot do damage as extensive as nuclear or radiological weapons – they have the potential of killing and maiming tens of thousands of our fellow human beings within hours or minutes. And their horrific effects have been graphically demonstrated in real time on the television screens of the world documenting Assad's attacks on innocent civilians.

Sometime in the last century, human society entered a gauntlet. As we pass through that gauntlet, a race is on to determine whether our values and political structures evolve fast enough to keep up with the geometric increases in our technology? If they do, technology could propel human beings into an awesome and unprecedented period of freedom, possibility and fulfillment. If not, we could destroy ourselves and turn into an evolutionary dead end – like our cousins the Neanderthals.

To survive that gauntlet, it is critically important that we do everything in our power to absolutely ban the use of weapons of mass destruction – and to make those who violate that ban into worldwide pariahs. We must make their use unthinkable.

In political and historic narratives – some moments take on an iconic, symbolic importance. Assad's use of chemical weapons is now one of them. Will the world stand idly by while we watch – up close and personal – as a government uses chemical weapons with impunity? Or will someone take action to require that the perpetrators of this crime be made to pay a price?

Most people in the world wish that someone had stepped up to stop the horrific genocide in Rwanda. Most now believe President Clinton and NATO did the right thing to prevent ethnic cleansing in Kosovo.

History will judge us harshly, if we stand by idly, and legitimate the use of chemical weapons – and weapons of mass destruction in general – by allowing their use in the view of the full world to go unpunished.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And let's be clear. We're not debating who has the right to possess these weapons – or to possess nuclear weapons and other weapons of mass destruction here -- a major topic of political debate in the world for the last decade. We are talking about their actual use.

If we agree that we cannot allow that actual use to occur with utter impunity, then the only question remaining is – who will act to impose a serious sanction?

Unfortunately the United Nations has not yet evolved into an institution that has the ability to escape gridlock if one of the world's major powers stands in the way. It will not act. Russia and China will prevent it.

So as a practical matter, if the United States does not lead some sort of international action to do so, it will not happen.

Of course the legacy of the War in Iraq casts a giant shadow on this showdown over chemical weapons in Syria. Its legacy casts doubt on the accuracy of American intelligence, and causes everyday Americans to be very reluctant to support any use of force in the world.

But this is not Iraq. The President is not asking for authorization to go to war – or to become engaged in the Syrian Civil War. He is not proposing – as Bush proposed in Iraq – an American military invasion. He is not proposing a campaign of "regime change" or "nation building." America's decision will surely have implications for the Syrian Civil War, but this decision is not even mainly about the Syrian Civil War. It is mainly about the use of chemical weapons.

The President is proposing that the Congress authorize him to take action in this very narrow circumstance. He is proposing that the world community demonstrate that if someone uses chemical weapons, there will be a substantial cost to that action – that we do not allow such an act to occur with impunity. Because if the world sits by, the message will be crystal clear: that the use of chemical weapons has once again become an acceptable means of armed conflict. That would be a tragedy – and would endanger the future of all of the world's children – who could one day find themselves writhing in pain and gasping for breath like the Syrian children we all watched on television.

Condemnation and "moral outrage" against the use of chemical weapons do not constitute a sanction. They are, in fact, no sanction at all. We would never allow the perpetrator of a rape or murder in the United States to be subjected to "moral outrage" and sent home to contemplate his deed. How much less can we allow that to the be case when a government has murdered 1,400 of its own people using weapons that have been universally condemned by the entire international community for almost 100 years. That defies common sense.

I would argue that the control – and ultimate elimination of weapons of mass destruction – chemical, biological and nuclear – is one of the most critical priorities for Progressives like myself, and for our entire society. To secure the future of our species, we must eliminate them – not only from the hands of tyrants like Assad, or unreliable nation states, or non-state actors – but from all of the world's arsenals, including our own.

We have begun to make progress down that long and difficult road with the end of the Cold War, the chemical weapons treaty, nuclear weapons treaties – and most importantly, the developing worldwide consensus that their use is unthinkable.

The world cannot afford an iconic use of chemical weapons to go unpunished. And the United States of America alone in the world has the ability to lead an appropriate international response.

Robert Creamer is a long-time political organizer and strategist, and author of the book: Stand Up Straight: How Progressives Can Win, available on Amazon.com . He is a partner in Democracy Partners and a Senior Strategist for Americans United for Change. Follow him on Twitter @rbcreamer.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Robert Creamer
Democracy Partners
creamer2@aol.com
DC Office 202-470-6955
Cell 847-910-0363

Robert Creamer
Democracy Partners
creamer2@aol.com
DC Office 202-470-6955
Cell 847-910-0363

--
--
You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group. Moderated by Aniello, Lori and Sara.

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.

You received this message because you are subscribed to the Google Groups "big campaign" group.
To unsubscribe from this group and stop receiving emails from it, send an email to bigcampaign+unsubscribe@googlegroups.com.
To post to this group, send email to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com.
For more options, visit https://groups.google.com/groups/opt_out .

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Stuart Eizenstat" <seizenstat@gmail.com>
To:	jake.sullivan@gmail.com
Date:	10/7/2015 5:06:25 PM
Subject:	Zarif/Iran

From: Eizenstat, Stuart [mailto:seizenstat@cov.com]
Sent: Wednesday, October 07, 2015 3:21 PM
To: 'seizenstat@gmail.com'
Cc: Holte, Laurina
Subject: TPP and Iran

Dear Jake,

I attended a meeting on Monday, October 5, in New York with Iranian Foreign Minister Mohammad Zarif, hosted by the Atlantic Council (whose Iran Task Force I chair) and the New America Foundation (with Bill Leurs and Tom Pickering). This is the third meeting I have had with Zarif.

He made the following points in a 20 minute speech and answers to questions:

1. The nuclear agreement was a victory for diplomacy and dialogue. What was a success for Iran is not a defeat for the U.S. This is not a zero sum game. The agreement is the best insurance against an Iranian breakout. The "fabricated nuclear material cannot be used for making a bomb." We are willing to take "your nuclear fuel, so we will not need to make any of our own."

2. Implementation of the agreement requires transparency and a commitment to abide by its terms, and Iran will do so.

3. The US seems intent in terms of sanctions relief to do the "least it can do". He is "concerned with the tough interpretation of sanctions relief by OFAC. Moreover, the New York banking authorities are complicating things even more with financial sanctions, making it difficult for European companies to get the funds to invest in Iran.
This sends negative signals Treasury and DOJ should give a reasonable interpretation to the lifting of sanctions. Otherwise, it will make it difficult for even European companies to do business in Iran. Here again, the U.S. seems to view sanctions relief as a zero sum game, in which whatever helps Iran is bad for the U.S. It is in everyone's interest if Iran's economy recovers, and gets out of a "siege mentality".

4. Iran does not expect American companies to do business with Iran because of continuing U.S. sanctions. But under existing rules, many U.S. companies can do business with Iran. For example, Iran needs 400 new aircraft, and can purchase them from either Boeing or Airbus. There is no legal bar to Boeing selling its aircraft to Iran, with an OFAC license. Likewise, humanitarian goods can be sold to Iran from the U.S. now, including pharmaceuticals and medical devices made by GE. Iran can be a "huge market" for U.S. goods and services.

5. Even if the lifting of sanctions will not help U.S. companies that much, compared to European companies, eventually this will happen.

6. Just as politics in the U.S. are difficult, they are also "difficult" in Iran .A member of the Iranian parliament said that Zarif's hands should be cut-off for shaking hands with President Obama at the United Nations this week. It is wrong to think that all decisions in Iran are made by one man.

7. Iran and the U.S. have negative views of each other. The U.S. sees Iran as determined to get a nuclear weapon, while Iran sees the U.S. as trying do dominate the Middle East.

8. He spent a good deal of time discussing Saudi Arabia. He said since his first days in office he has sought a dialogue, but Iranian overtures have been rebuffed. He was told by the Saudis, "leave the Arabs to ourselves". He recounted that he left the World Economic Forum immediately and made the long trip to Saudi Arabia for the funeral of King Abdullah. But he received barely a handshake for his efforts. Saudi Arabia also sees relations with Iran as a zero sum game. The Saudis think ISIS can help them against Iran. Iran has sent a new Ambassador to Saudi Arabia who they trust, and he hopes this will help the relationship.

9. I asked him about the use of the unfrozen assets, and I said that people here will be looking to see if Iran spends its new-found funds on its people and investments, of if substantial amounts go to Hezbollah. He gave a tough response. "The money is our money and it was illegally blocked by the U.S., and what we do with our money is purely our business." He further said, "You spend 10 times more in the Middle East than we do, and what has it gotten you?" He contended Iran would only get $40 billion and we will spend it for our people.

10. If we give funds to Hezbollah, they are a positive force in Lebanon, and have kept ISIS out of Lebanon.

11. Regarding Syria, he said the presence if Russian military equipment and personnel was a good thing for Syria. He contented that "four months ago ISIS was close to Damascus, and this necessitated Russian help to beat them back. Iran "does not intend to send troops to Syria, but we will play a greater role in training and supporting the Syrian Army. He asked rhetorically, "what good has the U.S. and its allies done in combating ISIS? " He said flatly, "We are cooperating with Russia in Syria." The U.S., he asserted, has a dilemma in Syria. If you stick with the rebels, your support is not likely to be effective; if you support Assad you are changing your policy. He asserted that

12. Regarding the 1994 AMIA bombing and the recent controversy over the death of the prosecutor Nisman, shortly before he was to deliver a report to the Argentine Congress, the person who alleged Iran blew up AMIA has been proven a fraud and liar. He did saw shortly after Nisman's death that it was a suicide, but he was simply following the statement made by Argentina's democratically elected leader. “It is a mistake to allege Iran blew up AMIA.” The Saudis are behind all of this with their incorrect allegations.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

13. Robin Wright of the Post, asked him about the release of the prisoners, including Jason, their journalist. Zarif said he knows Jason and would like to see him released, but he is an Iranian citizen, and an Iranian court found him guilty of passing along intelligence to a foreign power He is subject to Iranian law. “It will be hard to justify their release to our public.” However, he added, “I am ready for a negotiation, but it will have to involve the release of Iranian prisoners in the U.S.” The US “says we should be flexible”, but you are not flexible with our prisoners”. But he would like to see them back in the U.S. and their prisoners back in Iran.

Best wishes,

Stu Eizenstat

P.S. On the unrelated issue of TPP, I am disappointed with the position Hillary took. Of course, I am fully aware of the politics of the issue, but she could have stressed the geo-political advantage of passing it, in terms of combating Chinese influence in Asia. Also, the environmental groups seem positive. She might have dealt with the deficiencies in the trade area by bilateral side agreements, as with NAFTA. Her position will complicate an already difficult fight to pass TPP; its defeat would be a gift to China.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "German Marshall Fund" <press@gmfus.org>
To: podesta@law.georgetown.edu
Date: 3/8/2016 6:00:00 PM
Subject: GMF's World Wire: Feminist Foreign Policy | GMF's Brussels Forum Agenda Announced | Japan-Russia Relations

If you have problems viewing this email, you can view it as a web page. To view the mobile-friendly web page click here

G | M | F The German Marshall Fund of the United States
STRENGTHENING TRANSATLANTIC COOPERATION

Our Organization | Our Work | Our Events | Our Experts | GMFUS.org

GMF's World Wire

March 9, 2016

A Conversation with Margot Wallström, Swedish Foreign Minister: On Women, Peace, and Security

GMF will host a conversation with Swedish Foreign Minister Margot Wallström in Brussels on March 14. The Swedish government's commitment to pursue a "feminist foreign policy" puts gender equality and human rights at the center of Sweden's international objectives. The event will be livestreamed at 18:00 CET.

WATCH LIVE

Brussels Forum Convenes March 18-20

See what is on the agenda for this year's Brussels Forum. Press can now register to cover the event.

LEARN MORE

The Populist Challenge to Foreign Policy

Rosa Balfour & Timo Lochocki
In Europe, populist parties are thriving, challenging the status quo and the ruling elite. European Policy Center

READ MORE

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Tweet of the Week

@D_Schwarzer :
While #EUCO debates migration, we took Parliamentarians from 9 EU countries to Athens refugee camp to see challenges @eliamepgr @gmfus #MED

RETWEET

Will the EU Survive These Crises?

In the second installment of the GMF podcast series examining the crises facing the EU and possible solutions, Stephen Szabo, executive director of the Transatlantic Academy , talks with GMF Senior Fellow Sir Michael Leigh .

LISTEN NOW

Can Japan Bring Russia Back to the G7?

Joshua W. Walker
Inviting Putin to the G7 summit does not seem to be in the cards. This has not dampened the ambitions of Japan's prime minister to bring Putin in from the cold. War on the Rocks

READ MORE

Policy Leadership Civil Society

Follow

Strengthening Transatlantic Cooperation

Our Organization
About GMF
Career Opportunities
Press Room

Our Work
Leadership
Policy
Civil Society
Research & Analysis
Transatlantic Academy

Our Events
Major Conferences & Forums
Recent & Upcoming Events

Our Experts
Find an Expert

Manage preferences | Forward email | Unsubscribe | Subscribe

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Burns Strider" <burns.strider@americanbridge.org>
To: CTRFriendsFamily <CTRFriendsFamily@americanbridge.org>
Date: 11/25/2014 1:49:45 AM
Subject: Correct The Record Tuesday November 25, 2014 Morning Roundup

Correct The Record Tuesday November 25, 2014 Morning Roundup:

Headlines:

FROM MEDIA MATTERS FOR AMERICA: MMFA: Fox News Sunday Ignored Congressional Report Debunking Benghazi Myths

"Fox News Sunday ignored a new report from the GOP-led House Intelligence Committee that debunked many of the myths that Fox News has spent the last two years promoting."

Sunshine State News: "Hillary Clinton Routing Democratic Primary Foes in Florida"

"Gravis Marketing unveiled a new poll this past weekend showing Clinton claiming 51 percent of Florida Democrats."

Bloomberg: "Here Is the Perfect Date to Launch a Presidential Campaign"

"This time around, that's June 12. Candidates, mark your calendars."

BuzzFeed: "Clinton Shadow Campaign Gets Ready For The Real Thing"

"Susie Tompkins Buell, a major Democratic donor and Clinton's close friend, provided Correct the Record with early, significant backing. 'My instinct is to protect Hillary,' said Buell. 'She's such a target, and she needs to be protected by those who believe in her so she can focus on doing her important work.'"

Slate: "Barnes & Noble Has a Plan to Make Physical Books Popular This Black Friday"

"Instead of competing head on with Amazon this Black Friday, Barnes & Noble is looking to offer something that the online retailer can't. The bookstore announced today that come this weekend, it will sell 500,000 signed copies of the latest works from 100 prominent authors. On the non-fiction side, authors include George W. Bush, Hillary Clinton, Malcolm Gladwell, Neil Patrick Harris, and Amy Poehler. In fiction, Dan Brown, Jodi Picoult, and Donna Tartt are among those taking part."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

U.S. News & World Report: "Benghazi Isn't Going Away For Hillary"

"Politics is often irrational and more driven by perception than any series of facts. And it's hard to imagine any report that would be powerful enough to halt Republicans from using the incident and its aftermath against Hillary Clinton in 2016."

Washington Post: "With other Benghazi investigations completed, final probe ramping up"

"Republicans who remain convinced that there was an Obama administration coverup surrounding the deadly 2012 attack on the U.S. diplomatic compound in Benghazi, Libya, are pinning their hopes on one last congressional probe to produce proof of a scandal. Others in the GOP, however, are urging that the party drop the Benghazi conspiracy theories and move on."

Wall Street Journal blog: Washington Wire: "House GOP Benghazi Probe Goes On Despite Intel Panel Report"

"House Speaker John Boehner (R., Ohio) said Monday that Rep. Trey Gowdy (R., S.C.) will continue to head a special panel to investigate the 2012 attacks in Benghazi, Libya, pushing ahead with the probe despite the release Friday of a GOP-led report that found no attempt to mislead the public."

The Hill: "Pressure builds for Senate to join Benghazi probe"

"Sens. Ted Cruz (R-Texas), Rand Paul (R-Ky.) and Marco Rubio (R-Fla.), three young rising conservative stars who are weighing 2016 bids, say the Senate should participate in a joint investigation with the House."

Politicker NJ: "Source: Kempner and Gottheimer prep another group of Clinton for Prez backers"

"Hillary Clinton anchor fundraisers Mike Kempner and Josh Gottheimer welcomed the second round of Clinton fundraisers and friends to the Robert Treat Hotel tonight to polish the fundraising arm in the lead-up to a 2016 Clinton presidential candidacy."

Associated Press: "Democrats name 3 finalists to host 2016 convention"

"Democrats narrowed the list of contenders for their 2016 national convention to three cities on Monday, announcing the party's next presidential candidate will be formally nominated in New York City, Philadelphia or Columbus, Ohio."

Politico: "Al Sharpton: Rand Paul's outreach to blacks could hurt Democrats in 2016"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Sharpton added that Paul's actions could put 'a lot of pressure' even on Democrats such as Hillary Clinton — a potential 2016 frontrunner for the party — who have good records on civil rights."

The Hill blog: Congress Blog: "Ex-Im helps Hillary's friends at Boeing, not women-owned firms"

"Clinton maintains questionable political alliances with some of Ex-Im's biggest beneficiaries."

Articles:

FROM MEDIA MATTERS FOR AMERICA: MMFA: Fox News Sunday Ignored Congressional Report Debunking Benghazi Myths

By Oliver Willis

November 23, 2014, 5:02 p.m. EST

Fox News Sunday ignored a new report from the GOP-led House Intelligence Committee that debunked many of the myths that Fox News has spent the last two years promoting.

On November 21, the Republican-led House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence released its reporton the September 2012 attacks on two U.S. facilities in Benghazi, Libya. Similar to the many preceding investigations into the attacks -- including the Accountability Review Board and the bipartisan U.S. Senate Select Committee on Intelligence -- the report found that no stand down order was issued during the attacks, there was no intelligence failure leading up to the attack, and that the talking points the administration used in the days following the attacks were based on the CIA's best assessment at the time.

The November 23 edition of Fox News Sunday did not inform viewers of the report's findings. This stands in stark contrast to Fox's longstanding campaign to promote myths about the attacks.

Fox has been a tireless promoter of nearly every facet of the Benghazi hoax. In the 20 months following the attacks, Fox ran over 1,100 segments on Benghazi and hosted Republicans at a rate of 30:1 over Democrats to discuss the issue. Meanwhile, the network has routinely ignored and downplayed evidence refuting its conspiracy theories.

CNN media critic Brian Stelter noted that other Fox programs only provided cursory coverage of the report on the night of its release and that Fox never mentioned it the following day. According to Stelter (emphasis added):

STELTER: Boy, has Fox News spent a lot of time over the past two years focused on the 2012 terrorist attack in Benghazi, Libya, and I mean a lot of time. [...] But when a new Benghazi report came out on Friday, there was hardly a peep, and maybe that's because the report, which was Republican led, it was by the House Intelligence committee, debunks many of the myths that have run rampant on Fox News and in conservative media circles. [...] So I have to wonder: will Fox will stop aggressively pushing its theories about Benghazi? Probably not. With its audience largely in the dark about the latest findings, the myths may, and perhaps will, live on.

On the November 23 edition of Fox News' own MediaBuzz, host Howard Kurtz noted that it only received "brief" coverage on Fox and that the results of the two-year long investigation "deserved more coverage from all news outlets."

Sunshine State News: "Hillary Clinton Routing Democratic Primary Foes in Florida"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

By Kevin Derby

November 24, 2014, 1:56 p.m. EST

Former Sec. of State Hillary Clinton starts out 2016 as the favorite to win the Florida primary for the Democratic presidential nomination.

Gravis Marketing unveiled a new poll this past weekend showing Clinton claiming 51 percent of Florida Democrats. U.S. Sen. Elizabeth Warren, D-Mass., stands in distant second with 18 percent followed by Vice President Joe Biden with 12 percent. Two governors--Martin O'Malley of Maryland and Andrew Cuomo--lag far behind. O'Malley takes 4 percent and Cuomo 2 percent.

The poll of 694 Florida Democratic primary voters was taken from Nov. 20-21 and had a margin of error of +/- 4 percent.

Bloomberg: "Here Is the Perfect Date to Launch a Presidential Campaign"

By Mira Rojanasakul and Adam Pearce

November 25, 2014, 5:01 a.m. EST

The midterm elections are barely behind us, but already the political world is speculating about who will be the first major presidential contender—Hillary Clinton? Chris Chris Christie? Rand Paul?—to officially enter the 2016 race for the White House. (Jim Webb, a former Democratic senator from Virginia, said last week he was forming an exploratory committee.) Would-be candidates might be wise to hold off. If history is any guide, the ideal day to announce for president is…

… First In

Why? Going back to 1952, the most recent year with accurate records, no candidate who was first onto the field has won the presidency. Democrats Adlai Stevenson (1956) and George McGovern (1972) got as far as clinching their party's nomination but went on to lose in the general election.

… Last In

Have candidates had better luck swooping in all fresh-faced at the very end? Only one: Ronald Reagan, who was last to announce in 1980 and won the White House.

… Somewhere in Between

In every other election since 1972—the year state primaries became more important than nominating conventions as the way parties choose presidential candidates—successful contenders announced somewhere in the mushy middle, not long before or long after their rivals.

… Every Candidate, Each Year

Since '72, winners have declared an average 492 days before the general election. In years where no incumbent was running, the winner announced an average 511 days before Election Day. This time around, that's June 12. Candidates, mark your calendars.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

BuzzFeed: "Clinton Shadow Campaign Gets Ready For The Real Thing"

By Ruby Cramer

November 25, 2014, 7:00 a.m. EST

[Subtitle:] How three groups plan to raise unimaginable money, duel Republicans, and deliver a huge email list to Hillary Clinton. A big shift is coming after an unprecedented year.

The first item on the agenda was titled, "Why We're Here."

That's how it started, one year ago this month. Except no one at the Parker Meridien that day in New York seemed to know the answer.

Political operatives wandered the halls of the hotel between meetings, while two or three reporters hung around near the elevators, aimless. What they were covering, how it would all work and exactly to what end, wasn't clear at the time. But that small, scattered scene at the conference — a day-long series of panel discussions billed as a 2016 "strategy session" — marked the loose beginnings of a coordinated, unprecedented early effort to elect a U.S. president.

The Hillary Clinton "shadow" operation — call it a pre-campaign, or the "queen's machine," as one Republican news site has put it — is better defined now.

Three organizations make up what, together, is considered a formidable triad: Ready for Hillary, Correct the Record, Priorities USA. Respectively, the groups have amassed Clinton supporters, defended her in the press, and made preparations to raise millions to augment her possible campaign.

Last Friday, the stakeholders convened in New York again.

The occasion was the same: the Ready for Hillary national finance council meeting — a day of closed-door panel discussions with Clinton supporters, donors, and strategists who work at the other two outside groups.

But one year later, the pro-Clinton enterprise was larger — more organized and better synchronized. The aimlessness of the first meeting had been replaced by an air of authority. It was all very official. There were Ready for Hillary-branded centerpieces at each table. There were more people, and more reporters. Surrogates of the shadow campaign like Buffy Wicks, executive director of Priorities, cycled through the pressroom to take questions. The day before, Correct the Record aides set up a lunch with a few dozen donors.

Ready for Hillary had even moved the conference from the Parker Meridien to a larger, perhaps more symbolic venue: the Sheraton in Midtown — the place the Clintons host their foundation's annual Global Initiative meeting.

The trio of groups was a long way past the "Why We're Here" panel last November. At the meeting, Wicks described the alliance between the pro-Clinton groups as a "three-legged stool" that would be kept stable and well-resourced.

Together, the three organizations have appeared powerful and effective. The coalition has tacitly communicated something important: that a team of strategists have "laid the groundwork," "set the stage," and "built the foundation" for a campaign. The perception of a Clinton machine is valuable.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But individually, the impact of each group is harder to grasp, and less discussed. In more than two dozen interviews and conversations this month about what Priorities, Correct the Record, and Ready for Hillary, Democrats inside and outside the Clinton effort said the campaign cliches reveal little about what each organization did and did not actually accomplish in the last year.

Now Clinton's real campaign could be just months away. And in the waning days of the "shadow" efforts, the role and shape of all three groups is rapidly shifting.

The super PAC had a new board of directors, a new office, and a new candidate: Hillary Clinton. But three months after the closely watched retooling, when the first quarter closed this year, Priorities USA Action issued a statement trumpeting how little it had raised. The finally tally was just over $4,000.

After the second quarter, they did it again, raising just shy of $2,000. In the third quarter, the number was even lower: $216.

This is the same PAC that spent $67 million on President Obama's reelection.

The slow fundraising was a sign of good faith — evidence, as the group's spokesman, Peter Kauffmann, said this summer, that the PAC was continuing to "focus our efforts on supporting Democrats in 2014," rather than distracting from the midterms by raising money for an unconfirmed Clinton bid.

Earlier in the year, Priorities received a spate of unwanted headlines after the group announced they wouldn't be funding midterm candidates directly. (Democrats ended up losing at least eight seats in the Senate and 12 in the House this fall.)

Instead, officials at the PAC encouraged their donors to give to midterms candidates, while also taking informal meetings with contacts about 2016.

Now the real work begins for Priorities: raising a massive sum of money.

Officials have not made a fundraising goal public. The number $300 million has been discussed as a possible benchmark, according to two people familiar with the group's plans. Wicks wouldn't talk dollar targets on Friday. "The answer is enough resources to communicate the message," she told reporters.

Even for Priorities, considered one of the most potent big money groups in either party, raising $300 million would be an enormous feat. But this time around, the organization will benefit from more accepting attitudes toward super PACs.

During Obama's reelection campaign, when two former White House aides formed Priorities, the president was among the loudest opponents of outside, unlimited spending. Even after he endorsed Priorities in early 2012, donors were still nervous to give to the PAC — would it be held against them?

The group would eventually secure 29 checks for $1 million or more from individual donors. Each one required significant legwork from the Priorities co-founders and two other key figures: Jeffrey Katzenberg, a Hollywood executive and a longtime donor and fundraiser, and Paul Begala, the former Bill Clinton strategist who serves as a senior adviser to the PAC.

"Priorities had to devote a lot of energy to justifying its existence, in addition to doing the work of helping reelect Obama," said Geoff Garin, a pollster who served as Clinton's top strategist for the final two months of her campaign. "In 2016, Priorities will start off from a better position of strength and credibility."

Ahead of the next election, it's not clear who will lead on what could be one of the most ambitious outside fundraising projects in politics.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Priorities co-chairs both work on the PAC in a part-time capacity. Jim Messina, Obama's reelection campaign manager, runs his own consulting firm, and Jennifer Granholm, the former governor of Michigan, teaches at Berkeley.

Jonathan Mantz, the national finance director on Clinton's last presidential race, is currently the PAC's senior adviser to finance. He and Diane Rogalle, Priorities' finance director, are expected to direct the group's fundraising strategy. And Begala and Katzenberg, one source said, will help secure checks again this cycle.

But how Priorities will get the big checks, and with whose help, is the question occupying officials there now, two sources close to the group said.

Donors anticipate that the Clintons, and particularly Bill Clinton, will play a direct role in Priorities fundraising efforts, according to three people with knowledge of discussions among the PAC's network about the idea.

One suggested that Bill Clinton, among the most popular political figures in the country, would be the bold name the PAC needed to help bring in big checks.

"I would expect them both to be involved," one Democratic donor said.

Kauffmann, the spokesperson, said Priorities officials hadn't discussed the possibility that the former president would help with fundraising. "There have been no conversations about President Clinton raising money for Priorities," Kauffman wrote in a statement last week.

Before the announcement of a campaign, federal election rules would not restrict the Clintons from fundraising for Priorities. They could both speak at events and make direct solicitations for unlimited amounts of money — a scenario people close to the couple dismissed as improbable.

If Clinton does open a campaign account, either in the former of an initial exploratory committee or a campaign committee, she and her husband could still appear and speak at Priorities fundraisers — so long as they don't make the asks for contributions, according to a 2011 Federal Election Commission ruling.

Mitt Romney took this approach with his super PAC, Restoring Our Future.

In 2012, Bill Clinton attended multiple events for Priorities. Obama appeared at only one, a lunch hosted by Katzenberg. The White House later described it as a "thank you event for the campaign's supporters," not a fundraiser.

Clinton could have a different approach to the optics of outside spending. "She will take a more favorable view of these super PAC activities than Obama ever did," said a source with knowledge of her thinking on the topic.

The group has already started soliciting major donors, one source said. But officials also said Priorities won't move at full pace until Clinton runs.

"Priorities is meeting with key supporters to discuss the dynamics of the 2016 presidential race," said Kauffman. "We played a critical role in helping elect a Democratic president in 2012 and we look forward to doing the same in 2016."

On a Friday in late May, Democrats from an array of left-leaning groups in Washington met for a national security briefing at the offices of Third Way.

The centrist think tank regularly holds briefings for strategists. But the gathering last spring, as first reported by Politico, took place about two weeks ahead of the release of Hillary Clinton's new memoir, a chronicle of her four years as secretary of state. And the discussion focused in part on how best to respond to Republicans about the most controversial moment of Clinton's tenure: the 2012 attack on the U.S. consulate in Benghazi, Libya.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton's longtime spokesman, now a top adviser, Philippe Reines, attended the Third Way briefing, along with a number of her former aides.

A new partner was also at the table: Correct the Record.

The group — an arm of the the super PAC, American Bridge — was one of many represented at the May briefing. But their presence at the Third Way offices signaled the extent to which the organization has served as, and was sanctioned to be, a de facto Clinton communications shop for much of the last year.

Clinton has voiced her approval of the group's work. "She has told donors that this needed to be done," someone familiar with the conversations said.

Susie Tompkins Buell, a major Democratic donor and Clinton's close friend, provided Correct the Record with early, significant backing. "My instinct is to protect Hillary," said Buell. "She's such a target, and she needs to be protected by those who believe in her so she can focus on doing her important work."

Buell said she hasn't talked to Clinton about backing Correct the Record. (She is also a co-chair of Ready for Hillary's finance council.) "It wouldn't be appropriate," she said. "I know she's an appreciative person, so I don't need to hear anything from her. I don't expect it and don't need it."

Correct the Record is led by David Brock, the founder of American Bridge and Media Matters, an organization that monitors conservative news outlets.

The group has two components: a research team that has compiled pages and pages of material about Clinton's political history, and a "rapid response" communications operation that aims to defend her in the press.

At first, the group occasionally launched hits in the press unprompted against possible Republican presidential candidates, including Gov. Chris Christie and Sen. Rand Paul. When Christie got in trouble for closing lanes on the George Washington Bridge, Correct the Record released a graphic showing traffic signs that read, "Political Retribution" and "Lanes Closed. Expect Christie?" The picture drew story headlines like "Clinton-linked group attacks Christie."

Since then, Correct the Record has stayed focused on Clinton.

Democrats inside and outside the pro-Clinton effort said in interviews this month that Correct the Record's value hasn't been its public research material. (Clinton is one of the most covered, and vetted, potential presidential candidates in modern politics.) Instead, the organization has filled a void, serving as an on-the-record political voice for Clinton.

After she left the State Department, Clinton spent most of her time working at the family foundation, writing her book, and giving paid speeches. When she was criticized in the press — whether by a Republican lawmaker or a right-leaning group — it was most often Correct the Record that responded with a quote or a press release. Political reporters were more likely to get a comment from the outside group than a reply from a Clinton spokesperson.

Since her memoir came out this summer, Clinton has waded back into the debate. In September, she returned to the campaign trail, holding fundraisers and rallies for more than 26 candidates. And last week, when Obama announced a series of executive actions to slow deportations, Clinton's personal office released statement to reporters, saying she supported the move.

As a campaign gets closer, Clinton will become even more involved. When it begins, she will build up her own existing communications team.

Correct the Record has plans to stay active alongside her campaign, as first reported in the New York Times last week. The group, Clinton supporters said, faces the challenge of staying out of her staff's way while still being helpful.

“Correct the Record’s mission all along has been to fight the right against false and unfair attacks on potential presidential Democratic candidates, most notably Hillary Clinton,” the group’s communications director, Adrienne Elrod, said in a written statement. “Our mission is far from complete.”

“Moving forward, Correct the Record will remain central and fundamental to taking on the right-wing and others who seek to mislead the public.”

The organization will likely focus on responding to attacks from other outside groups, like the anti-Clinton firm, America Rising. Supporters said that if Correct the Record is successful in engaging Republican attacks, Clinton’s campaign would be able to focus on its message, staying as “positive” as possible.

“The campaign itself might not want to be in perpetual response mode,” said Garin, the pollster and former Clinton strategist. “In that sense, it’s helpful to have a third-party correcting falsehoods about Clinton from outside entities and right-wing news outlets whose oxygen will be attacking Hillary.”

Ready for Hillary was just a few months old. It was late spring in 2013, and no one quite knew what to make of the thing. Was it a draft movement? A fundraising venue? A campaign-in-waiting? The group had only 200,000 people on its email list — but each week more and more followers signed up.

Clinton’s advisers and former aides were watching warily.

By May, the group received valuable stamps of approval from Clinton loyalists like James Carville, Harold Ickes, Ellen Tauscher, and Buell. Bill Clinton’s old political director, Craig Smith, had also signed on as a senior advisor.

Early that summer, a leading New York donor sent an email to a group of fundraising contacts: “I just spoke with Craig Smith who is now advising Ready for Hillary PAC and, just so you know, it is okay for us to be supporting this now.”

The mass email from the donor, a longtime Clinton backer, is emblematic of the slow, begrudging way in which her world eventually accepted Ready for Hillary.

The group, co-founded by 29-year-old former Clinton staffer Adam Parkhomenko, still had detractors — including, for a time last year, the officials at Priorities, who believed the new PAC would compete for its donors. But most have embraced the group. In the absence of a real campaign, and with a growing list of supporters and strong marketing acumen, Ready for Hillary became impossible to ignore.

Clinton’s supporters also saw the value of a single hub for a pre-Clinton PAC, rather than an array of smaller, less reliable groups, which were already sprouting up in election filings by the spring of last year. Eventually, it became clear that Ready for Hillary was considered the dominant organization.

A year and a half later, the self-described “grassroots super PAC” has grown to a massive size. State and federal elected officials, including 16 senators, have directly endorsed the group since last summer. The PAC has appeared in every state, assembled a list of more than 3 million Clinton supporters, built a squad of about 35,000 volunteers, and hired a staff of 29 full-time employees. Their operating costs total roughly $23,000 per day, according to Bloomberg Politics.

The Ready for Hillary mission is straightforward: to build a list of people who support Clinton — and to provide fans a viable outlet for their enthusiasm.

“The storyline remains familiar and simple,” said Tracy Sefl, a Democratic strategist who has served as a senior adviser to the group since last year. “And for some time now, Ready for Hillary has been doing what we do.”

But of the three pro-Clinton entities, the group is perhaps the most misconstrued. The group is often credited with “laying the groundwork” for a Clinton bid, or building a “campaign infrastructure” two years in advance. But the generalizations glaze over the actual work of the PAC, which will come to an end when a Clinton campaign begins, as Politico first reported in detail.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Ready for Hillary's most valuable asset is its list of 3 million Clinton supporters.

Each person on the list has, at the very least, supplied an email address and mailing zip code — or, if a supporter signs up through the mail, a physical address where he or she can be contacted. (The 3 million figure does not include Facebook users who have liked the group's page, an official said.) The PAC also collects data about whether a member has made donations, volunteered, attended events, or purchased merchandise on the Ready for Hillary website.

Officials with the PAC expect Clinton will want the list.

The group has taken steps to ensure the quality of the data. Through an internal system, built by NGP VAN, the leading technology company for Democrats, the Ready for Hillary list "instantaneously" marries up, or syncs data, with a 50-state voter file, according to a person familiar with the system.

Ready for Hillary purchased the voter file from NGP VAN last year. The file is a comprehensive database that includes information about voting history. An official with the PAC would not disclose what percentage of this list matches the voter file — a possible indicator of the list's value to a campaign.

Officials expect they will be able to transfer the data to Clinton through a list swap. The process could be logistically and legally complicated. But the group has, one aide said, already walked through the ways a swap could work with Jim Lamb, the former Clinton lawyer Ready for Hillary hired last year. Organizers said they hadn't discussed the list with anyone inside Clinton's direct orbit.

"It's a safe assumption that someone should acquire the data and utilize it fully," said Sefl, the Ready For Hillary senior advisor.

The list's value is often confused for a field operation in the making. Aside from the work of a few regional staffers, the PAC hasn't built an infrastructure that resembles the scale of a presidential campaign's field organization.

"People think there's this huge campaign structure that Ready for Hillary has built, but if there is, not a lot of folks have seen it," said a senior Democratic operative. "They're not building a huge field operation. They're building a list."

"But it's an important list. Martin O'Malley and Jim Webb would kill to have that."

Scott Brennan, the chair of the Democratic Party in Iowa, described the PAC's work in clear terms. "They've built lists," he said. "They have volunteers."

In Iowa, where the first event of the nominating process is historically held, voters can get "a little squishy," Brennan said, about nontraditional campaign methods, such as a super PAC supporting a campaign that doesn't yet exist.

"Obviously, people want to see candidates here, and she has been here," he said.

As the next presidential race gets closer, more and more voters will want the candidate, not the PAC. Ready for Hillary officials are now preparing for that next phase. The group is planning to shut down when a campaign begins, though it still has events planned in cities across the country through at least January.

After a year on the road promoting their "Ready" brand on state-to-state bus tour, the group is quieter now, shifting into its role in the background.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

When Bill Clinton spoke in New Hampshire this fall, Ready for Hillary co-hosted the event and stocked the venue with posters bearing their trademark.

But a month later, when Hillary Clinton returned to the state to headline a campaign rally for two Democrats, the super PAC's presence was far more faint.

There were no signs or posters, no "Ready" branding on the walls. From the venue, you could barely spot the group's bus, idling on the far edge of the parking lot, allowing more space than usual to the candidate-to-be.

Slate: "Barnes & Noble Has a Plan to Make Physical Books Popular This Black Friday"

By Allison Griswold

November 24, 2014, 6:07 p.m. EST

Instead of competing head on with Amazon this Black Friday, Barnes & Noble is looking to offer something that the online retailer can't. The bookstore announced today that come this weekend, it will sell 500,000 signed copies of the latest works from 100 prominent authors. On the non-fiction side, authors include George W. Bush, Hillary Clinton, Malcolm Gladwell, Neil Patrick Harris, and Amy Poehler. In fiction, Dan Brown, Jodi Picoult, and Donna Tartt are among those taking part.

Barnes & Noble says the effort has been in the works for more than half a year, with each author signing thousands of copies of their books for readers. "Some went beyond their signature to personalize the books," the chain notes in its release. Mo Willems, a children's book author and illustrator, sketched the head of one of his characters in signed editions. Mary Amicucci, Barnes & Noble's vice president of adult trade and children's books, told MarketWatch that authors weren't paid for their efforts but were "hugely enthusiastic" about the plan.

The key to this particular Black Friday deal is that it's available in stores only. In that way, it's a pretty obvious ploy to get book lovers off of Amazon and into Barnes & Noble's physical locations, but it also seems like a savvy one. After all, if you come in to snag an autographed copy of The Goldfinch or The Polar Express—the kind of thing you can't just download onto your Kindle—you might also decide to pick up that copy of Pride and Prejudice you'd been meaning to get instead of ordering it online.

Barnes & Noble is under significant pressure to perform well this holiday season; its same-store sales have sunk for seven straight quarters, though its stock is up 60 percent year-to-date. Signed copies alone might not be enough to reverse that decline. But if nothing else, the amount of foot traffic and sales they generate should be a good test of whether big-name authors still have enough fan power to make a physical book worth its often hefty price.

U.S. News & World Report: "Benghazi Isn't Going Away For Hillary"

By David Catanese

November 24, 2014, 2:55 p.m. EST

At first glance, a rational observer might see a Republican-led House committee's verdict on the attack on a U.S. diplomatic compound in Benghazi, Libya, as the resolving voice in the 2012 tragedy that took the lives of four Americans, including a U.S. ambassador.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The House Intelligence Committee found there “was no intelligence failure, no delay in sending a CIA rescue team, no missed opportunity for a military rescue, and no evidence the CIA was covertly shipping arms from Libya to Syria.”

Some in the media seized on the report to declare that “Benghazi coverage will finally be put to rest.”

But politics is often irrational and more driven by perception than any series of facts. And it’s hard to imagine any report that would be powerful enough to halt Republicans from using the incident and its aftermath against Hillary Clinton in 2016.

After more than a year of drumbeat coverage on the issue in conservative media, for a GOP White House aspirant to just drop it because of a 37-page House report would be akin to political malpractice. Besides, there’s another investigation still underway, helmed by South Carolina GOP Rep. Trey Gowdy.

It’s true: This report will give Clinton a nice reference point to combat the coming attacks. Even Republicans investigated and found no systemic failure, she can say.

But that doesn’t mean it’s going away. Not by a long shot.

Take Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., who is floating his own name for a presidential run in 2016.

“Full of crap” is how he succinctly described the report’s findings on CNN this weekend.

As a respected foreign policy voice on the GOP side of the ledger, his comments give other 2016 contenders cover for continuing their own verbal broadsides on the controversy.

Republicans see the Benghazi attack as an inarguable blemish on Clinton’s tenure as secretary of state. Her off-handed comment (“What difference – at this point – does it make?”) questioning the worthiness of identifying the reason for the attacks at the moment they occurred will be fodder for countless ads against her.

Additionally, the Benghazi episode is a critical piece in the larger narrative the GOP will attempt to construct around what they see as a feckless Barack Obama-Hillary Clinton foreign policy.

There isn’t a special committee or gray-bearded statesman who can change that.

The red-hot issue is bound to come up in the GOP primary and in the general election. It’s difficult to imagine Benghazi not being a pointed question Clinton has to address in debate over foreign policy in 2016.

If it’s not, the Republican nominee will be sure to make it one.

Washington Post: “With other Benghazi investigations completed, final probe ramping up”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

By Ed O'Keefe

November 24, 2014, 7:46 p.m. EST

Republicans who remain convinced that there was an Obama administration coverup surrounding the deadly 2012 attack on the U.S. diplomatic compound in Benghazi, Libya, are pinning their hopes on one last congressional probe to produce proof of a scandal.

Others in the GOP, however, are urging that the party drop the Benghazi conspiracy theories and move on.

The House Select Committee on Benghazi will produce what Speaker John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) said Monday will be "the definitive report" on the attack that killed four Americans on the night of Sept. 11, 2012, and he reappointed Rep. Trey Gowdy (R-S.C.) , a former federal prosecutor known for his patterned blazers and impressive oratorical skills, to lead the panel.

"Two years later, the American people still have far too many questions about what happened that night — and why," Boehner said in a statement.

The heightened interest in the select committee comes in the wake of a House Intelligence Committee report, released last week, that rejected long-running conspiracy theories that the U.S. military was prevented from rescuing Americans targeted in the attack.

Gowdy's committee will hold a public hearing next month — only its second since being established in May — with other hearings planned for next year, including several behind closed doors in order to review classified information, according to aides who weren't authorized to speak publicly on the matter.

Democrats complain that the committee is a waste of both time and money, since it has developed no clear purpose or specific plan.

Republicans, including Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.) — an outspoken critic of the Obama administration's foreign policy — say that the Gowdy panel can produce significant results because it enjoys a broader mandate than the oversight committees that have produced reports so far. In those cases. the committees investigated specific actions by the CIA, Pentagon or State Department.

"I hope a joint committee looking at all three agencies together, rather than stove-piping, can get through this," Graham said over the weekend on CNN. The South Carolina Republican was especially critical of the House Intelligence Committee report.

While the report did fault the CIA and other agencies for incorrectly assessing what caused the attacks and the White House for a "flawed" public response, it mostly debunked the assertions that the casualties were caused by delayed military response.

Graham called the intelligence panel's report "absolute garbage." Speaking Sunday on CNN's "State of the Union," he said the report "puts all the blame on the State Department and absolves the intelligence community."

"When the Department of Defense committees looked at [the attacks], the Department of Defense was held blameless. At the end of the day, everybody is pointing fingers to everybody else," he said.

A spokeswoman for Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.), a potential 2016 presidential candidate, said Rubio was not pleased with the House Intelligence report.

"Regardless of the report's conclusions, many unanswered questions still remain, such as why no one at the State Department has been held accountable for the failure to heed the intelligence warnings of the deteriorating security situation in Libya, which is outrageous," spokeswoman Brooke Sammon said in an e-mail.

Spokesmen for other potential GOP presidential candidates, including Sens. Ted Cruz (R-Tex.) and Rand Paul (R-Ky.), didn't respond to requests for comment.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

At least some Republicans, including Sen. Jeff Flake (Ariz.), believe it's time for the GOP to drop the issue altogether.

"I've always thought the biggest problem with Benghazi is how it was cast by the administration and the remarks that Susan Rice just really threw in the face of what we knew was going on," he said Sunday on NBC's "Meet the Press." "But with regard to the other things that were addressed by this report, well, yes, I thought for a long time that we ought to move beyond that."

Gowdy said in a statement that the intelligence panel's report will assist his "comprehensive investigation" that is designed to produce the "final, definitive accounting of the attack on behalf of Congress."

Rep. Susan Brooks (R-Ind.), another former federal prosecutor and a member of the select committee, said that the intelligence panel's work "is one of many tools" that will be used "to put together a cohesive and comprehensive picture of the attack on our consulate."

"The American public deserves all of the facts regarding this tragic attack, and we are employing a deliberative and thorough process to find them," Brooks said.

Democrats on the committee have complained that Boehner is devoting at least $3.3 million in taxpayer funding to bankroll a committee without any clear goals

"We don't have a timetable yet, and we don't have a scope of investigation yet," Rep. Adam B. Schiff (D-Calif.), a member of the Intelligence Committee and the Benghazi committee, said Monday in an interview. "It's not because [Gowdy] is unwilling to work with us, it's that we haven't come to a conclusion about where it's headed."

Schiff defended the intelligence panel for working over two years on a report that was unanimously approved by all the members.

"The only real objection we're hearing is that it contradicts a myth. And for some, no amount of factual documentation is going to change their Fox-driven conclusion," he said, referring to the Fox News Channel, which has aggressively covered the attack, its aftermath and subsequent investigations.

Wall Street Journal blog: Washington Wire: "House GOP Benghazi Probe Goes On Despite Intel Panel Report"

By Michael R. Crittenden

November 24, 2014, 7:51 p.m. EST

House Speaker John Boehner (R., Ohio) said Monday that Rep. Trey Gowdy (R., S.C.) will continue to head a special panel to investigate the 2012 attacks in Benghazi, Libya, pushing ahead with the probe despite the release Friday of a GOP-led report that found no attempt to mislead the public.

Mr. Boehner said in a statement that "the American people still have far too many questions about what happened that night – and why" in announcing that he would reappoint Mr. Gowdy and the other GOP members to a House select committee to investigate the Sept. 11, 2012 attacks that left four Americans dead.

"I look forward to the definitive report Chairman Gowdy and the Select Committee will present to the American people," Mr. Boehner said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mr. Boehner made his announcement just days after the House Intelligence Committee issued a report that deflated many of the allegations made by White House critics over the attack and subsequent response by the Obama administration. The report found that the U.S. military and Central Intelligence Agency responded properly at the time of the attacks and that, while some "talking points" used by the administration were flawed, there was no attempt to mislead the public.

The intelligence panel's report said that it is meant to be the "definitive House statement" on the matter and that it was being made public "so that the American public can separate the actual facts from the swirl of rumors and unsupported allegations."

Democrats have repeatedly said the formation of the Benghazi select committee is a political stunt and is intended to provide political fodder to use against former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton if she runs for president in 2016. Rep. Elijah Cummings of Maryland, top Democrat on the select Benghazi panel, questioned the point of replicating the numerous other investigations into the attacks.

"Based on these unanimous, bipartisan findings, there is no reason for the Benghazi Select Committee to reinvestigate these facts, repeat the work already done by our Republican and Democratic colleagues, and squander millions of additional taxpayer dollars in the process," Mr. Cummings said in a statement.

A spokesman for Benghazi Select Committee Republicans said on Friday that the panel had received the intelligence committee's report "months ago," and that it would aid the panel's investigation.

The Hill: "Pressure builds for Senate to join Benghazi probe"

By Alexander Bolton

November 25, 2014, 6:00 a.m. EST

Senate Republican leaders are under pressure from GOP lawmakers with presidential ambitions to join the House in investigating the 2012 Benghazi attack.

Sens. Ted Cruz (R-Texas), Rand Paul (R-Ky.) and Marco Rubio (R-Fla.), three young rising conservative stars who are weighing 2016 bids, say the Senate should participate in a joint investigation with the House.

"The House is doing its job and engaged in oversight. For six years under [Senate Majority Leader] Harry Reid [D-Nev.], the Senate has refused to do its job. I am hopeful and optimistic the Senate will finally begin meaningful oversight. That is its constitutional responsibility," Cruz told The Hill.

But Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), who is set to take over as chairman of the Armed Services Committee, has yet to decide whether the Senate needs to deploy its investigate resources while the House is already doing so.

"What we need to do is talk with the House guys, see where they are and see if they think it's helpful," McCain said when asked whether the Senate should launch an investigation. "I'll be guided by that."

The 2008 presidential nominee has been discussing his options with Rep. Trey Gowdy (R-S.C.), the chairman of the House Select Committee on Benghazi.

A House GOP aide said the decision about whether the Senate participates is up to the leadership, including McCain and other incoming Republican leadership. Meanwhile, Gowdy has directed his panel to continue moving forward with its investigation..

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The South Carolina congressman has scheduled a hearing for December although the date and witness list has yet to be determined. He has also laid out an intensive investigative plan for 2015 that will include multiple hearings early in the year — some open to the public and others behind closed doors.

Cruz introduced a resolution last year calling on Congress to create a joint Senate-House committee to investigate Benghazi.

Paul, Rubio and 23 other Senate Republicans co-sponsored the measure — including Senate Republican Whip John Cornyn (R-Texas) but not Senate Republican Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.).

Aides to Paul and Rubio on Friday said their bosses believe the Senate should join the House select committee.

Rubio earlier this year criticized the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, which he sits on, because it had “not even attempted to conduct a thorough investigation into these terrorist attacks that took the lives of four brave Americans.”

The House Intelligence Committee released a report Friday that largely exonerated the Obama administration of Republican charges that it had covered up the circumstances of the attack and intentionally mislead Congress.

Democrats argue the latest House findings call into question the need for further investigation.

“Serious investigations have shown that the administration acted appropriately in Benghazi. Sen. McCain should think twice before throwing even more taxpayer dollars into what amounts to a baseless partisan stunt,” said a Senate Democratic aide.

The House intelligence panel, chaired by retiring Republican Rep. Mike Rogers (R-Mich.), found the administration did not intentionally mislead the public when Susan Rice, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, used talking points describing the attack as “spontaneous” and “not premeditated.”

The GOP-controlled panel also concluded “there was no stand down order issued” to the military that stopped it from intervening in the attack.

A spokesman for the House Select Committee on Benghazi said it has reviewed the Intelligence Committee’s report “along with other committee reports and materials as the investigation proceeds.”

Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.), McCain’s closest ally in the Senate, attacked the House report Sunday as “full of crap.”

"I don't believe that the report is accurate, given the role that Mike Morell played in misleading the Congress on two different occasions. Why didn't the report say that?" he told CNN’s “State of the Union” in an interview Sunday, referring to the deputy director of the Central Intelligence Agency at the time.

He argued that when Rice went on television after the attack she said on three occasions the consulate was strongly, secured when “nothing could be further … from the truth.”

“She gave an impression to the American people that these folks were well taken care of, when it was in fact a death trap. Who told her to say that?” he said, describing the House report “a complete bunch of garbage.”

Graham, who has floated a White House bid of his own, said last week the Senate needs to investigate.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"What I would envision is a select committee being formed in the Senate of members from the appropriate committees instead of a stovepipe approach," he told conservative radio host Hugh Hewitt.

"We would create a select committee in the Senate to marry up with the select committee in the House, become a joint select committee, bootstrap on the work already done by the House, and take this to its logical conclusion," he added.

The attack killed Christopher Stephens, the U.S. ambassador to Libya, two months before the 2012 presidential election and became a vulnerability for President Obama in the campaign.

Evidence that the State Department mishandled security before the attack, botched its response or tried to hide mistakes would become an issue in the 2016 campaign if Hillary Clinton, who served as secretary of State at the time, runs for the White House.

Paul, a leading 2016 contender, has repeatedly criticized Clinton for not taking the security situation in Libya more seriously.

He argues that if "she cannot protect our embassies" it "precludes her from ever being considered as commander in chief."

Politicker NJ: "Source: Kempner and Gottheimer prep another group of Clinton for Prez backers"

By Max Pizarro

November 24, 2014, 9:13 p.m. EST

Hillary Clinton anchor fundraisers Mike Kempner and Josh Gottheimer welcomed the second round of Clinton fundraisers and friends to the Robert Treat Hotel tonight to polish the fundraising arm in the lead-up to a 2016 Clinton presidential candidacy.

Thirty donors and public personalities convened for dinner at the Robert Treat tonight.

The guests included Democratic State Chairman John Currie, Assemblywoman Valerie Vainieri Huttle (D-37), Englewood Mayor Frank Huttle, Bergen County Democratic Chairman Lou Stellato, state Senator M. Teresa Ruiz (D-29), labor leader Milly Silva, attorney Phil Sellinger.

Former Obama State Director Mark Alexander was in the room.

A source with knowledge of the meeting said the group members left with a charged-up sense of the coming presidential contest and prepared to fundraise and campaign for the former Secretary of State.

The New Jersey goal is to raise $5-$10 million by day one of Clinton's launch, the source added.

Kempner – CEO of MWW – and Gottheimer – a former Clinton speechwriter – convened the first big power broker summit for Clinton a month ago.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Associated Press: "Democrats name 3 finalists to host 2016 convention"

By Ken Thomas

November 24, 2014, 2:42 p.m. EST

WASHINGTON (AP) — Democrats narrowed the list of contenders for their 2016 national convention to three cities on Monday, announcing the party's next presidential candidate will be formally nominated in New York City, Philadelphia or Columbus, Ohio.

The Democratic National Committee said convention bids made by Birmingham, Alabama and Phoenix had been eliminated.

DNC Chair Debbie Wasserman Schultz, a Florida congresswoman, announced the finalists in an email to Democrats and said the event would be held either the weeks of July 18, July 25 or August 22. She said the DNC expects to announce the host city in early 2015.

The three remaining cities could offer an appealing backdrop for Hillary Rodham Clinton, the leading Democratic presidential contender should she seek the White House again.

Clinton represented New York in the Senate and her husband, former President Bill Clinton, was first nominated at New York City's Madison Square Garden in 1992. The couple lives in nearby Westchester County and New York City Mayor Bill de Blasio has promoted the Brooklyn convention site as a popular option for the party's liberal base.

The Clintons have deep ties to Philadelphia's organizers, including Mayor Michael Nutter and former Pennsylvania Gov. Ed Rendell. The city was the site of the 2000 Republican convention and its East Coast location and patriotic heritage as the home of Independence Hall and the Liberty Bell could be a plus.

Columbus, meanwhile, would put Democrats in the center of the nation's top presidential battleground state and offer an in-state rebuttal to Republicans, who are holding their convention in Cleveland.

The winning bid is expected to be based on a number of factors, including the city's ability to raise an estimated $65 million or more along with the potential venues, hotels and transportation options for delegates, party activists and the media.

Birmingham, Alabama, and Phoenix, Arizona, had both offered out-of-the-box options. Alabama is a solidly Republican state and has not supported a Democratic presidential candidate since 1976, limiting its appeal. Democrats would like to turn Arizona into a presidential battleground state — the party has not carried it since 1996 — but some party activists have been critical of the state's approach to immigration enforcement.

Republicans are planning to hold their Cleveland convention beginning either June 27 or July 18. The DNC is keeping the July 18 week as an option but would hold it a different week if Republicans select a mid-July convention.

Politico: "Al Sharpton: Rand Paul's outreach to blacks could hurt Democrats in 2016"

By Katie Glueck

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

November 24, 2014, 2:12 p.m. EST

The Rev. Al Sharpton says Rand Paul's efforts to engage black voters could present a strategic challenge for Democrats: If the Republican senator runs for president, fewer African Americans may be motivated to show up and vote against him.

The civil rights activist and TV host had breakfast with the Kentucky senator last week, and the pair discussed the need for criminal justice reform before disagreeing over how to deal with the immigration system.

Democrats have traditionally done well among African American voters, especially with Barack Obama at the top of the ticket. In 2016, Democrats will "need maximum black turnout in a lot of states," Sharpton told POLITICO.

"What I think is more dangerous for Democrats is, if a guy like Paul is out there, if he becomes the nominee, for argument's sake, he … does not generate a turnout against him" among African Americans, Sharpton said. He added, "If he's able to neutralize his past image on civil rights, if he becomes the candidate … and if you don't get a huge black turnout saying 'We're afraid [of him],'" that could be a pitfall for Democrats.

Sharpton pointed to former New York City Mayor Michael Bloomberg's efforts to engage the black community as an example. Bloomberg "didn't get a lot of black votes … but because he reached out, a lot of blacks were not energized to come out and vote against him," Sharpton said.

Paul came under fire in his 2010 Senate race for equivocating over whether the Civil Rights Act should apply to private businesses (he later stressed he would have voted for the measure). But he has made engaging minority communities a priority in recent years. He has called for restoration of voting rights for some non-violent felons; visited Ferguson, Missouri, where a white police officer fatally shot a black teenager; worked with Democratic Sen. Cory Booker of New Jersey on criminal justice reform and decried police militarization. He's also called on the GOP to be more inclusive.

Sharpton stressed that he is not endorsing Paul, but suggested he was impressed with Paul's efforts.

"Now that he's [working] with Booker, going to Ferguson, having breakfast with Al Sharpton … he is beginning to demonstrate some very open, very consistent patterns of trying to broaden the framework of a potential candidacy," Sharpton said. "I think he knows it's unlikely someone like Al Sharpton would endorse him, but I can't ignore him. He's openly dealing with issues that [politicians] including people in the Democratic Party, haven't done."

Sharpton asked for the meeting, which was held in the Senate dining room, and said he was pleased that Paul was willing to get together in such a high-profile place. The reverend floated a possible invitation to his annual civil rights conference, and Paul did not rule out attending. The senator's office confirmed that he is open to a possible appearance.

Sharpton added that Paul's actions could put "a lot of pressure" even on Democrats such as Hillary Clinton — a potential 2016 frontrunner for the party — who have good records on civil rights.

"In this era of Ferguson and chokehold and the fact that we have the first black president leaving the White House, you can't just go by record," he said. "You gotta go by, as Janet Jackson used to say, 'What have you done for me lately?'"

The Hill blog: Congress Blog: "Ex-Im helps Hillary's friends at Boeing, not women-owned firms"

By Veronique de Rugy and Andrea Castillo; de Rugy is a senior research fellow at the Mercatus Center at George Mason University. Castillo is the program manager of the Technology Policy Program with the Mercatus Center.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

November 24, 2014, 4:00 p.m. EST

Here's some news that is sure to shock no one: Hillary Clinton is a big fan of the Export-Import Bank. During a recent address at a Little Rock event hosted by the No Ceilings Project, Clinton made a point to support the federal subsidizer of exporting multinational corporations.

The perpetual presidential hopeful told the crowd that the Ex-Im Bank is "a tool for us to be competitive in order to support our businesses exporting." She claimed that those who oppose Ex-Im's questionable lending practices to large, politically connected corporations are driven by ideology, not by evidence. Setting aside the fact that economists of all ideological backgrounds have amassed mountains of evidence that Ex-Im does not meaningfully improve U.S. exports or jobs, distorts international markets, and directly harms the 98 percent of unsubsidized workers, consumers, and exporters that don't have friends in Washington, Hillary Clinton's own support of Ex-Im isn't exactly based on "evidence" either. In fact, Clinton maintains questionable political alliances with some of Ex-Im's biggest beneficiaries.

First, it is ironic, and wildly out-of-touch, that Clinton should sing Ex-Im's praises at an event dedicated to promoting equality for women and girls. Corporate interest groups like the Chamber of Commerce try to spin Ex-Im's corporatist lending to politically favored firms by arguing that women-owned firms greatly benefit from Ex-Im. But the data show otherwise.

Ex-Im assistance to women-owned firms barely makes a dent as a portion of the total economy. The roughly 200 women-owned firms that Ex-Im backs each year constitute a mere 1 percent of the total 20,000 women-owned firms in the entire U.S. economy. The same is true when you look at export value backed: The $403.5 million in Ex-Im-backed export value for women-owned firms is a mere 3 percent of the roughly $15 billion in export value produced by all women-owned firms in the economy.

Nor is Ex-Im's portfolio significantly dedicated to the cause of women. Only 1.02 percent of Ex-Im authorizations and 5.8 percent of the Ex-Im firms backed from 2007 to 2014 are marked as "women-owned." Then there's the inconvenient fact that only 3 of Ex-Im's 44 presidents and chairmen have been women. By all accounts, it appears that the patriarchy is alive and well down at the Export-Import Bank.

This all assumes that Ex-Im's women-owned firm assistance data is accurate. Recently, Reuters released a bombshell report revealing that hundreds of firms that Ex-Im records designated as "small business" firms are in reality huge corporations owned by billionaires like Warren Buffett and Carlos Slim. This means that at least $3 billion in authorizations, or 8 percent of Ex-Im's portfolio, have been improperly categorized as small business lending. While the Reuters report did not analyze the accuracy of Ex-Im's women-owned lending, it is possible that much of this portfolio reached less than the "100 percent accuracy" that an Ex-Im representative admitted was "unacceptable."

Reuters concludes that Ex-Im's misleading reporting is a "primarily political" problem. So is Hillary Clinton's support of the bank. In April of this year, Clinton's questionable relationship with Ex-Im's top beneficiary, the Boeing Corporation, was revealed. The Washington Post reported that while serving as Secretary of State, Clinton "functioned as a powerful ally for Boeing's business interests at home and abroad, while Boeing has invested resources in causes beneficial to Clinton's public and political image."

Although the State Department had developed ethics guidelines against assisting Boeing because of its "frequent reliance on the government for help negotiating overseas business," Clinton ignored these prohibitions and negotiated a $2 million deal with the aerospace giant to host a pavilion at the World's Fair. Shortly after Clinton shepherded a $3.7 billion aircraft purchase deal between Boeing and the Russian government in 2010—characterized in her own words as "a shameless pitch … to buy Boeing aircraft"— Boeing announced it would contribute $900,000 to the William J. Clinton Foundation.

More recently, Boeing's Senior Vice President for Government Relations, Tim Keating, worked for the Ready for Hillary Super PAC, along with an "an array of well-connected Democratic lobbyists and politicos." In her memoir, Clinton writes that she considered her role as Secretary of State to be as an "advocate-in-chief" for American corporations like Boeing, Caterpillar, and General Electric, two other top Ex-Im beneficiaries. Clearly, Clinton's support of Ex-Im stems from her cozy relationships with some of the U.S.'s most powerful corporations, not average Americans and certainly not women and girls.

While Hillary Clinton and Boeing's relationship may be "mutually beneficial," the Export-Import Bank is certainly of no benefit to the average American. The bank imposes annual net costs of $3 billion on U.S. industries that are not subsidized by Ex-Im, is projected by the Congressional Budget Office to cost taxpayers $2 billion over the next decade, and privileges politically connected corporations over everyone else. If opposing Clinton's brand of corporatism and political opportunism makes one an "ideologue," then who would want to be anything else?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Calendar:

Sec. Clinton's upcoming appearances as reported online. Not an official schedule.

· December 1 – New York, NY: Sec. Clinton keynotes a League of Conservation Voters dinner (Politico)

· December 4 – Boston, MA: Sec. Clinton speaks at the Massachusetts Conference for Women (MCFW)

· December 16 – New York, NY: Sec. Clinton honored by Robert F. Kennedy Center for Justice and Human Rights (Politico)

· February 24 – Santa Clara, CA: Sec. Clinton to Keynote Address at Inaugural Watermark Conference for Women (PR Newswire)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Nick Merrill" <nmerrill@hrcoffice.com>
To: "Nick Merrill" <nmerrill@hrcoffice.com>
Date: 1/28/2015 8:13:24 AM
Subject: HRC Clips | 1.28.15

Use this version please.

HRC Clips
January 28, 2015

HRC

Romney home-building may clash with talk of income gap ; Costly projects began after last race ended (Boston Globe)
A burst of Democratic ideas (LAT)
Democrats see new chance to attack Kochs after $1 billion spending announcement (WAPO)
Fight the Temptation to Pay Attention to Polls (NYT)
Hillary Clinton's diversity problem ; It's a lot like Obama's diversity problem (WAPO)
Hillary Clinton and Her Detractors: Reporter's Notebook (NYT)
Can Hillary Clinton Get Along With the Press? (Bloomberg)
Obama Is Setting Up Hillary Clinton to Fail (National Journal)
Palin receives plaudits from pro-Hillary Clinton group (AP)
Gowdy: Benghazi investigation 'incomplete' without Clinton testimony (WAPO)
Congressman: Hillary Clinton agrees to testify to House's Benghazi panel (CNN)
Clinton willing to testify before Benghazi panel, Democrat says (Hill)

Romney home-building may clash with talk of income gap ; Costly projects began after last race ended (Boston Globe)

January 28, 2015
The Boston Globe

LA JOLLA, Calif. -- On a recent weekday, a half-dozen construction workers crowded onto a small plot of land in this pricey community, banging away on an 11,000-square-foot house with expansive oceanfront views that will soon replace one a fraction of the size.

There's a large master suite, a room for all the beach gear -- and a car elevator. Outside, scrawled in graffiti on a wall separating the property from the beach, was a message touting Mitt Romney for president.

Two years ago, Mitt Romney didn't think he would run for political office again. And in the aftermath of his bitter defeat in the presidential campaign, he embarked on something of a real estate spree. He simultaneously began building two multimillion-dollar homes, one here on the Pacific Ocean and another outside Salt Lake City. He also bought a third, a slopeside ski chalet in Park City, Utah.

For the first time in more than a decade, unencumbered by political considerations, the two-time presidential candidate and former private equity executive was free to spend his many millions without concern of how it might look. But now that he's considering a third presidential bid, the monuments of his wealth could become a political inconvenience, particularly as one of his key themes has been America's growing income divide.

Romney is traveling on Wednesday to Mississippi State University, a campus in the country's poorest state, where aides say he will outline his vision for a better America.

Romney, whose last presidential bid was hampered by his image of excessive privilege and insensitivity, may recognize the trouble his real estate holdings could cause in another campaign.

He is taking steps to shed some of his property, including retaining a broker who is currently showing the La Jolla home to potential buyers, according to a Romney aide. The aide would not disclose the asking price or explain why the former Massachusetts governor and his wife, Ann, want to sell the home after more than four years of city permitting, hearings, and construction.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In all, Romney has four homes. All of them are at least twice as large as the average home in the United States. They contain spas and hot tubs, and garages to hold up to four cars. They've built kitchens and dining rooms large enough to accommodate their large, sprawling family (5 sons, 5 daughters-in-law, and 23 grandchildren and counting).

"He wants to be close to his family," said Ron Kaufman, a longtime Romney confidant. "There's nothing more important to him than his kids and grandkids. . . . And if you could afford a house, and you're as close as the Romneys are to their kids, that's what you do."

Romney's plans to tear down and rebuilt his home in La Jolla were already underway during his last campaign. But since he lost the 2012 election, Romney has also purchased a six-bedroom home that was listed for $8.9 million in Park City, Utah, and he's built another 5,900-square-foot home 30 miles away near Salt Lake City.

He still has his New Hampshire vacation home on Lake Winnipesaukee, but last year sold his condominium in Belmont for $1.2 million, cutting his remaining ties to Massachusetts and raising questions about whether his 2016 campaign would again be headquartered in Boston.

"During the campaign neither Ann nor I had any time to think about home projects," Romney said in an interview a year after the 2012 election. "But now that the campaign is over, we have a little more time."

The new home in California includes an infamous "car elevator," first reported in 2012 by Politico and used by Romney's opponents to cast him as out of touch. A May 2013 planning document described it this way: "The proposed garage will have the appearance of a two- car garage, but will include a lift inside that will rotate two cars below grade to the basement area."

Building the home was the culmination of a long battle, which at times became heated with neighbors who said Romney's new home -- much larger than his former one -- was out of character with the neighborhood. Some neighbors also complained that he was incorporating square footage from a beach long believed to be public in order to build a larger home. Romney's home is on a street where houses are clumped together on small lots, with cherished views of the Pacific Ocean.

"It was contentious," said Anthony A. Ciani, a local architect and the chief opponent of Romney's expansion. "The issue was the bulk of it compared to the houses right next to it. It's not compatible with the gingerbread houses that are immediately adjacent. It's two, three times bigger than those."

A group of neighbors appealed to the state, but local and state officials ruled in the Romneys' favor, a process followed by the Los Angeles Times. Their former 3,000-square-foot home has been demolished -- except for a swimming pool and spa -- and a new one is under construction.

Planning documents call for a first floor that includes a library, and a large combined living room and dining room. The basement includes an exercise room, recreation room, and a room to hold the beach gear. Outside there will be a wraparound porch, as well as several palm trees, and a mixture of shrubs -- boxwoods, coffeeberry, and California blue sage -- to cover the property.

The work is expected to be completed by the end of the year, although it is unclear whether the Romneys will move in or find a buyer.

"Mitt and Ann's plans are firm," Matthew Peterson, the Romneys' San Diego-based attorney, said in an e-mail. "They will be completing the construction of the home by the end of the year, but no decision has been made at this time whether to keep it, or sell it."

He said that the home has been shown to potential buyers already, but "it is the Romneys' expectation that if the home were to be sold, it would best be sold after it is completed."

Romney's wealth defined him in 2012, with a mixture of inadvertent comments, a reluctance to talk about his successful business career, and a video showing him disparaging 47 percent of Americans who rely on government assistance.

In a Washington Post-ABC News poll taken shortly before the 2012 election, 53 percent of likely voters said that Romney's policies would favor the wealthy, with only 34 percent saying he would favor the middle class. Romney often seemed more comfortable talking with donors than he did in diners.

But those close to Romney have long described him as far more frugal than the caricature of him suggests. He frequently flies in coach, carrying his own bags. He repairs winter gloves with duct tape, refuses to spend money on apps for his iPad, and has a go-to meal that consists of a home-made peanut butter and honey sandwich.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Romney is donating his $50,000 honorarium from Wednesday's speech to charity, a contrast with Hillary Rodham Clinton, who collects fees that are five times higher. Clinton, too, has struggled in talking about her wealth, saying she was once "dead broke" while in her $5 million home.

"It's going to be hard for Hillary Clinton to make Mitt Romney's wealth a fruitful line of attack, with her multimillion dollar mansions in Georgetown and Chappaqua and her jet-setting lifestyle of the rich and famous," said a Romney aide, who declined to be identified.

But even if he is modest in some of his personal spending decisions, one area Romneydoes splurge on is real estate. His properties are all close to where his five sons are living. Every summer, they all gather at the home in Wolfeboro, N.H., and they spent last Christmas at the home in Deer Valley, where the massive stone fireplace was large enough to hold stockings for nearly two dozen grandchildren.

In August 2013, a holding company managed by Ann Romney purchased the home in Park City that had been listed at $8.9 million. The 8,730 square-foot home -- which has six bedrooms, eight bathrooms, an outdoor hot tub and a sauna -- was once featured in Architectural Digest, showcasing blond wood, two-story windows, and a chandelier made from antlers.

A Romney aide said that he co-owned the home with L.E. Simmons, a prominent Romney donor who runs a Houston-based private equity firm.

The Romneys also bought property in Holladay, Utah, where they tore down a smaller home and built a 5,900-square-foot house that features a fountain, terraces, a gazebo, a fire pit, and a spa, according to plans reviewed by the Salt Lake Tribune.

The plans also called for a hidden room, an 11-foot-long area masked by a bookshelf that swings open. But Romney told the Globe that it was much less mysterious than initial news reports suggested.

"It's a closet where we plan on keeping the copying machine, and the printer, and paper," he said, laughing. "Not even a lock on the door. It's hardly a secret room."

A burst of Democratic ideas (LAT)

By Doyle McManus
January 28, 2015
Los Angeles Times

Only a few months ago, it looked as if Republicans had recaptured their old claim to be the party of ideas, especially on the economic issue that has seized the attention of most Americans: the stagnation of middle-class incomes.

The GOP's former vice presidential nominee, Rep. Paul D. Ryan (R-Wis.), unveiled proposals to help the struggling middle class. Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.), another conservative hero, inveighed against income inequality. Even Mitt Romney, the once and perhaps future presidential candidate, has started saying it is time to get serious about poverty.

Meanwhile, Democrats seemed like an extinct volcano. Many of them campaigned for November's midterm election without any clear economic message at all. It didn't turn out well.

In politics, nothing concentrates the mind like electoral defeat -- unless it's the low roar of an oncoming presidential campaign.

And so, in the last few weeks, the Democratic volcano has erupted with ideas. President Obama listed dozens in his State of the Union speech, beginning with a tax increase on the top 1% to pay for child-care and education benefits for the middle class. House Democrats went further, proposing a tax on financial transactions that would allow for broader tax cuts for workers. And a think-tank task force co-chaired by former Treasury Secretary Lawrence H. Summers proposed tax breaks for middle-income folks as well as tax incentives to push companies toward sharing profits with their workers.

"Stagnation in wages and income is a choice, not a necessity," Summers said. "A different choice is possible."

You probably haven't seen much about, much less read, his report; It's 160 pages long and stuffed with serious economic analysis of why most Americans' incomes haven't grown much in real terms since -- ouch -- 1973.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But its prescriptions are serious, and they are probably close to what Hillary Rodham Clinton's economic platform will be, when we get to see it. The report was sponsored by the liberal Center for American Progress, whose founder, John Podesta, is expected to become chairman of Clinton's presidential campaign. The think tank's president, Neera Tanden, was Clinton's chief policy advisor in 2008.

And the report isn't coy about its political purpose; it sets out to update the centrist Democratic policies Bill Clinton ran on in the 1990s. "The world has changed," Summers said.

The core argument is that economic growth alone isn't enough to ensure sustained prosperity any more. Unless profits are broadly shared, the argument goes, the economy won't generate enough domestic spending to keep growth going -- or alleviate the widening gap between rich and poor.

Most of the solutions would be on almost any Democrat's wish list: more spending on education and training, more spending on roads and bridges and airports, paid parental leave for both fathers and mothers, and paid sick and vacation days for all.

And there's that corporate reform: legislation to push employers to share more of their growing profits with their employees, and to shift financial incentives for executives from short-term stock price increases to long-term growth.

The report calls for strengthening the 2010 Dodd-Frank financial regulation law, including tougher punishment for financial crimes beginning with mandatory "clawbacks" of bonuses paid to executives who are found responsible for malfeasance.

That sounds like a bow to Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.) and others on the Democratic left who have long complained that Wall Street got away with too much in the Great Recession. But the Summers report doesn't call for breaking up or shrinking big banks, as Warren has proposed, so it's unlikely to satisfy every progressive.

It won't make every centrist Democrat happy, either. The Progressive Policy Institute, a think tank spawned by Bill Clinton's New Democrat movement, began work this week on a list of policies focused on promoting private sector growth. "We need to expand our growth agenda to attract voters who may not agree with us," the group's president, Will Marshall, told me.

And what does Hillary think? She's not saying. As the prohibitive front-runner in a race she hasn't formally joined, she can let the arguments percolate.

She's given clues, of course -- but in all directions. She said she loved "watching Elizabeth [Warren] give it to those who deserve to get it." In Canada last week, she struck a less populist note, saying the pressing problem is "small- and medium-sized business formation."

And she has offered terse tidbits of policy via Twitter, warning Congress that "attacking financial reform is risky and wrong" and praising Obama's State of the Union address -- but adding: "Now we need to step up & deliver for the middle class."

But for Democrats who worried that their party's idea shortage might be chronic and disabling, the eruption of economic prescriptions must come as a relief. There's a debate underway, and the front-runner even has a draft platform in hand. The Democrats won't have to wage another campaign without an economic message after all.

Democrats see new chance to attack Kochs after $1 billion spending announcement (WAPO)

By Anne Gearan and Sean Sullivan
January 28, 2015
Washington Post

Forget Jeb, Rand and Ted. For Democrats, it's all about Charles and David.

The announcement this week that the vast political network backed by the wealthy industrialist Koch brothers aims to spend nearly $1 billion on the 2016 elections has reignited Democratic hopes of casting the brothers as electoral villains and linking them closely to Republican candidates.

It's a campaign strategy that yielded little success for the party in 2014, a banner year for the GOP. But Democratic officials and operatives say they are hopeful that their anti-Koch message will have more potency in a presidential election year.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Groups supporting potential Democratic candidate Hillary Rodham Clinton, as well as the House and Senate Democratic campaign arms, plan to single out the Kochs in their advertising and fundraising efforts.

“I think the Koch brothers dumping a billion dollars on the elections is definitely something the American people are interested in learning about,” said Rep. Ben Ray Luján (N.M.), chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

He said the DCCC plans to mention the brothers in online fundraising efforts. The DCCC raised $70 million in the last election cycle.

David Brock, founder of the pro-Clinton American Bridge political action committee, said his group will be retooling a 2014 war-room operation called “Real Koch Facts,” which he acknowledged did not achieve big results. The project aims to educate potential voters about what Democrats say is the Kochs’ largely hidden agenda and to attempt to shame recipients of Koch money.

Said Peter Kauffmann, a spokesman for the pro-Clinton Priorities USA Action super PAC: “Will Priorities USA Action talk about the Koch brothers’ attempt at a hostile takeover of the government of the United States? Stay tuned.”

But former House speaker Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.), who ran for president in 2012, compared Democratic attacks against the Kochs to failed GOP efforts to tar Democrats for receiving support from organized labor.

“The fact is we never got anywhere trying to explain to the country all of the extra advantage they got, for example, from labor unions,” Gingrich said. “It’s too indirect an argument.”

The Koch-backed network’s plan to spend $889 million on the 2016 elections was announced Monday at a Rancho Mirage, Calif., event hosted by Freedom Partners, a tax-exempt organization that serves as the nerve center of the political operation supported by the brothers and several hundred other conservative donors. Not all of the money will be put toward shaping elections; it will cover advertising and policy work as well as education and academic research, among other things. Much of the spending will be cloaked in secrecy.

James Davis, a Freedom Partners spokesman, said in an e-mail: “Democrats’ past attempts to divide America by demonizing job creators didn’t work too well. We remain focused on advancing free-market principles.”

In 2014, Democrats made a concerted effort to make the Kochs into bogeymen. Then-Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) routinely used Senate floor speeches to castigate them. Democratic groups ran TV and radio ads tying the Kochs to GOP candidates and presenting them as polluters and job outsourcers who were out of touch with the middle class.

“The oil billionaire Koch brothers are showering millions on Thom Tillis like he’s one of the family,” said an ad from the Democratic-aligned Patriot Majority USA.

But Tillis is now a U.S. senator from North Carolina, part of a wave of Republican wins that cost the Democrats their majority.

“It clearly didn’t work in 2014,” said Darrell West, vice president and director of governance studies at the center-left Brookings Institution. “That election was a disaster for Democrats. It seems to me they need to recalibrate the message.”

He said Democrats would need to tie their anti-Koch rhetoric to “substantive issues in a way that resonates with voters.”

Most voters don’t know who the Kochs are. Sixty-four percent of voters said they had no opinion or a neutral impression of them, according to an NBC News-Wall Street Journal poll conducted about a month before the November midterms. But among those who did, attitudes were overwhelmingly negative.

“The Koch brothers are not going to be a household name overnight, but our goal of making them a political liability for the people they are funding will continue,” Brock said.

The newly announced spending goal is unlikely to affect Clinton’s plans to begin her formal campaign in early April, strategists said. The goal is for her to raise an impressive total for the fundraising quarter that begins April 1.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But the early flurry of activity could apply pressure on mega-donors such as billionaire climate activist Tom Steyer and former New York City mayor Michael Bloomberg, a former Republican and staunch gun-control advocate who has donated mostly to Democratic candidates. The two were among the biggest givers in 2014.

Adviser Chris Lehane said Steyer will be looking at "where he can have the biggest impact" in 2016.

Like many Democrats, Lehane subscribes to the view that an anti-Kochs attack strategy could work better in 2016 than it did in 2014. "There will be a better voter pool, the Senate states will be more blue states than red states, and the media interest will be even bigger," he said.

Campaign finance reform advocates also say the Koch-backed spending plan is a fresh opportunity to push for revamping laws that allow well-funded independent groups to dominate elections, often without revealing their donors.

"There is just no matching this amount of wealth directed in this way," said Rep. David E. Price (D-N.C.), who introduced a bill this week that would create a matching system for small donations and seek to limit the influence of super PACs. "Of course, nobody should have to match it. We should have a system that keeps spending within reasonable limits."

But Price acknowledged that it would be difficult to pass such reforms in a Republican-controlled Congress. In the meantime, he said, raising the Kochs as an electoral issue isn't a bad idea.

"I think in some cases it does work to dramatize the issue and make it more real," Price said.

Fight the Temptation to Pay Attention to Polls (NYT)

By Brendan Nyhan
January 28, 2015
New York Times

Public service announcement: For now, you should ignore surveys testing potential Democrat/Republican matchups for the 2016 presidential election.

I'm referring to polls like The Washington Post-ABC News survey released last week, which made headlines with the finding that Hillary Clinton enjoys a big lead against Republicans like Jeb Bush and Mitt Romney. Other media organizations have also been releasing head-to-head polls like this, and more are sure to follow in the coming months.

I realize it's tempting to believe that these head-to-head polls have at least a little bit of meaningful information in them. Poll numbers are irresistible to political obsessives like me, but it's just too early for them to be useful in forecasting the general election.

Take the case of Mrs. Clinton's husband, Bill. In October 1991, Mr. Clinton, then the little-known Arkansas governor, pulled in only 20 percent of the vote in a prospective head-to-head matchup against President George H.W. Bush. His standing in the polls against Mr. Bush averaged only 34 percent as late as January 1992. But in the months that followed, Mr. Clinton gained stature while winning the Democratic nomination, and Mr. Bush's numbers plunged as his Gulf War-induced surge in approval dissipated. The campaign eventually brought the electoral fundamentals into focus: an electorate ready for change after 12 years of Republican control of the White House, a relatively weak economy, and an unpopular president. Mr. Clinton went on to beat President Bush by more than five points, winning 53.5 percent of the major-party vote in a three-way contest that also featured the eccentric billionaire H. Ross Perot.

The polls are likely to be even less accurate further from Election Day. In polls conducted in January 2003, for example, President George W. Bush led Democratic Senator John Kerry by 8 and 17 percentage points, but Mr. Bush's final margin of 2.5 percent of the popular vote was the narrowest of a re-elected president since Woodrow Wilson in 1916.

The political scientists Robert S. Erikson and Christopher Wlezien have shown that this pattern of early inaccuracy is consistent across the post-World War II era. Trial heat polls measuring support for potential general election candidates even 300 days from an election have virtually no predictive power in forecasting the final vote. (We are currently more than 650 days away.) It's not until near the end of primary season — mid-April of 2016, or approximately 200 days from Election Day — that polls start to be useful predictors, they find.

Why are polls so inaccurate for so long? The reality is that ordinary people pay very little attention to politics most of the time. Their responses to early survey questions are unconsidered and reflect factors like name recognition. Over time, however, the campaign eventually brings the state of the country into focus, drawing people's voting intentions into line with their partisanship and their perceptions of the state of the economy. As a result, the polls tend to converge toward the result predicted by forecasting models based on the fundamentals.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A key post-primary turning point, Mr. Erikson and Mr. Wlezien show, are the nominating conventions, which effectively deliver party messages to voters, helping influence independents and reel back in wayward partisans. By that point, the polls are almost as predictive as they will be at the end of the campaign. (The debates, by contrast, provide conflicting flows of information that rarely move the polls appreciably despite all the media coverage they attract.)

For all of these reasons, Mrs. Clinton's giant lead wouldn't hold up in an actual election contest. Her public standing has been artificially inflated by her tenure as secretary of state, which largely removed her from the partisan fray. A campaign would remind many Americans why they used to have unfavorable views of her. The winner of the Republican nomination will gain in stature and consolidate the support of the party in the first part of next year — the reason that the performance of G.O.P. candidates against Mrs. Clinton right now is not especially instructive in analyzing their prospective appeal. (At this point in January 2011, for instance, a McClatchy/Marist poll found President Obama leading Mitt Romney, 51 percent to 38 percent, but Mr. Romney ultimately attracted 47 percent of the vote and narrowly lost the race.)

Moreover, despite Mr. Obama's recent uptick in approval, approximately half of all Americans disapprove of his performance in office. While the growing economy is likely to continue to improve his standing and strengthen the prospects for a Democratic successor, any competent Republican would be expected to outperform the 39-41 percent mustered by G.O.P. candidates in The Post's polls.

Ultimately, all we can do is wait. We know head-to-head polls won't be useful for more than a year. Until then, your time is better spent following the direction of the economy — the most important predictor of presidential election outcomes — and the battle among G.O.P. candidates, who are already contesting the invisible primary that will help determine which candidate Mrs. Clinton or some other Democrat will face in November.

Hillary Clinton's diversity problem ; It's a lot like Obama's diversity problem (WAPO)

By Nia-Malika Henderson
January 27, 2015
Washington Post

When I first read the list of top campaign staffers with whom Hillary Rodham Clinton will surround herself in her presumed 2016 campaign for the White House, I had two thoughts.

One, that's a lot of white men. (Over at the Daily Beast, Tim Mak had the same reaction, wondering if Clinton needs "binders full of women.")

But my second thought was this: Of course it's that way.

Of the six people named in Anne Gearan and Philip Rucker's story, every single one is a white man. Now, in fairness, it's still early, and Karen Finney, Dennis Cheng, Jennifer Palmieri and the DNC's Mo Elleithee have been floated as options for top jobs. And Clinton's standing cast of advisers is also fairly diverse, with Huma Abedin and Cheryl Mills among her closest counselors and aides. Clinton picked Patti Solis Doyle as campaign manager in 2008.

But in filling out the top slots, Clinton has drawn from Obama's campaign circle, and that group of people is largely white and male. The frustration among black staffers and strategists has been that rather than creating and growing a new class of black politicos, Obama has surrounded himself with a cast of mostly white men. Obama and Clinton have relied on what academics call "path dependence," a theory that could explain everything from why the majority of labor secretaries over the last 25 years have been women to why women who appear on television have a similar look.

The person who has the job gets the same job again and looks like the person who had the job before. (Robert Gibbs. Jay Carney. Josh Earnest.) But in political campaigns, which are dynamic -- especially in the age of Twitter -- this kind of stasis can be a drawback.

Typically, surface diversity has been an easy thing to achieve. It's akin to the one-drop rule. If you have one black/Hispanic/Asian/woman in a group of white men, then, presto, you've achieved diversity. Obama's race came with expectations of more diversity, but it also shielded him from public complaints. He was sometimes the one drop, and that was often enough.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton, who will bank big on women and minorities, will have to do much more than simply follow Obama's path. She will have to create something new and different that matches the times and her profile, rather than absorb Obama's inner circle into her own.

"I love Barbra Streisand," said Donna Brazile, in an interview with The New York Times Magazine, "but Beyoncé is what's happening now. I love Peter, Paul and Mary, but she needs to be Justin Timberlake. She can't afford to kick people out, but she can afford to let new people come in. I realize that's uncomfortable."

Hillary Clinton and Her Detractors: Reporter's Notebook (NYT)

By Amy Chozick
January 27, 2015
New York Times

Hillary Rodham Clinton's presumed 2016 presidential campaign is already drawing a lot of criticism. That may not be a surprise. But Amy Chozick, a political reporter, is finding that the attacks against Mrs. Clinton have a new angle. She describes the challenge of reporting fairly on this subtle shift and what it may mean.

The cottage industry of attacking Hillary Rodham Clinton is not new, but I noticed over the past several months that the attacks that landed in my inbox struck a very different tone than those that Republicans used when she was first lady and later when she ran for president in 2008.

Remember when she was portrayed as the embodiment of bra-burning feminism? Then, in 2008, there were a lot of attacks that seemed based on gender, like an anti-Hillary website that called her a witch.

But ahead of the 2016 presidential campaign, the groups trying to stop Mrs. Clinton instead focus on her paid speeches, her response to the attack on the U.S. mission in Benghazi, Libya, and her comments last summer that her family was "dead broke" when leaving the White House. Instead of being the 1960s radical, she is portrayed as an elitist who is overly centrist.

The tricky thing in reporting this type of story is that you don't want to dismiss legitimate questions about her record as partisan "hating." Every political candidate faces attacks and should be thoroughly vetted if they're running for president. George W. Bush and other Republicans have certainly faced intense partisan attacks from the left.

But for some reason, Mrs. Clinton has always sparked a different level of ire. Mrs. Clinton's supporters largely believe the level of ire she sparks has to do with her being the first woman with a real chance to become president. Others point to how polarizing she is; polls show the country is almost equally divided in opinions about her.

Whatever the reason, I can't think of another candidate who has prompted an entire industry of kitschy items — like a "Hillary nutcracker," "No way in Hellary" aprons, and "Even Bill Doesn't Want Hillary" bumper stickers.

All this is a good way to rally Republicans, but it remains to be seen how much impact it would have on Mrs. Clinton's presumptive campaign.

Can Hillary Clinton Get Along With the Press? (Bloomberg)

By Joshua Green
January 27, 2015
Bloomberg

Last week, I was speaking with a veteran Republican strategist for a likely presidential candidate about what factors would shape the 2016 race that weren't already being obsessed over by the press. He replied, with grim satisfaction, that Hillary Clinton would have to endure more hostile press coverage than Barack Obama did and that this would redound to the GOP's benefit. For this strategist, as for many Republicans, it has long been an article of deep, almost cult-like faith that Obama's electoral success owed in no small part to the media's fawning coverage of his campaigns—and that this supposed bias will not be extended to Clinton.

Evidently, Clinton agrees. In a blockbuster piece in Monday's Politico, Mike Allen reports that a major component of Clinton's soon-to-emerge presidential campaign is a new approach to dealing with the press, which "Hillaryland," radiating the conviction of its principal, has generally abhorred and treated with hostile disdain. It seems those feelings haven't changed. "Advisers know that Clinton doesn't like or trust the press," Allen reports. But he quotes one of them conceding that open hostility toward the press hasn't been a successful strategy and that Clinton is ready to try something different. "You do see what works, and address what works the next time around," the adviser tells Allen. "The default isn't toward the pit-bull mentality." The campaign is apparently even searching for someone who could play the role of "good cop."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

If anything, Allen undersells his scoop. Clinton's relationship with the press isn't some minor campaign detail along the lines of who'll run Iowa or who'll shoot her ads. It's what's shaped her as a politician. As Allen's colleagues Glenn Thrush and Maggie Haberman detailed last summer, Clinton's relationship with the press has been caustic throughout her career.

Over the 25 years Hillary Clinton has spent in the national spotlight, she's been smeared and stereotyped, the subject of dozens of over-hyped or downright fictional stories and books alleging, among other things, that she is a lesbian, a Black Widow killer who offed Vincent Foster then led an unprecedented coverup, a pathological liar, a real estate swindler, a Commie, a harridan. Every aspect of her personal life has been ransacked; there's no part of her 5-foot-7-inch body that hasn't come under microscopic scrutiny, from her ankles to her neckline to her myopic blue eyes—not to mention the ever-changing parade of hairstyles that friends say reflects creative restlessness and enemies read as a symbol of somebody who doesn't stand for anything.

This has instilled a resentment that her closest allies consider unshakeable. "Look, she hates you. Period," a Clinton adviser tells Thrush and Haberman. "That's never going to change." Of course, these bad feelings toward the press are not entirely unjustified. In addition to the deranged and misogynistic attacks Thrush and Haberman lay out, Clinton has also been raked through the coals over more serious matters, such as Whitewater, that never merited such treatment and inflicted real damage. What both Clintons learned, and what eventually got her into trouble, was that attacking the press allowed them to survive scandals both real (Monica Lewinsky) and imagined (Whitewater).

This bred a kind of paranoid hubris that was the hallmark of Clinton's 2008 presidential campaign. My own experience in the Clinton crosshairs stands as a good example of why her "old" approach to the press often backfired.

In 2007, I was writing a story for GQ on the inner workings of the Clinton campaign. The Clinton campaign was unhappy about this. At the time, Clinton was presumed (by herself and nearly everyone else) to be the inevitable Democratic nominee and likely future president. This gave her a great deal of power and the illusion that she could control how the press covered her. So a Clinton aide threatened to withdraw Bill Clinton's cooperation to be the magazine's "Man of the Year" cover model if GQ didn't kill my piece. GQ killed my piece. (Full story here, via Ben Smith.)

The problem with this strategy, as anyone outside the Clinton bubble would easily recognize, is that it created more problems for her than it solved. Information wants to be free—especially juicy tales of Clinton campaign turmoil. When the story inevitably leaked, it drew far more attention than it otherwise would have, deepening the impressions of Clinton as imperious and entitled and her campaign staff as goonish extras from House of Cards. The stories they'd tried to squelch simply wound up in a different magazine (here, for anyone interested).

Can Clinton really let bygones be bygones and try a new approach? It would make all the sense in the world, since the lack of competition in the Democratic primaries means she'll have to contend with a bored and restless press corps. But it would also require her to willingly give up a measure of control at a time when she is even more powerful and inevitable-seeming than she was before. (For what it's worth, I haven't yet been invited to tea.)

That's a pretty tall order. Allen doesn't mention it, but a New York Times story last week raises some doubts. Amy Chozick and Michael Cieply report that Bill Clinton has broken off cooperation with a Martin Scorsese documentary for HBO that would have been released during his wife's campaign. Clinton wanted to control the interview questions and the final cut of the film, according Chozick and Cieply, and Scorsese refused.

This doesn't mean that Clinton's desire to reset her relationship with the media isn't sincere, or at least a sincere recognition of her self interest. Nor does it mean the effort is doomed. But it is a reminder that old habits die hard.

Obama Is Setting Up Hillary Clinton to Fail (National Journal)

By Joshua Kraushaar
January 27, 2015
National Journal

President Obama delivered his penultimate State of the Union with renewed confidence, eager to take credit for the economy's recent growth spurt. He offered few olive branches to Republicans for their landslide victory two months earlier; articulated a panoply of liberal proposals that stand little chance of passing through Congress; and took the rosiest possible view of the economy and international landscape—even in the face of contrary evidence. In the moment, it's a savvy political play: Claim credit for an improving public mood and force Republicans on the defensive.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But despite the hoopla, recent polling shows that the public is much more in sync with the GOP's agenda than the White House's. This month's NBC/WSJ survey illustrated a striking disconnect between the president's improving approval rating (at 46 percent, up 2 points since November) and the top priorities of the American electorate. In the survey, 85 percent of voters rank "creating jobs" as a top priority, followed by defeating and dismantling ISIS (74 percent), reducing the federal deficit (71 percent), securing the border with Mexico (58 percent), and addressing Iran's nuclear program (56 percent). The last four are core GOP strengths; polls consistently show Republicans with an edge on those issues.

The items at the bottom of the priority list are all top administration priorities: closing the Guantanamo prison camp (24 percent rate as top priority), addressing the issue of climate change (34 percent), creating a pathway to citizenship for illegal immigrants (39 percent), and increasing the minimum wage (44 percent). It wasn't just Obama's assessment of the international stage that was disconnected from reality. It was also his assessment that the American people are with him on his agenda.

That disconnect will be driving the upcoming presidential election, which will provide a decisive verdict on the sustainability of Obama's accomplishments. Obama, as he ad-libbed in the State of the Union, couldn't help but brag that he won two elections as proof of his mandate. The GOP also won a historic number of seats in Congress, capitalizing on public anger over his policies. Rather than move to the middle and compromise with Republicans, Obama appears intent on playing to his party's progressive base in the run-up to the 2016 elections – and pass along that legacy to Hillary Clinton's nascent campaign. It's a gamble that will determine whether his landmark legislation will remain law, or be rolled back by a new Republican president.

Obama should recognize how much of his post-election bump is being driven by forces outside of his control. The president is eagerly taking credit for the improved economy, even though little has passed legislatively in recent years. It wasn't long ago that he was blaming GOP intransigence for the slow growth. Now he's betting his remaining political capital that the encouraging economic trends will continue into next year—hardly a guarantee, given the history of false starts in the past.

"We're going to have to see sustained growth in the number of middle-class jobs and an increase in median income before we really see attitudes about the economy turn around," said Republican pollster Whit Ayres, who is advising potential presidential candidate Marco Rubio. "Debates on how to get the economy going to get more well-paying middle-class jobs will remain one of the very top issues in the next presidential campaign. The depth of middle-class anxiety is so widespread."

Obama's own emphasis on "middle-class economics" demonstrated that, despite his optimism, he recognizes that many Americans are still struggling to make ends meet. But his solutions were oddly disconnected from both the economic and the political realities he faces.

Consider the lack of creativity from the administration in its signature initiative from the State of the Union: free community college tuition for everyone. For most low-income Americans, the tuition is already free or heavily subsidized. There's not a groundswell of middle-class households whose goal is to receive an associate degree. The plan wasn't accompanied by a more ambitious approach to, say, help community colleges teach certain skills that aren't taught at traditional four-year colleges. (Rubio, for instance, has proposed expanding access to career and vocational education as part of his detailed educational blueprint.)

It's merely a tuition giveaway, one that originally was partly paid for by the very middle- and upper-middle-class families that are saving money for the four-year colleges that Obama has called essential for a successful career. The plan proposed getting rid of the tax exemption on 529 college savings accounts, which have been growing in popularity, to help parents prepare for their childrens' rising education expenses. That provision was so politically tone deaf that the White House withdrew it just one week after the president introduced it.

The proposal smacked of the very redistributive schemes that dogged Democrats throughout the 1980s.

Anytime a politician promises to "lower the cost to zero," as Obama did in his address, it's worth remembering the economic maxim "there's no such thing as a free lunch." And it directly puts a squeeze on the very middle-class constituency that Obama claims to be courting. Hillary Clinton will certainly want to echo a message centered on educational opportunity, but she's probably not eager to alienate a sizable group of voters who will be up for grabs in the next election.

Clinton has been publicly supportive of the president, but he's boxed her into a corner. She can't afford to publicly break with a president whose fortunes align closely with hers. Yet she's undoubtedly aware that her odds of winning the

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Democratic nomination are very strong, and moving away from the center won't help her in a general election.

Palin receives plaudits from pro-Hillary Clinton group (AP)

January 27, 2015
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) — Sarah Palin is picking up an unexpected title: top fundraiser for a group promoting a potential Hillary Rodham Clinton campaign for president.

During a speech in Iowa last weekend, the former Alaska governor and 2008 Republican vice presidential nominee held up a Ready for Hillary car magnet as she talked about ways for Republicans in Iowa to stop a Clinton campaign. Ready for Hillary, the super PAC backing a possible Clinton campaign, used the moment as a fundraising tool and said they raised more than $25,000.

Adam Parkhomenko, Ready for Hillary's executive director, sent an email to supporters saying: "By raising $25,000, Sarah officially qualifies as a co-chair of our National Finance Council. (We will wait until Sarah calls before officially adding her name to the list.)"

Palin appeared alongside several potential GOP presidential candidates at the weekend event organized by Rep. Steve King, R-Iowa. On the question of whether anyone can stop Clinton, she borrowed a phrase from the Obama campaign and said, "Yes we can."

A SarahPAC official did not immediately comment on the Ready for Hillary email.

Gowdy: Benghazi investigation 'incomplete' without Clinton testimony (WAPO)

By Colby Itkowitz
January 28, 2015
Washington Post

Whether she runs for president or not, Hillary Rodham Clinton is probably not done answering questions about Benghazi, Libya.

The House panel investigating the deadly attacks on the Benghazi mission in September 2012 met Tuesday in a fiery public hearing where Rep. Trey Gowdy (R-S.C.), who is chairing the 12-member select committee, said he would "ratchet up" the investigation and claimed the administration wasn't cooperating.

After the hearing, Gowdy told reporters he planned to call on Clinton to testify, saying a Benghazi investigation would be "incomplete" without questioning the former secretary of state.

"Every witness who has relevant information needs to be talked to," Gowdy said, according to ABC News.

Gowdy said he is waiting for pertinent documents from the State Department before calling Clinton to appear before the committee. Clinton has said she doesn't think the committee's investigation is necessary — other independent panels have not found any wrongdoing by the Obama administration — but has also said she would testify if asked.

But Democrats accused Gowdy of delaying the invitation to coincide closer with the 2016 election. At the hearing, Rep. Adam Schiff (D-Calif.) said the committee, which was created eight months ago, is at risk of becoming a "partisan fishing expedition, or it'll be drawn out to affect the presidential election cycle."

At Gowdy's request, ranking member Elijah Cummings (D-Md.) said he asked Clinton back in September if she would willingly testify, and she offered to come in December or January.

"She said I'll do it, period. The fact is she was very clear. She did not hesitate for one second," Cummings said. But Gowdy has yet to formally invite her to come testify, citing the need for additional documents.

Clinton appeared before Senate and House committees during back-to-back hearings on Benghazi as one of her final acts as secretary of state in January 2013. She defended the White House's response and famously lost her patience at one point, asking a Republican "what difference does it make" when pressed on the White House's initial explanation of why the attack occurred.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A year ago, Clinton said the attacks were her “biggest regret” during her years at State.

Congressman: Hillary Clinton agrees to testify to House’s Benghazi panel (CNN)

By Dan Merica
January 27, 2015
CNN

Washington (CNN) - Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton has agreed to testify to the House’s select committee investigating Benghazi, the panel’s Democratic ranking member told CNN on Tuesday.

Rep. Elijah Cummings said that Clinton agreed to testify before the committee investigating the 2012 terrorist attack in December after he contacted her months earlier.

“The chairman asked me back in September to inquire as to whether Secretary Clinton would testify,” Cummings said. “She immediately said she would and that she wanted to come in December, but if December did not work, she would come in January. She said I’ll do it, period. The fact is she was very clear. She did not hesitate for one second.”

The U.S. consulate in Libya was attacked on Sept. 11, 2012. Four Americans, including the U.S. Ambassador to Libya Chris Stevens, were killed. Initially, the attack was thought to be perpetrated by an angry mob responding to a video made in the U.S. which mocked Islam and the Prophet Mohammed, but was later determined to be a terrorist attack.

Nick Merrill, the former first lady’s spokesman, declined to go into detail about why Clinton agreed to testify and when she might do so.

“I’m going to leave it to the committee to address their plans,” said Merrill.

Cummings’ comments on Tuesday revealed the clearest indication to date that Clinton was willing to show up before the committee, though many details remain to be agreed upon and the appearance could well never happen.

While touring the country selling her new memoir in June 2014, Clinton was asked whether she would be willing to testify before the House committee.

“We’ll see,” she told NBC in an interview. “I’m not going to prejudge it.”

Clinton added that she took a lot of notes during the attack, but declined to say whether she would hand over the notes.

“Let’s see if it’s on the level or not. I don’t want to be part of anything that in any way politicizes or demeans the sacrifice that we saw happen there,” Clinton said.

The attack has remained a political issue for Clinton, who was secretary of state at the time, since 2012. As the former first lady eyes a potential presidential bid, a number of Republicans have signaled that Benghazi will be a main line of attack against Clinton.

Sen. Rand Paul has said the attack should disqualify Clinton from higher office.

Rep. Trey Gowdy, the chairman of the Benghazi committee, told reporters on Tuesday that he still intends to have Clinton testify as part of the investigation.

“Every witness who has relevant information needs to be talked to,” he said.

According to The Hill, Gowdy is prepared to hear from Clinton 30 days after receiving “all the [State Department] documents” on the attack.

Clinton testified for more than five hours before another House committee investigating Benghazi in January 2013, shortly before she left the State Department. At the time, Clinton acknowledged a “systemic breakdown” but said that her department was taking additional steps to increase security at U.S. diplomatic facilities.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Since then, Clinton has said her biggest regret a during the four years she served as America's top diplomat was the Benghazi attack.

"My biggest regret is what happened in Benghazi," Clinton said in January 2014. "It was a terrible tragedy losing four Americans, two diplomats and -- now it is public so I can say -- two CIA operatives."

Clinton willing to testify before Benghazi panel, Democrat says (Hill)

By Martin Matishak
January 27, 2015
The Hill

Hillary Clinton is willing to testify before the House Select Committee that is investigating the 2012 terrorist attacks in Benghazi, Libya, according to the panel's top Democrat.

Rep. Elijah Cummings (D-Md.) on Tuesday said he has spoken to Clinton about the possibility of testifying at the request of Rep. Trey Gowdy (S.C.), the panel's Republican chairman, and she "did not hesitate for one second."

"She said ... I'll do it, period," Cummings said after the committee's third hearing.

Cummings said Clinton, who was secretary of State at the time of the Benghazi attacks, indicated to him last year that she "wanted to come in December" to testify but could also come in January.
"The fact is that she was very clear," Cummings said.

The possibility of an appearance from Clinton, the front-runner for the Democratic presidential nomination in 2016 if she makes a bid, has loomed as the biggest question for the Benghazi panel since its formation last summer.

Gowdy first floated the possibility of Clinton testifying late last year, creating the potential for a dramatic confrontation with the former secretary of State over a security failure that some Republicans argue should disqualify her from the presidency.

Clinton is "a witness that we would like to talk to. I cannot tell you when," Gowdy said in December.

With the race for the White House set to erupt soon, Democrats could be maneuvering to accelerate the work of the Benghazi panel so that it is not investigating Clinton while she is running for the presidency.

Gowdy, a former prosecutor, on Tuesday said he and Cummings had initially agreed last year that Clinton should be brought before the panel.

But after that discussion, Gowdy said, Cummings had an unexpected change of heart.

"The deal I had with Mr. Cummings is we will bring her before the committee within 30 days of receiving all the [State Department] documents responsive to our request," Gowdy said.

He said the State Department must hand over the information the panel is seeking, including potentially some of Clinton's emails, before Clinton testifies.

"If I were to conclude this investigation having not talked to the secretary of State at the time it would be an incomplete investigation," Gowdy said. "But I can't talk to her until I have the documents that would make that conversation productive. I'm not interested in having a conversation where old allegations are repeated or a shouting match."

"I want to ask specific questions rooted in documents," he added.

Gowdy said he would be "happy to take her in January, February, March, whenever" but that it was up to the panel's Democrats on "how quickly" they get to her testimony.

"I'm willing to work with them on the timing. I'm willing to do it sooner rather than later," Gowdy said. "What I'm not willing to do is do it in a vacuum where I don't have access to the documents."

Cummings disputed that he changed his mind about having Clinton appear.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“That’s not true. I don’t know how he could say that because we’ve never been against it. He asked me to check with her. I did that she said she was willing to come so it was a non-issue,” Cummings said.

“If the committee wants her to come, she’s willing to come,” the Democrat added.

The spat over Clinton’s testimony comes at time of rising partisan tensions on the select committee, with members clashing over how the panel is conducting its investigation.

On the eve of an open hearing Tuesday, Cummings released letters in which he accused Republicans of conducting witness interviews in secret and withholding information from the Democratic members of the panel.

“I am saddened to report today that there are major, major problems with this committee and its work,” Cummings said in his opening statement, adding that its work is moving at a “glacial pace.”

Gowdy fired back that the criticism was “interesting” coming from Democrats, given that they fought the creation of the panel and have repeatedly threatened to boycott its work.

But Gowdy saved most of his ire for the State Department, taking it to task for failing to comply with requests for witness testimony and documents.

“This is not a political exercise for us,” Gowdy said. “We’re going to ratchet it up because I need access to the documents and the witnesses and we need to be able to conclude our work.”

The House created the select committee last May to investigate the 2012 Benghazi attacks. Republicans argue a new probe was needed to explore unanswered questions about the administration’s response to a terrorist assault that killed four Americans, including Ambassador Christopher Stevens.

Democrats have accused the GOP of launching a “witch hunt” against Clinton, and on Tuesday portrayed the panel as a partisan exercise.

“Now, more than ever, I’m convinced that my colleagues are in search of a mythical creature — a unicorn, that is, a made-up conspiracy that does not exist,” said Rep. Linda Sánchez (D-Calif.).

Rep. Adam Smith (D-Wash.) said the Republican majority on the committee made no document requests between May and December, adding that Gowdy’s comments about wrapping up their work “boggles the mind.”

Republicans dismissed the complaints as “ridiculous” and said the five Democrats’ on the panel were hypocrites because they have not suggested any witnesses or requested any documents for the probe.

“The happiness of the Democrats was never my objective in the first place,” Gowdy said after the hearing.

“They’re looking for a reason to leave.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Sarah Stephens" <sarah@democracyinamericas.org>
To: john.podesta@gmail.com
Date: 7/3/2014 11:29:38 AM
Subject: Democracy: Is there an app for that?

Having trouble viewing this message? Click Here

July 3, 2014

Dear Friends:

We are on the cusp of our July 4th holiday here in the U.S., when we remember the revolutionary origins of our country and celebrate our independence with baseball, beer, and displays of fireworks accompanied by a spirited rendition of Tchaikovsky's 1812 Overture.

Because we're eager to finish the work week, we're circulating our Cuba Central News Blast a little early so you can read the news now and all of us can join the party.

We start with Chip Beck , a U.S. citizen with ties to the CIA and the Navy. According to this blog post on Wikistrat, between 1998 and 2001, while he was working as a freelance journalist, Beck traveled to Havana and received significant cooperation from the Cuban government as he investigated the disappearance of Americans in Asia, Africa, and Central America during the Cold War. It's a great story.

In Beck's account of his five trips to the island, he describes familiar sounding offers by Havana to sit down and negotiate with Washington without preconditions, so long as the U.S. recognized Cuba as a sovereign nation. He concludes by quoting a conversation he had on the Malecón with a Cuban he identifies only as a single mom with a college degree.

She said, "If you tell a Cuban what to do, he will do the opposite just to spite you. If you [Americans] stop telling us what to do, things will work out exactly like you want."

Needless to say, this was very good advice which, a dozen years later, we're still waiting for the U.S. government to heed.

Instead, President Obama, the 11th president in charge of foreign relations with Cuba's revolutionary government, pursues the stale and failed policy he inherited from his predecessors. On one track, he has made some important moves to promote two-way travel, family reconciliation, and modest forms of bilateral cooperation. But, on the second track, he aggressively enforces the embargo with its international overreach to shut down Cuba's access to finance and global trade.

As of last week, for example, his Administration had already imposed penalties totaling $4.9 billion against 22 banks for violating U.S. sanctions against doing business with Cuba. That record was shattered by a penalty meted out against BNP Paribas, which pled guilty to two charges, agreed to pay a nearly $9 billion fine, and accepted bans for one and two years respectively on certain dollar clearing and processing activities - all for violations of sanctions against countries including Cuba. This led the Bank of Ireland, which has "long-standing customers with legitimate business interests in Cuba," to tell them it would no longer clear their transactions to or from Cuba, as the Independent reported.

At a time when tens of thousands of Cubans (like our friend Barbara Fernández) are working hard to take advantage of economic reforms - in cooperatives and private businesses - in order to live more prosperous and independent lives, tightening the screws on a policy that disregards their nation's sovereignty and increases their daily struggles makes no sense.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Eric Schmidt, Google's Executive President, who just wrapped up a visit to Cuba during which he voiced support for an open Internet, underscored the contradictory goals of U.S. policy in a blog post about his trip.

> "The 'blockade'," he writes, "makes absolutely no sense to US interests: if you wish the country to modernize the best way to do this is to empower the citizens with smart phones (there are almost none today) and encourage freedom of expression and put information tools into the hands of Cubans directly."

We were in Cuba at the same time as Google and heard Cubans express similar ideas. They want an Internet opening to complement their economic opening. They want workers, especially working women, to be able to get online and connect to their jobs from home. They want a more lively public debate. Just as Cubans are now free to travel overseas, they want to be able to access more information without having to leave. Dumping restrictions - whether on technology, U.S. travel, or finance - imposed by the U.S. would put what Cubans want in greater alignment with the ostensible goals of U.S. policy and help them get it.

Writing about the architects of our nation and their ideals, former Senator Gary Hart described what the Founders saw in history's great republics: civic duty, popular sovereignty, resistance to corruption, and a sense of the commonwealth; what we own in common that binds us together. Every time we visit the island, we see Cubans who share these ideals as well.

July 4th is a great day to celebrate the virtues of our system, which are many, but it can also be an occasion for some humility. In Cuba's case, that means to stop telling them what to do, and showing respect to Cubans and their ability to figure out their future and how they want to live for themselves.

If you need help figuring out why, when we celebrate Independence Day, we set off fireworks to music commemorating Russia's defense of Moscow against Napoleon, listen here .

This week in Cuba news...

Contents

U.S.-CUBA RELATIONS
- Google executives visit Cuba, advocate for Internet freedom
- BNP Paribas to pay $8.97 billion for violating U.S. sanctions against Cuba, Iran, Sudan
- Cuban Americans for Engagement meets with U.S. and Cuban officials
- Cuban drug receives patent in U.S.
- Miami man receives 20-year prison sentence for smuggling Cubans into U.S.

CUBA'S FOREIGN RELATIONS
- Panama court acquits all Chong Chon Gang crew members
- Prosecution in trial of Canadian businessman seeks 15-year prison sentence
- Argentina VP visiting Cuba on investment trip is indicted at home for bribery
- Cuban baseball players may legally play in foreign leagues
- Second round of negotiations between EU and Cuba to take place in August

IN CUBA
- Former editors of Espacio Laical to start new publication
- 88,000 Cuban homes sold in 2013
- Just 50 cars sold in the six months following opening of auto market
- ETECSA to eliminate mandatory minimum payment for cell phone service
- Railway between Havana and Mariel Port begins running

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Recommended Reading

- How Cuba's Gay Rights Activists are Starting a Revolution with One Simple Act , Carolina Drake, World.Mic
- OFAC Gores Red Bull for Skateboarding in Havana , George Murphy and Clif Burns, ExportLawBlog
- Cuba: is foreign investment the future? , Russell White, Latin America Bureau
- Hola Cuba! , Tom Risen, U.S. News & World Report
- Republican Party No Longer Has Tight Grip On Cuban-American Vote, Bill Clinton Says, Serafin Gómez, Fox News Latino
- Illegal, but was it wrong? , Phil Peters, The Cuban Triangle
- The new realities of running a business in Cuba , Jonathan Wolfe, Christian Science Monitor

Recommended Viewing

- Cuban Carmen Jones revives musical theatre on island , Sarah Rainsford, BBC News
- Intriguing Photos of Cuba Show the Country in a New Light , Amanda Gorence, Feature Shoot
- We Said, "No Car Pictures," Kainaz Amaria and David Gilkey, NPR

U.S.-CUBA RELATIONS

Google executives visit Cuba, advocate for Internet freedom

Eric Schmidt, Executive Chairman of Google, and Jared Cohen, Brett Perlmutter, and Dan Keyserling of Google Ideas, traveled to Cuba last week "to promote the virtues of a free and open Internet," Reuters reports. Google Ideas is "a think/do tank that explores how technology can enable people to confront threats in the face of conflict, instability or repression."

The story was first reported on 14ymedio , the new digital journal created by dissident blogger Yoani Sánchez. The story notes that this was the first visit by Google executives to the island and that Schmidt had expressed interest in traveling there in a 2013 interview with the Wall Street Journal .

Yoani Sánchez has collaborated with Google in the past, for example, by visiting Google headquarters and participating in a Google Hangout in October 2013.

State newspaper Granma wrote that "there would be nothing surprising about this news in any other country in the hemisphere." Cubans do not have access to Google's products, such as Google Analytics and the web browser Chrome, because of the U.S. embargo, Granma reports.

As CNN reported, Schmidt reflected on the trip, saying:

> "Our visit confirmed that the government recognizes some of the benefits of increasing access for Cubans, but it has not gone far enough in implementing the policy reforms needed to open the country to the web."

Currently, Internet access in Cuba is limited mostly to the government, as well as foreign companies and hotels, reports Reuters. AFP reports that the only individuals who can access Internet in their homes are doctors, journalists, and others with government authorization.

The Google delegation met with students attending polytechnic schools, toured the University of Information Sciences, and also met with some editors and journalists at 14ymedio, according to 14ymedio.

BNP Paribas to pay $8.97 billion for violating U.S. sanctions against Cuba, Iran, Sudan

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The French bank BNP Paribas, accused of violating U.S. sanctions against Cuba, Iran, and Sudan, agreed on Monday to plead guilty to these charges and pay the U.S. a fine of $8.97 billion, reports Reuters . According to the Wall Street Journal, the almost $9 billion fine is the largest ever imposed for sanctions violations.

Investigators found that sanctions violations, committed by removing the names of illegal clients from wire transfers within the American system, took place from 2002-2012. The New York State regulator, led by Benjamin Lawsky, said in a press release on Monday:

> "Through a series of egregious schemes to evade detection and with the knowledge of multiple senior executives, BNPP employees concealed more than $190 billion in transactions between 2002 and 2012 for clients subject to U.S. sanctions, including Sudan, Iran, and Cuba."

$2.24 billion of the fine will be paid to the New York's Department of Financial Services. The bank pled guilty on Monday to separate charges of conspiracy and falsifying business records. The Wall Street Journal reports that a hearing for BNP Paribas' guilty plea will take place on July 9. BNP is "the seventh bank to settle a criminal sanctions violation case but the first to plead guilty," reports the New York Times .

The bank will be banned for a year, starting in January 2015, from "dollar clearing," or "process[ing] payments in dollar denominations," the New York Times reports. BNP will not be able to "move dollars into or out of the United States" or convert foreign currencies into dollars, reports Foreign Policy , a punishing sanction since the terms of most international trade are in dollars. Furthermore, BNP will fire thirteen employees, including a chief operating officer. No individuals are facing criminal charges.

Cuba Standard reports that "the cost [of this ruling] to Cuba is likely high." It will set back banking in Cuba in several ways, and:

> "Observers believe this will prompt the Cuban government and its business partners to reduce dollar transactions to those impossible to avoid - thus raising transaction costs even more - seek business with banks less vulnerable to U.S. threats, and cause other large western banks to pull out or abstain from doing business with Cuba."

Representative Ileana Ros-Lehtinen (FL-27) praised the results of the investigation in a press release and said that the U.S. should take similar action against other sanctions violators:

> "We can be sure, however, that is just the tip of the iceberg when it comes to banks willing to assist regimes evad[ing] U.S. sanctions. ... This is why the U.S. must make it a priority to enforce the sanctions which we have worked so hard with our partners to create and impose, and continue to impose strict penalties against those who violate them."

Cuba's Ministry of Foreign Relations (MINREX) stated that the U.S. punishment of BNP "qualifies as an illegal and extraterritorial application of U.S. law against a foreign entity." MINREX said further:

> "Once again, the U.S. government ignores the overwhelming international rejection of this criminal and failed policy against our nation. With actions like this one, it also ignores the growing demands of various sectors of U.S. society for a fundamental change in policy toward Cuba."

Cuban Americans for Engagement meets with U.S. and Cuban officials

Cuban Americans for Engagement (CAFE), a group that advocates for improved U.S.-Cuba relations, visited Washington last week, meeting with representatives of both the U.S. and Cuban governments, reports Progreso Semanal .

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

They met with representatives of the U.S. Department of Agriculture about increased agricultural trade with Cuba, and Representatives Joe García (FL-26) and Jim McGovern (MA-2).

At the Cuban Interests Section, the group spoke to Ambassador José Ramón Cabañas, Cuba's Chief of Mission to the U.S., about lowering fees for consular services, making the repatriation process more transparent, allowing widespread and inexpensive Internet access, and encouraging Cuban investment in Cuba.

CAFE board members also met with Scott Gilbert, Alan Gross's lawyer, who reiterated the urgency of Gross's situation and the need for U.S. government action to secure his release.

Cuban drug receives patent in U.S.

Heberprot-P, a drug that helps treat diabetic foot ulcers, has been patented in 30 countries, including the United States, Cuban state news agency ACN reports. The drug was developed by Cuba's Center for Genetic Engineering and Biotechnology (CIGB). The patent will last until 2022, ACN says, and CIGB is working on having variants of the drug available before that time.

As recently as late April, the U.S. government had not allowed Heberprot-P to enter the U.S. because of the embargo, even though U.S. groups had been attempting since October 2013 to get special approval for the drug. The Cuba Central News Blast team explored this issue in October 2013.

The other countries in which the drug is patented include: Canada, Argentina, Australia, Singapore, South Korea, South Africa, Russia, China, India, Indonesia, Ukraine, Mexico, Malaysia, Japan, and Cuba.

Miami man receives 20-year prison sentence for smuggling Cubans into U.S.

Antonio Comin, a Miami resident, was sentenced to 20 years in prison for illegally smuggling Cubans into the United States, reports AFP. Comin was originally detained in September 2012, when his boat, holding 21 Cubans, ran out of gas in the middle of the Florida Strait.

In October 2013, the U.S. Department of Justice indicted Comin and eleven others on several smuggling charges. The press release by the Justice Department said that the men were accused of smuggling a total of 69 people into the U.S., from 50 of whom they made a profit. AFP reports that in addition to Comin, seven others so far who faced indictments have been sentenced, with prison terms ranging between 1.5 and eight years.

CUBA'S FOREIGN RELATIONS

Panama court acquits all Chong Chon Gang crew members

On Friday, June 27, the captain and two other officers of the Chong Chon Gang ship were acquitted in a Panama court of charges related to an attempt to transport undeclared weapons from Cuba to North Korea, reports the Associated Press. Panamanian forces seized the North Korean ship in July 2013, finding weapons, including anti-aircraft and missile systems, buried under several tons of Cuban sugar. Find our complete coverage of the Chong Chon Gang incident here and here.

The ruling on Friday, in addition to acquitting the three officers still held in Panama, acquitted the other 32 crewmembers, who were released in February 2014, reports AFP. According to AFP, a court statement said that Judge Carlos Villareal made the decision to acquit all crewmembers involved because the incident "was of international character and outside Panamanian jurisdiction."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Judge Villareal allowed for the return of the more than 200,000 bags of sugar that had been on the boat, reports AFP. He ordered that the weapons remain in the possession of the Panamanian Treasury, reports the Havana Times .

The United Nations (UN) ruled earlier this year that Cuba violated the UN arms embargo on North Korea.

Prosecution in trial of Canadian businessman seeks 15-year prison sentence

Prosecutors in the corruption case against Canadian businessman Cy Tokmakjian, of the Tokmakjian Group transportation company, are seeking a 15-year prison sentence for the defendant, reports Granma . Tokmakjian was arrested in 2011 during Raúl Castro's crackdown on corruption. His trial began in mid-June, as we reported here .

According to the Associated Press , a report on the case in Granma, Cuba's state newspaper, revealed the names of the two other Canadian citizens and over a dozen Cubans involved in the case. The report said prosecutors were seeking the harshest sentence, 20 years, for Nelson Ricardo Labrada Fernández, former Vice Minister of the Ministry of Sugar. The prosecution said it was seeking eight to twelve years for the other Cuban and Canadian Tokmakjian employees and contacts.

The Tokmakjian Group alleges that Tokmakjian's trial was "stacked against him," and that what the Cuban court called corrupt dealings were really legitimate, reports the AP .

Argentina VP visiting Cuba on investment trip is indicted at home for bribery

Amado Boudou, Vice President of Argentina, arrived in Cuba on June 27, the day before Cuba's Foreign Investment Law went into effect, and announced Argentina's interest in investing in Cuban industry, Granma reports. Boudou said that foreign investment would stimulate Cuba's economy and create jobs, which, in turn, would encourage Latin American integration.

While in Cuba, Boudou also met with Manuel Marrero, Minister of Tourism, according to Granma, and Cuba's Vice President, Miguel Díaz-Canel, reports Radio Cadena Agramonte.

Also on Friday, while in Cuba, Boudou was charged with "bribery and conducting business incompatible with public office" by an Argentine federal court, reports the Associated Press . He could face between one and six years in prison, as well as a lifelong ban on holding elective office. Boudou maintains that he is innocent.

Cuban baseball players may legally play in foreign leagues

Cuba is allowing some of its baseball players to sign contracts with foreign leagues in an effort to cut down on defections to the U.S., reports Reuters . In April , we reported that Cuba would raise the salaries of those who remain in-country, and was debating allowing them to play in foreign leagues.

Reuters reports that many Cuban baseball players will likely go to Japan -- Frederich Cepeda and Yulieski Gourriel have already signed contracts with teams in the Nippon Professional League -- and that Cuba will also allow foreign scouts onto the island for the first time. Now, all that prevents Cubans from participating in Major League Baseball in the U.S. is the embargo, Reuters reports.

Second round of negotiations between EU and Cuba to take place in August

Cuba and the European Union (EU) will conduct a second round of negotiations at the end of August as they work toward a bilateral agreement, reports Europa Press . Europa Press citing a "European source" said that the EU and Cuba are working toward "political dialogue, cooperation, and trade."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The first round took place in April during which the two parties agreed to a road map for the negotiations, as the AP reported at the time.

In February , the EU and Cuba began working to establish closer ties. Europa Press says negotiations to reach the cooperation agreement could take between one and two years.

IN CUBA

Former editors of Espacio Laical to start new publication

Roberto Veiga and Lenier González, two former editors of the Catholic magazine Espacio Laical, announced in a public letter on June 30 that they will start a new digital project, entitled Cuba Posible, reports the Havana Times . Veiga and González resigned from Espacio Laical in June , citing divisions that the magazine had created within the Catholic Church.

Veiga and González wrote that Cuba Posible would address "the practice of human dignity by every compatriot through the responsible exercise of liberty, equality and solidarity; the development of culture and the education of all citizens; [and] the economic progress of the country."

Veiga and González wrote that they decided to embark on this new project because:

> "We firmly believe that the restoration of trust among Cubans, and between Cuba and the world, and the depolarization of the political field, will open the doors of the future.* Cuba Posible *will work hard to build a better country."

Cuba Posible will be an online publication, reports IPS . In an interview with dissident blogger Yoani Sánchez's online newspaper 14ymedio , Veiga said he hopes to transcend the digital medium:

> "We will facilitate debates, channeling these debates and especially the dialogue, which is where the project can become more than just a digital space. We will encourage dialogue among people in a gathering of friends where civil society can participate, as can Cubans living abroad and foreigners."

The Nuevo Herald reports that Cuba Posible will be independent from the Catholic Church.

88,000 Cuban houses sold in 2013

A study carried out by the Havana Consulting Group finds that home prices in Cuba have dropped slightly since reforms legalized the purchase and sale of houses, and that home sales have significantly increased, reports Café Fuerte . According to the report, in 2013 88,000 homes were sold in Cuba, compared with 45,000 in 2012. The growth in home sales has been influenced by lower prices, as well as the supply created by Cubans who have left the country definitively and, since the sale and purchase of homes was legalized in November 2011, have been able to sell their homes instead of turning them over to the state. The greatest drop in housing prices occurred in the provinces of Matanzas (27.47%), Havana (19.80%), and Cienfuegos (16.04%).

Havana remains Cuba's biggest real estate market with 19% of the country's population and 18% of housing capacity. More than 50% of homes for sale are in Havana. Havana also has the highest average price of homes at 31,157.59 CUC. In Havana, the prices of homes vary greatly by neighborhood, with the most expensive in Playa and Old Havana, and the least expensive across the bay in Regla. Some of the most expensive homes are valued at one million CUC.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Despite growth in sales, Cuba's housing deficit has continued to climb, with an estimated shortage of some 700,000 homes.

Phil Peters explores the ins-and-outs of Cuba's real estate market in a report for the Brookings Institution.

Just 50 cars sold in six months following opening of auto market

In a stark contrast with Cuba's real estate market, only fifty cars and four motorbikes have been sold in Cuba in the past six months following the legalization of such sales, reports the Associated Press . In January , a new law went into effect allowing Cubans to buy vehicles from state dealerships without having to obtain permission from the government beforehand.

The car prices are prohibitive, since the majority of Cubans work state jobs that pay roughly $20 per month. The AP reports that a car that would cost $13,600 in the U.S. costs $42,000 in Cuba, and a car that would cost $53,000 in the U.K. costs $262,000 in Cuba. In January of this year, the announced prices of new cars led to widespread disappointment on the island, because most had been marked up by 400% or more. This disappointment was shared by nearly all sides of Cuban society - as Havana Times reported at the time:

> "On various social networks, a State journalist published calculations that estimate that, to purchase a car, a person would need to save 5,790 full salaries in the course of 482 years, concluding that 'they went off the deep end with these prices - we're going to be the world's laughing stock.'"

There are eleven dealerships selling cars in Cuba, reports Cubadebate . The AP reports that dealerships sell both new and used cars, and that the majority of those purchased are used, as they cost much less.

Profits from the past six months totaled $1.28 million, 75% of which Cuba's government has said will go toward its public transportation system, reports Reuters .

ETECSA to eliminate mandatory minimum payment for cell phone service

Cuba's state telecommunications company, ETECSA, will eliminate the mandatory minimum payment of 5 Convertible Pesos (CUC) for cell phone service starting in November, reports Café Fuerte . Mayra Arevich Marín, president of ETECSA, told Cuba's media Wednesday that she predicts the new measure will increase demand. She also explained:

> "It didn't happen sooner because it was necessary to make a series of investments to assure that when the measure went [into effect] we would have created all of the infrastructure for new lines."

Official statistics indicate that there were 2,104,600 cell phone service customers in Cuba at the close of 2013. That number has grown in the first part of 2014 and is expected to near 3 million by the end of year, reports Café Fuerte.

Railway between Havana and Mariel Port begins running

The construction of a railroad connecting Havana and Mariel Port was completed on Tuesday, July 1, the International Railway Journal reports. The track stretches 65 kilometers and is Cuba's first new railway in over two decades. Trains are currently running on the tracks, but the ceremony for the opening of the railroad will not take place until July 26.

Recommended Reading

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

How Cuba's Gay Rights Activists Are Starting a Revolution With One Simple Act, Carolina Drake, World.Mic

Cubans staged a "kiss-in" as part of the ongoing LGBT rights movement on the island. The piece also gives a short history of LGBT rights in Cuba, describing shifting perceptions.

OFAC Gores Red Bull for Skateboarding in Havana , George Murphy and Clif Burns, ExportLawBlog

ExportLawBlog breaks down OFAC'S case against Red Bull North America, Inc.

Cuba: is foreign investment the future? , Russell White, Latin America Bureau

White analyzes Cuba's new foreign investment law and asks if the legislation will succeed in bolstering investor confidence, or if the "scars" of the past are too "hard to erase."

Hola Cuba! , Tom Risen, U.S. News & World Report

Risen reports on the increased U.S. travel to Cuba, talking to Americas Quarterly editor Chris Sabatini about the importance of people-to-people trips, despite their often rigid structure.

Republican Party No Longer Has Tight Grip On Cuban-American Vote, Bill Clinton Says, Serafin Gómez, Fox News Latino

Gómez reports on Clinton's fundraising speech in Florida, where he referred to Cuban Americans' turn toward the Democratic Party. The Democratic Party needs to get out the Cuban American and Latino vote, the former president says. In June , with the publication of her memoir, former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton expressed her support for lifting the embargo.

Illegal, but was it wrong? , Phil Peters, The Cuban Triangle

Phil Peters focuses on the Cuba-related transactions that resulted in massive penalties this week for French bank BNP Paribas, noting that the prosecutors did not cite commercial activity as threatening "national and hemispheric security," adding: "as a foreign policy matter, for all we know the United States brought this case against a bank that was financing routine imports to Cuba -- food, consumer goods, construction materials, etc."

The new realities of running a business in Cuba , Jonathan Wolfe, Christian Science Monitor

Wolfe highlights the bureaucratic challenges faced by those working in Cuba's newly approved cooperatives and also examines the benefits such as higher wages and more autonomy in business decisions.

Recommended Viewing

Cuban Carmen Jones revives musical theatre on island , Sarah Rainsford, BBC News

Sarah Rainsford reports on how Cuba is reinvigorating the island's once-vibrant musical theatre scene with the performance of a re-imagined version of the Broadway musical Carmen Jones.

Intriguing Photos of Cuba Show the Country in a New Light , Amanda Gorence, Feature Shoot

Photographer Rose Marie Cromwell's striking photos combine "images of everyday Cuban rituals with images that capture the country in new ways, far from the traditional representations photographed over the years."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

We Said, "No Car Pictures" , Kainaz Amaria and David Gilkey, NPR

NPR photographer David Gilkey talks about his experience taking photos in Cuba for last week's special series, "Heirs of the Revolution ." Although he wanted to avoid the stereotypical car photos that surface in any Google search for "Cuba," he found that "Cuba's cars are impossible to ignore." Here, he presents some of the more unique car photos that he wound up taking.

Until next time,

The Cuba Central Team

DONATE NOW THROUGH Network for Good

Like our work? Consider a monthly donation!

The Cuba Central Newsblast is produced by the Center for Democracy in the Americas (CDA). CDA is devoted to changing U.S. policy toward Cuba and the other countries of the Americas by basing our relations on mutual respect, fostering dialogue with those governments and movements with which U.S. policy is at odds, and recognizing positive trends in democracy and governance. For more information, check out the CDA website . You can also like us on Facebook or follow us on Twitter .

© 2014 Center for Democracy in the Americas. All rights reserved.

CUBACENTRAL Center for Democracy IN THE AMERICAS

Forward email

SafeUnsubscribe
This email was sent to john.podesta@gmail.com by sarah@democracyinamericas.org |
Update Profile/Email Address | Instant removal with SafeUnsubscribe ™ |
Privacy Policy .

Trusted Email from Constant Contact FREE
Try it FREE today.

Center for Democracy in the Americas | PO Box 53106 NW | Washington | DC | 20009

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Joshua Dorner" <jdorner@americanprogress.org>
To: bigcampaign@googlegroups.com
Date: 10/6/2010 4:07:56 AM
Subject: [big campaign] Progress Report: The Chamber's Foreign Influence

We're currently preparing a more talking pointsy version of all of this, but this a good comprehensive look at where we're at so far on the Chamber.

Click here for the mobile edition | Problems viewing this email? Click here for the online edition

THE PROGRESS REPORT

October 6, 2010 by Faiz Shakir, Benjamin Armbruster, George Zornick, Zaid Jilani, Alex Seitz-Wald, and Tanya Somanader

Contact Us | Tell-a-Friend | Archives | Permalink | Subscribe to Feed

CORPORATE ETHICS

The Chamber's Foreign Influence

Following the Supreme Court's Citizens United decision in January, the right-wing U.S. Chamber of Commerce has taken record-breaking steps to influence the 2010 midterm elections. Pledging to spend an unprecedented $75 million this year, the Chamber is in the midst of launching one of the largest partisan attack campaigns to defeat Democrats, including candidates like Jack Conway (KY), Sen. Barbara Boxer (CA), Jerry Brown (CA), Rep. Joe Sestak (PA) and Rep. Tom Perriello (VA). Having aired more than 8,000 campaign ads on behalf of GOP Senate candidates alone and having spent 85 percent of its current expenditure on Republicans, the Chamber's spending has "dwarfed every other issue group and most political party candidate committee spending." It is well-established that the Chamber has used dues from corporations like health insurance giant Aetna to try to defeat health care reform, received contributions from bailed-out banks to lobby against Wall Street reform, and solicited funds from Fox News' parent company News Corporation for its election season attack campaign. But a new ThinkProgress investigation reveals that the Chamber is leveraging foreign companies to help fund its activities. Foreign corporations that join the Chamber pay dues that go into the Chamber's general account, which the Chamber then employs to fund its attack campaign. The Chamber "firmly denies the charge, saying its internal accounting rules prevent any foreign money from being used for political purposes." But, as a New York Times editorial notes today, foreign money is fungible, so "it is impossible for an outsider to know whether the group is following its rules." "We want to know what the system is. Basically, they claim they have a system, it's not enough to simply trust them, we need to verify," said Think Progress' Editor-in-Chief Faiz Shakir on MSNBC's

SIGN UP for the Progress Report

Read Our Blog: Think Progress

Features

Under the Radar

Think Fast

BLOG WATCH

Fox News follows all of its personalities on Twitter -- except for Glenn Beck.

The way forward on climate change.

What are you owed for 14 years on death row?

Revisiting the Henry Louis Gates Jr. affair.

Why we can't have nice things.

New health care law

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hardball with Chris Matthews yesterday. While Congressional members and watchdog groups are calling for further investigation into the charges, such campaign actions fall into "something of a regulatory netherworld" leading campaign finance watchdogs, lawyers, and current and former federal officials to believe regulatory agencies like the IRS or the FEC will not examine them closely. Thus, with the Citizens United ruling and the Chamber's abuse of its 501(c)(6) standing, the Chamber is set to use "unlimited money from donors who have no fear of disclosure."

HOW IT WORKS: Under the Federal Election Campaign Act (FECA), it is illegal for "foreign nationals" to "directly or indirectly" contribute, donate, or spend funds in connection with any federal, state, or local election in the U.S. It is also illegal to "solicit, receive or accept contributions or donations from them." The U.S. Chamber of Commerce is a trade association that qualifies as a 501(c)(6) organization which can engage in limited political activity, lobbying, and accept d ues from foreign members. While regular dues from American companies like Aetna or News Corp. can be used for any purpose deemed necessary by the Chamber leadership, 501(c)(6) organizations, like any organization, cannot use foreign funds to advocate for a political candidate or cause. What the ThinkProgress investigation found is that the Chamber has spearheaded efforts "to raise money from foreign corporations, including ones controlled by foreign governments" and funneled that money into its general 501(c)(6) account. Foreign members send money either directly to the U.S. Chambe r or to their country's local American Chamber (AmCham), which then transfers dues payments back to the Chamber's H Street office in Washington, D.C. While the Chamber may claim to have internal controls, foreign funds are fungible and all dues go to the same general account, which is then used to fund the Chamber's political attack campaign. Essentially, as Shakir pointed out , "they're acting as a [Political Action Committee]" which "run[s] ads against political candidates. But the difference here is PACs disclose where they get the money from." The Chamber refuses to disclose its donors.

OUTSIDE PLAYERS: The Chamber has aggressively cultivated foreign business connections to raise significant sums to augment domestic funds in its general account. In 2006, the Chamber created the "U.S.-Bahrain Business Council" (USBBC), a local office of the Chamber's 501(c)(6) trade association to help Bahranian businesses take advantage of the Chamber's "network of government and business relationships in the US and worldwide." Many of the USBBC board members are Bahranian, including B ahrain Martime & Mercantile International, Aluminum Bahrain, and the state-owned Bahrain Petroleum Company. USBBC's membership form explicitly states that foreign-owned firms are welcome and directs applicants to send or wire dues directly to the Chamber. With each USBBC board member contributing at least $10,000 annually, the Chamber of Commerce raises well over $100,000 a year in funds from its operation in Bahrain. The Chamber also operates a "U.S.-India Business Council" (USIBC) in its U.S. headquarters that includes some of India's largest corporations like the state-owned State Bank of India and the ICICI Bank as members. Annual membership dues range from $7,500 to $15,000 or more, and the funds are funneled directly into the literally covers young people.

The House GOP's Pledge to America is unpopular with small minority that have heard of it .

Rep. Pete King (R-NY) has little faith in the U.S. justice system .

DAILY GRILL

"The guy who tried to blow up Times Square with a car bomb was sentenced [in civilian court] to life in prison without parole. Good."
-- Fox News' Bill O'Reilly, 10/05/10, on Fox News

VERSUS

"Last night, Judge Andrew Napolitano put forth on 'The Factor' that the Constitution demands a civilian trial for the terrorists. I think that's hooey."
-- O'Reilly, 11/17/09, on Fox News

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Chamber's 501(c)(6) bank account. The USBIC, which advocates changing American manufacturing policy to help guide U.S companies to India, generates over $200,000 a year in dues from foreign businesses. While foreign "AmChams" operate outside the Chamber's direct sphere, they nonetheless send dues back to the U.S. In the Middle East, for example, the AmCham in Egypt calls itself one of the Chamber's "most active affiliates " and Abu Dhabi AmCham -- which includes a subsidiary of the state-run Abu Dhabi National Oil Company -- claims it is a "dues paying member" of the U.S. Chamber. The AmCham of Russia's relationship to the U.S. Chamber is less clear because many of the dues-paying members are Russian state-run companies, like VTB Bank , and controlled by the Russian government. When asked if members do pay dues, the Russia AmCham membership development manager replied, "Unfortunately, the information that you require is closed for the public ." And in what looks like an attempt to raise money for election from foreign nationals, the Chamber also commissioned former U.S. Ambassador to Singapore and McCain-Palin cam paign aide Frank Lavin to speak before foreign Chamber affiliates to talk about the stakes for the midterm elections. If such solicitation occurred, it would be a clear violation of FECA law.

TRUST AND DON'T VERIFY: Following ThinkProgress' report, Sen. Al Franken (D-MN) wrote to the FEC -- a federal agency that has ironically "been rendered toothless by its Republican members" -- to launch an investigation and insist that foreign companies prove whether their funds had b een used in campaign activities. He also asked the FEC to change its regulations allowing foreign companies that are incorporated in the U.S. to spend on elections. Rep. Tom Perriello (D-VA) also repudiated the funding as "fundamentally un-American and undemocratic" and called on his Republican opponent to denounce the ads. And finding Lavin's actions to amount to "indirectly soliciting contributions from foreign nationals for the use in U.S. elections" thereby violating the FECA law prohibiting anyone "to solicit, accept, or receive" contributions, the public advocacy group M oveOn.org requested the Department of Justice yesterday to launch a criminal investigation. The Chamber, however, has responded to the allegations by claiming it does not use foreign funds for political activities, calling ThinkProgress' report "completely erroneous" and a "partisan" "smear ." But instead of rebutting the actual allegations with evidence, Chamber spokeswoman Tita Freeman offered unverifiable assurances that the Chamber complies "with all applicable law." "We have a system," she said, that ensures AmChams "are not government-controlled entities." But as for addressing whether the AmChams transfer money from government-controlled entities, the Chamber was demonstrably silent. Indeed, as ThinkProgress' Lee Fang noted on MSNBC's Countdown with Keith Olbermann Tuesday, "what's alarming is the Chamber of Commerce hasn't put out any documentation. They haven't proved that there's a firewall. They're just saying, 'hey, trust us.'" What's more, with the Citizen's United decision and the Chamber's successful effort to kill a campaign finance reform bill mandating disclosure, the Chamber could continue to use foreign dues while funding more attack ads against Democrats without ever having to reveal any of its foreign contributors. Still, the Chamber insists that its unverified "system" should be enough to quell concern. As the Washington Monthly's Steve Benen puts it , "there's nothing like vague, terse responses from an already-secretive, conservative lobbying group to set minds at ease."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

THINK FAST

Politico reports that conservative activists are demanding that former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney apologize for passing a health reform law in his state. "I would advise him to acknowledge he made a mistake ," said Brent Bozell, president of the Conservative Victory Committee. Referencing a recent ThinkProgress post, Politico states that Romney's record is causing "a distraction" for the GOP.

Todd Palin fired off an email to Alaska's GOP U.S. Senate candidate Joe Miller, complaining that Miller refused to say whether his wife, Sarah Palin, is qualified to be president. "Sarah put her ass on the line for Joe and yet he can't answer a simple question," Todd Palin said in the email, adding, "Joe, please explain how this endorsement stuff works, is it to be completely one sided[?]"

Joe Miller has revealed this his wife drew unemployment benefits after working as Miller's clerk when he was a federal magistrate in 2002. Miller has argued that such benefits are unconstitutional, but he recently softened his position, saying that payments for unemployment should be entirely under the control of the states .

The Washington Post reports that "half a dozen" well-placed sources reveal that the Afghan Taliban are in high-level talks with Afghan President Hamid Karzai to end the war in Afghanistan. The talks are different from previous ones in that the Afghan Taliban are for the first time authorized to speak for the Quetta Shura, "the Afghan Taliban organization based in Pakistan, and its leader, Mohammad Omar."

This week, both President Bush and Vice President Cheney spoke separately before the Council of Insurance Agents & Brokers in Colorado. Both appearances were closed to the press. The Council is the leading industry voice of commercial insurance agencies and brokerage firms.

A poll shows that voters may like the health care reform bill passed earlier this year, contrary to frequent claims by Republicans and pundits that it's unpopular. The Public Religion Research Institute found that a majority -- 54 percent -- said they would be more likely to support a candidate who voted for health care reform.

Women on Wall Street earn less and have fewer jobs, according to a report by Bloomberg. More than five times as many women then men lost their jobs since July 2007, and their pay has also fallen: they earn only 58.8 cents for every dollar men in the industry earn.

"The House since January 2009 has passed 420 bills that have sat on the Senate shelf," according to a list of legislation given to The Hill. Legislation awaiting Senate action includes "measures to audit the claims fund set up by BP after the Gulf oil spill and legislation to increase screening for diabetes."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And finally: Outwitted by Weekly World News , Fox & Friends fell for a false story published by the tabloid, reporting as true that the Los Angeles police department was planning to purchase 10,000 jetpacks at $100,000 each. Co-host Brian Kilmeade offered the sage advice, "You gotta make up some rules. Because you're going to have jetpacks flying into choppers !" But about 40 minutes later, co-host Steve Doocy corrected the record.

--
You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail dubois.sara@gmail.com with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Gregory Rosalsky" <grosalsky@progressivemediausa.org>
To: bigcampaign@googlegroups.com
Date: 6/16/2008 4:03:31 PM
Subject: [big campaign] Media Monitoring Report - Evening 06/16/08

Main Topics: McCain and Misogynist Clayton Williams, McCan't Rally His Base or the Female Vote

Summary of Shift: Al Gore endorsed Barack Obama this evening. John McCain canceled a scheduled fundraising event today at the home of Clayton Williams, after Williams' past misogynist comments surfaced. Yet McCain refuses to return the $300,000 that Williams helped raise. Only CNN and MSNBC covered this story. McCain is expected to call tomorrow for the repealing of a moratorium on offshore oil drilling. Obama said he will travel to Iraq before the November election. President Bush met with British Prime Minister Gordon Brown, who announced further sanctions against Iran.
Security in Afghanistan is deteriorating because hundreds of imprisoned Taliban members have escaped and taken control o f several villages. The Saudis decided to increase their production of oil. Abdul Qadeer Khan, a Pakistani scientist, is accused of giving nuclear blueprints to Iran and North Korea. The now teenaged Elian Gonzalez has joined Cuba's Youth Communist Union. The DNC is starved for cash as it plans its August convention. Gay marriage is now legal in California and flooding is causing a crisis in the Midwest.

Highlights:
1) McCain cancels fundraiser at Texas misogynist Clayton Williams' home after his controversial comments surface, including a statement comparing rape to bad weather
a. Dana Bash: McCain "campaign fumble" is a "vetting problem" that is part of a pattern that includes Pastors Hagee and Parsley; McCain won't return $300,000 that Williams raised for him
2) Fox News' Cavuto calls out McCain for double talk on domestic oil drilling, Donatelli admits McCain's removal of drilling moratorium "may be a punt, but it's a long punt"
3) MSNBC explores McCain and the female vote
a. On "Hardball": McCain's pro-life record will hurt him with the female vote
b. MSNBC panel discusses McCain's 25 year history voting against women's health issues
c. Brewer on MSNBC: McCain continues to aggressively seek Clinton female voters, yet "polls show they are really lining up behind Barack Obama"
d. Fiorina Touts McCain's Appeal to women, also pushes McDifferent from Bush
4) McCan't Rally His Base
a. CNN's Bill Schneider reveals that "only one-third" of McCain supporters "feel fired up"
b. On "Countdown": McCain's base support and straight talk image are crumbling
5) Jack Cafferty highlights historically bleak odds that face the McCain campaign
6) Fred Thompson expressed his disapproval with the recent Supreme Court decision on Fox News [No Clip]

Clips:

Highlight #1
Dana Bash: McCain's Domestic Oil Exploration Statement Was Made to Cover Up "Campaign Fumble" Involving Fundraiser at Controversial Misogynist Clayton Williams, "Vetting Problem" Part of a Pattern That Includes Hagee and Parsley (CNN 06/16/08 4:05pm)
WOLF BLITZER: John McCain's campaign is grappling today with new evidence that it's vetting process isn't all that it should be. But publicly the all but certain Republican nominee is putting his energy into talking about the energy crisis […] Dana, what was McCain's basic message today?

DANA BASH: You know it was really interesting Wolf. McCain declared himself the underdog today. That's an age-old political move to try to lower expectations but he was also trying to get over his campaign's latest difficulty in avoiding be associated with a controversial figure.

[Beginning of Segment]

BASH: A hastily arranged press conference at his campaign headquarters. John McCain wanted to get in the news with a new idea for voter's pain at the pump: allowing states to drill for oil off-shore.

JOHN MCCAIN: Providing additional incentives for states to permit exploration off their coasts, would be very helpful in the short term, in resolving our energy crisis. That announcement was moved up to try to drive the day's story, not be driven by the day's campaign fumble that McCain had to cancel a Monday fundraiser at the home of Texas Republican Clayton

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Williams after the campaign was questioned about William's controversial comments about women during his 1990 Texas Governors race. Then Williams compared bad weather to rape, saying, "as long at it's inevitable, you might as well lie back and enjoy it."

[Video of Dana Bash asking McCain a question]

BASH: How did it come to pass that you had this fundraiser planned?

MCCAIN: First of all, my people are not aware of a statement that he made 16 or 18 years ago. I've forgotten how many years ago it was.

[Back to Segment]

BASH: But a Lexis-Nexis search for what Williams' is know for in politics, his 1990 Governor's race, comes up with multiple references to his comments about women. It was a big campaign issue because he was running against a woman, Ann Richards.

[Old Footage of Ann Richards]
ANN RICHARDS: When I hear remarks like Clayton Williams made, I don't care whether it's made around a campfire or in a living room or in a formal speech, it indicates a level of thinking that is an embarrassment.

[End Footage]

BASH: Williams is just the latest vetting problem for McCain. Last month McCain rejected endorsements from Pastors John Hagee and Rod Parsley, after months of controversy around their views of Catholics and Muslims.

[…]

BASH: And that fundraiser, originally slated for today will be rescheduled for a new location other than Williams' house later this summer. McCain made clear he won't return $300,000 William's helped raise, saying "those donor are his supporters" and McCain did not answer whether he thinks this will have any impact on his big push Wolf for those women voters. Those women voters, of course, he's trying really hard for, in light of Hillary Clinton's defeat.

Highlight #2
Fox News' Cavuto Calls Out McCain for Double Talk on Domestic Oil Drilling, Donatelli Admits McCain's Removal of Drilling Moratorium "May Be a Punt, But It's a Long Punt" (FNC 06/16/08 4:34pm)
NEIL CAVUTO: Sen John McCain will call tomorrow to lift the moratorium on states that choose to permit exploration off their shores. Carl Cameron, what's going on here?

CARL CAMERON: Sen McCain's gonna go to Texas, the heart of the American oil industry, and deliver a speech that does create some real challenges for him. Over the course of this campaign, Sen McCain has suggested that CEO pay is disproportionate and way out of whack in the oil industry; the oil industries have been profit-taking and gouging consumers. He's even gone so far as to suggest that rising gas prices amount to the equivalent of domestic terrorism, although obviously he was making a sort of hyperbolic political reference there. Tomorrow Sen McCain will make this speech. He will beat up on the oil industry but also offer them some oil branches, olive branches. One of them will be to lift the moratoria—and there's a whole series of them—on offshore drilling around the country. Now, there's a lot of states that do have offshore drilling and have not been eager to increase it. There's an awful lot of states that don't and have absolutely no interest in additional—it's the "not in my backyard" Nimby syndrome. Sen McCain believes that more oil production in the United States is necessary. He is a big, big believer in increasing nuclear energy, as well as renewable fuels. He fancies himself the most green, most environmentally-friendly Republican nominee the GOP's ever seen. So tomorrow he goes to Texas to talk about that, and he's not suggesting that states must drill offshore; he's only saying that by lifting the federal moratorium on new drilling they would have a choice and he'd leave it to them.

CAVUTO: […] So why do so many feel the Straight Talk Express is having it both ways on this drilling issue: drill more at sea but not on land in places like the Everglades or ANWR? Frank Donatelli is a McCain adviser and a deputy chair of the RNC, RNC's no double speak here. That is the part that confuses me. You know: water – fine, have at it, let the states decide, but don't touch the land. Am I reading him right?

FRANK DONATELLI: Well no. I think it's a moderate position. There are many, many different factors that you have to consider. But when it comes to drilling offshore, the key point to make is, number one, there's lots of oil and gas there. Number two, can be reached relatively quickly. And when we're in a […] supply-side crisis like we are, where the price of gasoline continues to go up it seems without end, It seems that going to the outer continental shelf and urging stje tates to participate in this, possibly with financial incentives,is the way to get more oil and gas online in the quickest way possible.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

CAVUTO: But Frank, you know, it confuses a lot of folks who say, well what is it? You're gonna explore for more oil? Well yeah I am but in water, essentially and not on land. And then people scratch their heads and say, well wait a minute, Straight Talk Express, this ain't clear.

DONATELLI: Well, I think it's a question of getting the job done. As I say, most people believe that there's lots of oil and gas supplies off of our shores that could be reached quickly. The other thing to remember is that we now have a federal ban in place, and the first thing that has to be done […] is to get the federal ban lifted. […] Let' s understand that what Sen Obama favors apparently is to allow gas prices to continue to increase and increase. And when McCain is trying to say with his speeches is wait a minute, we've already reached the point where gas prices are far too high. In the short- and medium-term, the best way to counterbalance that is to increase supply and the best way to do that is to allow, under proper circumstances, drilling in the outer continental shelf.

CAVUTO: But it's at the edges, Frank. And I think where most Americans step back and say Barack Obama and John McCain are against drilling in ANWR; they're against drilling in the continental United States. They are against, you know, ripping up the land. That's fine, […] have at it. What isn't clear is whether John McCain' s even short-term solution—for example, removing the federal gas tax; or saying jump-ball have the states decide this and having 50 states or the most affected states on the coast decide how they're gonna handle exploration of oil off of their coasts. […] That's my impression of it. He's just punting. He hasn't decided or said anything of substance.

DONATELLI: Well, it may be a punt but it's a long punt. Because to […] remove the federal ban against drilling off of all of our coast and to hopefully get state participation—and by the way, I think […] $4.50 gas […] has concentrated the minds of maybe some voters and in some cases some legislatures.

CAVUTO: Yeah, but I tell you, it's not in Florida, it's not in California. Under Republican and Democratic governors alike, they've always said no no no no. […] I think the senator knows that if i punt and give back to them, they're gonna just do nothing.

DONATELLI: But again, we haven't had these kind of gas prices before. And we have not had a proposal that the state should possibly be able to share in the royalty revenue in some way. You've got a lot of states hurting for additional revenue. And we have a national crisis here. […] These are extraordinary times. And if we're going to break this cycle of gas prices $4, $5, $6 a barrel, this is a very practical short-term way to do it. Senator Obama is not for it.

CAVUTO: Alright, we shall see. What you say about the states could potentially share in revenue, that could be a real deal-maker. Always good seeing you.

Highlight #3

McCain's Pro-Life Record Will Hurt Him with the Female Vote (MSNBC 06/16/08 05:38pm)

CHRIS MATTHEWS: John McCain continues to speak glowingly about Hillary Clinton in an obvious effort to court Clinton supporters. But are Clinton's women voters so disillusioned by their democratic candidates lost that they are willing to desert their party and go vote for Republican John McCain instead. […] Senator Obama is beating John McCain among women by 19 points, white women by 7 but McCain leads among suburban women by 6. […]

HIEDI HARRIS: […] John McCain's going to have to work really hard to get some of those women over, who are Hillary supporters, to his side.

MATTHEWS: Most voters are women. […] Will most Democratic Women vote Democratic?

AMY GOODMAN: […] It's interesting that we are talking about this today, Monday, which was the scheduled fundraiser for John McCain at the home of the Texas Oilman, Clayton Williams. Who is famous for having compared rape to bad weather saying you just have to lay back and enjoy it. He's also the guy that ran against Anne Richards in 1990 in Texas. And compared her to a cow saying you have to head her, hoof her and drag her through the dirt. Yes, they cancelled the fundraiser but it's very significant. He's very well known for these comments. […]

[…]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

GOODMAN: I think we won't hope if you have policies like John McCain just advocated for on Friday. When the Supreme Court came down with their decision, […] John McCain said he thought it was one of the worst decisions in History. That's very sad. […]

MATTHEWS: Why do you think most women vote Democratic?

HARRIS: A lot of women are very emotional. […]

MATTHEWS: You mean its not hard issues like abortion rights, or social security or minimum wage. Logical reasons?

HARRIS: I don't think most women under 50 care about abortion rights. Because women at that age, […] its always been legal. […]

MATTHEWS: Shouldn't they have a concept of it that if the Supreme Court moves further right and there is no longer a right to have an abortion?

HARRIS: I don't think it's going to change. I don't think no matter who is on the Supreme Court it's going to be over ruled. And the women who are complaining about it the most are too darn old to get pregnant. So I don't think it's a big issue for young ones.

GOODMAN: I think it's a very important issue. And when people learn, and they don't know right now, but especially when women learn about John McCain's record on reproductive rights, that he's 100% against abortion. They are going to be deeply concerned.

[…]

MSNBC Panel Discusses McCain's 25 Year History Against Women's Health Issues (MSNBC 06/16/08 3:52pm)
DAVID SHUSTER: John McCain is trying to win over disappointed Hillary Clinton voters, especially women. But according to a brand new poll by NARAL, the pro-choice organization, independent and republican women are more likely to cross over and vote for Barack Obama, instead of McCain. Obama leads McCain 53 to 40 percent. And this was after respondents were presented with the candidates views on abortion[…] Sabrina, I wonder if you will acknowledge that John McCain's pro-life position means that he's at odds with, essentially, most women on the issue of abortion.

SABRINA SCHAEFFER: Look, what I think is interesting about this is, we're talking about the women's vote and sort of assuming that because women share the same anatomy they're somehow going to share the same political convictions. And I think that's off. It's a little ridiculous to think that way. I'm not sure if this is a done deal for Senator McCain. I think he has to make the case.

SHUSTER: But Sabrina, can you point us to one poll in which a majority of women agreed with the pro-life position?

SCHAEFFER: Right, I don't know. At this point we're five months out of the general election and I think to look at any poll numbers and to take them too seriously at this point is off. I think, especially when we're looking at women who are known to be making their decisions much later in the game, to look at the poll numbers in June, right after when Senator Clinton has dropped out of the race, just doesn't do much good for anybody.

SHUSTER: Alright, Cecile, maybe I'm missing something then. Do you think women will go to John McCain when they hear more about John McCain's position on issues of abortion?

CECILE RICHARDS: Well, actually, I think it's a whole basket of access to affordable health care for women, and I think John McCain has a 25 year record with Planned Parenthood on voting against, he's voted against everything we've supported in terms of making health care more accessible and affordable for women. And I think that as women find that out, they frankly go to Senator Obama. We see in NBC's own poll, I think a 19 point spread of support of Senator Obama over Senator McCain. And again, certainly too, Senator Clinton supporters are seeing her record and Senator Obama's record are very closely aligned, their positions are very closely aligned on women's healthcare issues. And Senator McCain, is frankly, just very out of touch on women's healthcare needs.

SHUSTER: Cecile, I want to ask you if you're a little bit disappointed because, all of which you said is true but, you haven't heard a word about it from Barack Obama. It's almost as if he doesn't want to talk about women's issues right now.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

RICHARDS: Oh, actually, I really disagree. In fact, we at Planned Parenthood, we have a long history of working with Senator Obama on a whole host of women healthcare issues. On affordability, on accessibility of family planning, breast cancer screening, the like. And I think that, certainly now it's a general election you're going to see a big focus on access to affordable health care for women. I think in the primary the candidates positions were very similar. I think when you see the difference between Senator Obama and Senator McCain on these issues, women are going to continue to move to Senator Obama. In particular, independent and republican pro-choice women.

SCHAEFFER: I wanted to point out that the PEW Center for Survey Research just did another survey and they found that abortion is actually on the very bottom of the list in terms of people's top priorities. And I think what we need to remember is that women, like men, are going to be voting on some of the big ticket items. National security and the economy. And I think when people see Senator Obama's record on national security, when they realize he doesn't have any foreign policy experience, that's going to be a liability against him. And when it comes to the economy, especially when we're talking about women who are concerned about their financial security and their security in the work force, they're going to want a president that is not going to be a traditional tax and spend liberal but somebody who's going to help us promote more free market policies.

SHUSTER: […] Clarify for us, is it your position and is it John McCain's position that abortion should be restricted?

SCHAEFFER: You know, I can't speak for Senator McCain. I think that this is, you know, his issues are going to have to, he's going to have to speak to the larger issues that are facing women.

SHUSTER: Then speak for the Independence Women's Forum. Is it your position that abortion should be restricted?

SCHAEFFER: You know I don't actually think that IWFF takes a position on abortion.

[…]

Our focus is actually on economic issues, on education, on school choice, on national security.

RICHARDS: So I'd really love to pick up on this one point, because I think it's important to understand very clearly. Senator McCain has a 25 year history of voting against women health care issues. He has said, publicly, his commitment is to overturn Roe v. Wade. So, it's very clear where he is. I think what's important in Sabrina's mentioning that the economy is an important issue in this election, and Planned Parenthood absolutely agrees. So I believe that women's access to affordable healthcare for themselves and their families is going to be a paramount issue, and that's where I think Senator McCain is found incredibly lacking. It's not only his position on Roe, it's his position against opposing women's family planning access, opposing the programs that support women getting affordable breast cancer screening. This year, he even voted against the program that would have covered children's health insurance. So I think on a whole host of bread-and-butter economic issues that relate to women's health and families health, Senator McCain has a record that's going to really going to cause him problems with women voters.

Brewer on MSNBC: McCain Continues to Aggressively Seek Clinton Female Voters, Yet "Polls Show They Are Really Lining Up Behind Barack Obama" (MSNBC 06/16/08 10:33am) CONTESSA BREWER: […] can John McCain and Barack Obama be decided by Hillary Clinton supporters? McCain is aggressively targeting those very voters, hoping to sway Clinton loyalists who still harbor lingering bitterness towards Barack Obama.
[…]
Emily, what do you make of this strategy by John McCain? He has former HewlettPackard CEO, Carly Fiorina out there, trying to help him gain traction from women.

EMILY HEIL: And a lot of other things too. I mean, he is a ladies man these days! He's on the view, he's hanging out with Ellen Degeneres. You know, Carly Fiorina is everywhere for him. He's talking about how great a candidate Hillary Clinton was. He's really clearly trying to reach out to women voters. And you know, trying to talk to them about issues. But also, trying to engratiate himself with that voting bloc. Clearly, he thinks that's very important and he thinks he can make some gains there.

BREWER: Jonathan, polls show that women are really lining up behind Barack Obama. The only segment of the population that polls show that John McCain is doing really well, is white suburban women. Weren't those women, who may have been supporting a republican candidate anyway?

JONATHAN CAPEHART: Um, possibly. I mean, these possibly, very well be […] first they were the soccer moms and then they became the security moms after 9/11. Those are the voters that Senator Obama and McCain are going to go after rather vigorously. Senator McCain, let me start again. Women supporting Senator McCain, I think we'll see some shifting and some more movement when the two candidates really go at it. Particularly on issues of choice. And the democrats are hoping once women find out Senator McCain's record on choice that they will go in groves over to Senator Obama.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Fiorina Touts McCain's Appeal to Women, Also Pushes McDifferent From Bush (MSNBC 06/16/08 01:07pm)
ANDREA MITCHELL: Why should women turn to John McCain, who for a majority of women in America is on the opposite side of Roe vs. Wade. Also skipped a vote on equal pay, voted against requiring health care plans to cover birth control, voted against family planning programs. These are all majority positions amongst women's groups.

CARLY FIORINA: […] John McCain, […], has a long record on pro-life. On the other hand I know many, many women, some who are pro-life and some that are pro-choice who support John McCain because they are not single-issue voters. […] When we look at important issues like healthcare for example, John McCain proposes that every American be able to choose their health insurance plan from anywhere in the United States, in other words he would inject competition into health Insurance. That's important because for some women health insurance covers Viagra for example but it doesn't cover birth control and competition would provide a choice for many women. […] John McCain's proposal for portable health insurance programs, that is health insurance that individuals own, not the company for whom they are employed is very important to women. Because women are frequently the last hired, the first fired, they are more likely to be self-employed. […]

MITCHELL: Even though Barack Obama has a very big lead nationally among women, in a key cohort, white suburban women, McCain is ahead 44 to 39.

FIORINA: […] A large number of women who were Clinton supporters were open minded enough to listen to John McCain. […]

MITCHELL: One of the drags on McCain, very frankly, is George W. Bush. […]

[Visual of Bush quote]
"I want it to be said about George W. Bush that when he finishes his presidency, he looked in a mirror as a man who did not compromise his core principles for the sake of politics or the Gallup poll or the latest, you know, whatever. You can't lead in this world if you are chasing something as temporary as a popularity poll."

MITCHELL: […] The issue is he might not care about his popularity and he may stick to his principles but it does as a practical matter make it a lot harder for John McCain.

FIORINA: Well this is the number one talking point for the Democratic Party, that John McCain is just like George Bush. They believe it's the strongest argument they have against John McCain. Unfortunately it's just not true. The American people understand John McCain opposed George Bush on global warming and climate change; He opposed George Bush on the issue of Guantanamo Bay, […]

[Mitchell struggles to cut in]

MITCHELL: […] He took a position after the Supreme Court decision last week, praising the descenters, and saying that he agreed with Justice Roberts and the other justices that believe that the writ of Habeas corpus should not be extended to those prisoners.

FIORINA: Well, that is correct but they are different issues. […] We are in essence giving enemy combatants the same rights that we give to American citizens. […]

Highlight #4
CNN's Bill Schneider Reveals "Only One-Third" of McCain Supporters "Feel Fired Up" (CNN 06/16/08 5:00pm)
BILL SCHNEIDER: What we're seeing in this poll is a moral gap, and it's an enormous one. The moral gap in this campaign is huge. Barack Obama supporters are all fired up. Two-thirds of Obama supporters say they are extremely or very enthusiastic about voting for president this year. John McCain supporters, not so much. Only one-third feel fired up. Four years ago, there was almost no difference in enthusiasm between George W. Bush supporters and John Kerry supporters. Everybody was fired up. After 8 years of the Bush presidency, republicans are demoralized. McCain is trying to deal with it. Look at expectations, most voters believe Obama is going to win in November. So are democrats singing, "happy days are here again?" Actually, they're a little worried. Obama's running only a few points ahead of McCain. 42 percent of voters believe Obama's race will make it more difficult for him to get elected. That concern is higher among democrats. Obama also has a problem with seniors. He sometimes sounds like he's leading a youth movement. Republican have been making steady gains with seniors for at least 16 years. McCain now leads Obama by 8 points among voters 65 and older. Obama is trying to deal with it. The greatest generation, the one that lived through the depression and World War II was strongly democratic, they're passing from the political scene. Obama is trying to rally a new generation of democratic voters to replace them.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

McCain's Base Support and Straight Talk Image is Crumbling (MSNBC 06/22/08 08:04pm)
KEITH OLBERMANN: […] Only 52% of Republican primary voters approve of John McCain as their candidate. […] That lack of enthusiasm extending to members of the house and senate. The hill reporting last week that at least 14 Republican members of congress having refused to endorse or publically support Senator McCain. Nearly one dozen others refused to answer the question. […]

[Clip of McCain]

OLBERMANN: […] of the 3200 individuals that gave to Mayor Giuliani and Governor Romney's campaigns, only 113 of them, 3.5% have also since given to Senator McCain. That might explain why McCain was unwilling to say no to any of the money raised by Clayton Williams. […]

{Clip of McCain]

MCCAIN: First of all my people were not aware of a statement that he said 16 or 18 years ago. I've forgotten how many years ago it was. […] The people who contributed were supporters of mine not supporters of his. So when we found out that this was planned there we said no, we'll reschedule it and we'll do it somewhere else and I understand that he's not attending.

OLBERMANN: […] Mr. Williams is not attending, Senator McCain is still planning however to except all the 300,000 dollars […].

RICHARD WOLFFE: […] you cannot separate the man from the money. […] And in this case for John McCain that's built his brand around the idea of straight talk, people want to see him dealing straight, in a straight and honest way with this kind of issue. I'm not sure that in taking the money but rejecting the guy that is necessary a piece of straight talk.

[…]

WOLFFE: This enduring suspicion and mistrust about McCain from big pieces of his own party, its not just the financial backers of people like Giuliani or Romney. But the Bush money machine, which was this formidable enterprise for two election cycles, really has not rallied around John McCain. That's causing him problems now and it looks like it will cause him problems going forward.
[…]

Highlight #5
Jack Cafferty Highlights Historically Bleak Odds That Face the McCain Campaign (CNN 06/16/08 4:30pm)
JACK CAFFERTY: Don't bet on John McCain becoming the next President of the United States. That is the message coming from several presidential scholars and historians. Politico reports, these historians paint a bleak picture for McCain. They also say Barack Obama has the best chance for any democrat perhaps since Roosevelt beat Hoover in 1932. The historians say it should be an overwhelming democratic victory, noting McCain is facing one of the worst political environments for the party in power since World War II. There's also this, only twice in the 20th century has the candidate from the same party from a two-term president go on to win the White House. The last time it happened, in 1988 was when President Bush's dad replaced Ronal Reagan. But remember, Reagan was more than twice as popular as the current president is now.
McCain does have some advantages, including the fact that most people don't see him as a traditional Republican. Also, he could appeal more to moderates than Obama if the public would end up seeing the democrat as far left. And McCain might benefit from left over divisions in the democratic party from the long running primary season. Meanwhile, a new Gallup poll suggests the American people agree with these historians, 52 percent of those surveyed think that Obama will win regardless of who they support. 41 percent say McCain. And the world is weighing in too. A PEW poll, 25,000 people in 24 countries found that in all but two nations people put more faith in Barack Obama than in John McCain to do the right thing when it comes to world affairs. One of the two exceptions, that would be the United States.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

--
Gregory E. Rosalsky
Progressive Media USA
202-609-7691 (office)
707-484-3796 (cell)
GRosalsky@progressivemediausa.org
--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~
You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail ryan@campaigntodefendamerica.org with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.
-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Burns Strider" <burns.strider@americanbridge.org>
To:	CTRFriendsFamily <CTRFriendsFamily@americanbridge.org>
Date:	11/7/2014 1:10:03 AM
Subject:	Correct The Record Friday November 7, 2014 Morning Roundup

Correct The Record Friday November 7, 2014 Morning Roundup:

Headlines:

New York Times: "Midterms, for Clinton Team, Aren't All Gloom"

"Before any campaigning begins, Mrs. Clinton will first embark on a listening tour that echoes what she did first as a candidate for the Senate in New York and then as a freshman senator, gathering ideas and advice from a cross-section of influential people about their concerns."

Politico: "Clinton may put campaign HQ in Westchester"

"Her [Sec. Clinton's] aides are all preparing for a campaign based in New York – and talks about where to set up shop have increasingly focused on Westchester County, according to several people familiar with the discussions."

New York Times blog: The Upshot: "What 2014 Elections Can Tell Us About the 2016 Ones: Not So Much"

"In particular, the widespread Democratic losses weren't a 'repudiation' of Hillary Rodham Clinton (who played a minor role). But despite claims that they actually offer her a useful opportunity to contrast herself with a Republican Congress, she doesn't face a 'great situation' for her prospective 2016 presidential candidacy either."

Bloomberg: "Is Clinton the Biggest Winner or the Biggest Loser of the Midterms?"

"The question creeping onto everyone's mind is: How ought the sages of ClintonLand read the midterm leaves?"

Slate: "What Does It Mean for Hillary?"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"The question for Hillary Clinton's campaign is this: Will voters see her as a singular figure—Hillary—standing against an unpopular Republican Party, or will they see her as just another Democrat against just another Republican?"

Bloomberg: "Post Midterms, the 2016 Presidential Contenders Recalibrate"

"Hillary Clinton hasn't made any major appearances, or even minor ones, but is still the talk of the town. What do the midterms mean for Hillary? One thing we know for sure is that, according to the exit polls, more people thought Clinton would be a bad president than a good president. Paul, Christie and other GOP hopefuls fared worse, but it's another sign that running for president isn't good for your popularity."

New York Times opinion: Timothy Egan, NYT correspondent: "The Big Sleep"

"Clinton would be running for a third term of her husband, the most popular president of the last 20 years and the last Democrat who knew how to win over white people in red states."

MSNBC: "The curse of the Obama coalition"

"One silver lining here for Democrats is that Hillary Clinton tends to do well among working class whites, and thus could make up for some of Obama's major losses among those groups in 2016."

Mediaite: "O'Reilly to GOP: Stop Fighting or Hillary Will Cruise to Victory in 2016"

"He [O'Reilly] warned that if Republicans "continue to fight each other [and] don't compromise," they will lose and Hillary Clinton will glide to victory in 2016."

Washington Free Beacon: "The Biggest Loser"

"The 2014 election was a disaster for Hillary Clinton."

Articles:

New York Times: "Midterms, for Clinton Team, Aren't All Gloom"

By Amy Chozick

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

November 6, 2014

In the coming weeks, Hillary Rodham Clinton will stop delivering paid speeches. She will embark on an unofficial listening tour to gather ideas from the business community, union leaders and others. And she will seek advice from such far-flung advisers as an ad man in Austin, Tex., behind the iconic “Don’t Mess With Texas” campaign and a leading strategist at a Boston-based public affairs consulting firm with ties to the Kennedys.

The Democratic debacle in Tuesday’s midterm elections has put new urgency on Mrs. Clinton’s efforts to create a blueprint for a 2016 presidential candidacy, including exploring White Plains as a possible national headquarters and digesting exit polls to determine what the midterm results could mean for the presidential electoral map.

A number of advisers saw only upside for Mrs. Clinton in the party’s midterm defeats. Before then, opinions had been mixed about when she should form an exploratory committee, the first step toward declaring a presidential candidacy, with some urging her to delay it until late spring.

But over the past few days, a consensus formed among those close to Mrs. Clinton that it is time to accelerate her schedule: She faces pressure to resurrect the Democratic Party, and she is already being scrutinized as the party’s presumptive nominee, so advisers see little reason to delay.

No action will be taken before the Dec. 6 runoff in Louisiana between Senator Mary L. Landrieu, a Democrat and a Clinton friend, and her Republican challenger, Rep. Bill Cassidy, putting the likely date for the establishing an exploratory committee in early next year, said several Clinton advisers who insisted on anonymity in discussing private conversations.

Donors, meanwhile, have already started to discuss a Clinton candidacy, at times barely veiling a giddy excitement.

On Wednesday evening, Ready for Hillary, a “super PAC” that supports her candidacy, sent a fund-raising email. “Now more than ever we need to show Hillary that we’re ready for her to get in this race,” the plea for donations read. “America needs Hillary’s leadership.”

In many ways, Tuesday’s election results clear a path for Mrs. Clinton. The lopsided outcome and conservative tilt makes it less likely she would face an insurgent challenger from the left.

And a Republican-led Senate creates a handy foil for her to run against: Rather than the delicate task of trying to draw a stark contrast with an unpopular president in whose administration she served, her loyalists say, Mrs. Clinton can instead present herself as a pragmatic alternative to what they predict will be an obstructionist Republican Congress.

"Rand Paul and Ted Cruz and their allies in the House" will be "pushing Republican leadership hard," said Geoff Garin, a pollster who succeeded Mark Penn as chief strategist for Mrs. Clinton’s 2008 campaign. "When that happens it will give Hillary Clinton or whoever the Democratic nominee is a better platform to run."

But before any campaigning begins, Mrs. Clinton will first embark on a listening tour that echoes what she did first as a candidate for the Senate in New York and then as a freshman senator, gathering ideas and advice from a cross-section of influential people about their concerns.

“She’ll slow down a bit, get off the radar, get ready for this, and ready includes being a good freshman senator, with a legal pad and lots of conversations,” said one person with direct knowledge of her plans who spoke on condition of anonymity because the plans have not been made public.

Meanwhile, the people around Mrs. Clinton will speed up their efforts to vet potential campaign aides, casually connect with donors and begin to help Mrs. Clinton craft a clearer message, especially on the economy. Although Mrs. Clinton’s midterm campaigning schedule took her to Iowa, Pennsylvania, Colorado, North Carolina and other important 2016 states, she did not spend much time getting to know the specific concerns of voters, something she would need to do ahead of a presidential campaign.

Exit polls from Tuesday are being pored over for signs about what voters’ opinions could mean for Mrs. Clinton’s message and approach. Midterm voters expressed frustration with government, but also economic unease.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“One of the questions for 2016 is: Which of those will 2016 be about? Will it be about the size and cost of government, or will it be about who the economy works for?” Mr. Garin asked. “If it’s an election about who the economy works for, then the Democratic nominee will be in a much better position to win,” he added.

To help Mrs. Clinton do just that, several advisers are already being eyed for senior positions in a potential 2016 campaign. People close to Mrs. Clinton often point to a potential campaign manager in Robby Mook, a 34-year-old operative who managed the campaign for the Clintons’ longtime money man, Gov. Terry McAuliffe of Virginia. In addition to her small personal staff, Mrs. Clinton also receives advice from Minyon Moore, a savvy former White House adviser who works at the Dewey Square Group, a Boston-based consultancy with an office in Washington. A spokeswoman for Dewey Square said the firm has no formal relationship with Mrs. Clinton.

Ms. Moore is close to other potential campaign aides like Guy Cecil, executive director of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee and who previously worked at Dewey Square.

Other advisers are more far-flung. Roy Spence, the Austin advertising executive who helped develop the state’s ubiquitous “Don’t Mess with Texas” anti-littering campaign and who has known the Clintons for decades, is offering advice about image and messaging.

Mrs. Clinton turned to Sean Wilentz, a Princeton professor and presidential historian, for advice on shaping her stump speech ahead of Tuesday’s election. During the 2008 Democratic primary, Professor Wilentz, a longtime Clinton defender, accused Barack Obama’s campaign of “the most outrageous deployment of racial politics since the Willie Horton ad campaign in 1988.”

(A spokesman for Mrs. Clinton declined to comment, and Mr. Spence and Professor Wilentz did not respond to requests for comment.)

During the midterm campaign, Mrs. Clinton raised more than $10 million for Democrats, and she and former President Bill Clinton attended at least 75 events on behalf of more than 30 candidates, building and rebuilding the relationships she and her husband are known for.

The Clintons worked hard on behalf of Alison Lundergan Grimes, a candidate for Senate in Kentucky, and Senator Mark Pryor of Arkansas, and were somewhat startled by their double-digit losses. But it was former Gov. Charlie Crist’s loss to Gov. Rick Scott of Florida that carried the biggest implications for a 2016 presidential campaign, as the Clintons had hoped for Democratic leadership in a critical battleground state.

Other Democratic defeats had a silver lining. The Maryland governor’s race in which a Republican, Larry Hogan, defeated the Democrat, Anthony G. Brown, 51.6 percent to 46.9 percent, for example, diminished the likelihood that former Gov. Martin O’Malley, another Democrat, could emerge as a serious primary challenge to Mrs. Clinton.

As the outline for a campaign is drawn, Mrs. Clinton’s supporters describe what they envision as a “New Clinton Map” that they believe could create a winning coalition for 2016, drawing on the white working-class women who have long supported Mrs. Clinton and the young voters and African-Americans who helped elect Mr. Obama.

Politico: “Clinton may put campaign HQ in Westchester”

By Maggie Haberman

November 6, 2014, 3:51 p.m. EST

Hillary Clinton has yet to say for certain whether she’ll run for president, or for that matter who her campaign manager or what her message would be.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But this much she has settled one: if a second presidential campaign happens, it will not be run out of Washington, D.C.

Her aides are all preparing for a campaign based in New York – and talks about where to set up shop have increasingly focused on Westchester County, according to several people familiar with the discussions.

Westchester is Clinton's home county – she lives in Chappaqua, an affluent hamlet north of New York City. Having the campaign there would not just keep it close to Clinton – but it would place it far away from New York City and the hordes of political reporters and elites who live there.

It will be a far cry from Ballston, the Virginia suburb where Clinton's campaign was based in 2008, in a onetime Immigration and Naturalization Services building. While a few of Clinton's advisers at the time wanted her to put her campaign in upstate New York, most of her senior advisers wanted it based near Washington so they wouldn't have to move.

This time, the only question is how far away from Manhattan it will be.

Clinton advisers say no decision has been made about where she will put a campaign, and they continue to insist there is a chance – no matter how small – that she doesn't run.

Still, one group of Clinton insiders has advocated for White Plains, a city in the south-central part of Westchester County replete with office parks. It's more socioeconomically diverse than some other parts of a county best known as a haven for wealthy suburbanites who commute to Manhattan.

"It's close to the city," one Clinton insider explained, adding that it's easily accessible by rail service.

Other sources have said that officials like Westchester because many places there are more than an hour's car ride away from the city.

Brooklyn has also been under discussion for the campaign headquarters, according to people close to Clinton. And Queens and Long Island have also been in the mix.

"We're certainly ready for Hillary Clinton if Hillary Clinton's ready for us,"said Brooklyn Congressman Hakeen Jeffries, a Barack Obama supporter in 2008, who called the borough "one of the coolest… most diverse places on the planet."

But others say that separation from New York City — and proximity to the Clinton household — weigh in favor of Westchester.

"That tendency is to have it close the family house and convenient to them….and [Westchester is] better than the West Side of Manhattan," said James Carville, a longtime Clinton ally. In 1992, Carville said, the family chose Little Rock, Ark. for Bill Clinton's presidential campaign "because that's where they lived."

"It's not about the place, it's about an attitude," Carville, who has provocatively suggested locating the campaign in Buffalo.

That attitude, according to a number of operatives and veterans of past campaigns, is that people are opting to make the campaign their lives. So a less centrally-located headquarters may allow for a more complete focus on the job.

President Obama's campaign aides have often said that being in Chicago in 2008 was crucial to their success. It kept them out of the Beltway feedback loop, kept their staffers focused on the task at hand and stanched the viral spread of gossip from operatives to political reporters.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The same was true for George W. Bush, who chose Austin as a base for his 2000 campaign.

"I'm not saying that lobbyists, hangers on, and special pleaders couldn't find there way to the campaign, but at least they couldn't just walk across the street," said former Bush adviser Mark McKinnon.

"It had a fundamental impact on our entire attitude, our DNA, and the core approach and messaging of the campaign. We were not by, of, or sponsored by Washington. We were from outside the beltway and, therefore, better understood voters and what they wanted."

Being sponsored by New York is not necessarily a selling point for the rest of the nation. Neither is Westchester, a wealthy and fairly homogenous area. But Clinton's advisers believe it's preferable to Washington.

For months, Washington-based operatives have been preparing to move to New York; they just weren't sure exactly where. Even when it isn't explicit, New York as the new center of Democratic political gravity seems to be understood.

For instance, allies of Robby Mook — a potential Clinton campaign manager whose legion of former staffers talk on a "Mook Mafia" listserv and go on vacation together yearly — recently posted that their annual retreat will likely be held in New York next year.

Being in Westchester "would pose some logistical challenges, but look, everything's done these days electronically," said Judith Hope, a longtime friend of the Clintons and a former New York State Democratic Party chair.

"It might be a good thing to do," she added. "And it would be a suburban-based campaign, which wouldn't necessarily be a bad thing."

New York Times blog: The Upshot: "What 2014 Elections Can Tell Us About the 2016 Ones: Not So Much"

By Brendan Nyhan

November 6, 2014

America has again embraced our long history of electoral overreaction. While it's true that Republicans won a major victory at the polls, the results tell us far less about future elections than some commentary has suggested.

In particular, the widespread Democratic losses weren't a "repudiation" of Hillary Rodham Clinton (who played a minor role). But despite claims that they actually offer her a useful opportunity to contrast herself with a Republican Congress, she doesn't face a "great situation" for her prospective 2016 presidential candidacy either.

Historically, midterm results, which are typically unfavorable to the president's party, tell us relatively little about the coming presidential election, as the accompanying chart illustrates. The record shows that the president's party can rebound from major losses to win at the polls in two years. Bill Clinton, for instance, bounced back from the 1994 Republican landslide to easily win re-election in 1996. Similarly, President Obama, whose party suffered major losses in 2010, went on to defeat Mitt Romney in 2012, and George Bush won the 1988 election after Republicans suffered major losses in 1986, President Reagan's sixth year in office.

Candidates from the president's party can also perform poorly immediately after a favorable midterm election. Most notably, Democrats performed unusually well for the party of the incumbent president in 1998, gaining seats in the House and avoiding losses in the Senate in what was seen as a repudiation of the Republican impeachment of Bill Clinton. However, Al Gore significantly underperformed what most forecasting models expected just two years later, winning the popular vote only narrowly (and losing the White House) despite campaigning against the G.O.P. Congress. Similarly, George Bush was soundly defeated by Mr. Clinton just two years after his party lost only one Senate seat.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The reality is that the fundamental factors that dictate presidential elections will again matter in 2016 – principally, the state of the economy in the months before the vote. Mrs. Clinton faces an additional headwind because Democrats have held the presidency for two terms, which seems to reduce incumbent party performance.

From that perspective, party control of Congress is a relatively minor issue for future presidential elections. If the economy is strong, Mrs. Clinton won't need to distance herself from Mr. Obama – she'll be rushing to take credit for the prosperity Democrats have brought to America. If Americans are still feeling pessimistic about wages and jobs, however, she is likely to lose no matter who or what she tries to run against.

A more significant consequence of the recent election results may be the effect it has on the pool of candidates in future campaigns. Wave elections decimate lower-level officeholders on the losing side, depleting a party's ranks and depriving it of possible aspirants for higher office in future races (though some may be able to mount comebacks). Senator George Allen of Virginia, for example, was once thought to be a promising Republican presidential candidate, but lost in 2006 and is now forgotten. By contrast, wave elections can help fuel – or preserve – political careers for the winning party. In 1994, George W. Bush easily defeated the incumbent Democrat, Ann Richards, for the Texas governorship, starting a career in elected office that took him to the White House just six years later.

In this sense, it's far more likely that Gov. Scott Walker of Wisconsin or one of the other G.O.P. candidates who narrowly won on Tuesday will be the ultimate beneficiaries of Tuesday's result, not Mrs. Clinton.

Bloomberg: "Is Clinton the Biggest Winner or the Biggest Loser of the Midterms?"

By Emily Greenhouse

November 6, 2014, 6:11 p.m. EST

[Subtitle:] The answers to that question were surprisingly diverse.

The Republicans won big on Tuesday—or, depending on which part of the bifocals you're peering out of, the Democrats lost bad. President Obama is terribly unpopular, and Americans, on the whole, do not feel their country is going in the right direction—not close. But Obama is done facing national election, and he knows it; he was practically chipper with relief at yesterday's press conference. So the question creeping onto everyone's mind is: How ought the sages of ClintonLand read the midterm leaves?

She's a loser

In the very first hour of the first day after midterms—and therefore to some the very first day of the 2016 campaign—Sen. Rand Paul unleashed this clot of virality, complete with a new hashtag:

[IMAGES OF SEN. PAUL'S #HILLARYSLOSERS]

In his rundown of the Midterm winners and losers, Mark Halperin, the managing editor of Bloomberg Politics, put her squarely in the "Loser" column. Whatever her plan was before, Halperin said, "it's all thrown up in the air because no one expected the result they got. . . The party is now in disarray. Hillary Clinton and her team are so cautious–they overthink, overanalyze everything–this gives them a lot of new complexity to deal with."

She needs a vision

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In The Washington Post, Jennifer Rubin reduced “Clinton’s main selling point [to] her gender identity," then wondered if Clinton would be “as delusional and defiant about the state of the Democratic Party as Obama is.” She added:

As the GOP becomes harder to typecast, it becomes harder to think of Clinton as the future of a major political party and a movement that likes to think of itself as progressive. What exactly is she progressing toward and how is she going to get there?

Yuval Levin took a more overtly aggressive tack, in the National Review, writing that “people are bored of her and feel like she has been talking at them forever.” Levin saw Tuesday’s results as evidence of the Democrats' "overwhelming intellectual exhaustion”—nothing fresh to offer or say. He wrote of Clinton, “She is a dull, grating, inauthentic, over-eager, insipid elitist with ideological blinders yet no particular vision and is likely to be reduced to running on a dubious promise of experience and competence while faking idealism and hope.” Ouch.

At The Atlantic, Peter Beinart used milder terms, but similarly considered the Democratic voter’s hunger for inspiration. “Her gender alone won’t be enough,” he wrote. “She lost to Obama in 2008 in part because she could not overcome her penchant for ultra-cautious, hyper-sanitized, consultant-speak.”

Actually, she is now golden

So Clinton may have to work on energizing and rebranding, but what candidate doesn’t? She sure has the energy—she did 45 campaign events for 26 candidates in 18 states (and Washington, D.C.) in less than two months. It may be her fame and the bath of inevitability around her, but many feel that Hillary’s day has come. A good number of journalists found silver linings for Clinton in Tuesday’s news.

Writing for Politico, Maggie Haberman noted that "Clinton’s major problem was always going to be running as the candidate of the two-term party in power ... But a newly minted Republican Senate helps her to solve the problem of how to run against Washington.”

This logic was found in many pockets online. Rick Ungar, in Forbes, energetically announced that the Republican sweep will “make it easier to let Hillary be Hillary.” He concluded, “Inside the Clinton camp, the results of the 2014 midterms no doubt feel like a large steam valve has been turned, allowing all that left-wing pressure to release and dissipate.” Make no mistake, he said, it is she who emerged on top.

Andrew Romano at Yahoo News followed the same line of thinking, with greater verve and a little more wonk talk. The "easy answer" for 2014 midterm election winner is the Republican Party—but the "long-term winner" is Hillary Clinton. He wrote:

Under the surface, almost everything about last night’s midterm results — and the map, the math and the legislative morass that lies ahead in the run-up to 2016 — suggests that the former first lady and secretary of state could have a better next two years than the party currently guzzling champagne.

He detailed how many seats were likely to open up to the Democrats in 2016, and pointed out that, for Mitch McConnell, who “says he wants to compromise with Democrats, it’s hard to imagine that he’ll be able to control his party’s vehement Just Say No caucus for long.” Fox News took after NewsBusters in running a headline, “Hillary Clinton won the 2014 midterms? That's what Yahoo says,” in which Tim Graham, author of "Collusion: How the Media Stole the 2012 Election and How to Stop Them From Doing It In 2016,” lightly mocked Romano. But mostly he just pasted in paragraphs of Romano’s column, without bothering to add any words by way of disagreement.

One thing is for sure

Competition is necessary for evolution, and the Democratic party, the week proves, certainly needs to evolve. Clintons always survive, but it’s yet to be seen if Hillary Clinton will be the fittest. Inevitability smells stale, especially after Tuesday's shake-up. Her political brand needs spontaneity.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Slate: "What Does It Mean for Hillary?"

By Jamelle Bouie

November 6, 2014, 1:33 p.m. EST

[Subtitle:] The Republicans ran the table on Election Day. What does it mean for the Democrat in waiting?

The night was hardly over before Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul had his take on Tuesday's election results. "I think this election was basically a repudiation of the president, but also Hillary Clinton," he said. "The Democrat [in Kentucky] ran and wouldn't admit that she voted for President Obama. She was very specific—'I am a Clinton Democrat.' "

As political explanations go, this is unusually self-serving. Yes, the Clintons campaigned for Alison Lundergan Grimes, but there's no evidence Kentuckians were voting against Clinton as much as they were voting against Obama. Paul's take is purely a product of his aspirations; he's running for the Republican presidential nomination, and he wants you to think that he's the only one who can take on Hillary Clinton and win. Still, his comment raises a question: What does Tuesday mean for the unofficial—but very real—Clinton campaign?

Writing for Yahoo News, Andrew Romano says that the Republican win is a boon for the presumptive Democratic nominee. Because it's "hard to imagine" soon-to-be Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell "will be able to control his party's vehement Just Say No caucus." In fact, there's a great chance Washington will stay broken, allowing Clinton to "run as the antidote to D.C.'s dysfunction," writes Romano.

On the other side, the National Review says this is nonsense. "Let's get something clear: Watching your party get stomped like a narc at a biker rally in a midterm election is not something that helps a party's presidential frontrunner," writes Jim Geraghty for the conservative magazine. "America is not happy with Washington, and particularly furious with Obama and Democratic governance as a whole."

Both takes get part of the picture right. The new Senate Republican majority is filled with Tea Party politicians—like Joni Ernst of Iowa and Tom Cotton of Arkansas—who have no interest in compromising or even working with the president, much less the Democratic minority. What's more, the most extreme lawmakers—like Sen. Ted Cruz and the hard-right caucus of the House—likely feel vindicated. After two years of obstruction—including a government shutdown and a debt ceiling standoff—they won a huge midterm victory. Why change course? What's the incentive?

In which case, the antics of an irresponsible Republican Congress will burden the eventual Republican presidential nominee, which only helps a Clinton candidacy. At the same time, the Democratic Party is in utter disrepair. Some progressives have comforted themselves by noting the popularity of Democratic ideas: Otherwise conservative states have raised the minimum wage, legalized marijuana, and protected abortion rights from draconian "personhood" laws. But this only highlights the problem with the Democratic brand, which is so unpopular it weighs down candidates who push otherwise popular proposals.

The question for Hillary Clinton's campaign is this: Will voters see her as a singular figure—Hillary—standing against an unpopular Republican Party, or will they see her as just another Democrat against just another Republican? If it's the former, then Tuesday doesn't mean much for her prospective candidacy; voters will see her as Clinton first and a Democrat second, and may even see her ideas as Clinton ideas and not Democratic ones, which could help if she tries to expand the national issue space to include things like universal child care.

If it's the latter, however, then Team Clinton has a new challenge: to turn the Democratic brand into something worth supporting in 2016. But even that comes with the important caveat that presidential candidates have done just fine following a bad midterm year and have failed after a good one. George H.W. Bush won the election after the Republican failure of 1986—the closest analogue to Hillary Clinton's situation—and Al Gore lost it after the Democratic success of 1998.

I should say that there's a third option in all of this: that Tuesday didn't matter at all, and in a way that has nothing to do with Clinton's persona. Put simply, there's a good chance that 2014—like 2010—was driven by the demographics of American politics, in which Republican voters dominate midterm elections, and Democratic voters dominate presidential years. In which case, Clinton doesn't have to worry about 2016 since she won't be speaking to the people who elected a Republican Congress; she'll be speaking to the people who twice elected Barack Obama. And that is a good position to be in.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Bloomberg: "Post Midterms, the 2016 Presidential Contenders Recalibrate"

By Arit John

November 6, 2014, 2:47 p.m. EST

[Subtitle:] Some candidates are already gearing up for 2016, while others are nowhere to be found.

The 2014 midterm elections may be in the books, but for the crop of contenders who hope to be elected president in 2016, the next chapter is already being written. For some that means jumping into campaign mode, for others it means laying low and nursing political wounds, and for Texas Governor Rick Perry it means spending the morning in court.

Here's how the politicians expected to run for their party's nomination have spent their time since Tuesday.

Rand Paul

Republican Kentucky Senator Rand Paul's main goal since the GOP's D-Day has been to tie Democrats' losses not just to Obama, but to favored 2016 nominee Hillary Clinton. "Today, voters sent a message to President Obama and Hillary Clinton, rejecting their policies and many of their candidates," he wrote in a Facebook post late Tuesday called #HillarysLosers. Paul has also said that he would push for tax reform in January.

Paul Ryan

Republican Wisconsin Representative Paul Ryan is the favorite to become the Ways and Means Committee chairman. Given the nature of the job—proposing sometimes unpopular reforms to entitlement programs—it would probably not be helpful to a presidential bid. Like Paul, Ryan also went after Hillary Clinton. During an appearance on the "Hugh Hewitt Show" Thursday, Ryan said that the substantial Democratic loses showed that she could lose in 2016. "It just tells you that she's not inevitable," he said. "I think she's very beatable."

Rick Perry

Not all Republicans are having a great post-election week. After being allowed to miss the first two pretrial hearings, Republican Texas Governor Rick Perry will made his first court appearance on Thursday morning. The governor was indicted in August by an Austin grand jury on abuse of power charges, which his team has called a politically-motivated attack from Democrats. His lawyers will attempt to get the case dismissed on technicalities.

Bernie Sanders

Independent Vermont Senator Bernie Sanders has made it clear that he thinks Americans made a mistake on Tuesday. "I fear that the American people who want change … I think perhaps they have just voted for some folks whose agenda is very different than what they want and need," Sanders said Wednesday during an appearance on CNN. Sanders, also retweeted a link to a statement he released last month, making it clear that he's not going to caucus with Republicans. In the statement, he said he intended to caucus with the party that supports stances like rebuilding infrastructure, raising the wage, pay equity for women and a single-payer health-care system. "I could be wrong," Sanders said, "but my guess is that will not be the Republican Party."

Hillary Clinton

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Clinton hasn't made any major appearances, or even minor ones, but is still the talk of the town. What do the midterms mean for Hillary? One thing we know for sure is that, according to the exit polls, more people thought Clinton would be a bad president than a good president. Paul, Christie and other GOP hopefuls fared worse, but it's another sign that running for president isn't good for your popularity.

Scott Walker

Winning re-election means Republican Wisconsin Governor Scott Walker gets to stay on the 2016 presidential long list. Earlier this year he declined to commit to serving his full term if elected, but on Tuesday night he told the Associated Press that his decision on running "will have to wait [until] long after" he passes the next state budget, which might be next spring.

Mitt Romney

Gov. Mitt Romney @MittRomney: Big tent Republicans win big races. Congratulations. [11/5/14, 10:24 a.m. EST]

Ted Cruz

In an interview with The Daily Beast Tuesday night, Republican Texas Senator Ted Cruz said he was prepared to work with the White House. But on Wednesday he and a few likeminded senators sent a letter to Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, threatening to use "all procedural means necessary" to prevent Obama from following through with his promise to "lawlessly grant amnesty." Cruz, who will likely be the bane of Mitch McConnell's existence, has also repeatedly refused to say whether he supports him for Majority Leader.

Jeb Bush

Jeb Bush released a statement Tuesday night congratulating "Majority Leader Mitch McConnell" on a great night. "Republicans in Congress now have the opportunity–and the responsibility–to demonstrate to American voters that our party can effectively govern," he wrote.

Marco Rubio

Florida Republican Senator Marco Rubio released his own statement, saying he looks "forward to working in a Senate Republican majority to advance the reform agenda I've presented this year." In January the senator released a plan to help families lift themselves out of poverty, which doesn't include raising the minimum wage.

Chris Christie

After visiting 19 states in 5 days to help rally the troops for Republican governors, New Jersey Republican Governor Chris Christie probably took a well-deserved nap. On Wednesday, he has a fancy two-course lunch at the four Seasons Grill Room with a few billionaires.

Bobby Jindal

Louisiana's Republican Governor Bobby Jindal gave a late endorsement on Wednesday to Republican Representative Bill Cassidy, who's heading into a runoff election to try to unseat Democratic Senator Mary Landrieu. "I don't think Mary, anymore, represents Louisiana's values in Washington D.C.," Jindal said of Landrieu.

Martin O'Malley

After watching his second in command lose, Maryland Democratic Governor Martin O'Malley has spent his post-election days being taunted by Governor Christie. The outgoing governor's lieutenant, Anthony Brown, suffered a surprise defeat for governor against Republican Larry Hogan and many saw the race as a referendum on O'Malley, including Christie. "Even for Maryland, it got to be too much," Christie said Wednesday of O'Malley's policies. "That's quite an accomplishment."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Joe Biden

On Wednesday, Vice President Joe Biden and his wife hosted a reception commemorating Breast Cancer Awareness month, but otherwise he has kept a low profile. Given that he predicted on Monday that Democrats would keep the Senate and that Greg Orman would likely caucus with his party, that's probably for the best.

Elizabeth Warren

The general consensus is that unlike Biden, O'Malley and Clinton, Senator Elizabeth Warren, a Massachusetts Democrat and populist hero, backed winners. Her record on the trail (of the 11 candidates she campaigned for, six won and five lost) is decent given the circumstances, and while she's still a "no" on running in 2016, her supporters saw the results as more proof that Democrats need to get with the Warren program.

New York Times opinion: Timothy Egan, NYT correspondent: "The Big Sleep"

By Timothy Egan

November 6, 2014

Maybe it's best to close your eyes and fall into a Rip Van Winkle slumber for the next two years. The party that has refused to govern for half a decade and ran a substance-free campaign will now play at governing and not take up anything of substance.

Of course there will be votes, investigations and intrigue. Having worked tirelessly to make the Senate inert, Mitch McConnell now says he wants it to be relevant again. The man most likely to head the Environment and Public Works Committee, Senator James Inhofe of Oklahoma, would flunk a high school science class. He claims climate change is a huge hoax. The new senator from Iowa, Joni Ernst, vowed to bring at least one thing to the capital. "I have a beautiful little Smith & Wesson 9 millimeter and it goes with me virtually everywhere," she cooed.

Did you vote for that? No, you voted against President Obama. Why? David Letterman had the best line of the campaign. "Take a look at this: Gas under $3 a gallon — gas under $3 a gallon! Unemployment under 6 percent — who ever thought? Stock market breaking records every day. No wonder the guy is so unpopular."

Democrats would not embrace that record, or even try to explain it as a decent start for a country shaken by two decades of income stagnation. And so they were trounced. Where substance was allowed on Tuesday's ballot — minimum wage increases in four red states, gun background checks in a blue state — big majorities did what the new Congress never will.

But enough with the postmortems. On to 2016!

Hill and Jeb. Can we get to it now, and treat the next two years as a fog of fractious do-nothingism that has already passed? Hillary Clinton and Jeb Bush are poised to complete some unfinished business. Bush would be running for the second term of his dad, the now beloved George H.W., and to make everyone forget the two terms of his brother. And Clinton would be running for a third term of her husband, the most popular president of the last 20 years and the last Democrat who knew how to win over white people in red states.

Call it monarchy in a country that got its start by throwing off a king, or a dynasty in a nation that still likes to think of itself as a model of egalitarianism. But a moderate Bush and a problem-solving Clinton are really the only choices. Everyone else is flawed in special ways.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Take Senator Rand Paul, who always manages to look like a guy who just woke up from a long nap and missed a button on his shirt. Sure, he has some of his kooky father's baggage, the 18th-century view of 21st-century issues. But of late, Paul's been trying a little outreach beyond the Republican base of old white Southerners. He thinks our prisons shouldn't be stuffed with drug offenders, predominantly black. He says Republicans should not be passing laws making it harder for the poor, minorities and students to vote. And he says his party's brand "sucks" — his word — in many, many parts of the country.

All of this will get him nowhere, and be replayed in attacks ads, when the Republican presidential primary moves to its whitest of bastions in the South.

We saw a lot of Gov. Chris Christie in the last week of October. If you liked seven days of a red-faced guy shouting "shut up" and "get in line" and medical diagnosis from afar — "She was obviously ill," he said of a healthy nurse — you'll love a Christie presidency. The New Jersey governor demonstrated, again, the character traits we don't want in a president: poor judgment, a temper, pettiness. He's all bombast without even the belly anymore.

Scott Walker, the Wisconsin governor re-elected Tuesday after taking on and taking down organized labor, will be a flavor of the month. That's part of the problem: Scott is personality-free. But more important, an anti-labor candidate will not fare well in old-school blue-collar states like Michigan and Pennsylvania.

Ted Cruz will be around — a microphone, that is. He'll be shadowed by his female doppelgänger, the new Iowa senator, Ernst. His problems are myriad. He loves brinkmanship and shutdowns, but more than that, he really loves himself. Nearly everyone who comes in contact with him in the Senate, no matter the party, can't stand him.

That leaves Jeb Bush, a seemingly sensible nonpartisan. He's for immigration reform, the kind his base despises. If he can get over that hurdle, he's the nominee. And then he'll face one final problem: his name. He is, of course, the younger brother of a man who will long remain on the list of worst presidents. Take it from his mother, the reliably blunt-speaking Barbara Bush, last of the flinty New Englanders. The country, she said, has had "enough Bushes" in the White House.

Hillary Clinton, it's yours to lose. You've already started co-opting the progressive flank, making nice with Senator Elizabeth Warren. And yet, Wall Street likes you! The best thing Hillary has going for her right now is what happened in this week's midterms. Republicans will overreach, because they always do, prompting much nostalgia for the days when Stuff Got Done.

Two years is a long time to wait if, say, you are a fan of the New York Jets and believe that professional football teams should get more than one win every now and then. But it's nothing in politics. It's here now. Take a long snooze, and then wake up to 2016.

MSNBC: "The curse of the Obama coalition"

By Alex Seitz-Wald and Trymaine Lee

November 6, 2014, 4:40 p.m. EST

Barack Obama's coalition has become a curse for Democrats, in addition to a blessing.

In 2008, running to become the first black president, Obama made history by inspiring Americans who don't typically vote to get to the polls. The problem is that it's difficult to reliably capture that kind of lighting in a bottle on the first Tuesday of November every two years.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

There may be more people in Democrats' "coalition of the ascendant" – young people, minorities, single women and others – than in the GOP grouping, which skews white and male and old. But the Democratic coalition is much more fragile, as Tuesday night's victory proved.

There are lots of important numbers that help explain Democrat's drubbing, but here's the underlying landscape of Tuesday's vote, as well as virtually every other election: There are more conservatives in America. Far more. And they vote in every election, not just in presidential years.

Exit polls from Tuesday night show 37% of voters identify themselves as conservative, compared to just 23% who say they're liberals. About 40%, say they're moderate.

That's consistent with survey data going back decades, and the numbers have held more or less steady over time. In 1996, 20% of Americans said they were liberal and 40% conservative, according to Pew.

Ideological partisans tend to be the most dedicated voters and the ground troops of the party, so Democrats start every election with a deficit here. Lately, Democrats have only overcome that drag with the intensity of a presidential campaign and the inspirational force of a charismatic leader.

"There's basically two Americas – there's midterm America and there's presidential-year America," White House senior adviser Dan Pfeiffer told The Washington Post. "They're almost apples and oranges. The question was, could Obama voters become Democratic voters?"

The answer to that question looks like a resounding "no."

Part of what attracts Democrats to Hillary Clinton 2016 is the groundbreaking possibility of electing the first woman president. But is a reliance on history-making presidential contenders really a sustainable approach?

In North Carolina, which hosted this year's most expensive Senate race, progressives have been trying to create a more durable coalition under the Moral Monday Movement banner.

Rev. William Barber, the president of the North Carolina NAACP and leader of the Moral Monday Movement, is trying to move past the "messiah" politics of the Obama era.

Barber said the task moving forward would be building a wider coalition that isn't simply charged by one charismatic politician, in this case, Obama. "If you're going to change America you've got to break through that," Barber said after a speech and rally the night before the election in Greensboro.

"If you get whites, blacks and women and young people and Latinos to begin to come together and begin to change their language and not be trapped by Democrat versus Republican, liberal versus conservative, but really begin to talk about coming together around five issues," Barber said. He listed among those issues: Poverty and labor rights, educational opportunity, healthcare for all, fairness in the criminal justice system and protecting voting, LGBT, women's rights and immigration reform.

"Those five areas can garner and pull together a different kind of movement and we've seen that right here in North Carolina that does not back away from the race critique but allows people to come together across many, many different lines," he said.

Still, the effort was ultimately unsuccessful in reelecting Sen. Kay Hagan. Even with the most sophisticated and expensive turnout operation ever deployed in a congressional midterm election, Democrats got crushed when the Obama coalition didn't show up.

The electorate skewed along racial and generational lines, very much similar to what happened four and eight years earlier. The drop-off among young voters, who fueled Obama's insurgency in 2008, was particularly pronounced. Nationally, 18-29-year-olds made up only 13% of the electorate this year, while a quarter of voters were seniors, who lean Republican. That's a steep drop from 2012, when 21% of the electorate was young.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Across the country, voters were much older and whiter than they were in 2012, according to William Frey, a demographer with The Brookings Institution who analyzed exit polls and data from Tuesday's election.

Still, Frey said demographic and cyclical factors point to the sweeping Republican victory as more of an "aberration" than a trend indicator.

Frey also said there are a few key points to distill from the election data. He said the data suggests less of a referendum on the president than a pattern consistent with a cultural and generation gap, where older whites are resistant to policies associated with a younger, progressive and more diverse America.

In a way, Frey said, North Carolina even in this Democratic loss, is a sign that the Democratic coalition of hardcore whites, young and diverse voters isn't going anywhere – even if it didn't work this time.

"They just didn't turn out. They weren't as interested," he said.

Democrats will have a much better shot during the presidential election in 2016, but Republicans will try to head them off at the pass. "What GOP really won yesterday was a huge opportunity to recast our brand before 2016, when the terrain will swing back toward the Ds," longtime GOP strategist Mike Murphy tweeted.

What Democrats gained among minorities and young people with Obama, they've lost among whites and older voters, who still make up the larger single segments of the voting population. And worse – those demographics are more likely to vote regularly. For instance, Democratic Senate Candidate Bruce Braley was been leading among women by several percentage points in the final polls, but Ernst easily doubled that margin in her lead among men. And in a state that's 95% white, no amount of minority turnout could make up for Braley's 11 point deficit among whites.

One silver lining here for Democrats is that Hillary Clinton tends to do well among working class whites, and thus could make up for some of Obama's major losses among those groups in 2016. But she'll also have to contend with the possibility that blacks won't turn out in the record numbers they did in 2008 and 2012 to vote for an African-American president.

Clinton does have the potential to electrify a diverse coalition if she decides to run. But once again, Democrats may be lurching from one messiah to another.

Mediaite: "O'Reilly to GOP: Stop Fighting or Hillary Will Cruise to Victory in 2016"

By Josh Feldman

November 6, 2014, 8:18 p.m. EST

Bill O'Reilly kicked off tonight's Factor with some advice for Republicans on how to fix the country, and predicted President Obama would be remembered as a "villain" if he vetoes any of it. In order to establish their authority, O'REilly said, Republicans should lower corporate income tax, grant a six month tax amnesty on corporate money so that companies will have a window to bring money back into the U.S., and raise the minimum wage, among other things.

O'Reilly said all of this would bring an immediate boost to the economy and if Obama dares veto any of it, he "will go down in history as a villain."

That being said, O'Reilly did have some cautions for the GOPto keep in mind. For one thing, they shouldn't try to kill Obamacare while there's a president in office who will veto it every time. And he warned that if Republicans "continue to fight each other [and] don't compromise," they will lose and Hillary Clinton will glide to victory in 2016.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Watch the video below, via Fox News:

[VIDEO]

Washington Free Beacon: "The Biggest Loser"

By Matthew Continetti

November 7, 2014, 5:00 a.m. EST

The 2014 election was a disaster for Hillary Clinton. Why? Let us count the ways.

She will have to run against an energetic and motivated Republican Party. If the GOP had failed to capture the Senate, the loss would have been more than demoralizing. It would have led to serious discussion of a third party. Donors would have reconsidered whether their spending was worth the reputational cost. Candidate recruitment efforts would have stalled. Republican voters would have asked why they bother to show up. The Republican circular firing squad, always a problem, wouldn't use conventional weapons. They'd use ICBMs.

Clinton would have loved to capitalize on this scenario. It would have enabled her to prolong strategic decisions such as how and when and to what degree she breaks from Obama. She would have claimed partial credit for saving the Senate. She would have promised to build on Democratic success. You would have been able to see her aura of inevitability for miles.

But she has been denied. Instead she must calculate how to salvage the wreckage of 2014. She must convince Democrats that their savior is a grandmother who lives in a mansion on Massachusetts Avenue. It is her party that is shell shocked, not the GOP. Trust me: You don't want to be in that position.

The results also showed that the electorate looks forward rather than backward. Clinton's 2016 argument will be based in part on recollection. Her message: If you liked the 1990s, the last period of broad-based growth and full employment, put my husband and me back in the White House.

But voters are not retrospective. They judge based on the conditions of the moment. In 2010, Democrats tarred Rob Portman as a former Bush official. In 2014, they tried something similar with congressional candidate Elise Stefanik. Both Portman and Stefanik won.

This year, several candidates ran explicitly as "Clinton Democrats." They tried to associate themselves with fond and gauzy memories of a better time. They lost. Arkansas—the birthplace of Bill Clinton, the test tube of Clintonism—became a GOP stronghold. Tom Cotton defeated Mark Pryor by 17 points. The Clintons' star power, such as it is, was overwhelmed by the Republican wave of discontent and anger at liberal incompetence.

The Clintons aren't gods. They are human beings—extremely, terribly, irredeemably flawed human beings.

Their specialty: Mitigating Democratic losses among whites without college degrees. In 2014, the Clintons couldn't stop the bleeding. Republicans won the white working class by 30 points. And it will be difficult for Hillary Clinton to reduce this deficit over the next two years.

That is because of her problematic position as heir apparent to an unpopular incumbent. Her recent talk of businesses and corporations not creating jobs illustrates the dilemma: She has to identify herself with her husband's legacy in Elizabeth Warren's left-wing Democratic Party, while dissociating herself with the repudiated policies of the president she served as secretary of State. Has Clinton ever demonstrated the political skill necessary to pull off such a trick?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A failed president weighs heavily on his party. He not only drags it down in midterm elections such as 2006, 2010, and 2014. He kills its chances in presidential years. Think Hubert Humphrey. Think John McCain.

The McCain-Clinton comparison is worth considering. Both would be among the oldest presidents in American history. Both are slightly at odds with their party: McCain on campaign finance and immigration, Clinton on corporatism and foreign policy. Both lost the nomination to the presidents they sought to replace. Both campaigned for rare third consecutive presidential terms for their parties in the cycle after those parties lost Congress.

The environment was so hostile to Republicans by the time Election Day 2008 arrived, and the Democrats had so successfully defined themselves in complete opposition to the incumbent, that McCain didn't have a chance. But who in 2006 had predicted that a financial crisis would be the most important issue of 2008? Who in 2012 had the slightest idea that the Islamic State and Ebola and illegal migration would be factors in 2014? Who in 2014 knows with even the faintest degree of certainty what will loom over the electorate on Election Day 2016?

Russia, Iran, Syria, Iraq, North Korea, and al Qaeda are not moving to another planet. The Federal Reserve is not about to acquire the power of prophecy. The business cycle is exactly that—a cycle.

I do know this: Whatever voters are upset about two years from now, they are unlikely to hold it against John Boehner and Mitch McConnell. They are more likely to direct their ire at the president and his party: Hillary Clinton's party.

Do the Democrats begin presidential campaigns with the advantage? Absolutely. The distribution of the population, the composition of the presidential electorate, and the clustering of liberal voters in major metropolitan areas give the party of government a head start in the race to 270 electoral votes. Republicans can win. But, like in 2000 and 2004, it will be close.

What the 2014 results suggest, however, is that the "coalition of the ascendant" that elected and reelected Barack Obama may be more tied to him personally than to a generic Democrat. The panicked racial appeals to motivate black turnout failed not only because conditions are poor, but also because Obama was not on the ballot. The significance of electing the first black president, and then of legitimating his first term, did not apply. Nor will it in 2016, in which voters are likely to once again face a choice between two white people.

A lot will depend on those two candidates. If there was a sure lesson in 2014, it was that candidate performance matters. Colorado, Iowa, and Arkansas are the clearest examples of states where the Democratic Senate candidate became an embarrassment, and his Republican opponent made no unforced errors. The importance of candidates was also the lesson of Virginia, where Ed Gillespie used substance, clever advertising, and a winning personality to come within striking distance of Mark Warner. It was the lesson of New Hampshire, where Scott Brown's reputation as a carpetbagger may have prevented a tenth GOP pickup. And it was the lesson of Maryland, a deep blue state where the Democratic gubernatorial candidate, Anthony Brown, stumped so poorly coming off two terms of Martin O'Malley that partisan and demographic advantages could not save him.

Hillary Clinton is famous, ambitious, methodical, and clever. As I write, she faces no significant challengers for the Democratic nomination. She is the frontrunner to win the 2016 election. But she is not flawless. Her political skills are limited. She says things she later walks back. She represents the past. There are so many skeletons in her family's closets that the skeletons have closets. Her favorable numbers have already returned to Earth, and she will spend the next two years under attack by both Democrats and Republicans.

Faced with a younger, positive, appealing Republican candidate who avoids gaffes and runs not on amnesty and entitlement reform, but on a platform aimed at middle-class families and working-class whites, there is no telling how Hillary Clinton would look, how she would perform, what choices she would make. And if she slips and falls, who's going to rescue her? David Brock?

Calendar:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Sec. Clinton's upcoming appearances as reported online. Not an official schedule.

- November 14 – Little Rock, AR: Sec. Clinton attends picnic for 10th Anniversary of the Clinton Center (NYT)
- November 15 – Little Rock, AR: Sec. Clinton hosts No Ceilings event (NYT)
- November 21 – New York, NY: Sec. Clinton presides over meeting of the Global Alliance for Clean Cookstoves (Bloomberg)
- November 21 – New York, NY: Sec. Clinton is honored by the New York Historical Society (Bloomberg)
- December 1 – New York, NY: Sec. Clinton keynotes a League of Conservation Voters dinner (Politico)
- December 4 – Boston, MA: Sec. Clinton speaks at the Massachusetts Conference for Women (MCFW)
- December 16 – New York, NY: Sec. Clinton honored by Robert F. Kennedy Center for Justice and Human Rights (Politico)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Milia Fisher" <mfisher@hillaryclinton.com>
To: "John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
Date: 9/15/2015 12:11:02 PM
Subject: Andy Spahn Brock flag

Ian and Brian think he's referring to an email that CTR sent. Here's the story.

A Pro-Clinton Super PAC Is Going Negative On Bernie Sanders

The group links Sanders to Venezuela's Hugo Chavez and the United Kingdom's new Labour Party leader, Jeremy Corbyn.

He of Samantha Lachman Staff Reporter, The Huffington Post

He of Ryan Grim Washington Bureau Chief, The Huffington Post

Posted: 09/14/2015 09:59 PM EDT | Edited: 09/14/2015 10:20 PM EDT

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON -- A super PAC backing Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton is going negative, circulating an email that yokes her chief rival Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) to some of the more controversial remarks made by Jeremy Corbyn, the United Kingdom's new Labour Party leader, including his praise for the late Hugo Chavez, the Venezuelan leader who provided discounted fuel to Vermont in a deal supported by Sanders Clinton's camp has long said it has no plans to attack Sanders. But the super PAC, called Correct the Record, departed from its defense of Clinton's record as a former secretary of state in an email Monday that compares Sanders with Corbyn. Correct the Record, led by Clinton ally David Brock, also has sent trackers after Sanders and former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley.

The Democratic candidates have refrained from criticizing each other directly. Sanders has obliquely knocked Clinton for not stating her position on the Keystone XL pipeline, and hasn't made an issue of her use of a private email server and account while at the State Department. Clinton, in turn, almost never mentions Sanders' name and has focused on her Republican rivals.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Monday's Correct the Record email strays from that pattern. The email, sent to a Huffington Post reporter in response to an article about Corbyn and Sanders without any agreement that it would be off the record, was meant to flag Corbyn's "most extreme comments." Among those was the suggestion that the assassination of Osama bin Laden was "a tragedy ," since there was no attempt to arrest the former al Qaeda leader and put him on trial. The email also cites Corbyn's comment that he'd invite his "friends " from Hezbollah to come to the U.K. to discuss peace in the Middle East and an editorial in which he said that the North Atlantic Treaty Organization's "attempt to encircle Russia is one of the big threats of our time."

The email uses those comments to pivot to "similarities" between Corbyn and Sanders, who have engaged in a mild cross-Atlantic love-fest of late, given that they are both insurgent populists challenging their political parties' establishments. Corbyn has said he is following Sanders' campaign "with great interest ," and Sanders said he was "delighted " that the Labour Party elected Corbyn as its leader.

The "similarities" between the two, according to the email, include Sanders' introduction of legislation to terminate the United States' nuclear weapons program, comments that NATO's expansion into former Soviet states is dangerous because it could provoke Russia, opposition to more U.S. funds for NATO, and saying he "was concerned" that proposed new NATO members had shipped arms to Iran and North Korea.

The more serious stretch comes as the email highlights how Sanders helped negotiate a program with Venezuela's national oil company in 2006 that provided discounted heating oil assistance to low-income Vermonters. The senator said it was "not a partisan issue," in the state, which was the sixth to make the deal. His support for the program was apparently enough to merit a mention, since Corbyn has written that the late Venezuelan leader Hugo Chavez's "electoral democratic credentials are beyond reproach ."

Sanders spokesman Michael Briggs wrote in an email to The Huffington Post that Correct the Record was "distorting the record." The Sanders campaign has argued that attacks from Clinton supporters are inspired by anxiety over his leads in polls of Democratic voters in Iowa and New Hampshire.

"It is disappointing that Secretary Clinton's super PAC is spreading disinformation about Bernie," Briggs wrote. "This is exactly the kind of politics that Bernie is trying to change. To equate bringing home heating oil to low-income Vermonters with support for the Chavez government is dishonest."

Only a handful Clinton surrogates have attacked Sanders directly, and it remains to be seen whether the gist of the email from Correct the Record will be fed to anyone other than reporters. If so, the attack would be in the vein of what Sen. Claire McCaskill (D-Mo.) said about Sanders earlier this year -- that he's unelectable, since he's a self-identified democratic socialist.

--
Milia Fisher
Special Assistant to the Chair
Hillary for America
mfisher@hillaryclinton.com
c: 858.395.1741

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Tara McGuinness" <tmcguinness@progressivemediausa.org>
To:	tmcguinness@progressivemediausa.org
Date:	6/27/2008 11:21:44 AM
Subject:	This week June 27, 2008 ? Progressive Media USA Campaign Update
Attachments:	Weekly Update June 27 (2).doc

This week June 27, 2008 – Progressive Media USA Campaign Update

New McCain Campaign Developments . . .

This week, the campaign rolled out a new theme: "Paint Obama as conventional politician who always takes the safe and easy political road, then amplify the distinction by framing McCain as a patriot, somebody who has put sacrifice above self." [Politico , 6/26/08]

McCain launched a new ad touting his plan for energy independence and ending with the tagline, "Putting country first." The ad will air on national cable and key battleground states. [The Page , 6/27/08]

The McCain campaign has begun to hold town halls with "undecided" voters. The campaign is paying Direct Response Group $8,000-10,000 per town hall to develop the guest list of undecideds. Our trackers have not been to get into undecided town halls. [USA Today , 6/24/08]

Progressive Media USA and Partner Activities This Week . . .

Charlie Black Terror Comments

This week, Charlie Black, McCain's top adviser and a former lobbyist, said in an interview with Fortune magazine that another terrorist attack would be politically beneficial to John McCain. We used this opportunity to frame the comments as McCain using a page from the Karl Rove-GOP playbook of fear-and-smear tactics and remind the press of McCain's previous similar statements. We also used Black's comments as an opportunity to remind reporters of Black's many other controversies and that Black is one of 137 lobbyists advising or raising money for McCain.

RESEARCH: Our research team put together a document outlining the McCain campaign's use of fear and the terror card. Among research's find was a McCain web ad from the GOP primaries that used graphic images of terrorism to hit Mitt Romney's foreign policy experience. They also found a quote from 2004, where McCain said that the bin Laden October tape was helpful to Bush.

- 2004: McCain On Bin Laden Tape: "I Think It's Very Helpful To President Bush." According to the Associated Press, "Sen. John McCain, campaigning in southwestern Connecticut on Saturday, said Osama bin Laden's video message to Americans will likely energize President Bush's re-election campaign. 'I think it's very helpful to President Bush… It focuses America's attention on the war on terrorism. I'm not sure if it was intentional or not, but I think it does have an effect." [Associated Press, 10/30/04]

- 2007: McCain Emphasized Bhutto Assassination Would "Enhance" His Foreign Policy Credentials. In the immediate aftermath of the assassination of Benazir Bhutto, the Associated Press reported, "McCain was not so reticent about comparing his experience with that of other GOP contenders. ' My theme has been throughout this campaign that I'm the one with the experience, the knowledge and the judgment. So perhaps it may serve to enhance those credentials to make people understand that I've been to Pakistan, I know Musharraf, I can pick up the phone and call him. I knew Benazir Bhutto.' " [Associated Press, 12/28/07]

Research also put together a document on Charlie Black, including his involvement with campaign smear tactics, like the Jesse Helms "White Hands" ad.

PRESS: The press team gave the research to reporters and got Hotline to write on the McCain web ad. Hotline and Politico also wrote on the 2004 quote.

- "With all the talk of Charlie Black's recent remark in Fortune that a terrorist attack on U.S. soil would ultimately be good for John McCain, we thought we'd remind readers that this was not the first time fear-mongering was employed by the GOPer's team.

  "Remember this Web ad from the GOP primary? The spot -- title ' Experience' -- included graphic footage of a car bombing in making the case for McCain's foreign policy experience over that of rival Mitt Romney:" [Hotline , 6/25/08]

The press team pitched the Black story and got Ari Melber at The Nation to write a lengthy piece on Black.

- "For those who've followed Black's career, this latest ' gaffe' should hardly be surprising. Black has a long history of rough-and-tumble politics, on behalf of some of the most controversial figures in this country and abroad.

  "Black was a protege of the late GOP operative Lee Atwater, who coldly implemented the Republican Party's racially divisive ' Southern strategy .' Both Atwater and Black were longtime advisors to former North Carolina Senator Jesse Helms. In 1990, with Black as his senior advisor (the same position he now holds for McCain), Helms ran this ad against his African- American opponent, Harvey Gantt." [The Nation , 6/25/08]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Partner Activities: NSN released a memo to the press on how McCain and Republicans play politics with terror. The memo also included a PMUS A research document. Move On called on Black to be fired.

- "For the last eight years, George Bush has built power using the politics of fear. Now, J ohn McCain's team is doing the same thing.

  "On Monday, McCain's top adviser, Charlie Black, said that a terrorist attack will help his candidate win the election.[1] This kind of fear- based tactic is straight out of the Bush play book, and it's just plain wrong." [MoveOn email, 6/25/ 08]

Here are examples of the press using our frame:

- "The comments also returned the political spotlight to McCain's advisers and, in particular, to Black, who has drawn criticism for his long lobbying career and his representation of controversial foreign governments. McC ain has been criticized for surrounding himself with top advisers who were lobbyists." [Washington Post , 6/24/08]
- "During the 2004 presidential race, President Bush, Vice President Dick Cheney and other Republicans argued that Democratic nominee J ohn Kerry was soft on terrorism; the argument resonated with voters. The GOP also questioned the Democrats' record on national security in 2002, with White House political adviser Karl Rove saying Republicans should not shy away from citing terrorism concerns as a reason to vote for their party." [Associated Press , 6/23/ 08]

Energy

McC ain once again focused on energy this week. He proposed a $300 million prize for whoever develops a reliable car battery to replace gasoline. He also traveled to Nevada where his stance on Yucca and nuclear power is unpopular.

RESEARCH: Our research team put together a document on McC ain' s true energy priorities, which include billions in tax breaks for big oil companies.

PRES S: We shared research' s energy priorities document with reporters and our environmental partners. On the day McC ain was in Nevada, we sent the Sierra Club a video we found of McCain telling a reporter that he would not be comfortable having nuclear waste travel through Arizona. The Sierra C lub sent out a release about this video.

- "As J ohn McCain travels to Nevada today to raise money and tout his misguided energy proposals, a newly uncovered television interview exposes the Arizona Senator's hypocrisy when it comes to the issue of Yucca Mountain and nuclear waste. McC ain is a major proponent of storing thousands of tons of high- level nuclear waste at the unproven and unsafe Yucca Mountain site and just last week proposed a building 100 new nuclear reactors—a plan that by utilities' own estimates could cost more than $1 TRILLION. Yet, in an interview posted to the YouTube website in May 2007 and uncovered today, McC ain says he would not be comfortable with the waste traveling through his own home state on its way to the proposed Nevada repository." [Sierra C lub release, 6/25/08]

Lobbyists/S pecial Interes ts Dominate Mc C ain T eam

We continue to keep the pressure on McCain' s lobbyists – finding and sharing new research, highlighting McCain' s lobbyists for the press and giving our partners information on how McC ain' s lobbyist connect to their issue area. McC ain' s lobbyist advisers were in the news every day this week and we made sure to share the stories with our partners and other reporters.

Charlie Black, Senior Adviser – Black' s controversy has been documented above.

Rick Davis, C ampaign Manager – On Thursday, The Washington Post did a front page story on Davis' lobbying career and how it has profited from Davis' relationship with McCain.

- "But in the eight years since Davis first managed a McCain campaign, his relationship with the senator has been a lucrative commodity. He and his lobbying firm, Davis Manafort, have earned handsome fees representing clients who need McCain's help in the Senate. He also has made money from a panoply of McCain- related entities, some of which have operated from the upscale riverfront office space that houses his lobbying shop… Their relationship is typical of the symbiotic ties that have c ome to define the culture of the nation's capital." [Washington Post , 6/26/08]

Phil Gramm, Campaign Co- Chair – Gramm came under fire over the weekend for his support of the "Enron Loophole," which Obama proposed closing. Gramm continues to receive scrutiny for his lobbying work for the banking industry while he was helping craft McC ain' s economic policies.

- "Democrats also say that Gramm's post- Senate lobbying activities conflict with McC ain's promise to steer clear of lobbyists in his presidential campaign. And left- leaning critics point at Gramm for turning McCain, a longtime fiscal conservative who voted against President Bush's tax cuts, into a supply- sider who wants to make those tax cuts permanent." [Houston C hronicle , 6/21/08]

Tom Ridge, Campaign Co- C hair - On Tuesday, it was reported that former Homeland Security secretary and McCain co-chair Tom Ridge failed to properly disclose that he was lobbying for the Albanian government.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Guns

Yesterday, the Supreme Court ruled that the D.C. gun ban was unconstitutional. McCain quickly released a very pro-gun statement praising the decision. We made sure reporters writing on McCain's position had our research document on McCain's mixed gun record and how he moved to the right to pander to the conservative base.

- "But McCain has his own checkered history when it comes to the Second Amendment.

  "For years, the NRA considered him one of the 'premier flag carriers for the enemies of the Second Amendment' for his efforts to require background checks at gun shows.

  "McCain's support for background checks was not casual. He appeared in television commercials on behalf of referenda aimed at requiring them. And his efforts to pass a federal law caused the NRA to abandon one of their top priorities -- immunity for gun makers -- rather than have McCain succeed in attaching a gun show amendment to their bill.

  "But since becoming the presumptive GOP nominee, McCain has worked hard to woo his former opponents, appearing at the NRA convention in Kentucky last month and telling it, 'For more than two decades, I've opposed efforts to ban guns, ban ammunition, ban magazines and dismiss gun owners as some kind of fringe group unwelcome in 'modern' America.'" [Washington Post, 6/26/08]

Coordinated Activities with Progressive Partners

National Security Network – In addition to releasing a memo on McCain playing politics with terror, NSN also held a pen-and-pad briefing with reporters to get them up to speed on McCain's true foreign policy record.

Fortune 200 Report – The Center for American Progress Action Fund released a report on Thursday that shows that under McCain's tax plan, the Fortune 200 companies would get $200 billion in tax breaks. CAPAF held a press conference with Senators Durbin, Casey and Klobuchar to release the report.

- "If you're a CEO of one of America's largest corporations and have enjoyed the Presidency of George W. Bush, a contribution to the McCain campaign is looking like a pretty good investment.

  "A new report from the Center For American Progress Action Fund finds that a key piece of John McCain's tax plan —cutting the corporate tax rate from 35% to 25% —would cut taxes by almost $45 billion every year for America's 200 largest corporations as identified by Fortune Magazine." [CAPAF Wonk Room, 6/26/08]

In conjunction with CAPAF's report, Campaign Money Watch released a report that found that the top 200 corporations in America are well represented among McCain's campaign contributors and the lobbyists working to get him elected.

- "Apparently, one of the best investments corporate America could make right now is to make a campaign contribution to John McCain, or to hire one of the many lobbyists working for his campaign," commented David Donnelly, director of Campaign Money Watch. "But regular Americans can't afford to hire a lobbyist like Charlie Black or Rick Davis, or to make a $2,300 contribution. Perhaps that's why McCain's tax plan is so skewed to help corporate America." [Campaign Money Watch release, 6/26/08]

PMUSA also sent reporters and partners a flash report showing that McCain's 137 lobbyist adviser/staff/fundraisers have represented 120 of the Fortune 200 companies.

McCain U – On Monday, CAPAF is hosting McCain U – a briefing for reporters, the Hill and partners on McCain's policies on the economy, health care, foreign policy and energy. Our research team has been working on summary documents on McCain's record on these issues for inclusion in the McCain U packet. Our new media team has been working on videos to show at the briefing.

Sunday Shows – PMUSA prepared research materials on McCain and Pawlenty for Rep. Rahm Emanuel's Sunday show appearance.

In the States

Iowa

Policy Works spent a good deal of time this week figuring out the precise mix of policy and politics that the Des Moines Register requires for opinion editorials to get published. They continue to recruit high level, high quality surrogates and have started efforts to reach farther into the blogosphere of Iowa progressives.

- Clips:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

McCain didn't support GI bill Des Moines Register LTE, June 20, 2008

John McCain is on the wrong side of maverick. The Republican presidential candidate and Vietnam POW opposed bipartisan support for renewal and expansion of the "21st- century GI Bill" that increases educational benefits such as in- state tuition reimbursement and extends coverage to National Guard troops and Reserves. The bill, which was sponsored by Vietnam Marine infantry officer and former Secretary of the Navy, U.S. Sen. Jim Webb, is also supported by 91 percent of Americans. McCain who initially supported the bill said, "One of the things we ought to do is provide significant educational benefits in return for serving." Later, he opposed the measure. Facing opposition from veterans' groups, McCain argued that if government makes college more affordable, people might leave the military rather than re- enlist. Conversely, the Congressional Budget Office calculates that raising the educational benefits as proposed would result in a 16- percent increase in military recruiting. Moreover, McCain lacked the courtesy to show up for the vote, choosing instead to attend a pro- football fundraiser in California. Although the Senate bill passed 7522, McCain should be questioned regarding his alleged devotion to fellow veterans. His opposition to the bill is blatant hypocrisy. - Ellen Ballas, Coralville

New Mexico

Clearly New Mexico is continuing to drive recruitment of Veterans and is pitching a panel to public affairs television shows across the state (General Mel Montano and representatives of the GI Rights Hotline and GI Forum have signed on.) McCain will be in New Mexico on July 12; his finance chair (Ken Zangara) has quite a checkered press and will initiate a media campaign next week to have him removed as McCain's New Mexico Finance Chair.

- Blog:

No Help At All By Matt Brix - Jun 24th, 2008 at 7:24 pm MDT

Over the last week, we here at Clearly New Mexico have registered our disgust with the direction of the debate and the level of rhetoric over American energy policy (link)(link). Billions of dollars in public subsidies for oil and gas companies continue, while productive incentives for renewable energy languish. And, the inane idea of drilling for oil in coastal areas on the outer continental shelf is being billed as a legitimate response to the problem of $4.00 per gallon. The Albuquerque Journal (subscription required) saw fit to ignore reality and jump on the "black gold" bandwagon in its Sunday editorial. Like Congress and the president, the Journal is no help at all for the people of New Mexico. Because the president and his apologists in the press are beating the domestic drilling drum, I thought it might be interesting to find out just what kind of a marginal effect, if any, increased American oil exploration would have. So, I did what any armchair research novice would do; I jumped on Google. My grandiose plans of finding a slick econometric analysis quickly ended when I came across a story on NPR, one that put the nonsense about offshore drilling into simple perspective. Henry Lee of the Kennedy School of Government talks about the 8- 14 year time line for getting outer continental shelf drilling on- line and fully operational. High- end estimates put daily production at about 1 million barrels per day, or less than 1% of the world's daily oil consumption. This is hardly the kind of volume that would make a discernible dent. Plus, with growing needs from China, India and other Asian countries, oil from the outer continental shelf would have virtually zero impact on world demand. (NPR story) There you have it. When it comes to finding a sensible solution to the related crises of skyrocketing fossil fuel costs and global climate change, leaders in Washington are ignoring plain facts. Instead of serving the public interest, leaders in Washington, and our own Albuquerque Journal, are no help at all.

Minnesota

Alliance for a Better Minnesota continues to lead the charge in organizing around the National Republican Convention. Surrogates have been recruited as experts to be featured in earned media reports from the convention. This week ABM also worked on issues surrounding Norm Coleman's ties to lobbyists in DC. ABM also helped us put together research on Gov. Pawlenty to help prep Rep. Emanuel for his Sunday show appearance.

- Blog:

McCain Advisor Says Another Terrorist Attack Would Be "Big Advantage" for McCain

Another great week for McCain, and it's only Monday.

Ohio

It was another busy week for ProgressOhio: first the Bush Bus stopped in three locations and then McCain came to visit Youngstown at the end of the week. Press was generous to both organizing opportunities thanks to ProgressOhio's hard work: clips of McCain's visit often references UAW's objections to his record on free trade and gutting workers' rights and the Bush Legacy Bus clips noted many ways in which conservative policies have failed America.

Clips from McCain's Visit:

McCain talks trade, innovation with auto workers By GLEN JOHNSON – June 27, 2008
While McCain received a respectful welcome from a largely union audience, one employee firmly asked him about trade pacts such as the North American Free Trade Agreement and the Central American Free Trade Agreement - both of which workers believe have triggered job shifts to Canada, Mexico and Central America.

McCain supports the agreements but Democratic rival Barack Obama has threatened to unilaterally re- open NAFTA if labor and environmental concessions are not made.

The worker who asked the question, 37- year- old Raymond Francisco, moved his family to Ohio after GM closed the sport- utility vehicle factory where he worked in Linden, N.J.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"I don't believe that every trade agreement is totally fair, and we do have mechanisms in these agreements where you can bring suit where unfair practices exist," McCain told Francisco. "I would say that if and when we conclude additional free trade agreements, perhaps we could do a better job of setting up and implementing mechanisms that would address unfair or violations, basically, of the free trade agreements that we make."

McCain returns to battered Youngstown area By ANDREW WELSH- HUGGINS , The Associated Press 6/27/ 2008, 1:09 a.m. ET

(AP) —John McCain planned his second visit in three months to the Youngstown area Friday, an economically depressed region cool to the Republican's position on trade and jobs.

[snip]

"Sen. McCain's going to Youngstown, Ohio?" a skeptical Gov. Ted Strickland, who represented the area in Congress, said Thursday. "I could not imagine Sen. McCain could hope to gain political advantage in the Mahoning Valley," said Strickland, a Democrat who backed Hillary Rodham Clinton and now supports Sen. Barack Obama. "I really see nothing in Sen. McCain's economic policies that would have an appeal to the folks in these distressed Ohio communities."

[snip]

Mike Sullivan, retiree chairman for the Lordstown GM plant's United Auto Workers' local, said he hoped McCain wouldn't sway the minds of the union's largely Democratic members. McCain doesn't "have any of the kind of philosophies that are going to help working people," Sullivan said.

McCain to tour Lordstown Complex today

By STEPHEN ORAVECZ, Tribune Chronicle. POSTED: June 27, 2008

Auto workers want GOP presidential candidate John McCain to talk about jobs, trade and health care when he holds a town hall meeting this morning with employees at the General Motors Corp. Lordstown Complex.

Mike Sullivan, chairman of the United Auto Workers Local 1714 retirees, summed it up Thursday in anticipation of the Republican presidential candidate's second visit to the Mahoning Valley. He said, ''We need to have someone who understands the problems of working people.''

Auto workers who took part in a telephone news conference in anticipation of McCain's visit doubt he fits that bill. The UAW has endorsed Democratic candidate Sen. Barack Obama.

Among other things, the auto workers are concerned about McCain's support for free trade agreements and his opposition to increases in the minimum wage, said Dave Green, president of Local 1714. Putting money into the hands of working people ''is essential to our economy,'' he said.

Green said the next president needs to find a way to revive manufacturing in the United States. Training workers for new technology jobs is not enough, he said, because existing trade agreements let those jobs move overseas along with American manufacturing jobs.

Amid criticism from UAW, McCain to stop at GM plant
By Don Shilling, Published:Friday, June 27, 2008

The United Auto Workers, which typically supports Democratic candidates, launched a news release Thursday in advance of McCain' s visit to the car plant.

"McCain is out of touch with working people and their hardships," said Dave Green, president of UAW Local 1714 in Lordstown.

The UAW criticized McCain for supporting the North American Free Trade Agreement and voting against raising the minimum wage.

McCain coming to GM's Lordstown plant to talk about energy policy, push his plan to contain fuel costs

Sabrina Eaton, Plain Dealer Bureau, Friday, June 27, 2008

Leaders of a union that represents the plant' s workers —United Auto Workers Local 1714 —said they disliked McCain' s past opposition to minimum- wage increases and his past support for the North American Free Trade Agreement and other trade pacts that they blame for the decline of U.S. manufacturing jobs.

Union President David Green said he doesn' t expect McCain will gain support from workers at the plant because of that record, although they' ll give him a polite hearing.

"Just because we don' t necessarily agree with his philosophies and ideals doesn' t mean it' s going to be a disrespectful conversation," Green said.

Americans United for Change Bush Bus Clips

Anti- Bush group motors exhibit into Dayton The Bush Legacy Bus will tour 150 cities in effort link John McCain to president's policies. By Lynn Hulsey, Thursday, June 26, 2008

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

DAYTON —An advocacy group brought the Bush Legacy Bus to Dayton on Wednesday, J une 25, the first stop on a five- month, 150- city tour designed to bash President George Bush's record and to paint presumptive Republican presidential nominee Sen. J ohn McCain with the same broad brush.

"It's very powerful to see the timetable and cause and effect of so many of the administration's failed policies," said Marlene Ostrow, 49, who traveled from C incinnati to see the bio- diesel- powered rolling anti- Bush museum at Courthouse S quare in downtown Dayton.

Displays in the bus include timelines, videos and photographs outlining what the advocacy group, Americans United for Change, believes are the Bush Administration's disastrous policies and actions.

Displays covered Iraq, the economy, Hurricane Katrina, health care, workers' rights and education. A large old- fashioned style gas pump sat at the back of the bus, with an electronic display that could determine the annual cost of gas to a consumer. Atop the pump was a round sign with a large "W" in the middle and the words "Bush Cheney Oil," and at the bottom, and one that said "GOP Grand Oil Party."

Asked to react to the group's message, Republican National C ommittee spokeswoman Blair Latoff said, "The last thing Ohioans want or need is a bus full of professional partisans rolling into town and tearing people down. Ohio needs leadership and they are looking for someone like J ohn McC ain who has demonstrated the capability and willingness to work on both sides of the aisle to get things done."

McC ain was targeted along with Bush in speeches by local government officials and union and civil rights leaders. They asked the lunchtime crowd to support Democratic Sen. Barack Obama for president and they took particular aim at gas prices.

McC ain is on the side of "big oil and corporate greed," said Wesley Wells, executive director of the Dayton- Miami Valley AFL- CIO Regional Labor C ouncil.

"I agree with Senator Barack Obama. It's time for change. Don't you agree?" Wells said.

Keith Lander, 45, of Dayton came downtown to see the tour bus and hear the speakers. Given the state of the economy, high gas prices and the war in Iraq, Lander said he doesn't see how anyone could vote for Republicans in the fall. Those that do are "setting themselves up for their own demise," Lander said.

Radio C overage: Left- leaning advocacy group starts nationwide tour in Dayton Americans United for C hange, an issues- driven advocacy group, began a campaign this week called the "Bush Legacy Bus Tour". It's dubbed a "museum on wheels", highlighting what they describe as the failures of the Bush administration over his two terms in office. The courthouse square in Dayton was the first stop on the trip after its launch in Washington, D.C . From member station WYSO, Emily McCord reports.

http://www.statenews.org/media/2008/06/25/11526/11092.ram

Wisconsin

The executive director of One Wisconsin Now was in Washington, DC this week so clips and actions were lighter than we' ve come to expect. However, LTE' s and an adwatch clip on McCain' s energy ad were generated and OWN helped in outreach for SEIU' s Health Care bus. OWN continues to push their petition calling for less breaks for big oil in light of manufacturing plants closing and affecting the economy of Wisconsin.

C lips:

Reality C heck: McC ain Ad On Global Warming
General Election Ad Airs In Wisconsin*, UPDATED: 8:47 pm CDT J une 25, 2008

"Today, (McCain) has a realistic plan that will curb greenhouse gas emissions. A plan that will help grow our economy and protect our environment," the ad says. WISC- TV found that this claim needs clarification. McC ain's plan stems from the Stewardship Act he co- sponsored. The S tewardship Act failed in the S enate in 2003. It would create a so- called "cap and trade" system.

The program would cap emissions, aiming to reduce them by nearly 70 percent by 2050.
It would allow companies to buy, sell or trade their rights to emit gasses like carbon dioxide. So, companies that emit below the cap can sell their allowances not used back to the government... for cash or sell them to companies that want to emit more.

The main argument against McC ain's plan comes from his own party. The headline shown at the beginning of the ad was from the end of May, just before Republicans blocked a vote on a similar bill."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

McCain wrong on health care, says industry union Doug Shore — 6/25/2008 6:24 am

In the coming months, Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Sen. Barack Obama will be traveling across the country attempting to convince voters that they have a plan to improve our nation's health care system. A group of health care advocates will likely cross paths with the presidential candidates as it travels through many key battleground states to bring more attention to the respective plans of the two candidates. "The Road to American Health Care," a national bus tour organized by Service Employees International Union (SEIU), came through Wisconsin Tuesday and held a small rally in the Capitol building. Its primary message: John McCain's health care plan is not going to do anything to control skyrocketing costs of health care.

Blogs:

Beer conflict brewing for McCain Uppity Wisconsin, Posted June 23rd, 2008 by warmmidwest

It's going to be difficult for a large segment of McCain's base to look the other way concerning his family's alcohol fortune and lobbying for distribution of sweet-tasting beer concoctions aimed at the youth markets. "You can't run a beer company out of the White House," said Samuel L. Popkin, a political science professor at UC San Diego. "You can't run any company from the White House. McCain is leaving a live hand grenade on the table, a major embarrassment."

One Wisconsin Now continues to beat the drum over McCain's handouts to big oil:
Reject McCain's Latest Big Oil Handout By Cory @ One Wisconsin Now - Jun 20th, 2008 at 11:28 am EDT

One Wisconsin Now has launched a petition to Wisconsin's Congressional Delegation demanding that they stand against Senator John McCain's plan to giveaway $4 billion in new tax breaks to his friends in Big Oil. In 2006 Bush and McCain supported budget giveaways of $5 billion in tax cuts. This at a time when working people are struggling to pay $4-a-gallon gas prices and Big Oil companies are raking in records profits. One company pocketed as high as $7 billion in only one quarter recently. According to a report from the Capital Times, "The unprecedented rise in gasoline prices helped put 2,600 General Motors employees out of work in Janesville." That plant is scheduled to close as early as the end of 2009. It is pretty clear that the pain at the pump is spreading quickly to many other areas of our economy, especially in working family wallets. Take a moment to sign a petition to your representative in Congress! Tell them to reject the Bush/McCain policies of more tax giveaways to an industry that has devoured so much and given back so little.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Nick Merrill" <nmerrill@hillaryclinton.com>
To: "Adrienne Elrod" <aelrod@hillaryclinton.com>
Date: 4/12/2015 3:43:34 PM
Subject: Re: draft surrogate talkers -- responding to day 1 attacks

Can we draw smiley faces at the top of the page?

Or just give them the attached.*

Kidding, please don't share the attached.

On Sun, Apr 12, 2015 at 9:37 PM, Adrienne Elrod <aelrod@hillaryclinton.com > wrote:

> FYI - our talkers tomorrow already have our positive "the reviews are in" doc. This is just an addendum that is only going to a handful of folks who are going on tv tomorrow
>
> On Sun, Apr 12, 2015 at 9:35 PM, Nick Merrill <nmerrill@hillaryclinton.com > wrote:
>
> > Agree on need for positive stuff. If we're not already let's add the topper but send them all the great stuff we've put together today so that people aren't seeing this in a vacuum.
> >
> > On Sun, Apr 12, 2015 at 9:31 PM, Karen Finney <kfinney@hillaryclinton.com > wrote:
> >
> > > Can we start with a positive line like - despite the overwhelmingly positive response to Hillary's message, the GOP went into attack mode.
> > >
> > > On Sun, Apr 12, 2015 at 9:15 PM, Ian Sams <isams@hillaryclinton.com > wrote:
> > >
> > > > Hey folks. Here are some points we pulled together for surrogates going on TV -- not a wide blast -- on how to respond to day one attacks on HRC. Thoughts? Adrienne/Karen/etc. can get to surrogates once we're all good.
> > > >
> > > > Thanks.
> > > > Ian
> > > >
> > > > OPENING DAY -- SURROGATE TALKING POINTS ON GOP ATTACKS
> > > >
> > > > Today we've seen a wide range of attacks from the entire GOP field and their allies. Below are some points to respond -- keeping the focus on Hillary's desire to focus on voters while the Republicans are trotting out tired attacks on her.
> > > >
> > > > - Republicans can focus on attacking her, but Hillary is focused on meeting voters and having real conversations about issues facing everyday Americans. This is the start of the different kind of campaign that Hillary wants to run -- one that is squarely focused on having a conversation with voters -- answering their questions, asking them questions and sharing ideas.
>
> - Meanwhile, Republicans want to be the champions for those at the top. While Hillary is talking to voters and focused on everyday Americans, every single Republican candidate has offered the same tired attacks and the same economic agenda that Americans know rob them of the stability they've worked so hard for -- with a top-down agenda that would stack the deck even more in favor of those at the top.
>
> - Americans have responded clearly that they appreciate Hillary's focus on their issues and their lives, so if Republicans want to keep their focus on tired political attacks, that's their choice.
>
> If pressed on specific GOP attacks on foreign policy/HRC's record at the State Department, stemming from Jeb Bush's video or other attacks:
>
> Job number one for Hillary as Secretary of State was to restore America's leadership after it was badly eroded by eight years of the Bush administration's foreign policy -- two wars, damaged alliances, diminished moral standing, no stopping Iran's nuclear program, and no action on climate. She's proud of her accomplishments.
>
> - Hillary led the effort to build a worldwide coalition to impose the toughest sanctions in history against the Iranians, which forced them to the negotiating table and gave us our best shot at preventing them from acquiring a nuclear weapon.
> - Hillary brokered a ceasefire between Israel and Hamas in Gaza, which prevented a wider war and protected Israel's security.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- Hillary stood up to Putin by strengthening NATO, encouraging Europe to find alternative sources of energy, and called him out for trying to rebuild the Soviet Empire.
- Hillary worked with President Obama to get every major developing country, including China and India, to agree for the first time to reduce their carbon emissions and be held accountable for it.
- Hillary put internet freedom, LGBT rights, and women's rights on the global agenda, and defending human rights advocates on the frontlines around the world.
- And, of course, she was part of the President's team making the decision to launch the raid against bin Laden.

Jeb Bush may attack Hillary's time as Secretary of State now, but it's just negative politics meant to gin up his Republican base.

- Jeb Bush in 2013: "Former Secretary Clinton has dedicated her life to serving and engaging people across the world in democracy. These efforts as a citizen, an activist, and a leader have earned Secretary Clinton this year's Liberty Medal." [National Constitution Center, 6/27/2013]

Jeb Bush is advocating for the same failed foreign policy that led us to misguided wars and degraded our nation's standing in the world.

- Jeb Bush on George W. Bush: "I will tell you that I'm the only Republican that was in office when he was office as President that never disagreed with him. And I'm not going to start now. Why would I do that now after two years? …I'm not going to start now. It's just – 'til death do us part." [CNN interview]

--
Ian Sams | Rapid Response Associate
Hillary for America
(423) 915-6592 | @IanSams
Gchat: icsams

--
You received this message because you are subscribed to the Google Groups "HRCRapid" group.
To unsubscribe from this group and stop receiving emails from it, send an email to hrcrapid+unsubscribe@googlegroups.com .
To post to this group, send email to hrcrapid@googlegroups.com .
To view this discussion on the web visit https://groups.google.com/d/msgid/hrcrapid/CABd81JJxcSiv95x3%3Duc5H1fSQ5M9CZZ0deNmoNAwM%2BHKiO-p3Q%40mail.gmail.com.
For more options, visit https://groups.google.com/d/optout .

--
You received this message because you are subscribed to the Google Groups "HRCRapid" group.
To unsubscribe from this group and stop receiving emails from it, send an email to hrcrapid+unsubscribe@googlegroups.com .
To post to this group, send email to hrcrapid@googlegroups.com .

To view this discussion on the web visit https://groups.google.com/d/msgid/hrcrapid/CANOiRV9voo87eQ%2B49MXGxRrOM5gUxNkP0nCAL5ybLthiBFQVhA%40mail.gmail.com.

For more options, visit https://groups.google.com/d/optout .

--
You received this message because you are subscribed to the Google Groups "HRCRapid" group.
To unsubscribe from this group and stop receiving emails from it, send an email to hrcrapid+unsubscribe@googlegroups.com .
To post to this group, send email to hrcrapid@googlegroups.com .

To view this discussion on the web visit https://groups.google.com/d/msgid/hrcrapid/CAE_%3DYH9A96%3DBbB_V%2Bc2TuOy_zj4wT64H-ge3x9KHPB77Ob4ZEA%40mail.gmail.com.

For more options, visit https://groups.google.com/d/optout .

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

--

You received this message because you are subscribed to the Google Groups "HRCRapid" group.
To unsubscribe from this group and stop receiving emails from it, send an email to hrcrapid+unsubscribe@googlegroups.com .
To post to this group, send email to hrcrapid@googlegroups.com .
To view this discussion on the web visit https://groups.google.com/d/msgid/hrcrapid/CAE_%3DYH94MjOiM-GeGscqO5Uu1vsJtG0trgu%2BCBmMs9efPea8iQ%40mail.gmail.com.
For more options, visit https://groups.google.com/d/optout .

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Sara DuBois" <sara@progressiveaccountability.org>
To: "Sara Du Bois" <sara@progressiveaccountability.org>
Date: 9/17/2008 1:42:24 AM
Subject: [big campaign] '08 Daily News Clips - 9/17

08 Election Daily News Clips
September 17th, 2008

Candidate Tracking:

All times in Eastern Standard Time

7:30am McCain: Interview on ABC - "Good Morning America"

8am Palin: Fund Raiser in Dayton, OH

1:15pm BUSH: Meets with the President of Panama at the White House

7pm McCain and Palin: Town Hall in Grand Rapids, MI
- Tracking scheduled for this event

7:50pm BUSH: Attends Iftaar dinner with ambassadors and Muslim leaders

9pm Palin: Interview with Fox's "Hannity & Colmes"

News Clips:

MCCAIN ECONOMIC NEWS

McCain Embraces Regulation After Many Years of Opposition (WaPo 9/17/08)
By Michael D. Shear; A01
A decade ago, Sen. John McCain embraced legislation to broadly deregulate the banking and insurance industries, helping to sweep aside a thicket of rules established over decades in favor of a less restricted financial marketplace that proponents said would result in greater economic growth. Now, as the Bush administration scrambles to prevent the collapse of the American International Group (AIG), the nation's largest insurance company, and stabilize a tumultuous Wall Street, the Republican presidential nominee is scrambling to recast himself as a champion of regulation to end "reckless conduct, corruption and unbridled greed" on Wall Street.
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/09/16/AR2008091603732.html?hpid=topnews

McCain Laboring to Hit Right Note on the Economy (NYT 9/17/08)
By MICHAEL COOPER
On Monday morning, as the financial system absorbed one of its biggest shocks in generations, Senator John McCain said, as he had many times before, that he believed the fundamentals of the economy were "strong."
http://www.nytimes.com/2008/09/17/us/politics/17mccain.html?_r=1&em=&pagewanted=print&oref=slogin

Candidates Promise Broad Changes for Wall Street (WSJ 9/17/08)
By NICK TIMIRAOS , ELIZABETH HOLMES i, and MICHAEL M. PHILLIPS
McCain and Obama Have Similar Plans to Address Crisis
http://online.wsj.com/article/SB122161274563645947.html

John McCain tries to recover from comment on 'strong' economy (LA Times 9/17/08)
By Michael Finnegan and Noam N. Levey
The Republican says he does understand voters' concerns about the financial crisis. Barack Obama mocks his rival's grasp of the issue and his resolve to improve regulations.
http://www.latimes.com/news/politics/la-na-campaign17-2008sep17,0,1422335.story

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

McCain calls for Wall Street commission (Politico 9/17/08)
By Mike Allen
He becomes the first presidential nominees to call for a specific response to this weekend's finance crisis.
http://www.politico.com/news/stories/0908/13493.html

McCain, Obama trade heated jabs over the economy (AP 9/17/08)
By TERENCE HUNT and GLEN JOHNSON
John McCain and Barack Obama traded increasingly barbed insults along with prescriptions for the ailing economy Tuesday as financial fears shoved aside lipstick on pigs and every other political issue in a blink with just weeks left in the long presidential campaign.
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/09/16/AR2008091600859_pf.html

McCain Ad: Obama's Economic Solutions "Talk and Taxes" (The Page 9/17/08)
Latest TV spot from the Arizonan accuses Obama of having no real answers to the crisis on Wall Street. "My opponent's only solutions are talk and taxes. I'll reform Wall Street and fix Washington. I've taken on tougher guys than this before." Will be televised nationally. Amount and length of buy TBD.
http://feeds.feedburner.com/~r/time/thepage/ ~3/395138001/
Link to video of ad ("Foundation"): http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=DRg8kaKfLXs

New McCain Ad Addresses Financial Crisis (AP 9/17/08)
John McCain, struggling to strike the right note amid roiling financial markets and a Wall Street restructuring, released a new television ad Wednesday asserting he is the right leader to keep Americans' savings safe in the future.
http://elections.foxnews.com/2008/09/17/new-mccain-ad-addresses-financial-crisis/
Link to video of ad ("Enough is Enough"): http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=x7EbK1RREU4
Link to script: http://thepage.time.com/script-for-mccain-tv-ad-enough-is-enough/

Obama Speaks Directly to Voters on Economy in Two-Minute Ad (The Page 9/17/08)
In straight-to-camera remarks, the Land of Lincolner delivers his assessment of the economy and how he would fix it if he were president. Doesn't mention McCain by name, focuses instead on touting his economic plan and pushing unity. "This isn't just a string of bad luck. The truth is that while you've been living up to your responsibilities Washington has not. That's why we need change." Ad to air starting Wednesday nationally and in battleground states. Amount and length of buy TBD.
http://feeds.feedburner.com/~r/time/thepage/ ~3/395087376/
Link to video of ad ("Plan for Change"): http://my.barackobama.com/page/content/planforchange_ad/
Link to script: http://thepage.time.com/script-for-obama-two-minute-ad/

Analysis: Are economy's fundamentals actually OK? (AP 9/16/08)
By Tom Raum
Unemployment is at a five-year high. Financial firms that withstood the Great Depression are failing. Congress and a lame-duck president are gridlocked. So when John McCain declared that "the fundamentals of our economy are strong," it drew ridicule from Democrat Barack Obama. McCain later toned down his remarks, but his observation reflected a debate among analysts and policymakers about the economy's underlying health. Plenty of them think he's right.
http://www.boston.com/news/politics/2008/articles/2008/09/16/analysis_are_economys_fundamentals_actually_ok?mode=PF

McCain Described The Economy's Fundamentals As 'Strong' At Least 18 Times In 2008 (ThinkProgress 9/16/08)
Yesterday, after two of Wall Street's major banking institutions had just collapsed, Sen. John McCain (R-AZ) declared that he "still" believes "the fundamentals of our economy are strong." As MSNBC's First Read notes today, yesterday was only the most recent occasion that McCain has called the economy's fundamentals "strong" as the economy worsened throughout 2008:
http://thinkprogress.org/2008/09/16/mccain-economy-strong-18/

McCain Gets Both Acronym And Purpose Of SIPC Wrong (Wonk Room 9/16/08)
By Andrew Jakabovics

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Sen. John McCain (R-AZ) demonstrated again today that he was telling the truth about not knowing much about the economy. For a man concerned about protecting the average American from Wall Street greed, he seemed not to know who plays what role.
http://thinkprogress.org/wonkroom/2008/09/16/mccain-sipc-wrong/

MCCAIN NEWS

McCain Able to Skirt Limits of Federal Financing (WaPo 9/17/08)

By Matthew Mosk; A04
...With backing from the Republican National Committee, McCain has taken advantage of loopholes such as "hybrid" television advertisements and joint fundraising committees that may keep him close to financial parity with Obama.
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/09/16/AR2008091603321_pf.html

Hobnobbing Fund-Raisers Undercut Candidates' Talk of Reform (WSJ 9/17/08)

By BRODY MULLINS and GLENN R. SIMPSON
Barack Obama and John McCain both say they want to change Washington as part of their bids to win the White House. But the price of getting close to the candidates seems a lot like business as usual.
http://online.wsj.com/article/SB122161470139346065.html?mod=rss_Politics_And_Policy

McCain has 2 faces: Washington in- and outsider (AP 9/17/08)

By GLEN JOHNSON
John McCain embraces and expels Washington like an accordion player belting out a song. Squeeze in and he touts his vast knowledge of the capital city. Draw out and he casts himself a reformer bent on changing its ways.
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/09/17/AR2008091700257_pf.html

Dems hit McCain on access (Politico 9/17/08)

By: Mike Allen
The Democratic National Committee on Wednesday is launching a "McCain Press Watch" – a counter showing the number of days, minutes and hours since the last news conference by Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.). Currently, it's at 34 days and counting.
http://dyn.politico.com/printstory.cfm?uuid=6FBF9F4C-18FE-70B2-A8BE7D8887C8143F

McCain BlackBerry Easily Connects With Gore Internet (WaPo 9/17/08)

By Michael D. Shear; A04
The campaign of Sen. John McCain wanted to be clear yesterday: The Arizona Republican did not help create the BlackBerry. That message came after McCain's top economic adviser said that the senator had, in fact, helped bring about the handheld device, comments that the campaign later called a "boneheaded joke."
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/09/16/AR2008091603226.html
See Chicago Tribune's "BlackBerry inventor? Odd claim dies quickly": http://www.chicagotribune.com/news/nationworld/chi-berries17sep17,0,2391751.story

Move over, Al Gore: John McCain invented the BlackBerry (LA Times 9/17/08)

Noam N. Levey
A McCain campaign staffer attributes the creation of the technological device to the work of the Senate commerce committee -- of which McCain is a veteran member.
http://www.latimes.com/news/politics/la-na-trailblackberry17-2008sep17,0,7962227.story

Sarah Palin, others don't have heads for business, Carly Fiorina says (LA Times 9/17/08)

Maeve Reston
The former Hewlett-Packard CEO says that none of the top candidates would be ready to lead a big company. Barack Obama's team uses the comments against John McCain.
http://www.latimes.com/news/politics/la-na-trailcarly17-2008sep17,0,2276681.story?track=rss
See The Hill blog's "Fiorina: Palin Doesn't Have Experience to Run Major Company": http://briefingroom.thehill.com/2008/09/16/fiorina-palin-doesnt-have-experience-to-run-a-company/

Fiorina Sets off Flap, Saying Palin Not Ready for Big Business (NYT blog 9/16/08)

By Leslie Wayne

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Having once been dubbed the "most powerful woman in business," Carly Fiorina, a top economic adviser to Senator John McCain and the former chief executive of Hewlett-Packard, knows a little something about executive talent. After all, until she was ousted from the executive suite at Hewlett-Packard, Ms. Fiorina was a Silicon Valley legend, http://thecaucus.blogs.nytimes.com/2008/09/16/fiorina-sets-off-flap-saying-palin-not-ready-for-big-business/#more-6309
See CNN blog's "Fiorina's comment called 'Biden-like'": http://politicalticker.blogs.cnn.com/2008/09/16/fiorinas-comment-called-biden-like/

McCain reportedly 'furious' with Fiorina, campaign adviser says she will 'disappear' from TV (ThinkProgress 9/16/08)
Today, McCain economic adviser Carly Fiorina bluntly stated that neither John McCain nor Sarah Palin were capable of running a major corporation (she said the same of Barack Obama and Joseph Biden). A top campaign adviser said Fiorina will be punished for her candid sentiments:
http://thinkprogress.org/2008/09/16/mccain-reportedly-furious-with-fiorina-campaign-adviser-says-she-will-disappear-from-tv/

Flagging economy may propel Obama (Pittsburgh Tribune-Review 9/17/08)
By David M. Brown
As the national economy shows signs of weakening further, the chances of Democrat Barack Obama winning the presidency could strengthen, analysts said Tuesday.
http://www.pittsburghlive.com/x/pittsburghtrib/business/s_588629.html

McCain rallies in Dem-fertile Ohio region (Pittsburgh Tribune-Review 9/17/08)
By Salena Zito
You have to wonder: With just 49 days left until Election Day, what is Sen. John McCain doing in Ohio's Mahoning Valley -- again?
http://www.pittsburghlive.com/x/pittsburghtrib/s_588683.html
See PTR's "Workers are economy's 'fundamentals,' McCain says": http://www.pittsburghlive.com/x/pittsburghtrib/s_588617.html

McCain Addresses A Red, White And Blue Crowd (Tampa Bay Tribune blog 9/16/08)
by Keith Morelli
Most of those who came to hear John McCain were in the room by 11 a.m. and the speech started just after noon. In the meantime, a rambunctious crowd listened to young women belt out patriotic songs from "Little Pink Houses" to "Sweet Home Alabama" to "Born in the U.S.A.," which is more of a protest song than a patriotic one, but few ever get past the title.
http://www.tboblogs.com/index.php/news/story/mccain-speech-now-over-less-than-12-minutes-long/
See TBT blog's "McCain Goes Populist After Market Fall": http://www.tboblogs.com/index.php/news/story/mccain-goes-populist-after-market-fall/
See TBT blog's Palin's Fans Show Up Despite Her Absence": http://www.tboblogs.com/index.php/news/story/palins-fans-show-up-despite-her-absence/

Protesters Here To Greet McCain, Too (Tampa Bay Tribune blog 9/16/08)
by Keith Morelli
9:45 a.m.: A handful of protesters sets up shop with signs and offering opinions near the front of the Tampa Convention Center entrance. One woman holds a red and white sign that reads: "McCain voted against equal pay for women."
http://www.tboblogs.com/index.php/news/story/protesters-here-to-greet-mccain-too/

Historians say McCain camp not sleaziest (Politico 9/16/08)
By: David Mark and Avi Zenilman
David Axelrod, Barack Obama's chief strategist, said Sunday that John McCain is running the "sleaziest and least honorable campaign in modern presidential campaign history." It was a line trotted out all weekend by various Obama staffers as part of an effort to portray the Republican nominee as a purveyor of the slimiest tactics in recent memory.
http://dyn.politico.com/printstory.cfm?uuid=6AF39D2E-18FE-70B2-A88DF3EFEBB3D8AE

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

McCain says Obama is 'making up facts' (Politico 9/16/08)
By MIKE ALLEN
Sen. John McCain says his rival is "making up facts" and 'hurling insults" to try to get the upper hand in the campaign now that voters are worried about the nation's financial meltdown.
http://www.politico.com/news/stories/0908/13513.html

McCain avoids saying 'Bush' on the stump (DC Examiner blog 9/17/08)
Throughout the presidential campaign, analysts have mentioned ad nauseum that Barack Obama is trying to identify John McCain with the policies of President Bush, while McCain is doing his best to run from those policies.
http://www.dcexaminer.com/opinion/blogs/YeasandNays/
Obama_says_Bush_five_times_as_much_as_McCain.html

McCain Rep Lies: McCain's Global Warming Targets 'Consistent With International Scientific Consensus' (Wonk Room 9/16/08)
Douglas Holtz-Eakin, Sen. John McCain's "I'm a Ph.D. economist" adviser, is evidently having a mental meltdown, perhaps brought on by the collapse in the financial markets engineered by McCain's other "economic brain," Phil Gramm. Although his comment giving Sen. McCain credit for the miraculous invention of the Blackberry is meriting deserved ridicule, Holtz-Eakin's column in yesterday's Financial Times on climate change includes unambiguous lies to defend McCain's polluter-friendly climate plan. Holtz-Eakin lies about McCain's cap and trade plan:
http://thinkprogress.org/wonkroom/2008/09/16/dhe-lie-emissions-targets/

McCain Mocks Obama's Fundraiser with Streisand (WaPo blog 9/16/08)
By Robert Barnes
...[R]eunited with running mate Sarah Palin and in front of a boisterous crowd, McCain pointed out that Democratic rival Barack Obama's hard-edged comments about McCain and the economy came "just before he flew off to Hollywood for a fundraiser with Barbra Streisand." ...McCain recited a speech he had given earlier in the day about the need to reform Wall Street. A slow but steady trickle of supporters began to file out after Palin's speech introducing McCain.
http://voices.washingtonpost.com/the-trail/2008/09/16/mccain_mocks_obamas_fundraiser.html#more

PALIN NEWS

Palin Exaggerates Alaska's Energy Role (WaPo 9/17/08)
The woman touted by John McCain as the most knowledgeable person in America on energy issues has been having a lot of trouble getting her basic energy statistics straight. Last week, Sarah Palin told Charles Gibson of ABC News that her state, Alaska, produced "nearly 20 percent of the U.S. domestic supply of energy." On Monday, she told a campaign rally in Golden, Colo., that she had been responsible for overseeing "nearly 20 percent of the U.S. domestic supply of oil and gas." Both claims are way off.
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/09/16/AR2008091603406_pf.html

Palin to Meet Foreign Leaders at U.N. (WSJ blog 9/16/08)
By Monica Langley
Republican vice presidential candidate Sarah Palin will meet with foreign leaders next week at the United Nations, a move to boost her foreign-policy credentials, a Republican strategist said.
http://blogs.wsj.com/washwire/2008/09/16/palin-to-meet-foreign-leaders-at-un/

Aides say despite campaign travel, Palin's still in charge (ADN 9/17/08)
By KYLE HOPKINS
GOVERNOR'S ABSENCE: Aides say buck still stops with governor.
http://www.adn.com/sarah-palin/story/528484.html

Official Says Palin Team Implied Trooper Should Go (WSJ 9/17/08)
By JOEL MILLMAN
The former Alaska public-safety official at the center of a controversy surrounding Sarah Palin said in an interview that he and other police officials heard from the Alaska governor, her husband and aides "at least a dozen times" on the subject of Gov. Palin's former brother-in-law.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

http://online.wsj.com/article/SB122158863680544013.html?mod=rss_Politics_And_Policy

Can He Stop 'Troopergate'? (Newsweek 9/17/08)
Michael Isikoff
A former top Justice Department prosecutor now working for John McCain's presidential campaign has been helping to direct an aggressive legal strategy aimed at shutting down a pre-election ethics investigation into Alaska Gov. Sarah Palin.
http://www.newsweek.com/id/159260

McCain campaign clamps down on questions in Alaska (AP 9/17/08)
By ANNE SUTTON
GOP vice presidential candidate Sarah Palin is effectively turning over questions about her record as Alaska's governor to John McCain's political campaign, part of an ambitious Republican strategy to limit any embarrassing disclosures and carefully shape her image for voters in the rest of the country.
http://ap.google.com/article/ALeqM5jss1GQ0bw-wiD2RIwoldMMSE1dBwD938AT180

Attorney general says state staff won't testify (AP 9/17/08)
By STEVE QUINN
Alaska's investigation into whether Gov. Sarah Palin abused her power, a potentially damaging distraction for John McCain's presidential campaign, ran into intensified resistance Tuesday when the attorney general said state employees would refuse to honor subpoenas in the case.
http://www.adn.com/politics/story/528468.html

Lawmakers Sue to Stop 'Troopergate' Probe of Palin (AP 9/16/08)
By STEVE QUINN
Five state Republican lawmakers want a judge to stop an investigation into Alaska Gov. Sarah Palin's firing of a public safety commissioner.
http://www.time.com/time/printout/0,8816,1841614,00.html

Palin triggers feminism reversal (Washington Times 9/17/08)
By Jennifer Harper
The old partisan thinking about motherhood and the workplace has been rapidly reversed in America by the McCain-Palin ticket. ...'Mommy war' evolves in race http://washingtontimes.com/news/2008/sep/17/palin-triggers-feminism-reversal/

Palin 'phenomenon' hijacks online sales (CNN 9/16/08)
By Kristi Keck
For the first time since the start of the election, merchandise for John McCain's campaign rivals sales of Barack Obama gear at CafePress, an online store specializing in user-generated T-shirts.
http://www.cnn.com/2008/POLITICS/09/16/palin.online.sales/index.html

Christian publishers score big with Palin books (Religion News Service 9/17/08)
By G. Jeffrey MacDonald
In this high season for political books, two evangelical publishers are leading the race to capitalize on fascination with Alaska governor and GOP vice presidential nominee Sarah Palin.
http://www.usatoday.com/news/religion/2008-09-16-palin-evangelical-books_N.htm?csp=34

Couric gets second Palin interview (AP 9/16/08)
Second in the broadcast network competition to talk to Sarah Palin: Katie Couric. The CBS anchor will spend two days on the road with the Republican vice presidential candidate as well as presidential hopeful John McCain, the network said Tuesday. Couric's interview material will be aired Sept. 29 and 30 on the "CBS Evening News" and "The Early Show."
http://ap.google.com/article/ALeqM5hehMkMu23Oc1VW0z4nSrog8UvGLgD9385KP80

Rejoining McCain, Palin drops references to bridge and plane (Politico blog 9/16/08)
By Jonathan Martin

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Rejoining John McCain for a joint rally near Youngstown, Ohio, Sarah Palin offered an abbreviated version of her stump speech that included no mention of her putting the state plane in Alaska on eBay or her opposition to the "Bridge to Nowhere."
http://www.politico.com/blogs/jonathanmartin/0908/Rejoining_McCain_Palin_drops_references_to_bridge_and_plane.html?showall

Palin's Favorability Ratings Begin to Falter (Newsweek blog 9/16/08)
By Andrew Romano
To know her, it seems, is not necessarily to love her.
http://blog.newsweek.com/blogs/stumper/archive/2008/09/16/palin-s-favorability-ratings-begin-to-falter.aspx

OPINIONS AND EDITORIALS

Mr. McCain and the Economy (NYT 9/17/08)
John McCain spent Monday claiming as he had countless times before — that the economy was fundamentally sound. Had he missed the collapse of Lehman Brothers or the sale of Merrill Lynch, which were announced the day before? Did he not notice the agonies of the American Insurance Group? Was he unaware of the impending layoffs of tens of thousands of Wall Street employees on top of the growing numbers of unemployed workers throughout the United States? On Tuesday, he clarified his remarks. The clarification was far more worrisome than his initial comments.
http://www.nytimes.com/2008/09/17/opinion/17wed1.html?pagewanted=print

McCain out of touch with the costs of a 'free market' (Boston Globe 9/17/08)
GEORGE BUSH, John McCain, and so many other Republicans have continually touted the benefits of a "free market" without government controls. Well, we've had that for nearly eight years. Are we happy with the results?
http://www.boston.com/bostonglobe/editorial_opinion/letters/articles/2008/09/17/mccain_out_of_touch_with_the_costs_of_a_free_market?mode=PF

McCain and the Markets (WSJ 9/17/08)
It's easy to see how a 21-year member of the U.S. Senate like John McCain, or even a Senate rookie, could regard Wall Street as a mysterious and distant planet. Indeed, on the evidence of the past few days, Senators McCain and Obama would appear to know more about Mars than they do about financial markets.
http://online.wsj.com/article/SB122160943366545595.html

True Whoppers (WaPo 9/17/08)
By Ruth Marcus
Is there any reason to trust that McCain would go on to be an honest president?
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/09/16/AR2008091602874.html?nav=rss_print/editorialpages

No more Mr. Truth Guy (Denver Post 9/17/08)
By Richard Cohen
Following his loss to George W. Bush in the 2000 South Carolina primary, John McCain did something extraordinary: He confessed to lying about how he felt about the Confederate battle flag, which he actually abhorred. "I broke my promise to always tell the truth," McCain said. Now he has broken that promise so completely that the John McCain of old is unrecognizable. He has become the sort of politician he once despised.
http://www.denverpost.com/opinion/ci_10479810?source=rss

No one is above the truth, even Palin (ADN 9/17/08)
DAN FAGAN
You really can't experience the full effect of Monday's news conference featuring Palin spokeswoman Meghan Stapleton unless you hear it for yourself. Stapleton passionately attacked former Commissioner of Public Safety Walt Monegan. Her rhetoric was plain, desperate, and obvious. Her tone, pure shrill.
http://www.adn.com/opinion/story/528420.html

Searching for an economic leader (The Denver Post 9/17/08)
The unfolding financial crisis that has brought venerable Wall Street investment banks to their knees is posing a crucial test for presidential candidates Barack Obama and John McCain.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

http://www.denverpost.com/opinion/ci_10480440?source=rss

From moose whacker to McCain's meal ticket (LA Times 9/17/08)
By Tim Rutten
Sarah Palin has become integral to the GOP candidate's hopes of winning the presidency.
http://www.latimes.com/news/opinion/la-oe-rutten17-2008sep17,0,4732430.column

'Barbies for War!' (NYT 9/17/08)
MAUREEN DOWD
At gatherings in Wasilla, Alaska, pastors pray for reporters, drilling evokes cheers and Todd Palin is hailed as a guy who likes to burn fossil fuels.
http://www.nytimes.com/2008/09/17/opinion/17dowd.html

Pinpointing Palin's appeal (Washington Times 9/17/08)
There is something about Sarah Palin that captures people's attention.
http://www.washingtontimes.com/news/2008/sep/17/pinpointing-palins-appeal/

Enough of the Palin feeding frenzy (Boston Globe 9/17/08)
By Jeff Jacoby
IN POLITICS, cheap shots and invective are occupational hazards. But when have we seen anything to match the frenzy of rage and contempt set off by the nomination of Sarah Palin?
http://www.boston.com/bostonglobe/editorial_opinion/oped/articles/2008/09/17/enough_of_the_palin_feeding_frenzy?mode=PF

The frozen world view of a McCain guru (Boston Globe 9/16/08)
By H.D.S. Greenway
FOR SOME on the political right, Russia's overreaction to Georgia's attempt to pull a fast one in South Ossetia is a source of satisfaction and we-told-you-so. For those steeped in nostalgia for the Cold War, Russia will always be an enemy - and that goes for China, too. ...All this would be academic were not Kagan a foreign policy adviser to John McCain's campaign, and it is there that the struggle between realists and neoconservatives is being played out.
http://www.boston.com/bostonglobe/editorial_opinion/oped/articles/2008/09/16/the_frozen_world_view_of_a_mccain_guru?mode=PF

Props to Megyn Kelly (PoliticsWest 9/16/08)
Fox News' Megyn Kelly proved CNN's Campbell Brown has nothing on her. Taking on John McCain spokesman Tucker Bounds Monday, Kelly asked the pertinent questions and didn't let go. Specifically, why is the McCain camp lying about Barack Obama's tax plan?
http://www.politicswest.com/30180/props_megyn_kelly

BUSH NEWS

Bush suddenly scraps comments on financial markets (AP 9/16/08)
By BEN FELLER
With little explanation, President Bush on Tuesday scrapped a statement he planned to give on the tumultuous financial markets, abandoning any press coverage of his meeting with key economic advisers as more developments roiled Wall Street.
http://ap.google.com/article/ALeqM5gH8vjAe8Yxxfh2Mgi2N-G9cqOD8QD9386Q880

Bush returns to Gulf Coast, this time for Ike (AP 9/16/08)
By DEB RIECHMANN
President Bush got a firsthand look Tuesday at the fury that Hurricane Ike unleashed on the Gulf Coast, and was greeted by a virtual ghost town here where it made landfall. He urged frustrated storm evacuees to keep it that way until local officials say it is safe to return.
http://ap.google.com/article/ALeqM5h6z_UhxmDFaJau83XPy_PFobzfQwD9387FPO0

OTHER TOP NEWS

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Fed steps in to rescue AIG, adding to string of bailouts (McClatchy 9/16/08)
The Federal Reserve Board stepped in Tuesday night to provide an $85 billion emergency loan to American International Group in return for a nearly 80 percent stake in the teetering insurance and finance giant.
http://www.mcclatchydc.com/homepage/story/52646.html

On Texas' coast, a scramble for basic needs amid 'chaos' (USA TODAY 9/1/7/08)
By Donna Leinwand, Marisol Bello, Oren Dorell and Andrea Stone
Landress Pouncy has electricity. In these parts, that means she has houseguests — lots of them.
http://www.usatoday.com/news/nation/2008-09-16-IkeDay4_N.htm?csp=34

Democrats Join the 'Drill, Baby, Drill!' Chorus (TIME 9/17/08)
By Massimo Calabresi
House Democrats passed a bill Tuesday night that would end a 26-year ban on drilling for oil in federal waters 50 miles or more from the Atlantic and Pacific coasts — in a belated attempt to find political shelter from Republican election attacks over gas prices. But even as House Speaker Nancy Pelosi steered the bill through procedural hurdles to passage during the day, Senator John McCain was demonstrating the continued power of the issue on the campaign trail.
http://www.time.com/time/nation/article/0,8599,1841769,00.html

Pelosi orders wide Wall Street probe (Politico 9/17/08)
By: Mike Allen
House Speaker Nancy Pelosi has ordered a broad, swift investigation of Wall Street and will demand testimony from Bush administration officials and captains of finance, congressional officials said.
http://dyn.politico.com/printstory.cfm?uuid=6D44EFAF-18FE-70B2-A81BF5A9D7E5EC09

Elizabeth Edwards discouraged by health care focus (AP 9/17/08)
By MIKE BAKER
Elizabeth Edwards said Tuesday she is discouraged that health care is falling on the nation's list of priorities and critiqued the plans of both leading presidential candidates.
http://hosted.ap.org/dynamic/stories/E/ELIZABETH_EDWARDS?SITE=AP&SECTION=HOME&TEMPLATE=DEFAULT&CTIME=2008-09-16-21-46-23

Policy Makers Keep Key Rate Steady (NYT 9/17/08)
By EDMUND L. ANDREWS
Federal Reserve policy makers kept their benchmark lending rate unchanged at 2 percent on Tuesday, highlighting the conflicting pressures of an epic financial crisis and nagging inflation.
http://www.nytimes.com/2008/09/17/business/economy/17fed.html?hp=&pagewanted=print

Odierno takes reins in Iraq; general calls gains 'fragile' (USA Today 9/17/08)
By Jim Michaels
Gen. Ray Odierno, the incoming commander of U.S. forces in Iraq, said Tuesday that conditions in the country remain fragile despite dramatic security gains over the past year.
http://www.usatoday.com/news/world/iraq/2008-09-16-iraq-news_N.htm?csp=34

Vets Group to Launch Ad Contrasting Petraeus, Obama on Surge (WSJ blog 9/16/08)
By Susan Davis
Veterans for Freedom will launch a national cable ad Wednesday juxtaposing comments by Gen. David Petraeus on the success of President George W. Bush's 2007 troop surge in Iraq and comments by Barack Obama opposing the strategy.
http://feeds.wsjonline.com/%7Er/wsj/washwire/feed/%7E3/394550452/
Link to video of ad: http://link.brightcove.com/services/link/bcpid452319854/bctid1785322772

MoveOn Ad Uses "My Friends" Tic On McCain Lobbyists (HuffPo 9/16/08)
By Rachel Weiner
A new MoveOn ad posits who John McCain is really talking about when he says "my friends" -- his favorite lobbyists. Watch:
http://www.huffingtonpost.com/2008/09/16/moveon-ad-uses-my-friends_n_126797.html

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Link to video of ad: http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=CPuoAWaVStE

Ads from 527s aim to divide, conquer (Washington Times 9/17/08)
Christina Bellantoni
Initially pushed to the sidelines by the presidential nominees, independent political groups are readying a 24/7 barrage of attack ads designed to influence Americans' choices at the ballot box in November.
http://www.washingtontimes.com/news/2008/sep/17/ads-from-527s-aim-to-divide-conquer/

--
Sara DuBois
Tracking / Communications Manager
ProgressiveAccountability.org
sara@progressiveaccountability.org
202-609-7681 (office)
410-967-7306 (cell)

--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~
You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail ryan@campaigntodefendamerica.org with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.
-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Michael Huttner, Founder and CEO" <michael@progressnoweducation.org>
To: john.podesta@gmail.com
Date: 4/23/2010 5:32:39 AM
Subject: Will I see you at the Council on Foundations in Denver?

Board, Investors and Key Partner Organizations,

In a time when the stakes have never been higher, we are working day & night to ensure the public is properly educated on the key issues. Below you will find a sampling of our most recent successes in helping our allies with communications and new media.

We are looking forward to seeing many of our friends at the upcoming Council on Foundations in Denver. Please let me know if you will be in Denver & available to meet while there.

If you will not be joining us, please let me know when is a good time to connect in the near future.

Best,
Mike
(303) 931-4547 - cell

State	Organization	ED	Advisor
California	Courage Campaign Institute	Rick Jacobs	Deborah Rappaport
Colorado	ProgressNow Colorado Education	Bobby Clark	Ted Trimpa
Florida	Progress Florida Education	Mark Ferrulo	Doug Phelps
Michigan	Progress Michigan Education	David Holtz	Frank Smith
Minnesota	Alliance for a Better Minnesota Education Fund	Denise Cardinal	Ken Martin
Nevada	ProgressNow Nevada Education	Erin Neff	Susan McCue
New Hampshire	Granite State Progress Education Fund	Zandra Rice-Hawkins	Peter Glenshaw
Ohio	ProgressOhio Education	Brian Rothenberg	Jeff Rusnak
Pennsylvania	Keystone Progress Education Fund	Michael Morrill	Anna Burger
Washington	Fuse Innovation Fund	Aaron Ostrom	Martin Collier
Wisconsin	Institute for One Wisconsin	Scot Ross	Anne Summers

Here are updates and success stories from each of our partner states:

CALIFORNIA / Courage Campaign Institute:

Focus on ENDA

The religious right is working hard to ensure that LGBT judges are prohibited from being nominated to the US Supreme Court. In view of this aggressive discrimination, we began rallying our members this week to remind President Obama that this kind of intolerance cannot be associated with the selection of the very panel of judges charged with upholding equal protection under the law. The other point we are making is that Focus on the Family and other such groups are really no different from Fred Phelps and other extremists.

"This truly scandalous attempt to marginalize and dehumanize LGBT people, shared by countless others in this country, is exactly why we need legislation like the Employment Non-Discrimination Act. And it is exactly why we need to draw attention to this discrimination. ... In the coming years, the Supreme Court will adjudicate several historic cases, including Perry v. Schwarzenegger -- the Prop 8 case that will soon be decided in federal district court. That's why it is so important that President Obama gets this decision right, no matter the sexual orientation of his nominee."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Join us in writing to the President: http://www.couragecampaign.org/page/s/NotAFactor

COLORADO / ProgressNow Colorado Education:

Tax Day Messaging - ProgressNow Colorado Education has led efforts in Colorado to define and communicate a progressive message in response to the far-right Tea Party, anti-tax, anti-government efforts in this state. To counter the Tax Day protests, for example, we successfully injected our messaging into nearly all of the Tax Day coverage. We drafted and placed an op-ed on Tax Day in the Denver Post from one of our progressive allies, the Colorado Fiscal Policy Institute: http://www.denverpost.com/opinion/ci_14883383 We also were quoted in the Denver Daily News:http://thedenverdailynews.com/article.php?aID=8064 At the Tax Day protest at the Capitol, we were able to pitch two staffers from COFPI for interviews with Fox 31, 9 News, Channel 7, News 4, and KOA. In addition, we placed Kathy White from COFPI for an interview with Mario Solis Marich on AM 760's Progressive Talk during the evening drive time on Tax Day. Finally, we launched a new website for Tax Day that we will use in the coming months to tell positive stories about the impact of the American Recovery and Reinvestment Act in Colorado as well as other stories about the positive role of government in creating opportunity and promoting the common good: http://www.stuffmygovernmentdoes.com Progressive Communications Capacity-Building - New in 2010, ProgressNow Colorado Education has launched a program to expand the overall communications capacity of our allied organizations that are fellow members of the Colorado C3 Roundtable. We are working with these organizations in the context of our issue education campaigns to expand their respective communications capacity. In May, we also will be hosting the largest-ever media training for organizations that are members of the Colorado C3 Roundtable.

Media Watch - Also new in 2010, ProgressNow Colorado Education has launched a project to critique media coverage of important public policy issues in Colorado. For this project, we monitor all of the local network television news as well as every daily newspaper in the state. We also monitor right-wing radio as capacity permits. We already have produced over ten stories in two months highlighting errors and omissions in stories.

FLORIDA / Progress Florida Education Center:

Activism 101

After assisting in recent trainings with Wellstone Action and Equality Florida, In March, Progress Florida Education Center teamed up with The Public Interest Network, Repower America and the Sierra Club and co-sponsored a citizen activist training in Tampa Bay.

The training was a big success with 58 participants from across the region from all walks of life, concerned about a broad spectrum of progressive issues. Participants learned the three cornerstones of community organizing: recruitment, coalition building and generating media. Feedback from participants was very positive and one local elected official who attended stated his amazement that such great turnout could have been organized just through internet organizing.

(photo caption: Progress Florida Political Director Damien Filer runs a workshop on generating earned media (top). Director Mark Ferrulo conducts a group session on coalition building (middle). Participants introduce themselves by answering the intro question - "Name one issue that has you fired up!" (bottom)

Standing up to "Drill Baby, Drill"

Progress Florida Education Center played a central role in a large coalition of groups who organized the hugely successful Hands Across the Sand event. The event was organized to demonstrate widespread opposition to offshore oil drilling. Thousands and thousands of protesters, dressed in black to represent an oil spill, joined hands at more than 70 coastal locations across the state, sending an unmistakable message to our elected officials that Florida's shoreline should not to be sacrificed to Big Oil. The event garnered extensive press coverage statewide and has created numerous local networks of activists that continue to organize against the threat of offshore drilling today.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In March, Progress Florida unveiled the "Resolved Against Drilling" map, a powerful illustration and visual reminder to lawmakers of the overwhelming opposition to legislation that would end Florida's ban on oil drilling in state waters.

The map shows that at least 55 cities, counties, chambers of commerce, and local agencies around the state have passed resolutions opposing Speaker-Designate Dean Cannon's (R-Winter Park) and Senate-President Designate Mike Haridopolos's (R-Melbourne) effort to sell Florida's world famous coastline to Texas oilmen. From Key West to Pensacola, few other issues have met with such unified opposition from local communities.

Although the main purpose of the Resolved Against Drilling Google map was for it to be a tool for legislative advocacy, website use and field organizing, we were able to leverage it for some great press in both traditional and new media outlets.

MICHIGAN / Progress Michigan Eduction:

Fighting Climate Change, Defeating Coal

Progress Michigan Education's fight to stop a proposed dirty coal plant near one of Michigan's Great Lakes got a major media boost April 8 when an NRDC report we pushed out got major media coverage reporting that electric rates for consumers would jump up to $74 a year if the plant is built.

Serving as the media hub for the Beyond Coal campaign, Progress Michigan Education has helped to defeat four proposed coal plants in Michigan but the biggest one-sited near Lake Huron-would saddle electric ratepayers with $1.8 billion in debt for a coal plant that isn't needed and would contribute to climate pollution. CMS Energy, which has ties to Massey Energy Company, is the target of Beyond Coal's corporate campaign.

Building Partners' Communications Capacity

More than 30 activists from over 16 organizations have undergone trainings during March and April in earned media and strategic messaging as part of Progress Michigan Education's Communications Capacity Building Project.

The project, in partnership with the Michigan Voice civic engagement table, links larger group trainings with one-on-one specialized capacity building with the goal of training up to 120 individuals on earned media, new media, communications planning and online advertising. In addition, up to 10 organizations will receive comprehensive specialized and interactive communication analysis and training.

MINNESOTA / Alliance for a Better Minnesota Education Fund:

Census Work with MN Civic Engagement Table

Alliance for a Better Education Fund (ABMEF) is an active participant of the Minnesota Civic Engagement Table, which is part of the state voices network. In its role as communications hub for the table, ABMEF assisted the groups in messaging for their census work - reminding those residents in hard-to-count communities to turn in their forms. The result: early numbers show a significant increase in returns in these communities when compared to return rates in 2000.

thanktaxes.org

As the lead organization in Minnesota assigned to counter the TEA parties happening on April 15, Alliance for a Better Minnesota (ABM) provided citizens with a place to show their appreciation for the things taxes pay for. The campaign was centered around the website www.thanktaxes.org, and was continued through a twitter campaign (#thanktaxes). The result included hundreds of photos, thousands of tweets (and retweets) and every television in the twin cities featured our message - and the 20-foot-long moving billboard ABM featuring 20 different photos of people showing off their "thank taxes" sign in front of favorite public projects that circled the TEA party of tax day.

NEVADA / ProgressNow Nevada Education Fund:

ProgressNow Nevada organized the progressive response to Tax Day Tea Parties by creating alternative events that drew great media coverage. Our progressive tea parties focused entirely on revenue plans; reframing government and helped hammer the message narrative that "No is not a plan." Ironically, we made the top of the fold, front page of the conservative paper that is the subject of our media accountability project.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

http://www.lasvegassun.com/photos/2010/apr/15/70100/

We also worked with numerous C3 immigration partners in advance of the major Rally for America on message development and media relations. This included work with Democracia Ahorra, The Hispanic Institute, Reform Immigration for America and the Progressive Leadership Alliance of Nevada. The event on April 10 in Las Vegas drew 10,000 people and resulted in immediately changing the political dynamic for immigration reform in Washington about. http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=WP-84ylRaXo

We continue to expose the right-wing bias of the Las Vegas Review-Journal. Our reporting led to this feature in Media Matters on March 22. http://mediamatters.org/research/201003220062

NEW HAMPSHIRE / Granite State Progress Education Fund:

Brown Bag Lunch

Granite State Progress Education Fund is helping coordinate rapid-response needs for the 2010 legislative session that runs January through June in New Hampshire. Each week we host a weekly Brown Bag Lunch for progressive organizations, State House leaders and other strategic community advocates to network and exchange important information about upcoming hearings, hot-button bills and conservative shenanigans. The weekly gathering has provided an opportunity for cross-collaboration and proactive messaging.

For example, it came to our attention that conservatives were attempting to overturn a State House ban on guns and other dangerous weapons. House Bill 1693 would have turned the New Hampshire State House into an open carry zone, allowing guns and other weapons into places like the State House galleries, committee rooms, and Governor's office. Granite State Progress Education Fund alerted the New England Coalition to Prevent Gun Violence and drafted a joint action alert and talking points. We then organized oral testimony for the public hearing, including having a former coordinator of Read Across America raise concerns about having large groups of schoolchildren in open carry zones. Other participants from the Brown Bag Lunch agreed to sign in opposition to the bill as individuals and organizations, and helped spread the word. In the end, the committee - and full House - defeated the bill .

OHIO / Progress Ohio Education:

ProgressOhio member Robert Letcher was at a Health Care Protest in March, when the Columbus Dispatch caught a Tea Party member on tape berated him. Mr. Letcher was holding a sign saying that he suffered from Parkinson's disease and wanted the Bill passed.

In the Dispatch video one Tea Party member berated him and said "handouts are for the other side of town" while a second threw dollar bills at Letcher saying "I decide when you get a handout."

ProgressOhio jumped on the story which was buried (the paper wasn't even aware of the video content) and through email and new media turned the issue into a national story on civility in the health care debate. PO was the number 1 non-profit on YouTube for a number of weeks and had over a Half-Million views of the video and subsequent interviews of Letcher.

Letcher has a doctorate as a nuclear physics and also did many national interviews.

PENNSYLVANIA / Keystone Progress Education Fund:

The Keystone Progress Education Fund (KPEF) has set up a Technology Bank for other progressive 501(c)(3) organizations. Our vision is to have a stock of technology items that can be loaned at no or low cost to progressive groups. We will have items in at least 3 cities (Philadelphia, Pittsburgh and Harrisburg). The items in our bank will be things that groups need occasionally, but cannot justify purchasing because of budget limitations.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Our first purchase was six projectors.

KPEF developed a template for organizations wanting to hold local versions of our highly successful Pennsylvania Progressive Summit. The template, called "Progressive Summit in a Box," is currently being used by activists in Berks County to hold the first local progressive summit in PA.

KPEF is planning a series of webinars using presenters from the Pennsylvania Progressive Summit. The first webinars will be held in May. The first topic will be "Effective GOTV Strategies." The presenter is Regina Schwartz, Director of Communications and Outreach at the Analyst Institute.

WASHINGTON / Fuse Innovation Fund:

Fuse coordinated the progressive community's successful legislative campaign to raise new revenues in response to the State's financial crisis. The legislature adopted a package that raised $800 million in new revenues earlier this month. We organized a coalition of over 100 groups, with a combined field, lobbying and communications program.

- Our campaign organized a coalition rally of 6,000 people at the state capitol on Feb. 15th, calling on the legislature to protect our kids and the environment, care for the elderly and invest in the future. We went head to head with the Teabaggers' anti-tax rally earlier in the day, and outnumbered them two to one. This show of force made a huge impression on legislators.
- To open the session, Fuse organized a team effort that generated over 20,000 signed petitions and postcards urging the Governor and legislators to take a balanced approach to the state's financial problems. Four TV news stations and several reporters joined our team as we delivered the petitions to Governor Christine Gregoire, Speaker of the House Frank Chopp, and Senate Majority Leader Lisa Brown. This link includes our own video, as well as KING 5's coverage highlighting public support for new revenues: http://www.fusewashington.org/page/content/petitionvideos/%20

WISCONSIN / Institute for One Wisconsin:

The Institute for One Wisconsin has been assisting its Communications Capacity Building Project class of 2010 providing analysis and strategic communications advice. We've got eight energetic groups participating representing constituents across Wisconsin and serving a number of traditionally-underserved communities to increase the ability of these groups to communicate with their members, the media, decision-makers and donors.

The early impact of our work in 2009 has show in the written feedback and reports the Institute has received from previous participants. These lower-capacity organizations were not only able to improve and professionalize all aspects of their communications program, but also they reported member growth of 14 percent for all of the organizations in less than one year. The Institute will continue to work with these 12 groups, as well as the enthusiastic class of 2010 to further our vision of a Wisconsin with equal economic opportunity for all.

--
Michael Huttner
Founder and CEO
1536 Wynkoop St. #203
Denver, CO 80202
303-991-1900
www.progressnoweducation.org

CA: Courage Campaign Institute
CO: ProgressNow Colorado Education
FL: Progress Florida Education Fund
MI: Progress Michigan Education
MN: Alliance for a Better Minnesota Education
NH: Granite State Progress Education
NV: ProgressNow Nevada Education

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

OH: ProgressOhio Education
PA: KeystoneProgress Education
WA: Fuse Washington Education
WI: Institute for One Wisconsin

To unsubscribe from these updates, please click here: http://progressnow.org/unsubscribe

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Michael Morrill" <mike@keystoneprogress.org>
To:	sara@progressiveaccountability.org bigcampaign@googlegroups.com
Date:	10/21/2008 9:45:58 AM
Subject:	[big campaign] Re: Tracking Update: McCain Rally in Harrisburg, PA 10/21/08

There were 60-70 protesters in Harrisburg. Mostly from building trades, Planned Parenthood, SEIU. Video later tonight at www.youtube.com/morrillmajority

Michael Morrill
Executive Director
Keystone Progress
610-568-0469-office
mike@keystoneprogress.org www.keystoneprogress.org

From: bigcampaign@googlegroups.com [mailto:bigcampaign@googlegroups.com] On Behalf Of Sara DuBois
Sent: Tuesday, October 21, 2008 2:51 PM
To: bigcampaign@googlegroups.com
Subject: [big campaign] Tracking Update: McCain Rally in Harrisburg, PA 10/21/08

Hello All,
Just got off the phone with our tracker, Lisa, on the ground in Harrisburg. Below are the notes from our call.

Big Highlights

- Continues to hit on Biden-Crisisgate-- Adds anecdote: Biden referred to how JFK was tested in Cuban missile crisis. i was involved in that, on board the USS Enterprise, we had a target. we came so close. america does not need a president who needs to be tested. i've been tested my friends
- On drilling, contrasts his approach with Obama's: we wont delay, "we wont consider," we will do it.
- Says Obama is picking his Cabinet -- Adds Barney Frank to the Obama-Pelosi-Reid triumverate of undesirables, accusing Frank of wanting to "redistribute the wealth"
- McCain continues hammering Obama for wanting to "spread the wealth" with another "phony tax cut ... government giveaway"

Harrisburg, PA: McCain Rally 10/21/08
(Disclaimer: The following are notes, not direct quotes. If you'd like a quotable transcript or video of any part below, please email us.)

Background details

- Cindy McCain intros McCain
    - TY for your kind support, generosity, your belief in my husband for all these months
    - when we decided to do this, we sat down as a fam -- it takes a fam to do this -- some of the most important reasons are b/t the mccain and palin fam, where we have 3 active duty kids serving-- jack in navy, jimmy in marine corps, and jack palin in the army -- it is b/c of those 3 men and your sons and daughters serving that i belive that my husband should be the next president -- his experience, his leadership and most of all his character, he would make the best president -- has served his country since he was 17 and since then he has always put country first [thank you john! thank you john!] -- he has inspired our kids and so many others around the world to serve causes greater than self interest, not just put campaign first but each other first
    - our camp stands for reform, peace and prosperity -- the only person in this race who truly knows to lead and who doesnt have to wait 60 days to learn how to do the job is john mccain
- 750 people, at capacity
- Tracker didn't see any demonstrators

Speech Highlights

TY TY now you see why they often say in AZ why isnt she the candidate? cindy's done great job for our campaign and as mother. and so proud to have sarah palin. TY Rep. Todd Platz, doing a great job as your Rep. and Sen. Jim Rhoades suffered a tragic accident (http://www.wnep.com/Global/story.asp?S=9200083) and our thoughts and prayers go out to him. id like to say how important and how happy i am to be here in PA - we need to win PA and we'll bring real change to

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

DC- TY for this turnout and warmth and enthusiasm. in next 14 days we're gonna GOTV and win this. and you know, last wk it almost [yelling , McCain alaughs] it almost seemd like there were 3 candidates: obama me and JTP.

joe can claim achievement that few can top, only one to get straight answer out of obama about his plans for this country.

Now, Joe didn't ask for Senator Obama to come to his house, and he didn't ask to be famous. He certainly didn't ask for the political attacks on him from the Obama campaign. like so many americans, Joe's dream is to own a small business that will create jobs, and the attacks on him are an attack on small businesses all over the country. Small businesses employ 84 percent of Americans, and we need to support small businesses, not tax them the way obama wants to.

After months of campaign trail eloquence, we've finally learned what Senator Obama's economic goal is. As he told Joe, he wants to spread the wealth around. He believes in redistributing wealth, not in policies that grow our economy and create jobs and opportunities for all Americans. Senator Obama is more interested in controlling who gets your piece of the pie than he is in growing the pie. This explains some big problems with my opponent's claim that he will cut income taxes for 95 percent of Americans. You might ask: How do you cut income taxes for 95 percent of Americans, when more than 40 percent pay no income taxes right now? How do you reduce the number zero?

Well, that's the key to Barack Obama's whole plan: Since you can't reduce income taxes on those who pay zero, the government will write them all checks called a tax credit. And the Treasury will have to cover those checks by taxing other people, including a lot of folks just like Joe. In other words, Barack Obama's plan to raise taxes on some in order to give checks to others is not a tax cut; it's just another government giveaway. We have too much of that already.

The Obama tax increase would come at the worst possible time for America, and especially for small businesses like the one Joe dreams of owning. The small businesses Senator Obama would tax provide 16 million jobs in America. And a sudden tax hike for those businesses will kill jobs at a time when we need to be creating more jobs. I'm not going to let that happen.

America has an alternative to the phony tax cut my opponent started talking about only months ago. The McCain-Palin tax cut is the real thing. We're going to double the child deduction for every family. We will cut the capital gains tax. And we will cut business taxes to help create jobs, and keep American businesses in America.

As Joe has now reminded us all, America didn't become the greatest nation on earth by giving our money to the government to "spread the wealth around." In this country, we believe in spreading opportunity, for those who need jobs and those who create them. And that is exactly what I intend to do as President of the United States.

The next President won't have time to get used to the office. We face many challenges here at home, and many enemies abroad in this dangerous world. This weekend, Senator Biden guaranteed that if Senator Obama is elected, we will have an international crisis to test America's new President. We don't want a President who invites testing from the world at a time when our economy is in crisis and Americans are already fighting in two wars. Biden referred to how JFK was tested in Cuban missile crisis. i was involved in that, on board the USS Enterprise, we had a target. we came so close. america does not need a president who needs to be tested. i've been tested my friends. [USA! USA!]

What is more troubling is that Senator Biden told their campaign donors that when that crisis hits, they would have to stand with them because it wouldn't be apparent that Senator Obama would have the right response. Forget apparent. We know Senator Obama won't have the right response.

We've seen the wrong response from him over and over during this campaign. He opposed the surge strategy that is bringing us victory in Iraq and will bring us victory in Afghanistan. He said he would sit down unconditionally with the world's worst dictators. When Russia invaded Georgia, Sen. Obama said the invaded country should show restraint. He's been wrong on all of these. and btw, i will bring our troops home in honor and victory.

We cannot spend the next four years as we have spent much of the last eight: hoping for our luck to change at home and abroad. We have to act. We need a new direction, and we have to fight for it. I've been fighting for this country since I was seventeen years old, and I have the scars to prove it.

If I'm elected President, I will fight to shake up Washington and take America in a new direction from my first day in office until my last. I'm not afraid of the fight, I'm ready for it.

I'm not going to spend $750 billion dollars of your money just bailing out the Wall Street bankers and brokers who got us into this mess. I'm going to make sure we take care of the working people who were devastated by the excesses and greed of Wall Street and Washington.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

my friends, home values home values. the subprime disgrace and crisis caused this.

I have a plan to protect the value of your home and get it rising again by buying up bad mortgages and refinancing them so if your neighbor defaults he doesn't bring down the value of your house with him. we've got to have americans keep their dreams of staying in their home and owning a home.

I have a plan to let retirees and people nearing retirement keep their money in their retirement accounts longer so they can rebuild their savings.

I have a plan to hold the line on taxes and cut them to make America more competitive and create jobs here at home. Raising taxes makes a bad economy much worse.

Keeping taxes low creates jobs, keeps money in your hands and strengthens our economy.

The explosion of government spending over the last eight years has put us deeper in debt to foreign countries that don't have our best interests at heart. It weakened the dollar and made everything you buy more expensive.

If I'm elected President, I won't spend nearly a trillion dollars more of your money. Senator Obama will. And he can't do that without raising your taxes or digging us further into debt. I'm going to make government live on a budget just like you do.

I will freeze government spending on all but the most important programs like defense, veterans care, Social Security and health care until we scrub every single government program and get rid of the ones that aren't working for the American people. And I will veto every single pork barrel bill Congresses passes.

If I'm elected President, I won't fine small businesses and families with children. Senator Obama will. He will force them into a new huge government run health care program, while he keeps the cost of the fine a secret until he hits you with it. I will bring down the skyrocketing cost of health care with competition and choice to lower your premiums, and make it more available to more Americans. I'll make sure you can keep the same health plan if you change jobs or leave a job to stay home.

I will provide every single American family with a $5000 refundable tax credit to help them purchase health care insurance. Workers who already have insurance from their employers will keep it and have more money to cover costs. Workers who don't have health insurance can use it to find a policy anywhere in this country to meet their basic needs.

If I'm elected President, I won't make it harder to sell our goods overseas and kill more jobs. Senator Obama will. I will open new markets to goods made in America and make sure our trade is free and fair. And I'll make sure we help workers who've lost a job that won't come back find a new one that won't go away.

Senator Obama wants to raise taxes and restrict trade. The last time America did that in a bad economy it led to the Great Depression. They say those who don't learn the lessons of history are doomed to repeat them. Well, my friends, I know my history lessons, and I won't make the mistakes Senator Obama seeks to repeat.

If I'm elected President, we're going to stop sending $700 billion to countries that don't like us very much.

in the debate we had the other night -- i think it went pretty well -- you have to admire his eloquence, but you have to listen to his words. he said he would quote "consider" offshore drilling. consider. we wont delay, wont consider, we will do it. [drill baby drill!] he'll argue to delay drilling for more oil and gas and against building new nuclear power plants in America. If I am president, we will start new drilling now. We will invest in all energy alternatives -- nuclear, wind, solar, and tide. We will encourage the manufacture of hybrid, flex fuel and electric automobiles. We will invest in clean coal technology that can turn the economy of this state around. USA is sitting on world's largest supply of coal. Clean coal tech will reduce greenhouse emissions, itll save money. We will lower the cost of energy within months, and we will create millions of new jobs.

Let me give you the state of the race today. We have 14 days to go. We're a few points down. The national media has written us off.

Just the other day, Senator Obama's campaign announced that he is choosing his cabinet. He's measuring the drapes, and planning with Speaker Pelosi and Senator Reid to raise taxes, increase spending. Just last night, Barney Frank [boos], one of the most powerful members of Congress, said guess what, he wants to raise taxes and redistribute the wealth. and pelosi and reid want to concede defeat in Iraq, i will never do that. But they forgot to let you decide. My friends, as we've said several times in the past, we've got them just where we want them.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

What America needs in this hour is a fighter; someone who puts all his cards on the table and trusts the judgment of the American people. I have fought for you most of my life. There are other ways to love this country, but I've never been the kind to do it from the sidelines.

I know you're worried. America is a great country, but we are at a moment of national crisis that will determine our future. Will we continue to lead the world's economies or will we be overtaken? Will the world become safer or more dangerous? Will our military remain the strongest in the world? Will our children and grandchildren's future be brighter than ours?

My answer to you is yes. Yes, we will lead. Yes, we will prosper. Yes, we will be safer. Yes, we will pass on to our children a stronger, better country. But we must be prepared to act swiftly, boldly, with courage and wisdom.

I'm an American. And I choose to fight. Don't give up hope. Be strong. Have courage. And fight.

Fight for a new direction for our country. Fight for what's right for America.

Fight to clean up the mess of corruption, infighting and selfishness in Washington.

Fight to get our economy out of the ditch and back in the lead.

Fight for the ideals and character of a free people.

Fight for our children's future.

Fight for justice and opportunity for all.

Stand up to defend our country from its enemies.

Stand up, stand up, stand up and fight. America is worth fighting for. Nothing is inevitable here. We never give up. We never quit. We never hide from history. We make history.

Now, let's go win this election and get this country moving again.

TY and god bless!

--
Sara DuBois
Tracking / Communications Manager
ProgressiveAccountability.org
sara@progressiveaccountability.org
202-609-7681 (office)
410-967-7306 (cell)

--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~
You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail lori@progressiveaccountability.org with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.
-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Burns Strider" <burns.strider@americanbridge.org>
To: CTRFriendsFamily <CTRFriendsFamily@americanbridge.org>
Date: 10/16/2014 6:45:18 AM
Subject: Correct The Record Thursday October 16, 2014 Afternoon Roundup

Correct The Record Thursday October 16, 2014 Afternoon Roundup:

Tweets:

Correct The Record @CorrectRecord: .@HillaryClinton empowered women to drive agricultural growth via @FeedtheFuture #RuralWomen #HRC365 http://www.feedthefuture.gov/about [10/15/14, 4:54 p.m. EDT]

Headlines:

Associated Press, via WXYZ Detroit: "Hillary Clinton to campaign for Michigan Democrats Schauer & Peters during Oakland University visit"

"Michigan Democrats hope to make the most of Hillary Rodham Clinton's visit by dispatching her to a bellwether county to keep an open Senate seat and upend the state's Republican governor."

Bloomberg: "Hollywood McCain Is Ready For Hillary Clinton"

"'Game Change' actress Sandy Bainum wrote a $25,000 check to the Ready for Hillary PAC, one of the 38,000 donors who are financing the group that is laying the foundation for Clinton to run for president in 2016."

AFP, via Business Insider: "John Kerry's Plane Just Broke Down ... Again"

"Since taking up his post in February 2013, Kerry has flown some 566,000 miles (911,000 kilometres) around the globe and visited 55 countries -- many of them multiple times -- spending some 249 days on the road. He's well on his way to overtaking his predecessor Hillary Clinton who flew just short of a million miles in her four years in office, visiting a record 112 countries."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Time: "White House Works To Get Poor Parents to Speak More to Kids"

"A little over a year ago, Too Small to Fail was started with the goal of getting more parents talking, singing, and reading to their kids starting from birth. Studies have shown children born to higher-income families are exposed to some 30 million more words than their counterparts on welfare before the reach kindergarten."

Articles:

Associated Press, via WXYZ Detroit: "Hillary Clinton to campaign for Michigan Democrats Schauer & Peters during Oakland University visit"

[No Writer Mentioned]

October 16, 2014, 8:45 a.m. EDT

Michigan Democrats hope to make the most of Hillary Rodham Clinton's visit by dispatching her to a bellwether county to keep an open Senate seat and upend the state's Republican governor.

Clinton on Thursday will campaign for Senate candidate Gary Peters and gubernatorial candidate Mark Schauer in Oakland County in suburban Detroit. It's not only an attempt to excite the base but also to persuade middle-of-the-road voters in the swing county.

Gov. Rick Snyder won nearly 100,000 more votes there in 2010 than his opponent. But two years later President Barack Obama had a 52,000-vote advantage in the county, which benefited from the federal government's rescue of the auto industry.

Clinton supported the bailout as a senator, and the loans remain a political issue in Michigan even five years later.

Bloomberg: "Hollywood McCain Is Ready For Hillary Clinton"

By Annie Linskey and Greg Giroux

October 16, 2014, 6:34 a.m. EDT

[Subtitle:] Actress Sandy Bainum gives to Ready For Hillary as Republican Ben Carson draws more quarterly cash for the 2016 draft.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Clinton just got a vote of support from Cindy McCain — the fictional version as played in a movie recounting the 2008 presidential campaign.

"Game Change" actress Sandy Bainum wrote a $25,000 check to the Ready for Hillary PAC, one of the 38,000 donors who are financing the group that is laying the foundation for Clinton to run for president in 2016. Others include ESPN executive Marie Donoghue, who cut a check for $25,000; investment banker Roger Altman, who gave $20,000; and former diplomat Stuart Eizenstat, who donated $1,000.

The fundraising factoids started rolling in Wednesday as political committees large and small filed disclosure reports to the Federal Election Commission that were due at midnight. By far, the most watched group is Ready For Hillary. It's organized volunteers to cheer for the potential candidate at multiple public events from Iowa to Kentucky and has a bus with "Ready for Hillary" emblazoned on the side.

But it's not the best-funded for the 2014 third quarter. A group trying to convince retired neurosurgeon Ben Carson, a Republican, to run for president raised $3.3 million from July through September — the most of any contender from either party.

Ready for Hillary collected $2 million. That's a slowdown in both cash flow and donors from the group's last quarter, when it collected $2.5 million from 43,000 people. The group has a self-imposed cap of $25,000. Ninety-eight percent of the checks were for amounts less than $100, according to spokesman Seth Bringman, which means the super-PAC can continue to tap those supporters in coming fundraising pitches.

It's early to be looking at 2016 cash, though how prospective candidates and groups raise and spend money can be telling. Former Arkansas Governor Mike Huckabee, for example, spread his cash around to Republican candidates, while Rick Santorum, the former Pennsylvania senator, hasn't done much at all.

Here's a look at some of the groups likely to be active as 2016 presidential season approaches.

* America Rising: Republicans are far from sorting out their field, but they do have an opposition research team digging up nuggets that Democrats would prefer stay buried. The group's super-PAC raised $190,000 this quarter — mostly from a $100,000 contribution from Restore Our Future, the super-PAC that supported Republican Mitt Romney's presidential bid in 2012.

* Martin O'Malley: Democrat O'Malley, Maryland's soon to be ex-governor, raised about $710,000 during the quarter when the receipts from his two political organizations are combined. Checks included $25,000 from Florida Crystals Corporation, a West Palm Beach sugar company that is closely held. He also rounded up a $10,000 gift from Richard Holland of Omaha, Neb. — one of Warren Buffett's early investors. Holland was in the front row at a recent state party fundraiser that O'Malley headlined in July and gushed about how much he enjoyed the governor's speech as he left the event.

* Elizabeth Warren: Senator Warren of Massachusetts has disavowed the super-PAC that is pushing her to run for president in 2016 and it shows: The Ready For Warren PAC brought in $60,000 this quarter, and that includes in-kind donations. The biggest backer so far is Daniel Buk, a Washington political consultant who gave $25,000 to the effort. Warren's leadership committee, PAC for a Level Playing Field, raised $557,000 in the third quarter and donated $146,400 to Democratic candidates and committees where Senate elections could determine partisan control of the chamber after the Nov. 4 midterm elections.

* Ben Carson: The committee promoting Carson, a Republican doctor, to run for president raised an eye-popping $3.3 million in the third quarter — besting Ready for Hillary for a second quarter in a row. The retired neurosurgeon is a conservative darling taking top spots in polls, as the Bloomberg Politics/Des Moines Register Iowa Poll showed this week and colleague Phil Mattingly recently reported. Much of the cash came from donors who gave less than $200. The larger chunks of change included $10,000 from fellow doctor Robert G. Burlingame from Texas and $30,000 from Harry Bettis, an Idaho rancher.

* Marco Rubio: Senator Marco Rubio raised almost $1.5 million for his Rubio Victory Committee. Notable contributions include $1,000 from the Ohio Gun Collectors Association, which is far afield from his Florida constituency but in a prime swing presidential state.

* Mike Huckabee: The Huck-PAC saw nearly $1 million in contributions this quarter, from mostly small donors giving hundreds of dollars. The former Arkansas governor was fairly generous with his committee's cash, donating $1,000 to Republican Mike Rounds of South Dakota, who is locked in an unexpectedly tight Senate contest. Other top-tier Senate races where he contributed to the Republican contender include Kansas, Georgia, Alaska and North Carolina.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

* Rand Paul: Just under $500,000 in checks came in the door for Paul's Kentucky's Victory Fund. That includes $5,000 from Goldman Sachs' political action committee and $5,000 from Koch Industries. Straddling Wall Street and the Tea Party base is a strategic aim that could set Paul apart from what's shaping up to be a crowded primary field.

* Rick Perry: Texas Governor Perry's federal PAC raised $181,000 from donors including Shaun McCutcheon, an Alabama businessman who was on the winning side of a Supreme Court campaign-finance case earlier this year. RickPAC, which Perry formed in August, donated to 13 Iowa Republican candidates, including Joni Ernst, a state senator in a close race with Democratic Representative Bruce Braley for the U.S. Senate seat of retiring Democrat Tom Harkin. Iowa's caucuses traditionally kick off the presidential nominating contests.

* Rick Santorum: Santorum's federal committee pulled in about $15,000 this quarter — entirely from renting out his list of political supporters.

AFP, via Business Insider: "John Kerry's Plane Just Broke Down ... Again"

[No Writer Mentioned]

October 16, 2014, 4:35 a.m. EDT

Globe-trotting top US diplomat John Kerry was left hoofing it back on a commercial flight from Vienna Thursday, after his ageing Air Force plane broke down for the fourth time this year.

After marathon talks on Iran's nuclear programme in the Austrian capital Wednesday, Kerry's party of more than 40 State Department staff and journalists were checking out of their hotel rooms before dawn Thursday when the news came that his Boeing 757 needed unspecified repairs -- again.

Since taking up his post in February 2013, Kerry has flown some 566,000 miles (911,000 kilometres) around the globe and visited 55 countries -- many of them multiple times -- spending some 249 days on the road.

He's well on his way to overtaking his predecessor Hillary Clinton who flew just short of a million miles in her four years in office, visiting a record 112 countries.

But despite a normally well-planned, slick logistical operation to move Kerry and his posse of staff, security agents and the travelling press as he jumps from country to country, he has been beset this year by a frustrating number of glitches.

In August, the US secretary of state was forced to take a commercial nine-hour flight back to Washington from Hawaii when the plane suffered electrical problems after a trip which had seen him literally fly around the globe.

Earlier this year, a new transponder had to be flown from the United States to Switzerland when in the middle of international talks on the Syrian conflict in January his aircraft was grounded.

And in London in March, a similar mechanical problem was hastily fixed -- after a few nerve-wrecking hours which saw his party anxiously checking for flights home.

Kerry was Thursday flying back from a whirlwind six-day trip which saw him first travel to Cairo for an international donor's conference for Gaza, and then head to Paris for talks with his Russian counterpart Sergei Lavrov.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

He had arrived in Vienna early Wednesday and went straight into talks with Iranian Foreign Minister Mohammad Javad Zarif and EU foreign policy chief Cathy Ashton on Iran's nuclear programme.

Zarif chuckled Thursday when he heard Kerry's plane was grounded due to apparent mechanical issues. "So it is not just our planes," he told the online news site al-Monitor.

Time: "White House Works To Get Poor Parents to Speak More to Kids"

By Maya Rhodan

October 16, 2014, 12:11 p.m. EDT

[Subtitle:] By reading and talking to babies from birth, research has shown kids can enter school better prepared for success

At UCSF Benioff Children's Hospital in Oakland, a new program is about to get underway that serves a purpose near to both the Obama White House and former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton care a great deal about.

Benioff is one of two locations where Too Small to Fail, a joint venture between the Bill, Hillary and Chelsea Clinton Foundation and Next Generation, is launching a pilot program that will expand their efforts to close the so-called word gap. A little over a year ago, Too Small to Fail was started with the goal of getting more parents talking, singing, and reading to their kids starting from birth. Studies have shown children born to higher-income families are exposed to some 30 million more words than their counterparts on welfare before the reach kindergarten.

About 73% of the families served by Benioff Children's Hospital utilize Medicaid, says the hospital's President and CEO Dr. Bert Lubin, making it the ideal setting to test the benefits of providing tools and support to families and communities that encourage them to interact with their babies. "It's such a simple thing," Lubin says . "The parents who are not talking, singing and reading. They love their children, but they don't know that not doing it is something that really permanently effects the child."

On Thursday, representatives from the Oakland program will be at the White House sharing their stories with other community leaders, including the Mayor of Providence, Rhode Island where a Bloomberg Philanthropies funded program that records and tracks the words spoken to babies has been underway for a little over a year. Too Small is joining with the White House to use the nation's most powerful bully pulpit to spread the message that learning is important and support local communities working to get their children and babies best prepared for school.

The White House will announce an investment to fund a research coalition to build more research around the word gap. The federal government will also be working with the tech community to get their input in the effort to close the word gap. Some apps, like the Text4Baby mobile application, are already in use, helping provide mothers with information on the development of their child throughout pregnancy and infancy.

Over the next year at Benioff and around Oakland, parents will receive books, clothing and reading materials from birth to remind them to get chatty with their bundles of joy. They'll be reminded of the benefits of speaking to their kids on billboards and in advertisements, at community-based programs and in churches. The hospital also plans to track and record the development of babies who are being interacted with regularly to gauge the benefits and encourage other cities to do the same. "The reality is if we address this word gap, everyone is more likely to stay in school, get a job afterwards and contribute to society," Lubin says. "The investment is small in terms of the impact it will have on our society."

Almost half of infants and toddlers come from low-income families and about 25% live in poverty, according to the National Center for Infants and Toddlers. Though having enough food and shelter is extremely important to a child's health, cognitive development is equally important. Families play a pivotal role in children's early development, but only about 48% of parents read to their kids every day. That lack of interaction is detrimental to children who's way out of poverty is through school. According to research from Rice University, children from low income families heard about 30 million fewer words by age 4 than their high income peers. Kids from working class families heard about 15 million fewer.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“This word gap turns into an achievement gap once children reach school,” says Ann O’Leary, the director of the children and families program at Next Generation.

Too Small to Fail’s first year was spent increasing public awareness on the importance of closing the word gap. A partnership with Univision ensured ads appeared in Spanish and English. The topic came up on television shows including The Fosters and Orange is the New Black—this year, the issue is expected to come up on more shows including Modern Family and Criminal Minds. The American Academy of Pediatrics adopted a policy message that speaks to the importance of early literacy. And last March, Tulsa became the first city to launch a partnership with Too Small to Fail, similar to what’s happening in Oakland.

O’Leary says reading and speaking to children should be as important as brushing their teeth.“When you imagine that this is not an optional activity, but that this is a must-do activity it becomes kind of shocking that only half of families are doing this,” O’Leary says. “What if half were only brushing their teeth? We think it’s just as urgent to get this information out. These are not optional activities.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: David.Willett@Sierraclub.org
To: bigcampaign@googlegroups.com
Date: 7/10/2008 8:09:45 AM
Subject: [big campaign] Gas Prices: Obama's Plan for Relief, McCain/GOP Rake in $5 mil from Big Oil

This went out nationally this morning, with localized versions being distributed in our target states (NH, PA, OH, MN, WI, NM, NV, OR, CO)

(Note, the McCain fundraising numbers are slightly different than what has been used recently because we're highlighting the dramatic increase in donations this year.)

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE: July 10, 2008
CONTACT: Josh Dorner, 202.675.2384
David Willett, 202.675.6698

Big Oil Rakes In $610 In Profits For Each American Driver

Obama Offers Plan for Real Relief from Pain at the Pump, Energy Independence;

McCain, 'Grand Oil Party' Receive Over $5 Million from Oil Industry, Propose More of the Same

Washington, D.C.----Newly released campaign finance records coupled with John McCain's misguided and dangerous energy proposals demonstrate that McCain and his allies in Congress are only interested in more of the same: more drilling; more expensive, dirty, and dangerous nuclear power; and more schemes designed to pad Big Oil's bottom line while denying consumers real relief at the pump. Meanwhile, American families are suffering as gas prices--and oil company profits--surge to new records.

"Having Big Oil's best friends in the White House has crippled our economy and hardworking Americans are suffering," said Cathy Duvall, Sierra Club National Political Director. "Barack Obama went to Detroit and told the automakers what they needed to hear--that they must make cars that get better gas mileage; John McCain went straight to Houston and told the oil industry what it wanted to hear--that he strongly supported their desire to begin the wholesale, unfettered 'exploitation' of our coasts. It's clear that America simply cannot afford another president from the 'Grand Oil Party.'"

Big Oil Raking in Record Profits at the Expense of American Drivers

An analysis of the record--breaking 2007 profits of just the five biggest oil companies--ExxonMobil, BP, Chevron, Shell, and ConocoPhillips--shows that they made an astonishing $123,300,000,000 last year alone. With approximately 202 million American drivers on the road, that means Big Oil is raking in about $610 in profits for each and every driver. As oil and gas prices continue to surge, the amount every driver is paying to pad Big Oil's bottom line will only keep increasing.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Big Oil has American consumers over a barrel," said Duvall. "We literally cannot afford to continue the failed policies of the Bush administration, but it seems unlikely that a campaign full of oil industry lobbyists and awash in millions made at the expense of American consumers is going to stand up to Big Oil and deliver the kind of change we need. By contrast, Barack Obama has stood up to special interests and has a plan to help Americans get through today's crisis, while putting us on the path to energy independence in order to rid us of Big Oil's chokehold once and for all."

New Campaign Finance Reports Show Big Oil Has Funneled over $5 million to McCain and the Republican Party

Campaign finance reports filed June 30, 2008 and analyzed by the non--partisan Center for Responsive Politics show that John McCain has received $1,001,668 from the oil and gas industry, while the Republican Party has separately raked in an astonishing $4,002,662. These new reports show that McCain hauled in nearly $210,000 from the industry in the month of June alone--a month in which he flip--flopped on offshore drilling and held numerous fundraisers in Big Oil's backyard.

Additional analysis of past campaign records by Campaign Money Watch underscores McCain and Big Oil's mutual embrace. From 1989--2006, McCain received a total of $305,277 from oil and gas interests----despite running for president in 2000 and occupying the high--profile position of Senate Commerce Committee Chairman. Big Oil has already poured nearly three times that much into his campaign in just the past few months alone.

"It looks like the Big Oil fat cats in Texas gave John McCain more than just a couple standing ovations after he flip--flopped on offshore drilling and gave them exactly what they wanted," noted Duvall. "And is it just a coincidence that the Republican Party hauled in over $4 million from Big Oil and then turned around and bought $3.4 million worth of false and misleading attack ads riddled with blatant lies about Barack Obama's energy plan?"

Lobbying disclosure forms also indicate that at least 22 lobbyists who lobby on behalf of some of the biggest oil companies in the world are involved in John McCain's campaign.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

John McCain v. Barack Obama on Gas Prices and Breaking Big Oil's Chokehold on America

Obama's Plan for Real Short--Term Relief v. John McCain's Gas Tax Gimmick
Obama wants a second round of stimulus checks for consumers and an additional $1000 tax cut for working and middle--class families to offer Americans short--term relief from crippling energy prices and the skyrocketing cost of food and other goods. Obama would pay for this tax credit by repealing billions in taxpayer--funded giveaways to Big Oil and by imposing a windfall profits tax on oil companies that fail to invest their excess profits in clean energy. (Source: Bloomberg, 05/01/2008)
John McCain has proposed a gimmick: a so--called gas tax holiday that would do absolutely nothing to lower prices at the pump, but would pad Big Oil's bottom line with an extra 18 cents a gallon and potentially bankrupt the highway trust fund at a time when our infrastructure is already crumbling. His misguided plan has been denounced by over 200 leading economists--including 4 Nobel Prize winners. (Source: Bloomberg News, 05/05/2008)

Obama's Plan for 50 MPG Cars v. John McCain's $300 Million Giveaway Gimmick
Obama knows that the long--term solution to high gas prices is making sure we have cars that get better gas mileage. He fought hard to pass the first increase in fuel economy in more than 30 years. Now he wants to go further and give American automakers the tools they need to double fuel economy to 50 miles per gallon. (Source: www.barackobama.com/issues/energy)
John McCain didn't even bother to show up for any votes on last year's landmark fuel economy/energy bill. And he has had a spotty record on the issue in the past. Instead of providing the real leadership we need right now and putting forth a real plan, McCain proposed a $300 million gimmicky giveaway to grab headlines. (Sources: Washington Post, 05/13/2008; New York Times, 05/12/2008; 2007 Senates Votes #208, #225, #226, #416, #425, #430; Detroit Free Press, 07/09/2008)

Obama's Plan on Speculators v. McCain's Empty Rhetoric
Obama knows that Wall Street speculators are gaming the system and running up the price of oil at the expense of hardworking American consumers. He supports the Consumer--First Energy Act of 2008 (S.3044), which would crack down on speculators and put in place other measures to protect consumers, make sure oil companies are paying their fair share on their record profits, and encourage the development of renewable energy. (Source: Associated Press, 06/10/2008)
John McCain says he wants to take on speculators, but has refused to support the Consumer--First Act. One of the biggest loopholes exploited by speculators--the so--called "Enron Loophole"--was put into law by one of McCain's closest campaign advisers, former Senator Phil Gramm, who also blocked efforts to close the loophole in 2002. (Sources: Associated Press, 06/10/2008; Dallas Morning News, 06/29/2008)

Obama's Plan to Make Big Oil Pay Its Fair Share v. McCain's Texas--Sized Tax Cut for Big Oil
Obama wants to end the billions in subsidies and giveaways that the oil industry receives each year--at taxpayer expense. He also wants to make sure Big Oil is paying its fair share on its tens of billions in record profits. He would impose a windfall profits tax on oil companies that fail to invest their excess profits in the clean energy technologies we need to end our addiction to oil and fight global warming. (Source: Reuters, 06/09/2008)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

John McCain has mocked Obama over his proposal for a windfall profits tax--even though McCain himself said he was open to the idea just two months ago. Meanwhile, he has proposed a tax plan that would offer a $3.8 BILLION tax cut to the five largest American oil companies alone. This plan would cost a stunning $1.7 trillion overall and put any hope of balancing the budget well out of reach. (Sources: New York Times, 06/17/2008; Grist, 05/16/2008; Center for American Progress Action, 05/27/2008, http://www.americanprogressaction.org/issues/2008/pdf/oil_tax.pdf)

Offshore Drilling Reality v. Rhetoric
John McCain flip--flopped on offshore drilling and gave the oil industry exactly what it's wanted for 30 years. (Source: Politico, 06/18/2008)
McCain claims that the Bush--McCain drilling plan would offer Americans "psychological" relief. (Source: ABC News, 06/24/2008)
Even the Bush Administration admits that drilling offshore won't do anything to lower gas prices today, tomorrow, or even a decade from now. (Source: Energy Information Administration)
Oil companies currently hold leases on 41,000,000 acres offshore, but a mere 8,123,000 of those acres are actually in production. (Source: House Natural Resources Committee)
More than 80 percent of the total oil available offshore is in areas that are already open to leasing. (Source: House Natural Resources Committee)

*Profits per driver were calculated using 2006 figures (the most recent available) for the number of licensed drivers in each state and the 2007 profit figures for the five largest oil companies: ExxonMobil, BP, Chevron, ConocoPhillips, and Shell.

Paid for by the Sierra Club Political Committee, http://www.sierraclub.org/, and not authorized by any candidate or candidate's committee.

# #

---------- Forwarded by Josh Dorner/Sierraclub on 07/10/2008 10:07 AM ----------

"Josh Dorner,

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Sierra Club"
<josh.dorner@sier To raclub.org> josh.dorner@sierraclub.org
cc
07/10/2008 09:58
AM Subject
Gas Prices: Obama's Plan for Relief, McCain/GOP Rake in $5 mil
Please respond to from Big Oil
"Josh Dorner,
Sierra Club"
<josh.dorner@sier raclub.org>

Having trouble receiving our e--mail? Try adding us ( sierra.news@sierraclub.org) to your Address Book.

(
E
m b e d
d
e d i m a g
e m o
v
e d t o f i l
e
:
p i
c
0
6
3
5
9
.

g
i f
)

(((
E E E
m m m b b b e e e d d d
d d d
e e e d d d i i i m m m a a a g g g
e e e m m m o o o
v v v
e e e d d d
t t t o o o f f f i i i l l l
e e e
: : :
p p p i i i c c c
0 2 1
3 7 0
6 6 2
0 2 9
2 4 1
. . .
g g g i i i f f f
)))
P r e s s
R
o
o
m
:
F
o
r

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Immediate Release

(Embedded image moved to file: pic20537.gif)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

E x
p l o r
e
,
E n j o
y
a n
d
P r
o
t
e
c t
t h
e
P l a n
e
t

(FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE: July 10, 2008 (
E CONTACT: Josh Dorner, 202.675.2384 E m David Willett, 202.675.6698 m b b e e d Big Oil Rakes In $610 In Profits For Each American Driver d d Obama Offers Plan for Real Relief from Pain at the Pump, Energy d e Independence; e d McCain, 'Grand Oil Party' Receive Over $5 Million from Oil d i Industry, Propose More of the Same i m m a a g Washington, D.C.--Newly released campaign finance records g e coupled with John McCain's misguided and dangerous energy e m proposals demonstrate that McCain and his allies in Congress are m o only interested in more of the same: more drilling; more o v expensive, dirty, and dangerous nuclear power; and more schemes v e designed to pad Big Oil's bottom line while denying consumers e d real relief at the pump. Meanwhile, American families are d t suffering as gas prices--and oil company profits--surge to new t o records. o f f i i l "Having Big Oil's best friends in the White House has crippled l

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

e our economy and hardworking Americans are suffering," said Cathy e
: Duvall, Sierra Club National Political Director. "Barack Obama :
p went to Detroit and told the automakers what they needed to p i hear--that they must make cars that get better gas mileage; John i c McCain went straight to Houston and told the oil industry what c
2 it wanted to hear--that he strongly supported their desire to 0
1 begin the wholesale, unfettered 'exploitation' of our coasts. 4
5 It's clear that America simply cannot afford another president 0
4 from the 'Grand Oil Party.'" 4
8 1
. .
g Big Oil Raking in Record Profits at the Expense of American g i Drivers i
f f
))
An analysis of the record--breaking 2007 profits of just the five biggest oil companies--ExxonMobil, BP, Chevron, Shell, and ConocoPhillips--shows that they made an astonishing $123,300,000,000 last year alone. With approximately 202 million American drivers on the road, that means Big Oil is raking in about $610 in profits for each and every driver. As oil and gas prices continue to surge, the amount every driver is paying to pad Big Oil's bottom line will only keep increasing.

"Big Oil has American consumers over a barrel," said Duvall. "We literally cannot afford to continue the failed policies of the Bush administration, but it seems unlikely that a campaign full of oil industry lobbyists and awash in millions made at the expense of American consumers is going to stand up to Big Oil and deliver the kind of change we need. By contrast, Barack Obama has stood up to special interests and has a plan to help Americans get through today's crisis, while putting us on the path to energy independence in order to rid us of Big Oil's chokehold once and for all."

New Campaign Finance Reports Show Big Oil Has Funneled over $5 million to McCain and the Republican Party

Campaign finance reports filed June 30, 2008 and analyzed by the non--partisan Center for Responsive Politics show that John McCain has received $1,001,668 from the oil and gas industry, while the Republican Party has separately raked in an astonishing $4,002,662. These new reports show that McCain hauled in nearly $210,000 from the industry in the month of June alone--a month in which he flip--flopped on offshore drilling and held numerous fundraisers in Big Oil's backyard.

Additional analysis of past campaign records by Campaign Money Watch underscores McCain and Big Oil's mutual embrace. From 1989--2006, McCain received a total of $305,277 from oil and gas interests----despite running for president in 2000 and occupying the high--profile position of Senate Commerce Committee Chairman. Big Oil has already poured nearly three times that much into his campaign in just the past few months alone.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"It looks like the Big Oil fat cats in Texas gave John McCain more than just a couple standing ovations after he flip--flopped on offshore drilling and gave them exactly what they wanted," noted Duvall. "And is it just a coincidence that the Republican Party hauled in over $4 million from Big Oil and then turned around and bought $3.4 million worth of false and misleading attack ads riddled with blatant lies about Barack Obama's energy plan?"

Lobbying disclosure forms also indicate that at least 22 lobbyists who lobby on behalf of some of the biggest oil companies in the world are involved in John McCain's campaign.

John McCain v. Barack Obama on Gas Prices and Breaking Big Oil's Chokehold on America

Obama's Plan for Real Short--Term Relief v. John McCain's Gas Tax Gimmick
Obama wants a second round of stimulus checks for consumers and an additional $1000 tax cut for working and middle--class families to offer Americans short--term relief from crippling energy prices and the skyrocketing cost of food and other goods. Obama would pay for this tax credit by repealing billions in taxpayer--funded giveaways to Big Oil and by imposing a windfall profits tax on oil companies that fail to invest their excess profits in clean energy. (Source: Bloomberg, 05/01/2008)
John McCain has proposed a gimmick: a so--called gas tax holiday that would do absolutely nothing to lower prices at the pump, but would pad Big Oil's bottom line with an extra 18 cents a gallon and potentially bankrupt the highway trust fund at a time when our infrastructure is already crumbling. His misguided plan has been denounced by over 200 leading economists--including 4 Nobel Prize winners. (Source: Bloomberg News, 05/05/2008)

Obama's Plan for 50 MPG Cars v. John McCain's $300 Million Giveaway Gimmick
Obama knows that the long--term solution to high gas prices is making sure we have cars that get better gas mileage. He fought hard to pass the first increase in fuel economy in more than 30 years. Now he wants to go further and give American automakers the tools they need to double fuel economy to 50 miles per gallon. (Source: www.barackobama.com/issues/energy)
John McCain didn't even bother to show up for any votes on last year's landmark fuel economy/energy bill. And he has had a spotty record on the issue in the past. Instead of providing the real leadership we need right now and putting forth a real plan, McCain proposed a $300 million gimmicky giveaway to grab headlines. (Sources: Washington

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Post, 05/13/2008; New York Times, 05/12/2008; 2007 Senates Votes #208, #225, #226, #416, #425, #430; Detroit Free Press, 07/09/2008)

Obama's Plan on Speculators v. McCain's Empty Rhetoric
Obama knows that Wall Street speculators are gaming the system and running up the price of oil at the expense of hardworking American consumers. He supports the Consumer--First Energy Act of 2008 (S.3044), which would crack down on speculators and put in place other measures to protect consumers, make sure oil companies are paying their fair share on their record profits, and encourage the development of renewable energy. (Source: Associated Press, 06/10/2008)
John McCain says he wants to take on speculators, but has refused to support the Consumer--First Act. One of the biggest loopholes exploited by speculators--the so--called "Enron Loophole"--was put into law by one of McCain's closest campaign advisers, former Senator Phil Gramm, who also blocked efforts to close the loophole in 2002. (Sources: Associated Press, 06/10/2008; Dallas Morning News, 06/29/2008)

Obama's Plan to Make Big Oil Pay Its Fair Share v. McCain's Texas--Sized Tax Cut for Big Oil
Obama wants to end the billions in subsidies and giveaways that the oil industry receives each year--at taxpayer expense. He also wants to make sure Big Oil is paying its fair share on its tens of billions in record profits. He would impose a windfall profits tax on oil companies that fail to invest their excess profits in the clean energy technologies we need to end our addiction to oil and fight global warming. (Source: Reuters, 06/09/2008)
John McCain has mocked Obama over his proposal for a windfall profits tax--even though McCain himself said he was open to the idea just two months ago. Meanwhile, he has proposed a tax plan that would offer a $3.8 BILLION tax cut to the five largest American oil companies alone. This plan would cost a stunning $1.7 trillion overall and put any hope of balancing the budget well out of reach. (Sources: New York Times, 06/17/2008; Grist, 05/16/2008; Center for American Progress Action, 05/27/2008, http://www.americanprogressaction.org/issues/2008/pdf/oil_tax.pdf)

Offshore Drilling Reality v. Rhetoric
John McCain flip--flopped on offshore drilling and gave the oil industry exactly what it's wanted for 30 years. (Source: Politico, 06/18/2008)
McCain claims that the Bush--McCain drilling plan would offer Americans "psychological" relief. (Source: ABC News, 06/24/2008)
Even the Bush Administration admits that drilling offshore won't do anything to lower gas prices today, tomorrow, or even a decade from now. (Source: Energy Information Administration)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Oil companies currently hold leases on 41,000,000 acres offshore, but a mere 8,123,000 of those acres are actually in production. (Source: House Natural Resources Committee)
More than 80 percent of the total oil available offshore is in areas that are already open to leasing. (Source: House Natural Resources Committee)

*Profits per driver were calculated using 2006 figures (the most recent available) for the number of licensed drivers in each state and the 2007 profit figures for the five largest oil companies: ExxonMobil, BP, Chevron, ConocoPhillips, and Shell.

Paid for by the Sierra Club Political Committee, http://www.sierraclub.org/, and not authorized by any candidate or candidate's committee.

# #

(Embedded image moved to file: pic06483.gif)

(Embedded image moved to file: pic27595.gif)Sign up for Raw

(
E
m
b
e d
d
e d i m a g
e
m

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

o
v
e d
t o f i l
e
:
p i
c
2
4
3
5
0
.
g
i f
)

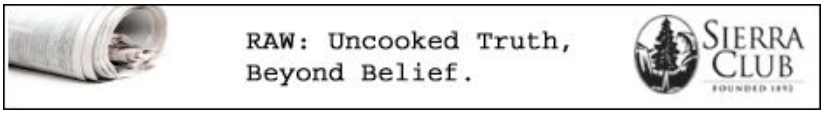
Sierra Club | 85 Second St., San Francisco, CA 94105 | Change Media Type | Contact Us | Visit the Press Room

Update My Profile | Manage My Email Preferences | Update My Interests | Unsubscribe

--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~

You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com



To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail ryan@campaigntodefendamerica.org with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.

-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Burns Strider" <burns.strider@americanbridge.org>
To:	CTRFriendsFamily <CTRFriendsFamily@americanbridge.org>
Date:	10/14/2014 8:06:51 AM
Subject:	Correct The Record Tuesday October 14, 2014 Afternoon Roundup

Correct The Record Tuesday October 14, 2014 Afternoon Roundup:

Tweets:

Correct The Record @CorrectRecord: #ICYMI @GGPotter is proud to have @HillaryClinton at UNLV via @ElkoDaily http://elkodaily.com/09/commentary-proud-to-have-hillary-clinton-at-unlv/article_c5a48f1d-9ee8-58a5-bef1-8b126969ebdc.html … [10/13/14, 5:41 p.m. EDT]

Correct The Record @CorrectRecord: .@HillaryClinton "has done so much more to promote education than just raise money… She's... made a real difference." -Gregg Potter [10/13/14, 3:43 p.m. EDT]

Correct The Record @CorrectRecord: UNLV grad: "Hillary Clinton… has spent her entire career increasing educational opportunities for so many people, including me." @ElkoDaily [10/13/14, 3:38 p.m. EDT]

Correct The Record @CorrectRecord: Commentary: Proud to have Hillary Clinton at UNLV via @ElkoDaily http://elkodaily.com/09/commentary-proud-to-have-hillary-clinton-at-unlv/article_c5a48f1d-9ee8-58a5-bef1-8b126969ebdc.html … [10/13/14, 3:34 p.m. EDT]

Headlines:

Huffington Post opinion: Peter D. Rosenstein: "Hillary Clinton is Right; Every Child must be Considered 'Too Small to Fail'"

"Ensuring that children do well is the goal of a new Clinton Foundation initiative begun by Hillary Clinton."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Politico blog: Dylan Byers on Media: "Christie, Clinton top 2016 coverage"

"Hillary Clinton and Chris Christie have received more newspaper coverage than any other potential 2016 presidential candidate so far this year, a new Pew report found."

Washington Post blog: The Fix: "Hillary Clinton's best campaign surrogate is barely a month old"

"Politicians show off their kids and their families all the time, mostly as a way to telegraph all- American normality. Clinton is doing something different. She is using Charlotte as a kind of mirror to both recognize her own privilege and argue against it."

Wall Street Journal blog: Washington Wire: "Hillary Clinton: Putin Must Be Kept Contained"

"In a speech Monday night in Las Vegas, Mrs. Clinton depicted Russian President Vladimir Putin as a mortal threat to sovereign European countries and U.S. interests. She called for a sustained commitment to keep him contained."

Washington Post blog: All Opinions Are Local: "Tim Kaine probably is at the top of everyone's VP list"

"The political bottom line: Kaine's the right balance for her [Sec. Clinton] should she win the 2016 presidential nomination."

Yahoo: "In Iowa, Ready for Hillary builds a list and hopes for the best"

"So why is Ready for Hillary hard at work in Iowa — and so far in advance of the caucuses — if Clinton did so well here in 2008? There are a few reasons, her supporters say."

Associated Press: "Arkansas Democrats calling, again, on Bill Clinton"

"Democrats announced Tuesday that former President Bill Clinton will headline rallies this weekend in several Arkansas cities. Most of his stops will be in the 4th District, where one of his former Cabinet officials is running for Congress."

Articles:

Huffington Post opinion: Peter D. Rosenstein: "Hillary Clinton is Right; Every Child must be Considered 'Too Small to Fail'"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

By Peter D. Rosenstein

October 14, 2014, 1:15 p.m. EDT

In a recent Washington Post article it was reported that the federal Healthy Start program was changing and becoming more of a competitive grant program. That would be totally counter-productive to the stated goals of the program. Rather than cutting it this program should be expanded to include even more children and focus on them from birth to five.

According to the Health Resources and Services Administration's (HRSA) website "The Healthy Start program works to prevent infant mortality in 87 communities with infant mortality rates at least 1.5 times the national average and high rates of low birth weight, preterm birth, maternal mortality and maternal morbidity (serious medical conditions resulting from or aggravated by pregnancy and delivery). Healthy Start communities are some of our nation's poorest and Healthy Start families frequently struggle to meet their most basic needs. Healthy Start reaches out to pregnant women and new mothers and connects them with the health care and other resources they need to nurture their children."

The benefits of this program have been seen in the District of Columbia, a city of both rich and poor. There are parents who can afford the best for their children and don't need help and parents who desperately need help so their children can grow up healthy with the opportunity to reach their full potential. Both sets of parents want the best for their children but one group either doesn't have the knowledge or the resources, or both, to do what is needed. The Healthy Start program is making a difference.

The Mayor of the D.C. recently announced the District's partnership in a Clinton Global Initiative (CGI) program called Stronger2gether. It is a public-private partnership with over 40 CGI partners working to improve maternal and child-health outcomes. According to the Mayor "Stronger2gether is working to reduce infant mortality utilizing innovative analytics, best clinical practices and the mobilization of community partners. The idea is to create a culture of health and help babies get to their first birthday healthy and ready to thrive." One must question why when CGI and its 40 partners recognize the importance of such a program the federal government is cutting back theirs.

Our priorities as a nation must include a focus on children and their quality of life from birth to age five. We need to not only keep children alive but ensure that with a combination of nature and nurture they thrive.

Ensuring that children do well is the goal of a new Clinton Foundation initiative begun by Hillary Clinton. The foundation in partnership with Next Generation began a project called Too Small to Fail. Its stated goal is, "to help parents, caregivers, communities and businesses take meaningful, evidence-based actions that will improve the health and well-being of America's youngest children, age zero to five, and prepare them to succeed in the 21st century."

According to its materials the Too Small to Fail project, which builds on the work for children that has been the hallmark of Hillary Clinton's career, it is based on the fact that, "Research on the brain informs us that the most important time in building a person's capacity to learn and understand is between the ages of zero to five. That is when with appropriate stimulation a child's brain grows the fastest and synapses connect. It is the time when every sound, every sight, every touch, and every spoken word get gathered together and filed away to be referenced and built upon with every interaction as the brain develops. It is during these first few years of life that we learn language, important social and emotional skills, critical thinking, and how to focus on tasks at hand."

If we strengthen our focus on infants and young children we will accomplish what has been the elusive holy grail of the education system; doing away with the achievement gap. We can ensure every child comes to school equally ready to learn. While Too Small to Fail is developing a public action campaign and testing it out in a number of communities, others need not wait to adopt this idea. One option is to push for expanding Healthy Start. We should provide for each child age zero to five who doesn't have someone at home who can do it; a mentor who will talk to, read to, sing to, and play music for them.

We need to model this program on the idea some attribute to an old African proverb, and which Hillary used as the title for her book, 'It Takes a Village'. We must involve the whole community, including the faith community, so that each child has at least one person able to commit the quality time it will take to make a difference in their lives from zero to five. We must insist that government not shirk what should be its responsibility and provide the funding for our children's future when others either can't or won't.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Politico blog: Dylan Byers on Media: "Christie, Clinton top 2016 coverage"

By Hadas Gold

October 14, 2014, 11:11 a.m. EDT

Hillary Clinton and Chris Christie have received more newspaper coverage than any other potential 2016 presidential candidate so far this year, a new Pew report found.

In 15 top U.S. newspapers from Jan. 1 to Sept. 27, 2014, the New Jersey governor and former Secretary of State were each the subject of 82 stories focused on the 2016 campaign. On the Republican side, Mitt Romney came in second for coverage with 74 stories. Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.) is a trailing second for Democrats, with just 22 stories.

Overall, Pew found that more stories focused on potential Republican candidates than Democratic ones, 202 to 115 stories respectively.

And, Pew found that there's more coverage two years before the 2016 election as there was two years ahead of the 2012 and 2008 election. In the first nine months of 2014, there have been 541 newspaper stories written about the 2016 presidential campaign compared to 271 in 2010, and 460 in 2006. The 2010 decrease is expected since President Barack Obama did not have a primary challenger. Pew credits the uptick in 2014 and focus on Christie to the "Bridgegate" scandal that dominated media earlier this year.

In the same study last year the coverage focused on Sens. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.), Rand Paul (R-Ky.) and Christie, while Clinton and Vice President Joe Biden dominated on the Democratic side.

Washington Post blog: The Fix: "Hillary Clinton's best campaign surrogate is barely a month old"

By Nia-Malika Henderson

October 14, 2014, 12:06 p.m. EDT

The prospect of Grandmother Hillary Clinton offered so many opportunities for political reporters and pundits to chew over so very many things.

How would Clinton weigh being a grandmother against being president? Could she in fact do both, or would the pull of knitting booties just be too strong?

Would the whole experience and the grandbaby anecdotes "humanize her"?

What would be the most politically beneficial name?

If she had a girl, what would that mean?

And then there was that question about what little Charlotte would call her grandmother. Nana Secretary was one guess, with a request for readers to offer more suggestions. (How about let's not and say we did?)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Just in case you are wondering:

Aides to Hillary Clinton and her daughter, Chelsea Clinton, declined to answer what Charlotte will call her maternal grandmother. And three people close to Hillary Clinton said they couldn't pry an answer out of her when they asked.

The overarching question was, as always, how Charlotte would fit into the Clinton narrative. That is to say, how Charlotte/Grandmother Clinton would be received by the public and what all of it had to do with politics. (Let's note here that this question was never, ever, ever, once asked about Grandpa Mitt Romney. Not once.)

Based on Clinton's last few post-Charlotte speeches, we now have an answer to a question that probably should not even have been asked.

Charlotte Clinton Mezvinsky, the closest thing we Americans have to a royal baby, is the poster infant for girl power and for economic populism. At a time when high profile politicians tend to steer clear of the "regular person" anecdotes (remember what happened to Al Gore?), Charlotte is the anecdote that keeps on giving.

Just five days after she was born, Clinton was already putting her to work.

“I think my granddaughter has just as much God-given potential as a boy who was born in that hospital on the same day,” Clinton said at a women's real estate convention in Miami. “I just believe that. That’s the way I was raised.”

Speaking at a rally for Tom Wolf, running for Pennsylvania Governor, Clinton offered Charlotte up as an example of what Elizabeth Warren has said is a system rigged towards the rich.

"You should not have to be the grandchild of a president to get a good education, to get good healthcare,” she said. "Let’s make sure we give every child in Pennsylvania the same chance that I’m determined to give my granddaughter.”

In some ways, Clinton is assuming the gaze of the American public when she considers her granddaughter. Much the same way people look at say Prince George and wonder about the life of riches he will enjoy, Clinton knows the average American might wonder the same about Charlotte and then perhaps wonder about fairness and what exactly elite, wealthy Americans like her know about it.

Politicians show off their kids and their families all the time, mostly as a way to telegraph all- American normality. Clinton is doing something different. She is using Charlotte as a kind of mirror to both recognize her own privilege and argue against it.

Wall Street Journal blog: Washington Wire: “Hillary Clinton: Putin Must Be Kept Contained”

By Peter Nicholas

October 14, 2014, 7:47 a.m. EDT

As a newly minted secretary of state, Hillary Clinton seemed convinced that she could bring about a thaw in America’s chilly relationship with Russia.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

That heady period in 2009 is long gone.

In a speech Monday night in Las Vegas, Mrs. Clinton depicted Russian President Vladimir Putin as a mortal threat to sovereign European countries and U.S. interests. She called for a sustained commitment to keep him contained.

Mrs. Clinton, a likely presidential candidate in 2016 warned that under Mr. Putin's leadership Russia is using military power in combination with its leverage as an energy producer to cow European leaders.

Some Europeans "just don't want to confront Putin in any way," Mrs. Clinton said in a question-and-answer session that was part of a paid speaking engagement sponsored by the UNLV Foundation. "I think that's a mistake. I think he is at heart a bully and you have to be smart; not confrontational, but you have to stand up and you have to encircle and you have to try to choke off his ability to be so aggressive."

Mrs. Clinton's appearance had drawn protests from student leaders at the university, who objected to her $225,000 speaking fee. Mrs. Clinton has said she won't pocket the money but will instead plow it into her family's charitable foundation.

She received a warm reception at the event, held at the Bellagio hotel. The moderator, Las Vegas Sun Publisher Brian Greenspun, gave her a pair of running shoes as a gift. The shoes were a nod to her possible political ambitions — and also a light reference to her appearance in Las Vegas six months ago when someone in the audience hurled a shoe at her.

Famously, former President George W. Bush said in 2001 that he had looked Mr. Putin in the eye and found him to be "straight-forward and trustworthy."

Asked how she perceived the Russian leader, Mrs. Clinton said: "Well, I see a very cold-blooded, calculating former KGB agent who is determined to not only enrich himself and his closest colleagues, but also to try to revive Russia's influence around its border."

The line echoes one used by Sen. John McCain (R., Ariz.) who while running for president in the 2008 election said he looked into Mr. Putin's eyes and saw "three letters: A K, a G, and a B."

Should Mrs. Clinton run for president in 2016, opponents are likely to call attention to the moment in 2009 when Mrs. Clinton and her Russian counterpart pushed a mock "reset" button to symbolize a new era of good will.

The rapprochement ultimately fizzled. With Russia's annexation of Crimea and incursions into Ukraine, U.S.-Russian relations have hit a post-Cold War low point.

No more is Mrs. Clinton talking of a reset.

She warned of allowing "the borders of Europe — after the bloodiest century in human history – to be rewritten the way Putin is trying to rewrite Ukraine and threatening other places as well. We cannot let that happen because there will be no stop to it.. … Put aside his personality, his agenda is one that threatens American interests and we have to be smart about how we're going to contest it."

As secretary of state she said she warned Europeans that they needed to "move toward energy independence" so that they wouldn't be so reliant on Russia.

"I think there was an unwillingness on the part of the Europeans to commit to that," she said. "Each country was pretty much looking out for its own energy needs. Now, of course, they're scrambling to figure out how to get out from under Russian intimidation using energy as a weapon. And the United States needs to stay deeply involved in working with our allies in Europe – to move them toward more energy independence."

As ever, Mrs. Clinton fielded the inevitable question: Will she run for president?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And, as ever, she gave an answer that was noncommittal. Yes, she's considering it. She wants to find ways to help people, but hasn't decided whether the presidency or her family foundation is the best vehicle.

"As I make my decision, part of what I will be thinking about is, What do I want to do with the next years of my life," said Mrs. Clinton, who will turn 67 on Oct. 26. "How do I want to spend my time?"

Washington Post blog: All Opinions Are Local: "Tim Kaine probably is at the top of everyone's VP list"

By Norman Leahy and Paul Goldman

October 14, 2014, 10:09 a.m. EDT

Is Sen. Tim Kaine (D-Va.) the new Harry Truman? As a senator from Missouri, Truman led a bipartisan congressional effort overseeing World War II operations. This rankled President Franklin Delano Roosevelt's administration. Not wanting to draw FDR's ire onto themselves, senior senators gave the job to the backbencher from the "Show-Me" state.

But when FDR ran again, bipartisan praise for a job well done led to Truman getting on the party's national ticket. Seventy years later, a young man who grew up in Missouri seemingly has acquired some of "Give'em Hell Harry's" moxie.

In January, Sen. Kaine co-sponsored legislation challenging President Obama's professed authority to pursue his Middle East war policy. "It really concerns me that the president would assert he has the ability to do this unilaterally," Kaine said.

The Virginian's co-sponsor: Arizona Republican Sen. John McCain, who lost to Obama in 2008.

This meant Kaine, among the president's earliest backers, had hooked up with the strongest Republican critic of his friend's Middle East military policy. Media commentators predictably said Kaine and McCain wanted to rein in the president. Their proposed legislation changed the 1973 War Powers Act to give Congress more say — and the president less — in deployment and use of U.S. military force.

Kaine said the historic tension between the legislative and executive branches over foreign intervention had always been a legal "obsession."

The Constitution gives Congress sole authority to declare war. But since Truman, every president, including Obama, has maintained that the Constitution gives the commander in chief the power to send military forces into harm's way without official congressional approval.

President George W. Bush, for example, did ask for congressional "authorization" of the Iraq war. But he made clear he didn't legally need their approval, much less a war declaration.

Kaine believes the current constitutional and legal murkiness needs clarification. Yet Congress's long-standing ambivalence on the scope of presidential war powers reflects military and political reality.

History shows that it can be politically risky to vote against a president after the commander in chief has made a case that military action is vital to national security.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Sen. Kaine underscored this point by combining his seemingly anti-war measure with strong support for Obama's actual military policy.

The 1962 Cuban Missile Crisis is also instructive. President Kennedy followed the basic Kaine-McCain approach. He created a special war group that included congressional leaders, met with them whenever requested, shared secret information, gave them full access to the Pentagon brass and didn't act until getting their final advice.

What happened? Congressional leaders didn't want to appear weak against communism, perhaps fearing their "secret meeting" recommendations wouldn't stay secret. Their recommendations surely would have led to a nuclear war.

Fortunately, JFK ignored them. Back-channel discussions with the Soviet premier uncovered his similar willingness to stand up to his own nuclear war hawks, saving humanity.

In the end, no War Powers Act, however amended, can guarantee the required good judgment. Still, Kaine has a valid point: To help get this good judgment, a more defined and mandatory consultation process would seem to be necessary.

Kaine's self-described "obsession" with the obvious has earned him political plaudits and a Truman-like advantage.

Democrats are generally seen as the anti-war party. Then-Sen. Hillary Clinton's vote to green light the Iraq war is likely the main reason she failed to shut down anti-war underdog Barack Obama's campaign in 2008 before it became unstoppable. Tim Kaine is uniquely positioned politically: dovish enough for the anti-war left but covered on the right by hooking up with the hawkish McCain. Front-runner Clinton figures to run more hawkish than the dovish Democratic norm.

The political bottom line: Kaine's the right balance for her should she win the 2016 presidential nomination. He created picture-perfect politics from perfunctory policy. Luck? No way. Then-Gov. Kaine made the Veep list in 2008. Right now, he leads the one for 2016.

Yahoo: "In Iowa, Ready for Hillary builds a list and hopes for the best"

By Jon Ward

October 13, 2014, 5:12 a.m. EDT

[Subtitle:] It's less glamorous than you might think

DES MOINES, Iowa – You get a funny response when you ask Ready for Hillary leaders in Iowa what they're doing to avoid a repeat of Clinton's loss in the 2008 caucuses here, where she came in third.

Ready for Hillary was built to avoid and correct the mistakes of 2008, right?

"You know, I'm kind of confused by that," said Derek Eadon, who oversees Iowa and the entire Midwest for Ready for Hillary, the group started last year to prepare a campaign in waiting for Clinton.

Jerry Crawford, an Iowa-based adviser to the group, was even more blunt. "I think Hillary ran a very good campaign in 2007-2008 in Iowa. The notion that she didn't … is more urban legend than truth," Crawford told me. "She was a very good candidate. She turned out more caucusgoers than had any Democratic candidate for president in history."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Only, of course, Barack Obama turned out more people than she did. John Edwards wooed more supporters than Clinton, for that matter.

Eadon and Crawford hail from different generations and look back at 2008 from different points of view. Eadon, a 30-year-old Iowa native, worked for Obama in 2008 as a paid campaign organizer in Cedar Rapids. Crawford, 65, is a longtime Clinton loyalist who helped run Clinton's 2008 campaign in Iowa and is helping Ready for Hillary's efforts today. But Eadon now says he thinks the Clinton campaign in Iowa was about as good as Obama's, and that too much retrospective meaning about their operations has been attached to the outcome of the 2008 caucusing.

"Because [Clinton] lost they did everything wrong. Because Obama won he did everything right. But I think there were a lot more similarities in the two campaigns," Eadon said, sitting in a windowless conference room inside an office park near the state Capitol building.

So why is Ready for Hillary hard at work in Iowa — and so far in advance of the caucuses — if Clinton did so well here in 2008?

There are a few reasons, her supporters say.

First, there is the perception among Iowans that Clinton ignored them in 2008 and didn't want to campaign hard for their votes. And to some extent this is true. She didn't fully commit to the state until the summer of 2007, after an internal campaign memo was leaked that showed advisers encouraging her to totally skip over the Hawkeye State. So in a way, Ready for Hillary — a national organization — has a very specific job to do in Iowa when it comes to salving hurt feelings and forestalling resentments.

Ready for Hillary operatives at the national level have a clear sense of this mission. "You can't take grass-roots supporters for granted," said Adam Parkhomenko, the group's executive director.

Second, Obama did a better job than Clinton did of hiring Iowa natives around the state as organizers and of attracting new blood into the caucus process to volunteer and vote. Crawford bristles at the charge that Clinton's Iowa operation failed here, and points the finger at the national operation, which he said treated Iowans and their unique process with disrespect. "When people say top-down, that's really a comment about the national campaign staff last time," he said. "If you're looking for accuracy, it's more a comment about them than about the Iowa campaign."

Third, Clinton supporters wanted to try to keep the playing field clear of competitors who could take advantage of a vacuum to develop momentum. They have done this very effectively. And Clinton will need every advantage here in the general election if she is the nominee in 2016. She trailed Republican Mitt Romney in a Des Moines Register/Bloomberg Politics survey of voters released on Saturday.

But what is Clinton going to do in 2016 (insert obligatory "if she runs") that she didn't do in 2008?

"It's a good question," Eadon said.

If that answer seems puzzlingly noncommittal, it's probably because Ready for Hillary is doing a lot of the same things that Clinton's supporters did in 2007 and 2008. They're just doing it earlier than Clinton or Obama or Edwards did it, by more than a year. They are building a list of supporters for Clinton, which could be sold to an eventual Clinton campaign. Its staffers and volunteers are building a local organization in the hopes that an eventual national Clinton campaign team will come along and pick up their work.

The work is not that complicated and it also cannot address the biggest problems of the 2008 campaign, which involved high-level strategic decisions, such as choosing not to make Clinton available to the local press in Iowa, and not prioritizing repeated trips to the hinterlands of Iowa's many small towns.

Furthermore, much of the corrective work being done by Ready for Hillary is outside of Iowa. Clinton was plenty organized in Iowa in 2008, but she wasn't able to catch up to Obama because he out-prepared and out-organized her in many of the subsequent primary and caucus states.

"A lot of states where there were no volunteer organizations during the 2008 campaign, we wanted to make sure that — should she run and she goes to Minnesota or Maine or Utah — those people are ready to go," Parkhomenko said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Ready for Hillary's list-building will also give Clinton something like the advantage that Obama, as an incumbent president, had in 2012. He set up an operation to maintain a list of supporters through Organizing for America after taking office, which kept its hands on his 13 million-member email list, and kept many of those supporters engaged and in touch. Most importantly, they ensured that Obama had the most current contact information for these supporters, in an age when people change cell phone numbers and email addresses with high frequency.

The 2008 Clinton campaign's list was at about 3 million email addresses at its height, and has now shrunk to about 1 million active names, said a source familiar with the list. Ready for Hillary, meanwhile, has an up-to-date list of nearly 3 million names, ready to hand over to a Clinton campaign.

"We've surpassed where she ended her campaign in 2008," Parkhomenko said. "What that does is, she starts off where she left off. For a nonincumbent, that is just a remarkable place to begin."

Eadon and his deputy, Gracie Brandsgard, have full-time organizing counterparts in the northeast, working in New Hampshire; in the South, based at the group's Northern Virginia headquarters, and active in South Carolina and North Carolina; and out west, based in California.

In the end, however, the value and impact of any work done now will be determined by the actions of a formal national organization that does not yet exist.

One Clinton insider who has worked in Iowa politics for a long time says getting her national team to value the hard work of early primary state blocking and tackling and of empowering grass-roots volunteers rather than taking them for granted is "a done deal." "Is she going to put together an A team nationally? Yes, she never makes a mistake twice," the insider said.

In Iowa, where 239,000 Democrats set a record for caucus participation in 2008, the work of building a list is as much about human interaction with key activists as it is about data wizardry.

There are only two Ready for Hillary staffers in Iowa: Eadon and Brandsgard. They are in charge of the entire Midwest. Their headquarters is a single open room on the ground floor of an office building two blocks from the intersection where Obama held his last rally of the 2012 campaign. They share space with employees of Eadon's consulting firm, Blueprint Strategies, and of NextGen Climate, the climate change group founded by billionaire Tom Steyer.

The Democratic Party's data capabilities are formidable. But they have been so worshipped in the press that the perception is they have not just the name of every voter but also their favorite toothpaste.

Ready for Hillary, however, is building a list of supporters "from scratch," Eadon said. It's a little bit of an exaggeration. But not entirely.

Democrats have an impressive array of voter information at their fingertips dating back several election cycles. And late in the fall of 2013, Ready for Hillary bought the 50-state voter file through NGP VAN, the company that coordinates the building of the Democratic Party's voter file. In January, it bought a list of all Hillary Clinton's 2008 supporters and emailed them, offering a free bumper sticker in exchange for a signup with the group.

Since then, Ready for Hillary has continued to sign people up through its website, through social media, and by showing up at fairs and community events. It has also built up a robust direct mail operation. But in Iowa, after those initial contacts, Eadon and Brandsgard have not been sitting at their desks dialing phone numbers for the last six months.

Instead they hit the road to meet people who have already signed up. A common misperception is that list-building is just a one and done activity: get the name, get the person's info, add it to the list, and move on to the next one. This is a static view of organizing that the Republican Party is still trying to overcome in many quarters.

The Democratic view is kinetic. Eadon and Brandsgard did events in the 12 biggest counties in Iowa early in the year. There they met with Clinton's most gung-ho supporters, and asked them to start building local support networks for Clinton and to start recruiting people to sign up with Ready for Hillary through their neighborhoods and their social networks. They also sent volunteers to county conventions in 84 of Iowa's 99 counties in

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

March.

But if that was the end of the engagement, RFH might have lost contact with the supporters and allowed their enthusiasm to lapse. And so the midterm elections have served as an important galvanizing agent for Ready for Hillary. The group has directed members to the state party in Iowa and helped turn them out to knock on doors and make phone calls for Democratic candidates on the ballot this fall. It has curried favor with the grass roots and establishment at the same time, while also keeping these Clinton fans engaged in the political process, and in touch with her proto-campaign in waiting.

The national group continued this virtuous cycle in the late summer and early fall, exchanging portions of its lists with 14 different campaigns across the country. The campaigns, which were not disclosed, got a list of active volunteers eager to help them campaign. And Ready for Hillary got a batch of names ripe for targeting over email. Ready for Hillary has also dispatched staff from its offices in the Washington area to 14 states across the country, including Iowa, to help the last-ditch effort to keep the Senate. Iowa's Senate race between Republican Joni Ernst and Democrat Bruce Braley is one of the closest in the nation.

The plan was always for RFH to dissolve after Clinton makes a decision in the months immediately following the midterms. Parkhomenko said that on the day Clinton announces, the group plans to send an email to its list, directing people to Clinton's campaign website. It will check to see who clicked the link in their email and visited Clinton's website, and follow up a few times with those who didn't. The final step would be to work with a third party vendor to compare Ready for Hillary's list with the Clinton campaign's list, to see which supporters it doesn't have.

The organizations would then do an even swap, with the Clinton campaign getting names and emails it doesn't already have, and Ready for Hillary getting the same from the campaign in exchange.

At that point, Ready for Hillary's work will be done. Iit will be up to Clinton's people to make sure they don't waste it.

Associated Press: "Arkansas Democrats calling, again, on Bill Clinton"

By Andrew DeMillo

October 14, 2014, 12:25 p.m. EDT

Arkansas Democrats are again enlisting their favorite political son as they try to fend off a Republican takeover of the state's top offices in November.

Democrats announced Tuesday that former President Bill Clinton will headline rallies this weekend in several Arkansas cities. Most of his stops will be in the 4th District, where one of his former Cabinet officials is running for Congress.

The visits come only a week after the former Arkansas governor led rallies in central and northern Arkansas. At those events, Clinton urged voters to not use the November election as a protest vote against President Barack Obama. Early voting beginsMonday.

Clinton will visit Hot Springs on Friday; Hope, where he was born, on Saturday; and North Little Rock, Pine Bluff and Forrest City on Sunday.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Tara McGuinness" <tara@progressiveaccountability.org>
To: bigcampaign@googlegroups.com
Date: 7/13/2008 4:25:35 AM
Subject: [big campaign] and this week's WI Framing (the article I meant to send)

"Also greeting McCain was a now customary contingent of costumed and non-costumed demonstrators: a Citizen Action cow ("Got Health Care? "), and McCain and Bush impersonators from One Wisconsin Now play-acting around a giant mock rubber stamp."

McCain targets women at Hudson campaign stop: At J&L Steel Erectors, senator touts himself as better choice than Obama (Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, The (KRT) Via Acquire Media NewsEdge) Jul. 12--HUDSON -- In a first-of-its-kind event for his campaign, a town hall meeting for women only, Republican John McCain argued Friday that "when you cut through all (of Democrat Barack Obama's) smooth rhetoric," McCain's economic agenda of business tax cuts, lower spending and expanded trade makes him a better candidate for women than Obama.

Xceed Contact Center – Diversifying on Existing Strengths Learn more, download free white paper.

Lauding Democrat Hillary Rodham Clinton's campaign, and even hailing the first female speaker of the House, Democrat Nancy Pelosi, McCain sought to connect with a demographic that, in his words, is "as we all know . . . a majority of the voters."

Find Solutions for Enterprises, SMBs & Service Providers at the INTERNET TELEPHONY Conference and EXPO West, September 16-18, 2008, Los Angeles, California.

McCain offered a biting critique of Obama, accusing him of being a tax-raiser and a naysayer, especially on energy issues, which have dominated the first heavy exchange of TV ads in the Great Lakes battleground states.

"His answer is no . . . no to more drilling, no to more nuclear power. . . . You know, for a guy whose official seal carried the motto of, 'Yes, we can,' Senator Obama's agenda sure has a lot of, 'No, we can't,' " McCain said.

Obama has not ruled out supporting nuclear power but has said he has safety concerns about it.

The Illinois Democrat also opposes the expanded offshore drilling that McCain is touting, arguing that it won't have an effect in oil production for years.

But the event, at J&L Steel Erectors, was intended as an outreach to women in particular. On Thursday, Obama hosted an economic event geared to women in northern Virginia.

At the Hudson event, McCain was accompanied by his wife, Cindy. The local businesswoman who introduced McCain -- company Chief Executive Officer LouAnne Reger -- joked about fashion, dieting and her two divorces as she warmed up the crowd.

"I know you all want to know how to lose five pounds in one week. All you have to do is host a town hall for John McCain," Reger told the crowd, drawing laughter.

"Do you want to know how to lose 30 pounds?" Cindy McCain said a few moments later. "Help your husband run for president."

The hundreds in the audience were overwhelmingly women.

"Yesterday (Thursday) in New York, Senator Obama went on at great length about how much he cares about women's issues," McCain said. "I believe him. But when you cut through all the smooth rhetoric, Senator Obama's policies would make it harder for women to start new businesses, harder for women to create or find new jobs, harder for women to manage the family budget, and harder for women and their families to meet their tax burden."

McCain supports extending the Bush tax cuts and also proposes a cut in corporate taxes and a doubling of the child credit. Obama has proposed a series of tax cuts for middle-income earners and below, while favoring higher income and capital gains taxes on people making more than $250,000.

McCain sought to assure voters in Hudson he felt their economic pain, especially after published comments this week by his longtime friend and adviser Phil Gramm that the United States has become a "nation of whiners" and the country is in a "mental recession." Gramm said later that he was referring to "our leaders" when he said that, not average people.

"Juggling family and career can be hard," McCain told his audience. "Now you have to deal with the rising costs of both running a business and raising a family."

Pay legislation 'flawed'

Democrats criticized McCain this week for opposing legislation in Congress aimed at ensuring pay parity for women; McCain has said the legislation was flawed.

"We have not done enough. I'm committed to making sure that there is equal pay for equal work," McCain told the crowd Friday.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In a statement Friday, Obama senior adviser Anita Dunn said: "Senator Obama believes every woman deserves equal pay for equal work. He has a plan to help working women by guaranteeing seven paid sick days to the 22 million who currently have none, and by providing child tax credits, additional after-school programs, and a tax cut for 71 million working women and eliminating capital gains taxes for 8.7 million women who own small businesses or start-ups. Senator McCain thinks the Supreme Court was right to make it harder for women to challenge pay discrimination at work, and he opposed legislation that Obama co-sponsored to reverse that decision."

In an Obama campaign call with reporters Thursday in advance of the McCain visit, U.S. Rep. Tammy Baldwin (D-Madison) said, "There could not be a starker difference (between the two), both with regard to working women and pay equity."

Baldwin said that for "all the strain that the middle class in Wisconsin and the rest of the nation is feeling right now, Senator McCain is not offering any meaningful short-term (stimulus) plan or meaningful middle class tax cut."

A recent report by the nonpartisan Tax Policy Center found that McCain's tax cuts would go far more to upper earners, while Obama would raise taxes on upper earners, but lower them more than McCain for people below the highest brackets. McCain argues that his plan would do more to stimulate job creation, and thereby benefit Americans broadly.

Third visit to Wisconsin

McCain's visit was his third to Wisconsin in the general election campaign and brought him to what is easily the fastest-growing part of the state, St. Croix County, which gave President Bush a nine-point cushion in 2004.

High-growth suburbs have proved fertile for the GOP in recent elections. Bush won Wisconsin's six fastest-growing counties four years ago (although he badly lost the biggest top-10 county in growth, Dane).

Since Hudson is in the Twin Cities media market, the visit is also a media two-fer, drawing heavy coverage in Minnesota and Wisconsin, both states that Democrats narrowly carried in 2004 and that McCain would like to flip from blue to red.

"This is a battleground state. There's no doubt that Wisconsin will be one of those states that decide who the next president of the United States is," McCain said Friday, although most recent polls have given Obama a double-digit lead in both states.

The crowd at Friday's event was made up largely, but not entirely, of McCain supporters. Some people interviewed supported Obama or were undecided.

The McCain campaign said seats were mostly allocated through a group of pro-McCain women in the state who recruited friends, phone-tree style, to come.

Also greeting McCain was a now customary contingent of costumed and non-costumed demonstrators: a Citizen Action cow ("Got Health Care?"), and McCain and Bush impersonators from One Wisconsin Now play-acting around a giant mock rubber stamp.

To see more of the Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, or to subscribe to the newspaper, go to http://www.jsonline.com .

Copyright (c) 2008, Milwaukee Journal Sentinel Distributed by McClatchy-Tribune Information Services.
For reprints, email tmsreprints@permissionsgroup.com , call 800-374-7985 or 847-635-6550, send a fax to 847-635-6968, or write to The Permissions Group Inc., 1247 Milwaukee Ave., Suite 303, Glenview, IL 60025, USA.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

--~--~---------~--~----~-----------~-------~--~----~
You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail ryan@campaigntodefendamerica.org with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.
-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "German Marshall Fund" <press@gmfus.org>
To: podesta@law.georgetown.edu
Date: 11/3/2015 6:00:00 PM
Subject: GMF World Wire: The Atlantic Dialogues Wraps | Turkish and Polish Elections | Migration

If you have problems viewing this email, you can view it as a web page. To view the mobile-friendly web page click here

G | M | F The German Marshall Fund of the United States
STRENGTHENING TRANSATLANTIC COOPERATION

Our Organization | Our Work | Our Events | Our Experts | Support GMF

GMF's World Wire

November 4, 2015

The Atlantic Dialogues 2015: Prosperity and Security Across Latitudes

This year's edition of The Atlantic Dialogues brought together a diverse group of public- and private-sector leaders from around the Atlantic Basin to discuss cross-regional issues ranging from security to economics, migration to energy. Watch the videos, read the transcripts, and see the photos from the conference in Marrakesh, Morocco.

WATCH HERE

After Turkey's Elections: Implications for the Future

On November 4 at an event in Washington, DC, GMF experts will discuss the impact of Turkey's election on November 1 and how transatlantic allies can help Turkey better cope with its security risks.

REGISTER HERE

The Law and Justice Win in Poland: Implications for the United States, Germany, and the EU

GMF experts Michal Baranowski, Daniela Schwarzer, and Hans Kundnani analyze what the Polish elections means for its allies, as well as Poland's position in the European Union.

READ MORE

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Tweet of the Week

@M_Baranowski :
Fascinating conv with #NATO Dept SecGen A.Vershbow @NATOdsg on #Russia , #A2/AD & #deterrence @gmfus #VoiceoftheFlank pic.twitter.com/9KcvfhNcBr

RETWEET

Migration: Not a Problem to be Solved, but Challenge to be Managed PODCAST : While at The Atlantic Dialogues, GMF's Astrid Zeibarth and Adnan Kifayat talk with Katrin Hirseland and Anna Wittenborg about how different regions can respond to migration , particularly in Europe now.

LISTEN HERE

Minding the Economic Gap: The Role of Refugees in Economic Development

Alissa Akins | As refugees arrive in Europe, cities across Europe and the U.S. should consider proactively attracting migrants to their communities as part of a long-term inclusion strategy.

READ MORE

Policy Leadership Civil Society

Follow

Strengthening Transatlantic Cooperation

Our Organization
About GMF
Career Opportunities
Press Room

Our Work
Leadership
Policy
Civil Society
Research & Analysis
Transatlantic Academy

Our Events
Major Conferences & Forums
Recent & Upcoming Events

Our Experts
Find an Expert

Manage preferences | Forward email | Unsubscribe | Subscribe

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Alexandria Phillips" <aphillips@hillaryclinton.com>
To:	"Alexandria Phillips" <aphillips@hillaryclinton.com>
Date:	5/19/2015 12:48:06 AM
Subject:	H4A News Clips 5.19.15
Attachments:	H4A 5.19.15 Clips.docx

H4A Press Clips

May 19, 2015

SUMMARY OF TODAY'S NEWS

Yesterday Hillary Clinton spoke in Iowa at the home of Dean Genth and Gary Swenson about the economy, small businesses and drug abuse and mental health.

The New York Times did a piece on Hillary Clinton's first impression on voters saying that only 1% of voters do now know who Hillary Clinton is. Also saying that during she has used the smaller sessions to share lesser-known vignettes from her past: her mother's impoverished upbringing; her middle-class childhood in Chicago; her work in the 1970s as an advocate for children; her juggling work and child rearing as a young lawyer in Arkansas.

The Clinton Foundation will disclose this week a list of nearly 100 paid speeches given by Bill, Hillary and Chelsea Clinton dating to 2002. On Friday, Mrs. Clinton's campaign released her personal financial disclosure form for 2014 through the present, which reported that she and her husband had earned $25 million delivering paid speeches.

The State Department is proposing a deadline of January 2016 to complete its review and public release of 55,000 pages of emails former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton exchanged on a private server and turned over to her former agency last December.

LAST NIGHTS EVENING NEWS

There was no 2016 coverage on last night's major outlets except for to highlight President Clinton's tweet to President Obama about his new twitter handle. Instead they covered the biker gang shooting in Waco, Texas where 9 died and 170 were arrested, coverage of the progress being made by Amtrak to recover the affected tracks. Also featured on ABC World News Tonight was a special segment on Elian Gonzalez and immigration.

SUMMARY OF TODAY'S NEWS..... 1

LAST NIGHTS EVENING NEWS..... 1

TODAY'S KEY STORIES..... 4

In Iowa for second visit, Clinton keeps to her low-key, tilt-left strategy // WaPo // Robert Costa - May 18, 2015 4

Why Hillary Clinton's Campaign Isn't the Most Liberal Ever // TIME // Haley Sweetland Edwards - May 18, 2015 6

Hillary Clinton May Not Need a Second Chance to Make a First Impression // NYT // Amy Chozick – May 19, 2015 7

State Department won't release Hillary Clinton's emails until January 2016 // Politico // Josh Gerstein - May 18, 2015 10

More Clinton Fees to Be Disclosed // WSJ // Rebecca Ballhaus and Peter Nicholas - May 18, 2015 12

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

SOCIAL MEDIA..... 13

Bill Clinton (5/18/15, 12:57 PM) Welcome to @Twitter, @POTUS! One question: Does that username stay with the office? #askingforafriend 13

President Obama (5/18/15, 2:07 PM) Good question, @billclinton. The handle comes with the house. Know anyone interested in @FLOTUS? 13

Matthew Boyle (5/18/15, 8:21 AM) @RandPaul to @HillaryClinton : "your husband passed the laws that put a generation of black men in jail" 14

Katie Zezima (5/18/15, 8:22 AM) Paul: If I'm the Republican nominee I'll be competitive in Philly: "I'll ask Hillary Clinton: 'what have you done for criminal justice?
'"..... 14

Josh McElveen (5/18/15, 9:04 AM) BREAKING @KellyAyotte says @RepFrankGuinta should resign his seat in wake of FEC deal. #nhpolitics
#wmur..... 14

HRC NATIONAL COVERAGE..... 14

Clinton's super PAC fundraising irks progressives // CNN // MJ Lee - May 18, 2015..... 14

Back in Iowa, Hillary Goes Big on Small Business // Real Clear Politics // Alexis Simendinger - May 18, 2015
16

Clinton talks economy, campaign finance on return to Iowa // Des Moines Register // Tony Leys - May 18, 2015 18

Hillary Clinton Campaign Begins Drafting Policy Solutions To Heroin Epidemic // Huffington Post // Marina Fang – May 18, 2015 20

Clinton Returns to Iowa to Help Rally Caucus Volunteers // ABC News // Julie Pace - May 18, 2015 21

Hillary Clinton's second wave of Iowa courtship arrives in Mason City // CNN // Dan Merica - May 18, 2015 22

10 questions for Hillary Clinton // CBS News // Rebecca Kaplan – May 19, 2015..... 24

Hillary Clinton Backs Obama Plan To Reverse Police Militarization // Huffington Post // Ryan Grim and Ryan J. Reilly - May 18, 2015 28

Hillary Clinton: "Grateful" For Obama's Work on Economy, But "Deck Is Still Stacked In Favor Of Those At The Top" // Real Clear Politics // Ian Schwartz - May 18, 2015..... 29

US Reps. Jim McGovern, Joe Kennedy campaign for Hillary Clinton // Mass Live // Shira Schoeberg - May 18, 2015 29

Clinton Sets Citizens United as Supreme Court Litmus Test // ABC News // Julie Pace, Associated Press - May 18, 2015 30

Gowdy: Benghazi report may leave questions unresolved // Greenville Online // Mary Troyan - May 18, 2015 31

Clinton Friend's Libya Role Blurs Lines of Politics and Business // NYT // Nicholas Confessor and Michael S. Schmidt – May 18, 2015 33

The long and winding road ahead for Hillary Clinton's e-mails // Washington Post // Fred Barbash – May 19, 2015 37

What Sidney Blumenthal's Memos to Hillary Clinton Said, and How They Were Handled // NYT // Michael S. Schmidt - May 18, 2015 38

Hillary Clinton's army of trolls // Politico // Annie Karni – May 19, 2015..... 40

Hillary Clinton was paid millions by tech industry for speeches // WaPo // Matea Gold, Rosalind S. Helderman, and Anu Narayanswamy - May 18, 2015..... 43

Clinton Criticism of Wealth Leaves Us 1% Convinced // Bloomberg // C. Thompson and Lauren Arnold - ay 18, 2015 47

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

CNN commentator: Hillary Clinton's 'strong point' is her last name, husband // WaPo // Erik Wemple – May 18, 2015 48

Politics More: 2016 Elections Hillary Clinton Media // Business Insider // Colin Campbell – May 18, 2015 49

Hillary Clinton Paid by Jeb Bush's Education Company // First Look // Lee Fang – May 18, 2015 50

Rand Paul: Bill Clinton put 'generation' of black men in prison // The Hill // Alexander Bolton – May 18, 2015 50

Bill Clinton signals he can be Hillary's second fiddle // The Hill // Niaill Stanage – May 19, 2015 51

Bill Clinton's Hud Secretary: Julian Castro Team Hillary's Top VP Choice // Breitbart News // May 18, 2015 54

House liberals play hard-to-get with Hillary Clinton // Politico // Lauren French – May 19, 2015 54

5 Things You Might Not Know About Hillary Clinton // NYT // Amy Chozick – May 19, 2015 57

What Young Feminists Think of Hillary Clinton // National Journal // Molly Mirhashem - May 16, 2015 58

OTHER DEMOCRATS NATIONAL COVERAGE..... 64

Why Not Martin O'Malley? // Harvard Political Review // Quinn Mulholland - May 18, 2015 64

Bernie Sanders Wants to Be President, but He's Already Facebook Royalty // NYT // Nick Corasaniti - May 18, 2015 66

Sanders: Make Wall St. pay college tuition // Burlington Free Press // April Burbank – May 18, 2015 68

Elizabeth Warren Details Obama's Broken Trade Promises // Huffington Post // Zack Carter - May 18, 2015 69

Snoop Dogg: I'll be voting for Hillary Clinton // The Hill // Judy Kurtz - May 18, 2015..... 70

GOP..... 71

In Philadelphia, Rand Paul Talks Privatized Amtrak and Criminal Justice // Bloomberg // David Weigel - May 18, 2015 71

Rand Paul Vows to Filibuster to Block Patriot Act // ABC News // Steve Peoples, Associated Press - May 18, 2015 72

Rand Paul Cites Questionable Benghazi Reporting In Forthcoming Book // Buzzfeed News // Molly Ward – May 18, 2015 73

Why We Must Reform the VA // Medium // Jeb Bush – May 18, 2015..... 75

Jeb Bush's GOP Rivals Keep Him Front and Center // WSJ // Reid J. Epstein - May 17, 2015 76

Jeb Bush stands by opposition to same-sex marriage // CNN // Alexandra Jaffe - May 18, 2015 78

Jeb Bush Says Christian Business Owners Can Refuse To Serve Gay Weddings // Huffington Post // Marina Fang - May 17, 2015 79

Bush insists he's not writing off Iowa // Politico // Eli Stokols - May 18, 2015..... 80

Team Jeb: He's held to 'different standard' than Hillary // Washington Examiner // Byron York - May 18, 2015 82

Why Marco Rubio could beat Jeb Bush // CNN // Julian Zelizer - May 18, 2015..... 83

Marco Rubio has listed himself as 'white' instead of 'Hispanic.' News flash: He's both. // Miami Herald // Patricia Mazzei - May 18, 2015 86

Supreme Court Won't Block Probe of Scott Walker's Recall Campaign' // Bloomberg // Greg Stohr - May 18 2015 87

Scott Walker's Long History of Dirty Tricks // The Daily Beast // David Freedlander – May 18, 2015 88

Records indicate Scott Walker was copied on letter promising loan to donor // Journal Sentinel // Jason Stein and Patrick Marley – May 18, 2015..... 93

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Scott Walker touts charters, vouchers in charter-heavy New Orleans Monday // NOLA // Jessica Williams - May 18, 2015 96

Chris Christie Now Opposes Creating a Pathway to Citizenship for Undocumented Workers // Bloomberg // Terrence Dopp – May 18, 2015 97

Gov. Christie: American exceptionalism isn't a punchline — it's a set of principles. // Medium // Chris Christie – May 18, 2015 98

Christie to Call for Larger Military, More US Intervention // ABC News // Jim Colvin, Associated Press - May 18, 2015 113

Chris Christie, Rand Paul Bring Patriot Act Debate to Campaign Trail // WSJ // Heather Haddon and Janet Hook - May 18, 2015 114

Chris Christie Now Opposes Creating a Pathway to Citizenship for Undocumented Workers // Bloomberg // Terrence Dopp - May 18, 2015 116

Christie cites experience running against female opponent // Philly // The Associated Press - May 18, 2015 117

Chris Christie will be in New Hampshire when Obama visits NJ: Chris Christie in the news // Cleveland // Sabrina Eaton - May 18, 2015 118

Sen. Lindsey Graham on White House bid: 'I'm running' // Politico // Katie Glueck - May 18, 2015 118

Sen. Lindsey Graham Is 'Having A Blast' As He Preps Presidential Run // NPR // Jessica Taylor and Don Gonyea - May 18, 2015 119

Bobby Jindal forming exploratory committee for White House run // Politico // Jonathan Topaz - May 18, 2015 121

Connecting the Dots Behind the 2016 Candidates // NYT // Gregor Aisch and Karen Yourish - May 17, 2015 122

TOP NEWS..... 123

DOMESTIC..... 123

Obama to Limit Military-Style Equipment for Police Forces // NYT // Julie Hirschfeld Davis - May 18, 2015 123

Obama foundation brings in $5.4 million // Politico // Josh Gerstein - May 18, 2015..... 125

Feds Project Lake Mead Below Drought Trigger Point in 2017 // ABC News // Ken Ritter, Associated Press - May 18, 2015 127

INTERNATIONAL..... 129

Kerry, in Seoul, slams North Korea // WaPo // Carol Morello - May 18, 2015..... 129

Bombing and clashes resume as Yemen heads for 'catastrophe' // WaPo // Ali al-Mujahed and Erin Cunningham - May 18, 2015 130

OPINIONS/EDITORIALS/BLOGS..... 132

Christine Quinn on Hillary Clinton & Marriage Equality // Out // Christine Quinn - May 18, 2015 132

Why is Hillary Clinton Tacking Left? // National Journal // Ron Fournier - May 18, 2015 133

You won't believe Hillary Clinton's spin on avoiding the press // WaPo // Chris Cillizza – May 18, 2015 135

TODAY'S KEY STORIES

In Iowa for second visit, Clinton keeps to her low-key, tilt-left strategy // WaPo // Robert Costa - May 18, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

MASON CITY, Iowa — Hillary Rodham Clinton's appearance here Monday at the home of Dean Genth and Gary Swenson — one of the first gay couples to marry in Iowa — spoke volumes about the political pitch and style of her nascent presidential campaign.

Even as a global celebrity and the overwhelming Democratic front-runner, Clinton is doggedly focused at this early stage on highlighting her progressive values and on what she called "people-to-people connections" — aggressive organizing in the state where she placed a disappointing third in the 2008 caucuses.

The event — the first of Clinton's two-day visit — was tailored to fit that low-key, tilt-left strategy, which her campaign hopes will signal that she is taking little for granted in the primary race. She arrived quietly in a minivan trailed by Secret Service agents and ducked inside to greet a crowd of volunteers, who were given "commit to caucus" cards to share with friends. The tightly controlled setting also allowed her to continue to steer clear of the press pack following her.

Holding court in the living room, Clinton embraced her ties to President Obama and cast herself as his tested and natural heir. It was an acknowledgment that Obama's leftover network remains a coveted coalition in Iowa and an assertion that her time on the world stage is an asset, rather than a liability, as Republicans have challenged.

"I'm going into this race with my eyes wide open about how hard it is to be president of the United States," Clinton told approximately 50 Democrats gathered. "I do have that experience to know what is possible and how best to proceed."

On economics, her message was populist. Facing vocal competition from bank-bashing Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) and other likely rivals for the Democratic nomination, Clinton said she is as frustrated as anyone with the gap between the rich and the poor.

"The deck is still stacked in favor of those at the top," Clinton said. She attacked "hedge-fund managers" and other financiers for exploiting loopholes in the U.S. tax code.

"Warren Buffett has said it, but so have a lot of other people. There's something wrong when the average American CEO makes 300 times more than the typical American worker," she said.

But Clinton continued her stretch of declining to take questions from reporters — ignoring the media contingent outside the house and bypassing controversial topics, such as the debate over U.S. trade policy that has roiled Congress for weeks. Reporters were ushered out of the home after she delivered her remarks, unable to record her exchanges with attendees.

Clinton's talk also came days after reports that she and husband, former president Bill Clinton, have earned more than $25 million since early last year in speaking fees — a development she did not mention during her comments about the unsettling power of wealthy Americans.

Republicans seized on her event's closed nature and her refusal to take questions from reporters. On Twitter, the Republican National Committee promoted its "#AskHillary" hashtag campaign in an attempt to pressure Clinton to engage with the media.

As Clinton left the house Monday, reporters shouted questions that went unanswered, including this from Fox News's Ed Henry: "Why won't you answer any questions?"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton is scheduled to appear Tuesday in nearby Cedar Falls for a roundtable with small-business leaders. The stop, like Monday's, will be open only to invited guests.

Many people in the house were excited about getting a chance to hear her up close, but some onlookers were less than enthused.

Doug Bell, 59, a farmer from Thornton, Iowa, waited outside for an hour to catch a glimpse of Clinton but left without getting a chance to speak with her.

"I caucused for her in 2008, but the world has changed, and I'd like to get her update about what's been happening with us, the backbone of America," he said.

Clinton said she understood the concerns of everyday Iowans and would guard the landmark policies of the Obama years, particularly the president's health-care law, to "reignite" the national economy and give a lift to those struggling.

"We aren't running yet, but we are on our feet," Clinton said.

Turning to the issue of drug abuse and mental health, Clinton sounded compassionate and solemn. "It is below the surface people are talking about it," she said. "It is something hard to deal with."

"I did not believe I would be standing in your living room talking about the drug abuse problem, the suicide problem and the mental health problem," she said. "Now I am convinced I have to talk about it."

The visit was also a nod to solidarity with the gay rights movement, including her own shift toward supporting same-sex marriage as a constitutional right. Genth, one of her hosts, is a board member of One Iowa, the largest gay rights organization in the state, and was a prominent backer of Obama in 2008. He and Swenson were married in 2009, soon after the Iowa Supreme Court ruled in favor of same-sex unions.

Across Iowa, Clinton's campaign already has 21 organizers and six regional directors building her ground game — far more than other Democratic contenders and part of her plan to cultivate skeptical liberals who may be tempted to back a lesser-known candidate.

For Clinton, that means going small, rather than big. Cookies, grapes and bottles of water were offered at the home, and no signs were displayed on the lawn. If it wasn't for the row of satellite trucks outside, there would have been little evidence in the neighborhood that a presidential candidate was mixing and mingling just up the block.

"It is the best way to make those connections," Clinton said of her approach.

Why Hillary Clinton's Campaign Isn't the Most Liberal Ever // TIME // Haley Sweetland Edwards - May 18, 2015

A number of Beltway pundits have recently decided that Hillary Clinton is not just running a liberal campaign, but perhaps the most liberal campaign in decades. But that's not entirely accurate.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Just as you can't step into the same river twice, no presidential campaign ever faces the same electorate. And on a range of issues, America has become more liberal since the last time Clinton ran.

Without exception, the positions that have been cited as "boldly liberal" are entirely in line with mainstream public opinion.

Take gay marriage, which Clinton endorsed in 2013. As of last year, 6 in 10 Americans—and a whopping 74% of Democrats—were in favor of it too, according to a recent NBC/Wall Street Journal poll.

Or immigration. Last week, Clinton was congratulated by many liberals for backing a broad path to citizenship for roughly 11 million undocumented people. But in an NBC/WSJ poll last fall, 60% of Americans were in favor of a "path to citizenship" and nearly 75% were even more in favor of it if the plan involved asking immigrants to jump through certain hoops, such as paying back taxes.

Or criminal justice reform. Last week, Clinton called for reforming sentencing laws and reducing how much military-grade equipment is funneled off to police departments. But as of last year, that's pretty much exactly where most Americans were, too: 63% were against mandatory minimum sentences for non-violent crimes, according to Pew Research, and nearly 60% thought militarization of police had gone too far.

The same is true on other socially liberal issues that Clinton has backed lately, much to the delight of the liberal base, including better gun control measures, a minimum wage increase, and paid family leave. As of 2013, 91% of Americans supported mandating criminal background checks before someone is allowed to purchase a weapon, and 60% supported reinstating a ban on assault weapons, according to Gallup. Roughly two-thirds of Americans are now in favor of raising the minimum wage and 60% believe that employers ought to give paid time-off to employees when they're sick, according to a February AP-GfK poll.

In early May, liberal activist groups claimed victory after Clinton's campaign manager, Robby Mook, hinted that the Democratic front-runner would soon announce a comprehensive plan to make college more affordable. But again, she's right in line with most Americans. According to the Harvard Institute of Politics, 79% of Americans described student debt as "a problem" that needs to be addressed.

At the same time, Clinton has kept mum on some liberal ideas that are more divisive. She's avoided taking a stance on President Obama's big new free trade deal, the Trans-Pacific Partnership, which many liberals have criticized. While she's made some populist remarks about reining in Wall Street, she's stopped short of getting specific on liberal ideas like capping CEO pay or breaking up the big banks. And she's not taken a definitive stance on the construction of the Keystone XL oil pipeline, which has become a signature issue for environmentalists hoping to address climate change.

It's possible, then, to imagine a more liberal campaign than the one Clinton is running. And if seems like she has the most liberal campaign in history, that's partly because she's facing an America that is more liberal on those issues.

Hillary Clinton May Not Need a Second Chance to Make a First Impression // NYT // Amy Chozick – May 19, 2015

Jeb Bush has his famous last name as a calling card, for better or worse. But Scott Walker's name does not ring many bells outside Wisconsin.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Ted Cruz is not even well known in Texas.

Republican presidential hopefuls will spend millions of dollars trying to get voters to remember their names and something that sets them apart. But the one White House contender who needs no introduction faces a different sort of problem:

Everybody knows Hillary Rodham Clinton.

She did not just co-star in a national soap opera during her husband's eight-year presidency: She reinvented herself as a senator from the nation's biggest media market, New York; reintroduced herself again, this time to the nation, as a presidential candidate in 2008 and then remade herself into the country's chief diplomat.

She never left the stage.

Not since Richard M. Nixon mounted a comeback in 1968, historians and pollsters say, has a candidate entered a presidential contest with so low a bar for name recognition or so high a bar for changing voters' opinions.

The campaign playbooks of Nixon and Mrs. Clinton seem to share some pages.

Nixon strove to show a more casual side by bypassing journalists and staging town-hall-style events — orchestrated by his media consultant, Roger Ailes — at theaters across the country packed with friendly audiences. Taking softball questions, he kept to his talking points and struck television viewers as more relaxed than the sweaty man they remembered from his debates against John F. Kennedy in 1960.

"A lot of people who thought they'd made up their minds about him saw a different version," said Kenneth L. Khachigian, a speechwriter for Nixon and later for Ronald Reagan. "That's a prime example of someone who had a lot of perceived political baggage and who remade himself."

Mrs. Clinton, too, has been ducking reporters and instead holding round-table discussions with carefully chosen voters in early voting states. (Aides say the questions those voters ask are not screened.) She has used the sessions to share lesser-known vignettes from her past: her mother's impoverished upbringing; her middle-class childhood in Chicago; her work in the 1970s as an advocate for children; her juggling work and child rearing as a young lawyer in Arkansas.

On Tuesday, she will talk to small-business owners in Cedar Falls, Iowa, part of her second swing through the state.

At one event in Las Vegas, she sat with high school students whose parents are undocumented immigrants. It was a canny move: Young people and Latinos are two demographic groups whose opinions Mrs. Clinton may still be able to shape, Democratic pollsters say.

There are not many others.

Only 1 percent of voters have never heard of Mrs. Clinton, a CNN poll found in March (suggesting the network's pollsters managed to reach a few people living in caves).

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A larger number, but still just 11 percent of all voters, said they did not know enough about her to form an opinion, according to a New York Times-CBS poll published this month. By contrast, 43 percent said they did not know enough about Mr. Bush, the best-known Republican contender.

On the bright side for Mrs. Clinton, she enters the race with a devoted base of supporters, mostly women, who appear solidly in her corner. Women in big states like Ohio and Pennsylvania heavily favored Mrs. Clinton in the 2008 Democratic primaries, driving her defeat of Barack Obama in those states.

Mrs. Clinton remains highly popular with African-Americans, college-educated women and single women, said Celinda Lake, a Democratic pollster.

Scott Keeter, director of survey research at the Pew Research Center, said Mrs. Clinton's profile in the polls was like that of an incumbent facing re-election.

"We know from political science that a significant majority of the electorate, upward of 90 percent, know how they'll vote," he said. "You're talking about 10 to 15 percent of the electorate who are in play, and then you have to factor in enthusiasm and turnout."

The slivers of swing voters Mrs. Clinton's campaign hopes she can sway include married women in the suburbs. "They love her experience," Ms. Lake said, "and they like the idea of having a woman president."

The unknown"wild card" is whether Mrs. Clinton's chance to make history as the first female president will motivate voters who may be less inclined to support her, Mr. Keeter said.

Similarly, voters under 30 years old were far more likely to be undecided or to say they did not have an opinion of Mrs. Clinton, according to the Times-CBS poll.

"Even though she's so well known, there's an aspect of a slate that can be written upon," said Jennifer Granholm, the former governor of Michigan who is co-chairwoman of Priorities USA Action, a pro-Clinton "super PAC." "Young people may need to be reminded about her."

This year's cozy round-table discussions are not the first time Mrs. Clinton has tried to show voters a softer side. In her 2008 campaign, though, she waited until her favorability ratings had fallen during her heated primary battle with Mr. Obama.

The effort then included warm video testimonials about "the Hillary I know" from her oldest friends and people she had met as a senator. "I thought she was a bit remote," Shannon Mallozzi, a Long Island mother said in one video. "She sat with me, and she was just phenomenal. That day, it was two moms sitting in a car."

But the effort seemed to some to be a calculated attempt by a candidate who was behind.

Trying too hard to change voters' minds about a candidate's character or life story can be a trap, as Mitt Romney discovered in 2012.

Stung by attacks portraying him as a ruthless corporate titan, his aides tried to change public opinion about Mr. Romney's years at Bain Capital. Kevin Madden, who was a senior adviser to Mr. Romney, said it was a mistake not to keep focused on communicating the candidate's forward-looking ideas.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Instead of reintroducing his businessman profile, it should have been, 'How are we going to tackle the big economic challenges?'" he said.

The 2016 campaign is still in its early days, making this the prime time for the candidates to try to shape what the voters think of them. The later it gets, the harder that can be.

In 2004, the Democratic nominee, John Kerry, who battled an image of being effete, took a well-publicized hunting trip dressed in camouflage, hoping to show he could relate to voters who drive pickup trucks with gun racks.

"That was authentic, but perceived as inauthentic," said Mark Mellman, a pollster who advised Mr. Kerry. "The truth is, he did actually bag a lot of birds on that trip."

"Changing people's deeply held views," he added, "is the hardest thing to do in politics and in life."

State Department won't release Hillary Clinton's emails until January 2016 // Politico // Josh Gerstein - May 18, 2015

The State Department is proposing a deadline of January 2016 to complete its review and public release of 55,000 pages of emails former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton exchanged on a private server and turned over to her former agency last December.

The proposal came Monday night in a document related to a Freedom of Information Act lawsuit Vice News filed in January seeking all of Clinton's emails.

"The Department's plan ... would result in its review being completed by the end of the year. To factor in the holidays, however, the Department would ask the Court to adopt a proposed completion date of January 15, 2016," State's acting director of Information Programs and Services John Hackett said in a declaration filed in U.S. District Court in Washington.

"The Department understands the considerable public's [sic] interest in these records and is endeavoring to complete the review and production of them as expeditiously as possible. The collection is, however, voluminous and, due to the breadth of topics, the nature of the communications, and the interests of several agencies, presents several challenges," Hackett added.

The controversy over Clinton's private email account led to a turbulent start for her presidential campaign, which she announced last month. She has said she wants the emails public and is eager for State to release them as quickly as possible.

The State Department's proposal, however, could mean a delay of almost 13 months between the time Clinton turned over her records and the bulk of them being made public.

Soon after the New York Times revealed in March that Clinton had exclusively used a private email account as secretary of state, State Department spokespeople repeatedly said that they expected the review of the Clinton records to take “several months.” They did not immediately respond to messages Monday night seeking an explanation of why that estimate was so off base.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hackett said 12 State staffers have been assigned full-time to reviewing the Clinton emails and that it took until sometime this month to scan in the records, which were provided on paper by Clinton in 12 “banker’s boxes” in December. He said the scanning process took five weeks and was “complicated” by some of the printouts of Clinton emails being double-sided.

State Department officials did say they planned an earlier disclosure of a batch of the emails provided to a House committee investigating the Benghazi attacks. However, the department’s spokespeople have said only that the initial release will come “soon,” declining to be more specific about the timing of that first release.

Asked by POLITICO Friday when that Libya-related batch of records should emerge, State spokesman Jeff Rathke was vague. “I don’t have an update to share. But yes, we’re aware that there’s interest out there, certainly,” he said at a daily briefing for reporters.

State Department lawyers have complained in court of a “crushing burden” of FOIA requests as well as at least 79 FOIA lawsuits pending against the department. They have also cited the need to prioritize the Clinton email project as a reason for delays in other FOIA cases.

The Iowa caucuses are due to be held Feb. 1, 2016 — just two weeks after the proposed release of Clinton’s emails.

More Clinton Fees to Be Disclosed // WSJ // Rebecca Ballhaus and Peter Nicholas - May 18, 2015

WASHINGTON—The Clinton Foundation will disclose this week a list of nearly 100 paid speeches given by Bill, Hillary and Chelsea Clinton dating to 2002 for which the foundation accepted the fees, officials at the charity said Monday, providing a window into another source of revenue for a family philanthropy whose fundraising practices have cast a shadow over Mrs. Clinton’s young presidential campaign.

On Friday, Mrs. Clinton’s campaign released her personal financial disclosure form for 2014 through the present, which reported that she and her husband had earned $25 million delivering paid speeches. Not included on that disclosure were payments for at least five speeches that Mrs. Clinton directed to her family’s foundation.

The Clinton campaign and a spokesman for Bill Clinton said that by law, the speeches didn’t need to be disclosed because the speaking fees were donated to charity. Separately, a foundation official said the decision to post the list was made in prior weeks, before Mrs. Clinton’s personal financial disclosure form was filed, a requirement that federal law makes of presidential candidates.

The foundation will report the fees associated with each speech in ranges, officials said. Some of these fees are already known.

Federal law leaves room for interpretation on whether candidates are required to include speeches on that form if the funds go to charity. Guidelines posted on the website of the Office of Government Ethics, which oversees personal financial disclosures, say payments of any kind—including those given to a charity—must be reported “as usual.”

But Vince Salamone, a spokesman for the office that oversees the ethics program for the executive branch said there are scenarios in which a candidate wouldn’t be required to disclose speaking fees. If a person was in the role as an “agent” for the charity and the money was paid directly to the charity, disclosure wouldn’t be required, the office said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mr. Salamone said in a statement that “disclosure of speaking fees is not required when a public filer or the filer’s spouse is acting as an agent of an organization and payment is made directly to that organization.”

He added: “The rule is different when the speaking is done in a personal capacity and the fees are directed or donated to charity, in which case disclosure would be required.”

The spokesman for the Clintons said they had complied with all disclosure requirements. “Speaking engagements for which fees are designated for the foundation do not fall within those personal income reporting requirements,” the spokesman said. “The payment generated from that service is listed as revenue to the foundation on its tax documents.”

Since Mrs. Clinton launched her campaign last month, the foundation has been taking steps to become more transparent. Starting in July, it will begin releasing donor names quarterly. Previously, the names were released annually.

Still, critics seized on the omission of those speeches from the campaign filing to paint the former secretary of state as secretive. Her disclosure came on the heels of recent revelations that some names of donors to organizations affiliated with the Clinton Foundation remained undisclosed. “This is just another example of Hillary Clinton trying to play by a different set of rules,” said Allison Moore, a spokeswoman for the Republican National Committee.

The new list will include speeches Mrs. Clinton made at colleges and universities, which could revive criticism of the Clintons for accepting payments—even on their foundation’s behalf—from schools that have been hard-pressed to keep tuition costs down.

Last June, Mrs. Clinton faced a backlash when the Las Vegas Review-Journal reported that the University of Nevada at Las Vegas was paying her $225,000 to deliver the keynote speech at a university fundraising event. Students called for her to reject the fee. A spokesman declined to confirm the amount of the payment at the time but said such fees are paid through private donations and that no university funds are involved.

A review of Mrs. Clinton’s financial disclosures while she was secretary of state shows she has long followed the practice of omitting speeches where she or her husband directed the payment to the Clinton Foundation.

In May 2012, Mr. Clinton was paid $250,000 for speaking at the Luskin Lecture for Thought Leadership at the University of California, Los Angeles. The fee was donated to the Clinton Foundation, a spokesman for the university said, and didn’t appear in Mrs. Clinton’s disclosure forms.

In the 11 years during which Mrs. Clinton filed financial disclosures as a U.S. senator and as secretary of state, she reported that her husband made $105 million in speaking fees. All told, since leaving the White House, the Clintons have earned at least $130 million in speaking fees.

Mrs. Clinton also delivered several speeches at universities in 2013, when she wasn’t required to disclose her income—including one at the University of Buffalo for $275,000, which she donated to her foundation.

SOCIAL MEDIA

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Bill Clinton (5/18/15, 12:57 PM) Welcome to @Twitter, @POTUS! One question: Does that username stay with the office? #askingforafriend

President Obama (5/18/15, 2:07 PM) Good question, @billclinton. The handle comes with the house. Know anyone interested in @FLOTUS?

Matthew Boyle (5/18/15, 8:21 AM) @RandPaul to @HillaryClinton : "your husband passed the laws that put a generation of black men in jail"

Katie Zezima (5/18/15, 8:22 AM) Paul: If I'm the Republican nominee I'll be competitive in Philly: "I'll ask Hillary Clinton: 'what have you done for criminal justice?'"

Josh McElveen (5/18/15, 9:04 AM) BREAKING @KellyAyotte says @RepFrankGuinta should resign his seat in wake of FEC deal. #nhpolitics #wmur

HRC NATIONAL COVERAGE

Clinton's super PAC fundraising irks progressives // CNN // MJ Lee - May 18, 2015

(CNN)Hillary Clinton's decision to personally raise money for a super PAC supporting her campaign is agitating her progressive critics, who see the move as further proof that the Democratic presidential frontrunner doesn't share some of their values.

There was never any expectation that Clinton would renounce super PAC money this election cycle. But liberal activists determined to use the Democratic primary to pressure Clinton to embrace a progressive agenda say the idea of the former secretary of state personally wooing the wealthiest class of donors runs counter to the populist rhetoric she's employed this year.

Within days of announcing her White House bid, Clinton had called out wealthy investors for paying too little in taxes and pledged to get big money out of politics. At the time, it was a welcome message for liberal Democrats who are uncomfortable with Clinton's close ties to Wall Street and find the prominent role of super PACs in elections utterly distasteful.

But the recent revelation that Clinton will personally fundraise for a super PAC supporting her campaign -- a decision to play by the rules of a system she has condemned as "dysfunctional" -- has invited fresh eye-rolling. It has also exposed a core tension for Democrats, who have increasingly embraced super PACs at the same time that they decry the explosion of soft money in national politics.

Clinton's campaign is explaining the decision as a matter of political necessity.

"With some Republican candidates reportedly setting up and outsourcing their entire campaign to super PACs and the Koch Brothers pledging $1 billion alone for the 2016 campaign, Democrats have to have the resources to fight back," a Clinton campaign official said in an email, who spoke anonymously to discuss the sensitive topic of fundraising. "There is too much at stake for our future for Democrats to unilaterally disarm."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton's expected involvement with Priorities USA has highlighted the contrast between her and Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders, an independent who is Clinton's only declared rival to date for the Democratic presidential nomination, as well as other potential challengers.

An independent from Vermont seeking the Democratic presidential nomination, Sanders has aggressively opposed super PAC donations. A long-shot candidate without a national fundraising operation, Sanders has no chance of matching Clinton's fundraising haul and has little to lose by going after millionaire and billionaire donors.

On Capitol Hill last week, Sanders told CNN that Clinton's decision to personally court super PAC donors was "unfortunate."

"We're living in a world since Citizens United where multi-millionaires and billionaires are playing a horrendous role in the political system," Sanders said, referring to the Supreme Court's 2010 ruling that paved the way for super PACs to direct virtually uncapped amounts of money to aid political candidates. "That's why I believe that we need to overturn Citizens United and move to public funding of elections."

Phil Noble, a South Carolina Democratic activist and supporter of former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, a potential Democratic candidate for president, said the development underscores what progressives view as a "fundamental disconnect" between Clinton and middle class voters.

"It's not that she raises a bunch of money for a PAC that causes her problems with middle class voters. That is a symptom as opposed to the ailment," Noble said. "The larger illness is she is out of touch with middle class voters -- she does have a lifestyle and a history that is about as alien to middle class voters as corporate jets are to a Subaru."

And activists who are pushing Massachusetts Sen. Elizabeth Warren to challenge Clinton see campaign finance reform as a major issue.

"Being a true champion for working families like Elizabeth Warren is about clearly and unequivocally supporting such critical priorities as a constitutional amendment overturning Citizens United," said Erica Sagrans, campaign manager for Ready for Warren, a movement dedicated to drafting Sen. Elizabeth Warren into the 2016 race.

Clinton's personal involvement with Priorities USA marks the latest chapter in the Democratic Party's evolving relationship with super PACs.

Democrats initially fiercely opposed Citizens United. But for all of their rhetoric against super PACs, and as much as the party continues to use the Supreme Court decision as a political rallying cry, over the years political interest has largely won out over progressive idealism.

In 2012, President Barack Obama reversed course, declaring after years of keeping his distance from super PACs that his campaign would participate in raising money for Priorities USA.

Now that tension is being brought to new heights as the party's next likely presidential nominee personally plans to drum up support for a super PAC backing her candidacy.

Clinton allies also see that her fundraising prowess and the depth of her connections with the kinds of donors who can cut multi-million dollar checks will likely make her a formidable competitor against any Republican candidate she may face in the general election. Officials are careful to emphasize, however, that Clinton and everyone else involved with her campaign will strictly follow the law as they solicit funds for Priorities USA.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The 2016 money race is well underway on the other side of the political aisle.

Declared GOP candidates including Sens. Ted Cruz of Texas and Marco Rubio of Florida, as well as expected candidates like former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, are on a fundraising tear. And they've shown no signs of distancing themselves from super PAC money. Cruz launched his campaign in March, and the senator's allies declared that an affiliated network of pro-Cruz super PACs had raised upwards of $30 million in just a matter of days.

The stiff competition against Republican money is a reality that some progressive leaders say they cannot ignore.

Former Vermont governor and Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean said it would be unwise for Clinton to reject super PAC money.

"Unfortunately, if you don't play by the same rules everybody else does, you end up losing elections," said Dean, founder of Democracy for America, one of the groups behind the draft Warren movement. "The key is to change the rules, and I think we have a much better chance of doing that with her as president than we do with one of the Republicans."

Back in Iowa, Hillary Goes Big on Small Business // Real Clear Politics // Alexis Simendinger - May 18, 2015

The last time Hillary Clinton was publicly photographed riding a bicycle may have been when she was secretary of state, accompanying her husband along a beach.

The bike motif, without the sand, will serve as a campaign backdrop this week in Iowa, when Clinton focuses on small business owners and their employees, who say in national surveys they need customers, access to capital, and less government red tape.

Clinton, who kicked off her campaign a month ago and then spent three days in Iowa, is returning to hail her team's grassroots organization in the early caucus state, and to describe her vision for a U.S. economy that relies on small entrepreneurs to create jobs.

On Monday, she'll meet grassroots organizers at the home of a supporter in Mason City, Iowa, and on Tuesday she'll participate in a roundtable discussion with community lenders and business representatives in Cedar Falls. That discussion is to take place at Bike Tech, a bicycle and sports shop that outgrew its location on Main Street this year and moved to larger quarters in a vintage former post office a few streets away.

"I want to be the president for small business," Clinton declared May 5 while speaking during a similar roundtable at a library in Nevada.

After launching her second bid for the White House in April and committing to victory in Iowa next year, Clinton vowed to return to the state as often as possible. Caucus-goers proved challenging for her in 2008, and for her husband in 1992.

Iowans insist on taking the measure of presidential aspirants up-close, and Clinton is determined to deliver the personal attention that requires shoe leather, hand-shaking, careful listening, and selfies posed with strangers.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Younger voters -- who embraced Barack Obama in 2008 -- are among Clinton's targets in 2016. The popular bike shop in Cedar Falls where the candidate will appear Tuesday is a setting meant to enlarge her narrative in a number of ways.

She wants the attention of young voters, progressive voters, small shops and family-run enterprises (which are America's economic engine, and by the way, are led by many swing voters). She wants her message to come across as "Main Street v. Wall Street" (to blunt critics who say she's too cozy with big financial institutions and New York's business elites). And Clinton wants support from female voters (a quarter of Iowa's businesses are women-owned).

In 2008, Clinton lost Iowa in part because voters there said they had trouble warming up to her.

"I know what people have been saying,`Well, you know, we've got to know more about her, we want to know more about her personally,'" she said before Obama's victory. "And I totally get that. It's a little hard for me. It's not easy for me to talk about myself."

This time around, Clinton is campaigning as close as she can get to "outside-the-bubble" just-folksiness, reminding her audiences that before she was an attorney, first lady of Arkansas, wife of a president, senator from New York, and secretary of state, she grew up with Midwestern values as the daughter of a small businessman who ran a drapery business. She may be a wealthy international icon at age 67, but Clinton's message is that she's never relinquished her middle-class, middle-America sensibilities.

President Obama visited Cedar Falls in January, turning to the community as a favored setting for a pre-State of the Union message, describing the economic imperatives of universal broadband connectivity (Cedar Falls is an "eCity" leader, according to Google).

During the first week of May to mark Small Business Week, the president described his national agenda for small entrepreneurs, hitting everything from regulations to lending. Clinton is expected to echo those themes as she begins to describe how she would enlarge "the economy of the future," as she's pledged to do if elected president.

Obama a few weeks ago said, "I have signed into law 18 different tax cuts for small businesses, which are helping them thrive in the 21st-century economy."

"By investing in our infrastructure, expanding access to credit, and assisting entrepreneurs as they start out and scale up, we are continuing to bolster America's small business community," he added.

The president talks about expanding export markets for U.S. small businesses, a topic that in Iowa could encourage Clinton to touch on international trade.

As Congress debates legislation to grant the president fast-track authority to conclude a trade pact with 11 other nations, Clinton has been conspicuously mute. Trade Promotion Authority, which would permit the legislative branch to approve or disapprove a trade deal but not to amend it, divides Democratic lawmakers and is vigorously opposed by organized labor. But she promoted the merits of the Trans-Pacific Partnership as secretary of state.

As the U.S. economy has continued to recover, small business owners say they're more optimistic about the future. But that outlook dimmed a tad in the first quarter compared with late 2014, even as it remained at the highest level measured since January 2008, according to a quarterly survey reported by the Gallup Organization. Small entrepreneurs are focused on their prospects for revenues, and on the challenges of accessing capital and credit.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Recently, Clinton said the expansion experienced by many small businesses had “stalled out,” an assertion Obama disputed as a blip tied to slower growth in Europe rather than a U.S. trend.

In the Hawkeye State this week, advised by many of the same economic experts who served Presidents Clinton and Obama, Hillary is expected to have her say.

Clinton talks economy, campaign finance on return to Iowa // Des Moines Register // Tony Leys - May 18, 2015

Mason City, Ia. – Hillary Clinton vowed Monday to fight for more fairness for American workers as the economy continues to recover.

"We need to get back into the habit of actually rewarding workers with increases in their paychecks for the increases in productivity and profitability that they have helped" achieve, Clinton said to applause from about 60 Democratic activists gathered at a house in Mason City.

The former senator, first lady and secretary of state, who is the heavy favorite for the Democratic nomination for president, was beginning her second trip to Iowa since announcing her candidacy last month.

She has been focusing on small events, such as the one held here Monday. "Not only do I learn a lot, but I also feel like it's the best way to make those connections," she told the activists. "... It will also give me the kind of information I need to be a better president."

Among the things she said she's heard about on her travels is the drug-abuse crisis, including methamphetamine in Iowa and heroin in New Hampshire. She noted reports that more Americans are now dying from drug overdoses than from car crashes. "This is tearing families apart, but it's below the surface. People aren't talking about it," she said.

Clinton said she's committed to reforming the political process, including by appointing Supreme Court justices who would rule against the kind of untraceable money that has flowed into the system since the Citizens United decision gave corporations more freedom to make donations. She said that if it takes a Constitutional amendment to change the situation, "I will work for that."

But Clinton, who is being supported by a so-called superPAC, said "we also have to stand our ground, and we have to try to figure out how to get people to work with us for the betterment of our country, the betterment of people who need a good, positive support system."

Organizers said the crowd was made up of Democrats invited by the campaign, the local party or the homeowners, Dean Genth and his husband, Gary Swenson.

Genth, who is vice chairman the Cerro Gordo County Democratic Party, said in an interview that he supported Barack Obama over Clinton in the 2008 caucuses. Genth said he also liked Clinton then, but he went with the challenger from Illinois.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Genth, 65, said he believes Clinton has grown since then, including from her service as Obama's secretary of state. "There is not a living, breathing human being on the face of the Earth with her resumé and experience and background."

Clinton has come under fire from Republicans for taking few questions from reporters during the early weeks of her candidacy. She took no questions from reporters at Monday's event, and the press was ushered out of the house as she began to greet voters after giving her 25-minute remarks.

State Republican Party Chairman Jeff Kauffman renewed the criticism Monday with a statement emailed to reporters covering Clinton. "Hillary Clinton still refuses to answer simple questions about her unseemly financial dealings, secret email server, or disastrous foreign policy. Polls show Iowans already find Clinton untrustworthy and her actions have confirmed their suspicions."

Clinton spokeswoman Lily Adams issued a statement in response to the criticism: "The focus of our ramp up period is to hear from voters about the issues they care about. She's enjoyed engaging in hours of public question and answer sessions and, as the campaign progresses, looks forward to more engagement with voters and the press as well."

Clinton is scheduled to make a stop Tuesday morning at a bike shop in Cedar Falls.

Hillary Clinton Campaign Begins Drafting Policy Solutions To Heroin Epidemic // Huffington Post // Marina Fang – May 18, 2015

WASHINGTON -- After hearing story after story from voters on the campaign trail about heroin's toll, Hillary Clinton instructed her policy team to draw up solutions to the burgeoning opiate epidemic.

A Clinton aide told The Huffington Post that the Democratic presidential candidate decided to make mental health and drug addiction a major campaign issue after stops in Iowa and New Hampshire, where she kept hearing from people that the problem needs more attention. It's the type of issue that may not get much attention inside the Beltway and on Sunday talk shows, but opiate addiction has become a devastating problem.

Clinton brought it up on Monday during a stop in Iowa, telling supporters that she wants to "end the stigma against talking about it."

“When I started running, when I started thinking about this campaign, I did not believe I would be standing in your living room talking about the drug abuse problem, the mental health problem, and the suicide problem," she said at the home of one of the first gay couples in the state to wed. “But I’m now convinced I have to talk about it. I have to do everything I can in this campaign to raise it, to end the stigma against talking about it."

A Centers for Disease Control and Prevention study of 28 states found that heroin deaths doubled from 2010 to 2012. U.S. heroin-related overdose deaths increased 39 percent in 2013 from the year before, hitting 8,257. Vermont’s governor devoted his entire 2014 state of the state speech to heroin. In New York City, there are more heroin deaths than homicides.

“This is tearing families apart, but it is below the surface," Clinton said. "We aren’t talking about it because it is something that is hard to deal with."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The heroin or opioid epidemic has exposed the U.S. drug treatment system as inadequate, both in its capacity to treat those addicted and to do so using evidence-based care. Although medically assisted treatments, such as medications methadone and buprenorphine, are viewed by the medical community as essential components of an opioid addict's recovery, they are inaccessible to the vast majority in need.

Some treatment centers and drug courts continue to insist that addicts refuse these medically assisted treatments. Following a HuffPost investigation into "abstinence-based" opiate treatment, the federal government barred state drug programs from getting federal money if they force addicts to wean off of medications.

Clinton has been holding a series of events to discuss substance abuse and mental health. She laid the groundwork for these events at a roundtable in New Hampshire last month, one of her first campaign events as an announced presidential candidate.

When a voter mentioned that substance abuse was a major problem in the community, Clinton called it a "quiet epidemic" and said it's "not just something we can brush under the rug." She commended the Affordable Care Act for placing more emphasis on requiring health insurers to cover treatments for mental health and substance abuse, but said there needs to be more policy reform, from local to national.

"There is a hidden epidemic. We know the drug use problem, whether it's pills or meth or heroin, is not as visible as 30 years ago when there were all kinds of gangs and violence," Clinton said. "This is a quiet epidemic and it is striking in small towns and rural areas as much as any big city. I think a lot of people are thinking, well, that's somebody else's problem, that's not my problem. And indeed, it is all of our problem and we don't have enough resources, so that if somebody decides that they wanted to get help, where do you send them to? What kind of opportunities do they have for treatment? And I am convinced that the mental health issues -- because I consider substance abuse part of mental health issues -- is going to be a big part of my campaign, because increasingly it's a big issue that people raise with me."

Clinton also mentioned substance abuse and mental health in a major speech on criminal justice reform that she made last month in the wake of the riots in Baltimore after the death of Freddie Gray at the hands of police. She emphasized the links between problems in the criminal justice system and problems in treating mental health and drug abuse.

"The promise of deinstitutionalizing those in mental health facilities was supposed to be followed by the creation of community-based treatment centers," she said. "Our prisons and our jails are now our mental health institutions."

Clinton Returns to Iowa to Help Rally Caucus Volunteers // ABC News // Julie Pace - May 18, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton returns to Iowa on Monday to help ramp up her campaign's volunteer network in a state where she struggled to build an effective ground game during her first run White House run in 2008.

Clinton will meet with volunteers and campaign organizers in the northern Iowa town of Mason City. The event is being hosted by Dean Genth and Gary Swenson, who were active supporters of President Barack Obama when he defeated Clinton in the 2008 Iowa caucuses.

While Clinton's path to victory in Iowa so far seems easier this time around, her campaign is eager to show she's not taking the state for granted. The campaign has hired 21 caucus organizers and six regional field directors who are seeking commitments from voters to caucus for Clinton early next year.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The early organizing could also yield longer-term benefits for Clinton's campaign, should she win her party's nomination. Iowa will be among the competitive battleground states in the general election and her campaign can draw on the voter contacts it makes now next year.

Clinton's two-day swing through Iowa marks her second trip to the state since she formally launched her campaign last month. On Tuesday, she'll head to Cedar Falls, where she'll begin outlining proposals for boosting small businesses.

Clinton arrives in Iowa under pressure from Republicans who want her to clarify her position on a massive Asia-Pacific trade deal being debated on Capitol Hill. While Clinton was supportive of the Trans-Pacific Partnership pact while serving as Obama's secretary of state, she has been largely silent on the matter since announcing her campaign.

Obama's push for the trade deal has angered some liberal Democrats who fear the agreement with Japan and several other nations would hurt U.S. companies and workers.

Hillary Clinton's second wave of Iowa courtship arrives in Mason City // CNN // Dan Merica - May 18, 2015

Mason City, Iowa (CNN)More than 70% of Iowa's Democratic caucus-goers chose an alternative to Hillary Clinton in 2008, a fact her aides in the state are actively looking to address early in her 2016 run.

Clinton will make her second visit to the state Monday when she headlines a small "house party" in Mason City that campaign aides hope will showcase their focus on moving Democrats who supported other candidates -- particularly then-Sens. Barack Obama and John Edwards - to Clinton's 2016 campaign.

Clinton's Iowa operation has a total of 27 field organizers on the ground in Iowa, six regional organizing directors and 21 organizers who live in cities and towns across the state. So far, according to campaign aides, their focus has been on reconnecting with Clinton supporters from 2008, winning over those who rejected her first presidential bid and connecting with those young people and students who are new to the state.

Monday's event in Mason City, which will be hosted by Dean Genth and Gary Swenson, is an example of Clinton's campaign looking to target former Obama supporters.

Genth and Swenson were the first gay couple to receive a marriage license at the Cerro Gordo County Courthouse when same-sex marriage was legalized in the state in April 2009. During the 2008 caucus, both were outspoken and early Obama supporters. They housed Obama campaign staff and volunteers in their Mason City home and told Obama's campaign office in Chicago that they would be willing to do whatever they could to get the senator elected.

"We were supportive of Clinton but we actually caucused for Obama," Genth said Monday. "As the caucus campaigning went on we got really involved with the Obama campaign. It was more a function that we were so early on with Obama, we had already pitched out tent at that point."

A former business executive, Genth moved from Ohio to Iowa in 2003 after meeting Swenson, a radiologist and breast cancer specialist, in 2002. Genth said it was love at first sight. The two have long been activists for same-sex marriage and Genth is a member of One Iowa, the state's leading LGBT rights organization, that spearheaded efforts to legalize same-sex marriage in the state.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Genth said that while Obama's position on same-sex marriage was "not a determining factor" for their support in 2008, it did play a role.

"We definitely got signals from Obama where he stood on some of the basic principles and basic rights," he said.

As a candidate in 2008, Clinton opposed same-sex marriage, supporting the idea of civil unions instead. She did not proclaim her personal support for same-sex marriage until 2013, after she left her diplomatic position as secretary of state.

Shortly after her announcing her presidential bid, her campaign said that Clinton now believes same-sex marriage is a "constitutional right," a departure from her past statements.

The steady change in her position hasn't bothered Genth. "Some people seem to never evolve," he said. "So somebody that does evolve is a great thing."

Genth is the vice chairman of the Cerro Gordo County Democratic Party and has said he has "reached out to every Clinton campaign person that walks into the area or has a phone number" about getting the candidate to North Iowa as much as possible.

Clinton's campaign aides have regularly said the candidate will focus on Iowa and come back regularly, but no future trips have been announced. Clinton will overnight in Iowa on Monday and headline an event on small business at a bike shop in Cedar Falls, Iowa on Tuesday.

The state of play in Iowa is also vastly different than it was in 2007 and 2008. Clinton leads every poll on the Democratic side and many activists in the state, despite hungering for a competitive primary, acknowledge that there isn't a Barack Obama-like candidate that could come from behind to topple Clinton. Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders, an independent, is the only other declared candidate for the Democratic nomination, although former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley is expected to announce his run later this month.

In an effort to showcase their grassroots organizing efforts, Sarah Marino, the campaign's Mason City grassroots organizer, will introduce Clinton at the event on Monday.

10 questions for Hillary Clinton // CBS News // Rebecca Kaplan – May 19, 2015

In the 36 days since Hillary Clinton announced she was running for president, she has answered just 13 questions from reporters. The last time she took a question was a month ago, Apr. 21, 2015, about the book, "Clinton Cash," which took a critical look at her family's finances.

(Clinton's response was, "Those issues are in my view distractions from what this campaign should be about, what I'm going to make this campaign about.")

In the intervening month, there have been news developments that have elicited reactions from other presidential candidates and potential candidates. Clinton, however, has said little.

As she returns to the campaign trail in Iowa and New Hampshire this week, here are 10 questions CBS News might ask:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

1. Do you support the Trans Pacific Partnership (TPP)?

The Democratic Party is divided on trade. Mr. Obama, Republicans and some Democrats want legislation that would put the Asia-Pacific free trade agreement on an expedited path through Congress. Other Democrats think the agreement would hurt American workers and the environment. Which Democrats would Clinton side with now?

She argued for TPP as secretary of state and in her 2014 memoir, "Hard Choices" but has been noncommittal since. She has said on this issue only that "any trade deal has to produce jobs and raise wages and increase prosperity and protect our security, and we have to do our part in making sure we have the capabilities and the skills to be competitive."

And as CBS News Correspondent Julianna Goldman reported Monday, Clinton earned more than $2.5 million giving speeches to organizations that have lobbied in favor of the trade deal.

2. Should Congress have a say in whether the U.S. signs a nuclear agreement with Iran?

Both the House and Senate have now passed bills that would allow Congress to review the framework deal that rolls back Iran's nuclear program in exchange for sanctions relief. The legislation would allow lawmakers to block the president from exiting at least some sanctions if enough members don't like the deal.

White House caves on Iran nuclear bill after veto threat

The White House had resisted congressional efforts to weigh in, arguing this negotiation is the purview of the president, but given the substantial Democratic support, the president is expected to sign the deal.

3. Does the president need a new Authorization for the Use of Military Force (AUMF) to fight the Islamic State of Iraq and Syria (ISIS)?

In mid February, the White House sent Congress legislation that would formally authorize war against ISIS - six months after the air campaign against the Islamic group actually began. The administration believes that the 2001 authorization that gave the president the authority to deploy U.S. troops to fight the instigators of the 9/11 attacks also enables him to fight ISIS, so a new AUMF hasn't topped his agenda. Still, the fight against ISIS will almost certainly bleed into 2016 and the campaign.

4. Why are Republican candidates struggling to give a straight answer on whether they would have authorized the 2003 Iraq invasion?

Former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush Bush was the first to stumble, saying he would have authorized the war in Iraq. He then claimed he misinterpreted the question posed by Fox News' Megyn Kelly, who initially asked whether he would have authorized the invasion, "knowing what we know now." Eventually, he said, "Knowing what we now know, I would not have engaged."

How the Iraq War question could shape 2016 campaign

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And Florida Sen. Marco Rubio struggled to articulate his position after "Fox News Sunday" host Chris Wallace played two video clips in which he appeared to take different stances on the 2003 invasion.

This is an area where Clinton has been unequivocal. "I thought I had acted in good faith and made the best decision I could with the information I had. And I wasn't alone in getting it wrong. But I still got it wrong. Plain and simple," she wrote in "Hard Choices."

What do independent voters think about foreign donations to the Clinton Foundation?

5. What can you say to ensure voters that contributions to the Clinton Foundation will not affect your decisions as president?

Clinton has been asked about foreign government donations to the Clinton Foundation, related to her tenure as secretary of state, and especially on whether foreign entities received special treatment in exchange for contributions to the foundation. She said, "We're back into the political season and therefore we will be subjected to all kinds of distraction and attacks. And I'm ready for that. I know that that comes, unfortunately, with the territory."

After she last interacted with the press, the Clinton Foundation admitted it had erred in its public disclosure of donors.

6. What steps would you take to help same-sex couples get married if the Supreme Court does rule it is a constitutional right?

Since former President Bill Clinton, signed the Defense of Marriage Act in 1996, Clinton has held just about every view on the spectrum of same-sex marriage. In 2000, she said she believed marriage was for a man and a woman. For awhile, she said it fell under the authority of states. In 2015, the video she released to announce her presidential bidfeatured a gay couple. Now, her campaign staff says she supports same-sex marriage and wants the Supreme Court to rule that it is a constitutional right.

Supreme Court divided in historic gay marriage case

But what if they don't? After hearing arguments on the issue in late April, the justices appeared sharply divided over whether gay and lesbian couples should be allowed to marry. If the court rules in June that states have a right to declare only men and women can enter into marriage, will Clinton take action?

7. How would you go "even further" than President Obama on immigration and stay within the limits of the law?

Clinton gave an immigration speech in Nevada earlier this month, and pledged to go "even further" than President Obama did by allowing a larger pool of people, such as the parents of children brought to the U.S. illegally, to apply for a reprieve from deportation.

Clinton takes on Nevada as controversial book debuts

President Obama spent months publicly saying he didn't have the authority to expand relief for undocumented immigrants before he used his executive authority to protect millions from deportation. And he had his legal team spend months making sure the case for that action was airtight and would hold up against a potential court battle.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Congress, meanwhile, is far from acting on immigration and is even looking for ways to roll back programs the president has put into place.

8. You left the White House "dead broke," in your words. You now command upwards of $200,000 a speech. How much money do you think you and your husband need to be comfortable?

Clinton later apologized for the "dead broke" comment, saying she could have been more "artful."

She and husband Bill Clinton earned just over $25 million from a total of about 100 paid speeches since January 2014 and $5 million from the proceeds of "Hard Choices."

9. Is it hypocritical for you to accept super PAC support -- and to push the boundaries of the law by coordinating with a super PAC -- while calling for new rules to limit third-party campaign spending?

Like President Obama before her, Clinton is accepting campaign support from super PACs -- independent groups that can accept unlimited campaign donations from individuals or corporations -- while at the same time condemning their influence on the political process.

"We need to fix our dysfunctional political system and get unaccountable money out of it once and for all, even if that takes a constitutional amendment," Clinton said last month in Iowa, calling campaign finance reform one of the four key pillars of her campaign.

Even so, her campaign insists that as long as others in the race for the White House are exploiting super PACs, her campaign will as well. The Clinton campaign, however, is actually empowering super PACs even more by coordinating with one specific group. Super PACs are barred from coordinating with candidates, but this group says it has found a loophole allowing it to work with the Clinton team.

10. Are you willing to tell Saudi Arabia that they must encourage equal rights for women?

Women's rights was one of Clinton's chief causes as secretary of state - and it's likely to become a point of contention during the 2016 campaign as well given the lingering questions about the Clinton Foundation's acceptance of donations from foreign governments. On the day she announced her presidential bid, Sen. Rand Paul, R-Kentucky - himself a contender for the White House - honed in on Clinton's relationship with the Saudis.

Rand Paul: Hard for Hillary Clinton to say she's for women's rights

"In Saudi Arabia, a woman was raped by seven men. The woman was then publically whipped. And then she was arrested for being in a car with an unmarried man. I think we should be boycotting that activity, not encouraging it. And it looks really bad for the case of defending women's rights, if you're accepting money," Paul said in an interview on CBS' "Face the Nation" in April.

After Clinton announced, the foundation announced a new donor policy. Now, the foundation will accept large donations from six foreign governments - Australia, Canada, Germany, The Netherlands, Norway and the United Kingdom.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Clinton Backs Obama Plan To Reverse Police Militarization // Huffington Post // Ryan Grim and Ryan J. Reilly - May 18, 2015

WASHINGTON -- President Barack Obama's executive order banning the federal government from transferring certain types of military-style equipment to police forces would remain in place if Hillary Clinton wins the presidency in 2016.

Clinton is "supportive of the recommendations and of the need for reform," a spokesperson for the Democratic candidate said Monday after Obama announced in Camden, New Jersey, that the transfer of certain military gear to police would be sharply curtailed.

Clinton last month slammed police militarization in a major speech on criminal justice issues. "We can start by making sure that federal funds for state and local law enforcement are used to bolster best practices, rather than to buy weapons of war that have no place on our streets," she said in the speech, which followed the death of Baltimore's Freddie Gray at the hands of police. "President Obama's task force on policing gives us a good place to start. Its recommendations offer a roadmap for reform, from training to technology, guided by more and better data."

Obama's announcement flowed from the task force recommendations that Clinton cited. Under the president's plan, bayonets, camouflaged uniforms, grenade launchers, certain types of armored vehicles, firearms of .50-caliber or larger and weaponized vehicles would no longer be transferred to law enforcement agencies. Other military equipment would be on a controlled list that would require law enforcement organizations to demonstrate need.

Clinton, in her speech, called for every police department to have body cameras for officers, and highlighted the need for community policing. "We should listen to law enforcement leaders who are calling for a renewed focus on working with communities to prevent crime, rather than measuring success just by the number of arrests or convictions," she said. "As your senator from New York, I supported a greater emphasis on community policing, along with putting more officers on the street to get to know those communities."

Obama on Monday said militarized gear “can sometimes give people the feeling like there's an occupying force as opposed to a force that's part of the community."

The Justice Department’s Office of Community Oriented Policing Services is preparing after-action report looking at mistakes by the St. Louis County Police Department in handling protests in Ferguson, Missouri, related to the police killing of teenager Michael Brown in August. Photos of the police department's heavily armed officers and military-style gear made world news.

Hillary Clinton: "Grateful" For Obama's Work on Economy, But "Deck Is Still Stacked In Favor Of Those At The Top" // Real Clear Politics // Ian Schwartz - May 18, 2015

On Monday, Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton spoke to a small group of Iowans at a "house party" event in Mason City. In this part of her speech Clinton talked about domestic issues such as the economy and the Affordable Care Act (ACA). The video is from a livestream captured by Bloomberg's Jennifer Epstein on Periscope.

Clinton praised Obama for the "hard work" he's done on the economy, but lamented the "deck is still stacked in favor of those at the top."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"We're not running yet but we are on our feet," Clinton said about the economy.

"The deck is still stacked in favor of those at the top, we know that, and so we have to be especially focused on how we're going to bring about the changes that will ignite opportunity for everybody willing to work hard for it," Clinton also said.

HILLARY CLINTON: I'm so relieved that as I travel around the country and talk with people, there is a sense that we are on our feet. We're not running yet but we are on our feet. We can see the changes that are happening in people's life and can put them in a context as to where we go from here now as a country. I am very grateful to President Obama for the hard work [he's done on the economy]...

I know that although we have begun to move forward again, it is still hard to imagine exactly how we're going to get to the point where people are not just getting by but getting ahead again and staying ahead. Because, look, the deck is still stacked in favor of those at the top, we know that, and so we have to be especially focused on how we're going to bring about the changes that will ignite opportunity for everybody willing to work hard for it.

US Reps. Jim McGovern, Joe Kennedy campaign for Hillary Clinton // Mass Live // Shira Schoeberg - May 18, 2015

U.S. Reps. Joe Kennedy and Jim McGovern, both Massachusetts Democrats, spent parts of their weekends campaigning for Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton.

McGovern attended a Worcester event on Saturday and Kennedy attended an event Sunday in Newton. Both events were grassroots organizing meetings. Early organizing meetings are a way for a campaign to energize the so-called "grasstops," committed activists who are likely to volunteer for campaigns, recruit other volunteers and donate money.

The public support for Clinton by liberal congressmen in Massachusetts comes as liberal organizations nationally have organized a movement to draft U.S. Sen. Elizabeth Warren, a Massachusetts Democrat, to run for president.

Warren has gained clout as a charismatic liberal leader in the Senate focused on economic policy, but she has said repeatedly that she will not run for president. The Clinton campaign is likely hoping that having Kennedy and McGovern throw their support behind Clinton now could galvanize other Massachusetts liberals to do the same and not to hold out hope for a Warren candidacy.

In addition to Clinton, who is a former secretary of state, U.S. Senator and first lady, Vermont U.S. Sen. Bernie Sanders is running for the Democratic nomination for president and former Maryland governor Martin O'Malley is seriously considering it.

More than a dozen Republicans are running or seriously considering it.

Clinton Sets Citizens United as Supreme Court Litmus Test // ABC News // Julie Pace, Associated Press - May 18, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton said Monday that if elected president, she would make opposition to a Supreme Court ruling that cleared the way for unlimited political donations a litmus test for nominees to the high court.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"I will do everything I can do to appoint Supreme Court justices who will protect the right to vote and not the right of billionaires to buy elections," Clinton told about 50 supporters at a house party in Iowa.

While Clinton has previously said she would support a constitutional amendment overturning the 2010 decision known as Citizens United, she has not previously said publicly that she would use the ruling as a benchmark for nominating justices.

She added Monday she is consulting with legal experts about other ways the court's ruling in the case could be trumped.

Despite her staunch opposition to Citizens United, which helped usher into politics groups known as super PACs that can raise unlimited amounts of campaign cash, Clinton is directly courting donors for a super PAC backing her candidacy.

Democrats were initially reluctant in the elections after the court ruled in Citizens United to fully embrace such outside groups, while Republicans did so with fewer reservations and are aggressively raising money for them in the early days of the 2016 campaign.

Clinton's stop in the northern Iowa town of Mason City marked her second trip to the state since she formally launched her campaign last month. She spent more than an hour talking with local officials, campaign organizers and volunteers — the type of small-scale campaigning some Iowa Democrats say she didn't do enough of during her first bid for the Democratic nomination in 2008.

Clinton placed third in the Iowa caucus that year, behind President Barack Obama and former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards.

The hosts of Monday's event, Dean Genth and Gary Swenson, campaigned actively for Obama in 2008. Genth said he didn't choose Obama over Clinton for any ideological reasons, but more because he "captured everyone's imaginations with his charismatic campaign and his ability to connect to the grassroots."

While Clinton so far doesn't face as tough of a primary challenge as she did in 2008, her campaign is eager to show she's learned lessons from her past missteps. The campaign has hired 21 caucus organizers and six regional field directors who are seeking commitments from voters to caucus for Clinton early next year.

The early organizing could also yield longer-term benefits for Clinton's campaign, should she win her party's nomination. Iowa will be among the competitive battleground states in the general election and her campaign can draw on the voter contacts it makes now next year.

Clinton arrived in Iowa under pressure from Republicans who want her to clarify her position on a massive Asia-Pacific trade deal being debated on Capitol Hill. While Clinton was supportive of the Trans-Pacific Partnership pact while serving as Obama's secretary of state, she has been largely silent on the matter since announcing her campaign.

Obama's push for the trade deal has angered some liberal Democrats who fear the agreement with Japan and several other nations would hurt U.S. companies and workers.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

As she opened her remarks Monday, Clinton subtly defended her decision to avoid wading into the trade debate or taking questions from reporters on a range of other issues.

Though she never mentioned the Republican criticism directly, she said small events that put her in direct contact with voters are providing her with the foundation for her campaign, as well as "the kind of information I need to be an even better president."

Gowdy: Benghazi report may leave questions unresolved // Greenville Online // Mary Troyan - May 18, 2015

WASHINGTON — The final congressional report on the 2012 Benghazi terrorist attacks may present conflicting information on issues without concluding which version is true, according to Republican Rep. Trey Gowdy, chairman of the special House committee investigating the attacks.

Democrats on Gowdy's committee, who have already declared the investigation a waste of taxpayer money, were further irritated by the possibility that the much-touted House investigation will leave some facts open to interpretation.

Gowdy, R-S.C., said in a recent interview the investigation is a fact-finding mission, but every factual dispute may not be settled.

"If you do a good enough job laying out the facts, the conclusions will either speak for themselves or you'll have competing factual narratives and you can draw your own conclusions," Gowdy said.

The House Select Committee on Benghazi was created a year ago to conduct a comprehensive investigation into the events surrounding the Sept. 11, 2012, terrorist attack on the U.S. facilities in Libya that killed four Americans, including Ambassador Chris Stevens. Seven Republicans and five Democrats serve on the panel.

At the time the committee was created, Republican leaders said previous congressional investigations, which were limited to specific jurisdictions such as the military or intelligence agencies, had left questions unanswered, and a special committee with wider latitude was needed address new revelations.

"I intend for this select committee to have robust authority, and I will expect it to work quickly to get answers for the American people and the families of the victims," House Speaker John Boehner of Ohio said last year when he asked the House to create the panel.

Gowdy said the final report could be finished by the end of the year if the Obama administration cooperates more quickly in producing documents.

But he also warned that issues may be left unresolved, especially if witnesses or documents contradict each other.

"It's not my job to tell people what to conclude," Gowdy said. "If you have two witnesses, (and) one says the light was red and one green, I don't view myself as being the arbiter of who is more credible."

The committee is investigating security lapses related to the attack, the military's response to the incident, and whether the Obama administration, for political reasons, intentionally downplayed the event as something other than a coordinated terrorist attack.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Committee Democrats have grown increasingly critical of how Republicans are proceeding.

Asked to comment on the possibility the committee won't draw conclusions about disputed facts, the panel's top Democrat said the investigation is an attempt to discredit Hillary Rodham Clinton, a presidential candidate who was secretary of state at the time of the attacks in Benghazi.

"For the Committee's report to be credible... we should draw bipartisan conclusions based on the facts, state publicly when conspiracy theories are debunked, and set forth concrete recommendations to implement reforms that protect our diplomatic corps around the world," Rep. Elijah Cummings, D-Md., said in a statement.

During the committee's most recent public hearing in January, Rep. Adam Schiff, D-Calif., said the report needs bipartisan support to be considered credible.

"Let's make it bipartisan so that the country and the families will have the confidence of knowing that this was an objective work product," Schiff said.

Gowdy said the panel has uncovered new evidence and has talked to witnesses never before interviewed.

But most of those interviews have been conducted in private. Publicly, committee members have focused mostly on improving security at diplomatic outposts and on disputes with the State Department and Clinton over access to emails, documents and witnesses.

Gowdy said he knows not everyone will be satisfied with the panel's final report, especially extreme partisans on either side.

"If you do a good enough job getting every bit of information the fact-finder needs, they'll be able to draw their own conclusions," Gowdy said. "People are going to draw different conclusions. That's fine."

GOP committee member Martha Roby of Alabama said she's tried to manage her constituents' expectations about the results of the investigation.

"This is a fact-finding, truth-finding mission, and whatever that reveals is what it reveals," Roby said. "Truth is a stubborn thing."

Clinton Friend's Libya Role Blurs Lines of Politics and Business // NYT // Nicholas Confessor and Michael S. Schmidt – May 18, 2015

When the Clintons last occupied the White House, Sidney Blumenthal cast himself in varied roles: speechwriter, in-house intellectual and press corps whisperer. Republicans added another, accusing Mr. Blumenthal of spreading gossip to discredit Republican investigators and forced him to testify during President Bill Clinton's impeachment trial.

Now, as Hillary Rodham Clinton embarks on her second presidential bid, Mr. Blumenthal's service to the Clintons is once again under the spotlight. Representative Trey Gowdy of South Carolina, a Republican who is leading the congressional committee investigating the 2012 attacks in Benghazi, Libya, plans to subpoena Mr. Blumenthal, 66, for a private transcribed interview.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mr. Gowdy's chief interest, according to people briefed on the inquiry, is a series of memos that Mr. Blumenthal — who was not an employee of the State Department — wrote to Mrs. Clinton about events unfolding in Libya before and after the death of Col. Muammar el-Qaddafi. According to emails obtained by The New York Times, Mrs. Clinton, who was secretary of state at the time, took Mr. Blumenthal's advice seriously, forwarding his memos to senior diplomatic officials in Libya and Washington and at times asking them to respond. Mrs. Clinton continued to pass around his memos even after other senior diplomats concluded that Mr. Blumenthal's assessments were often unreliable.

But an examination by The New York Times suggests that Mr. Blumenthal's involvement was more wide-ranging and more complicated than previously known, embodying the blurry lines between business, politics and philanthropy that have enriched and vexed the Clintons and their inner circle for years.

While advising Mrs. Clinton on Libya, Mr. Blumenthal, who had been barred from a State Department job by aides to President Obama, was also employed by her family's philanthropy, the Clinton Foundation, to help with research, "message guidance" and planning of commemorative events, according to foundation officials. During the same period, he also worked on and off as a paid consultant to Media Matters and American Bridge, organizations that helped lay the groundwork for Mrs. Clinton's 2016 campaign.

Much of the Libya intelligence that Mr. Blumenthal passed on to Mrs. Clinton appears to have come from a group of business associates he was advising as they sought to win contracts from the Libyan transitional government. The venture, which was ultimately unsuccessful, involved other Clinton friends, a private military contractor and one former C.I.A. spy seeking to get in on the ground floor of the new Libyan economy.

The projects — creating floating hospitals to treat Libya's war wounded and temporary housing for displaced people, and building schools — would have required State Department permits, but floundered before the business partners could seek official approval.

It is not clear whether Mrs. Clinton or the State Department knew of Mr. Blumenthal's interest in pursuing business in Libya; a State Department spokesman declined to say. Many aspects of Mr. Blumenthal's involvement in the planned Libyan venture remain unclear. He declined repeated requests to discuss it.

But interviews with his associates and a review of previously unreported correspondence suggest that — once again — it may be difficult to determine where one of Mr. Blumenthal's jobs ended and another began.

Mr. Gowdy's committee on the attacks in Benghazi hopes to ask Mr. Blumenthal who, if anyone, was paying him to prepare the memos for Mrs. Clinton and whether they were among his responsibilities at the Clinton Foundation. The committee's investigators are also interested in whether the planned business venture in Libya posed any potential conflicts for Mr. Blumenthal or Mrs. Clinton, whose aides the business partners sought meetings with in early 2012.

The Libya venture came together in 2011, when David L. Grange, a retired Army major general, joined with a newly formed New York firm, Constellations Group, to pursue business leads in Libya. Constellations Group, led by a professional fund-raiser and philanthropist named Bill White, was to provide the leads. Mr. Grange's company, Osprey Global Solutions, based in North Carolina, would put "boots on the ground to see if there was an opportunity to do business," Mr. Grange said in an interview.

The men had little experience in Libya. Exactly how Mr. White was to procure leads in Libya is unclear. He spent much of his career as an executive at the Intrepid Sea, Air & Space Museum, and had raised money for politicians, businesses and charities. His biography also describes Mr. White as a consultant for Aquahydrate, a bottled-water company whose backers include Ron Burkle, the billionaire investor who had been a close friend of the Clintons.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“We were thinking, ‘O.K., Qaddafi is dead, or about to be, and there’s opportunities,’ ” Mr. White said in a brief telephone interview, adding, “We thought, ‘Let’s try to see who we know there.’ ”

Mr. White declined to answer follow-up questions about what role Mr. Blumenthal was playing in the business venture. But Mr. Grange described Mr. Blumenthal as an adviser to Mr. White’s company, along with two other associates: Tyler Drumheller, a colorful former Central Intelligence Agency official, and Cody Shearer, a longtime Clinton friend whose sister once worked for Mrs. Clinton.

“I just know that he was working with the team to work on business development,” Mr. Grange said of Mr. Blumenthal.

In the spring of 2011, Mr. Blumenthal, Mr. Drumheller and Mr. Shearer were helping plan what was to be Mr. Grange’s first trip to Libya, according to emails stolen by a Romanian hacker and published by Gawker and ProPublica in March. Mr. Blumenthal said he had been advised not to comment on the correspondence because the theft remained under investigation by the F.B.I.

In August, Mr. Grange signed a memorandum of understanding with two senior officials in the Libyan transitional government to provide “humanitarian assistance, medical services and disaster mitigation,” along with helping to train a new national police force.

The agreement fell apart, Mr. Grange said, but the partners continued to seek other projects in Libya, including a proposal to create the floating hospitals to treat the country’s war wounded. But doing business there proved difficult: Some Libyan leaders were wary about working with Western companies, while the contractors could not figure out whom to make deals with.

“It was just so factionalized over there,” Mr. Grange said. “You never knew who to believe or trust, or know who was in charge of what.”

Even as their plans sputtered, Mr. Blumenthal continued to draw on the business associates for information about Libya as he shaped his memos to Mrs. Clinton. Sometimes the two realms became blurred.

In January 2012, for example, Mr. Blumenthal sent Mrs. Clinton a memo describing efforts by the new Libyan prime minister to stabilize his fragile government by bringing in advisers with experience dealing with Western companies and governments.

Among “the most influential of this group,” Mr. Blumenthal wrote, was a man named Najib Obeida, who worked at the fledgling Libyan stock exchange. Mrs. Clinton had the memo forwarded to her senior State Department staff.

What Mr. Blumenthal did not mention was that Mr. Obeida was one of the Libyan officials Mr. Grange and his partners hoped would finance the humanitarian projects. The day before Mr. Blumenthal emailed Mrs. Clinton, Mr. Grange wrote to a senior Clinton aide at the State Department to introduce the venture with Mr. Obeida in Libya and seek an audience with the United States’ ambassador there. Mr. Grange said he did not receive a reply.

Mr. Blumenthal sent Mrs. Clinton at least 25 memos about Libya in 2011 and 2012, many describing elaborate intrigues among various foreign governments and rebel factions.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mrs. Clinton circulated them, frequently forwarding them to Jake Sullivan, her well-regarded deputy chief of staff, and requesting that he distribute them to other State Department officials. Mr. Sullivan often sent the memos to senior officials in Libya, including the ambassador, J. Christopher Stevens, who was killed in the 2012 attacks in Benghazi.

In many cases, Mr. Sullivan would paste the text from the memos into an email and tell the other State Department officials that they had come from an anonymous “contact” of Mrs. Clinton.

Some of Mr. Blumenthal’s memos urged Mrs. Clinton to consider rumors that other American diplomats knew at the time to be false. Not infrequently, Mrs. Clinton’s subordinates replied to the memos with polite skepticism.

In April 2012, Mr. Stevens took issue with a Blumenthal memo raising the prospect that the Libyan branch of the Muslim Brotherhood was poised to make gains in the coming parliamentary elections. The Brotherhood fared poorly in the voting.

Another American diplomat, after reading the same memo, noted that Mrs. Clinton’s source appeared to have confused two Libyan politicians with the same surname.

Mrs. Clinton herself sometimes seemed skeptical. After reading a March 2012 memo from Mr. Blumenthal, describing a plan by French and British intelligence officials to encourage tribal leaders in eastern Libya to declare a “semiautonomous” zone there, Mrs. Clinton wrote to Mr. Sullivan, “This one strains credulity.”

Mr. Sullivan agreed, telling Mrs. Clinton, “It seems like a thin conspiracy theory.”

But the skepticism did not seem to sour Mrs. Clinton on Mr. Blumenthal, who continued to forward Mr. Blumenthal’s memos, often appending a note: “Useful insight,” or “We should get this around asap.”

In an August 2012 memo, Mr. Blumenthal described the new president of Libya, Mohammed Yussef el-Magariaf, as someone who would “seek a discrete relationship with Israel” and had “many common friends and associates with the leaders of Israel.”

“If true, this is encouraging,” Mrs. Clinton wrote to Mr. Sullivan. “Should consider passing to Israelis.”

The emails suggest that Mr. Blumenthal’s direct line to Mrs. Clinton circumvented the elaborate procedures established by the federal government to ensure that high-level officials are provided with vetted assessments of available intelligence.

Former intelligence officials said that it was not uncommon for top officials, including secretaries of state, to look outside the intelligence bureaucracy for information and advice. But Paul R. Pillar, a former C.I.A. official who is now a researcher at the Center for Security Studies at Georgetown University, said Mr. Blumenthal’s dispatches went beyond that sort of informal channel, aping the style of official government intelligence reports but without assessments of the motives of sources.

“The sourcing is pretty sloppy,” Mr. Pillar added, “in a way that would never pass muster if it were the work of a reports officer at a U.S. intelligence agency.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The long and winding road ahead for Hillary Clinton's e-mails // Washington Post // Fred Barbash – May 19, 2015

The State Department said in a court filing late Monday that it will take at least until January 2016 for it to review a cache of 30,000 e-mails provided by former secretary of state Hillary Clinton and decide which ones can be made available to the public, and in what form.

Even then, it said, an "interagency review process could impact the Department's proposed" timeline for public release of redacted versions of the e-mails.

And any other requests for Clinton e-mails, it warned, could make the review even slower.

At best, according to the plan, some e-mails could land just at the beginning of the Democratic presidential nominating process, which starts in February with the Iowa caucuses.

The e-mails were turned over to the department at its request by the former secretary of state in December following reports that she was keeping them on a private server.

The court filing came in response to a Freedom of Information Act suit filed by Vice News.

Why will it take so long?

The State Department filing explained that Clinton sent over the e-mails on paper, rather than in some digital form. They consume a total of 55,000 pages in "twelve bankers boxes…that corresponded approximately to the time frame of the documents within a given box."

Now each page "must be individually hand–processed in order to ensure that all information is being captured." That alone is a five-step process that is "time consuming and labor-intensive," the filing to the U.S. District Court in Washington said.

But that was just the beginning. The state department outlined a 15-step process involving sign-offs by at least three different offices internally and an unknown number of other agencies, each of which will undoubtedly impose its own review procedure on the missives.

For example, if the Treasury Department had some role in a subject under discussion in an email, its lawyers will be given the opportunity to review it and perhaps to suggests at one extreme, reasons why it should not be released or portions that should be redacted.

"The review of these materials will likely require consultation with a broad range of subject matter experts within the Department and other agencies, as well as potentially with foreign governments," the filing said, adding by way of warning that the department "operates in approximately 285 locations around the globe."

Nor did the filing suggest any firmness in the January, 2016 date. Indeed, a footnote warned that additional requests for Clinton emails that are subject-specific, as opposed to the Vice's demand for everything, could "slow down the Department's processing of the collection."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

What Sidney Blumenthal's Memos to Hillary Clinton Said, and How They Were Handled // NYT // Michael S. Schmidt - May 18, 2015

In 2011 and 2012, Hillary Rodham Clinton received at least 25 memos about Libya from Sidney Blumenthal, a friend and confidant who at the time was employed by the Clinton Foundation. The memos, written in the style of intelligence cables, make up about a third of the almost 900 pages of emails related to Libya that Mrs. Clinton said she kept on the personal email account she used exclusively as secretary of state. Some of Mr. Blumenthal's memos appeared to be based on reports supplied by American contractors he was advising as they sought to do business in Libya. Mr. Blumenthal also appeared to be gathering information from anonymous Libyan and Western officials and local news media reports. What follows are descriptions of some of the memos and how they were handled by Mrs. Clinton and her aides.

Clinton Says Idea on Rebels Should Be Considered

In April 2011, Mr. Blumenthal sent Mrs. Clinton a memo about the rebel forces fighting the regime of Col. Muammar el-Qaddafi. The rebels, Mr. Blumenthal wrote, were considering hiring security contractors to train their forces. Mrs. Clinton forwarded the memo to her aide, Jake Sullivan, and said that the idea should be considered. (Pages 1-3)

In 2011 and 2012, Mrs. Clinton forwarded 18 memos to Mr. Sullivan, who in turn circulated them to senior State Department officials, including Ambassador J. Christopher Stevens, who was killed in the 2012 attacks in Benghazi, and Ambassador Gene A. Cretz, who preceded him.

An Alert to Possible Terrorist Attacks in Libya

In May 2011, Mr. Blumenthal sent Mrs. Clinton a memo reporting that affiliates of Al Qaeda in Libya were plotting attacks in revenge for the United States' killing of Osama bin Laden. Mrs. Clinton forwarded the email to Mr. Sullivan, saying that it was "disturbing, if true." Mr. Sullivan questioned its accuracy, but said he would share with others. (Pages 4-5)

Highlighting the Role of a Potential Business Partner

In January 2012, Mr. Blumenthal wrote to Mrs. Clinton about challenges facing Libya's new government. In the memo, Mr. Blumenthal said that Libya's prime minister was bringing in new economic advisers, and that a businessman, Najib Obeida, was among "the most influential of this group." At the time, Mr. Obeida was a potential business partner for a group of contractors whom Mr. Blumenthal was advising. Mrs. Clinton instructed Mr. Sullivan to ask for a response from senior State Department officials including Mr. Cretz, then the ambassador to Libya. (Pages 6-15)

A Memo Is Passed On, Despite Questions

In March 2012, Mrs. Clinton forwarded a memo by Mr. Blumenthal to Mr. Sullivan, saying that she was dubious about its content. Mr. Sullivan agreed, stating that Mr. Blumenthal's report resembled "a conspiracy theory" — but still asked State Department officials to review it. (Pages 16-17)

A Warning Is Forwarded to Incoming Ambassador

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In April 2012, Mr. Blumenthal wrote to Mrs. Clinton warning about the imminent rise of the Muslim Brotherhood in Libya. Mrs. Clinton forwarded the memo to Mr. Sullivan, who sent it to Mr. Stevens, the incoming United States ambassador to Libya. Mr. Stevens' response — that the Brotherhood in fact had a relatively small following in Libya — was passed on to Mrs. Clinton. (Pages 18-24)

Clinton Suggests Sharing Information With Israel

After receiving an August 2012 memo from Mr. Blumenthal about how the new Libyan prime minister wanted to have a better relationship with Israel, Mrs. Clinton suggested to Mr. Sullivan that they pass the intelligence along to the Israelis. (Pages 25-27)

Hillary Clinton's army of trolls // Politico // Annie Karni – May 19, 2015

Hillary Clinton's tweets aren't particularly edgy or provocative. But no matter what she says, they tend to generate a passionate response – much of it negative.

No matter the message, whether it's an opinion on a contentious issue or an unremarkable snapshot from the campaign trail, the result tends to be the same: an avalanche of cynicism, snark and some outright bile.

In part, it's a function of the size of her account — with 3.5 million followers, Clinton's Twitter following dwarves every other contender in the 2016 hunt. And Twitter trolling, as all of the prospective candidates and anyone in public life can attest, is the price of admission.

Still, when it comes to Clinton, the trolling is of a different scale and measure, a clear reflection of the strong feelings she provokes among her legion of detractors.

"How can you tell Hillary will fight every day for kids and families? Because it's what she's always done," @HillaryClinton tweeted May 12, with a link to a Huffington Post story outlining her legacy as Arkansas' first lady.

That relatively mundane tweet provoked anger from both the right and the left. "What about the ones she voted to send to war in Iraq," replied Karen Geier, whose Twitter bio identifies her as a digital and social media strategist, a feminist and a proud progressive.

Ted Bingham, a self-described conservative Mormon from Sheboygan, WI, replied: "After she's done lying about the 30,000 emails, how she was named, and her 'immigrant grandparents. She's a total waste!!!"

And Christopher Mahoney, who identified himself online as a retired vice chairman at Moody's, replied to Clinton by reaching back to the suicide of a close Clinton confidante in the '90s: "Especially the family of Vince Foster."

Amid a long stream of detractors, one fan account, whose handle is @HRC, tweeted encouragingly, like a small voice working up the nerve to express an unpopular opinion: "Next Prez."

Clinton's online detractors most often paint her as untrustworthy, or raise questions about the foreign money that has flowed to the Clinton Foundation while she was secretary of state. Some call her names like "witch," dictator," "monster," and even "Hitlary," all reminders of how polarizing Clinton can be — a feminist hero and glass-ceiling cracker to supporters; an untrustworthy, pandering operative to the haters. (Her most devoted supporters sometimes break through the noise with supportive exclamations of “Queen!”)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Her large Twitter following is, on the whole, an advantage for Clinton, who can exert more control over her own message and image: a recent picture of Clinton in Iowa was retweeted 251 times and favorited by 561 Twitter users. In contrast, a recent picture of New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie campaigning in New Hampshire with his wife, Mary Pat, was retweeted once and favorited three times.

With more followers than all the top-tier Republican candidates combined (her closest GOP competitor is Sen. Marco Rubio, who has 736,000), Clinton’s Twitter account is a powerful messaging tool for pushing out her own snapshots from campaign stops, weighing in on national issues in 140 characters, and directing supporters to her fundraising and volunteer pages online.

But that formidable footprint comes with a price: she also trumps her opponents in terms of her legions of trolls, who sometimes overwhelm the conversations she generates, picking at the scabs and scars Clinton has accumulated over nearly four decades in public life.

When Clinton recently tweeted “Healthy women ? healthy communities. Sign up if you agree with Hillary,” one quick response to that relatively anodyne message was, ““On average how much does Bill spend on hookers each week?”

Clinton’s physical appearance is not considered out of bounds among her Twitter tormenters. One response to photos of Clinton walking around Brooklyn last week, dressed in a long green jacket, that were posted on Twitter: “She’s a human pear.”

On May 14, Clinton’s tweet about “words that ring truer than ever today: ‘Human rights are women’s rights, and women’s rights are human rights.’ #TBT” — along with a picture of Clinton from her famous 1995 speech on human rights in Beijing — drew an especially pointed response. One Rachel Cohen — a self-described protestant Christian, conservative libertarian gun owner replied: “Oh for the days when you weren’t tired, fat, old and gray.”

The campaign doesn’t engage with its trolls — or even acknowledge them. “Hillary Clinton listens to everyone’s voices whether they have substantive feedback during the hours of roundtable discussions she’s had or 140 characters of feedback in response to a tweet,” said a Clinton campaign aide.

A Democratic strategist who is not affiliated with the campaign explained the Clinton approach this way: “Haters gonna hate.”

And they do.

“Hillary wants to call someone’s mom on Mother’s Day. It could be yours,” Clinton tweeted — seemingly innocuously — on May 4, with a link to the campaign contest fundraiser.

Not so innocuous, it turned out.

“I am so thank U R Not my mom or Grandma and U stay away from my MOM! Dictator Hypocrite!” replied one woman whose Twitter handle is Judy Ameil.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“How about calling the moms of those killed at Benghazi? that’s a great start. Instead, it’ll probably be rich donors. #Witch.” wrote Paul Hicks, who tweets under the handle @PaulAniston and responds often to Clinton’s tweets.

While the attacks seem to be personal and sometimes sexist, the attackers claim they are not.

“Yep. I troll quite a bit I guess,” Hicks, who works as a quality control engineer, explained in a direct message on Twitter. “I don’t dislike her personally because I don’t know her personally. As with all politicians, I’m sure she’s very likeable and says all the right things…. I’m as tired of old white men leading this country as the next guy. We need someone that’ll unite the country, protect it & stand up for its citizens.”

The constant stream of criticism “comes with the territory” of a high-profile campaign, said Rebecca Heisler, former social media director for Mitt Romney’s 2012 presidential campaign. “The key is to create enough quality content that you’re not just getting negative feedback, you’re also getting supporters to actively engage and drown out the noise.”

Reading the individual comments is counter-productive, she said, but getting a bigger picture of a candidate’s reception online can be helpful to a campaign. “There are social listening tools where you can monitor more broadly how people are engaging with your content,” Heisler said.

“There is a big difference between social noise and social action,” warned Betsy Hoover, a partner at 270 Strategies, who was President Obama’s 2012 digital organizing director and worked with Ready for Hillary. “You have to recognize that and know what you’re seeing and when. Engagement is high and the focus is really high. With Clinton, you have a very focused place for that energy to go in a way you don’t on the other side. It’s much easier to be against something on Twitter than for something, but the people that are pro-Hillary are donating money, sharing a video, or volunteering in their communities.”

By now, the campaign has come to expect a stream of trolling — especially when Clinton weighs in on divisive issues like abortion.

“When it comes to women’s health, there are two kinds of experts: women and their doctors. True 40+ years ago, true today. - H” she tweeted last Wednesday, weighing in on the debate surrounding a bill to ban 20 week abortions (it passed in the House earlier that day).

The responses were as expected: “Why don’t you just come out and say you have no problem with killing babies? We’re talking 20 weeks. you’re a monster…” tweeted “Ryan,” a self-described “Christian. Texan. Conservative,” who has over 6,000 followers.

Jeb Bush also weighed in on the bill on Twitter: “I urge Congress to support the late-term abortion ban today. We need to stand up for life and the most vulnerable among us. #HR36.” As with Clinton, some of his trolls also started a conversation that seemed to be more about general attacks on his candidacy than the 20-week abortion ban.

In the end, though, Clinton’s online presence trumped his, even if it came with a stream of ugly comments from those that will never vote for her.

Bush’s comment was retweeted 265 times, compared to Clinton’s 2,345.

Hillary Clinton was paid millions by tech industry for speeches // WaPo // Matea Gold, Rosalind S. Helderman,

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

and Anu Narayanswamy - May 18, 2015

In one of her last gigs on the paid lecture circuit, Hillary Rodham Clinton addressed an eBay summit aimed at promoting women in the workplace, delivering a 20-minute talk that garnered her a $315,000 payday from the company.

Less than two months later, Clinton was feted at the San Francisco Bay-area home of eBay chief executive John Donahoe and his wife, Eileen, for one of the first fundraisers supporting Clinton's newly announced presidential campaign.

The two events spotlight the unusually close financial ties between Clinton and a broad array of industries with issues before the government that paid tens of millions of dollars to her and her husband, former president Bill Clinton, in the months preceding the launch of her presidential campaign.

Disclosure documents filed by Hillary Clinton last week revealed that the couple have earned about $25 million for delivering 104 paid speeches since January 2014.

While Bill Clinton's lucrative speaking career since leaving the White House in 2001 has been well documented, the new disclosures offer the first public accounting of Hillary Clinton's paid addresses since she stepped down as secretary of state. And they illustrate how the Clintons have personally profited by drawing on the same network of supporters who have backed their political campaigns and philanthropic efforts — while those supporters have gained entree to a potential future president.

Silicon Valley is one place where those overlapping interests come together, according to a Washington Post analysis of the new Clinton disclosures.

Out of the $11.7 million that Hillary Clinton has made delivering 51 speeches since January 2014, $3.2 million came from the technology industry, the analysis found. Several of the companies that paid Clinton to address their employees also have senior leaders who have been early and avid supporters of her presidential bid.

The tech sector was the largest single source of speaking fees for Clinton, followed by health care and financial services, according to the Post analysis. Bill Clinton also made substantial income speaking to tech groups but focused more heavily on financial services, insurance and real estate companies.

A Hillary Clinton campaign spokesman declined to comment.

While it is common for former presidents to receive top dollar as paid speakers, Hillary Clinton is unique as a prospective candidate who received large personal payouts from corporations, trade groups and other major interests mere months before launchinga White House bid. In some cases, those speeches gave Clinton a chance to begin sounding out themes of her coming campaign and even discuss policy issues that a future Clinton administration might face.

Companies that paid her to speak include industry giants such as Xerox, Cisco Systems and Qualcomm, as well as start-ups and trade groups focused on biotechnology and medical technology.

The blurred line between personal and political is apparent in the cases of companies that hired Clinton to speak and are led by executives who are now prominent backers of her campaign. Salesforce.com, for instance, paid Clinton $451,000 to deliver two talks last year, and its CEO, Marc Benioff, is a major donor to Ready for Hillary, a super PAC that laid the groundwork for her presidential bid. Another major backer of the PAC is Irwin Jacobs, he former chairman of Qualcomm, which shelled out $335,000 for Clinton to speak in late October.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A spokeswoman for Salesforce declined to comment on how Clinton came to be invited to speak. Qualcomm did not return requests for comment. A spokeswoman for Jacobs said that he is retired from the company and does not play a role in its decisions.

When Clinton arrived at eBay for her March 2014 women's-leadership speech, she had another connection to the company. Eileen Donohoe, wife of the CEO, had worked for Clinton as U.S. ambassador to the U.N. Human Rights Council.

Abby Smith, spokeswoman for eBay, said that, "as one of the world's most admired women, Hillary Clinton was the perfect choice" for the event. Smith declined to comment on the Donahoes' fundraiser for the Clinton campaign.

The new disclosures showed Clinton's vast earning power on the public speaking circuit as a former secretary of state who many viewed as the Democratic presidential nominee in waiting.

In some cases, organizations that had once paid Bill Clinton to speak now paid even more to lure his wife.

The Biotechnology Industry Organization paid Bill Clinton $175,000 in 2010. Four years later, the group paid $335,000 — nearly twice as much — to hear from Hillary Clinton. Likewise, the Advanced Medical Technology Association paid Bill Clinton $160,000 to speak in 2009 and paid Hillary Clinton $265,000 to speak in 2014.

The warm reception for Hillary Clinton in Silicon Valley comes after she watched a young upstart named Barack Obama lock up many of the industry's top money players during their fight for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination.

Since then, the region has experienced explosive growth, making it an even bigger target for candidates hunting for political donors. Republicans such as Sen. Rand Paul of Kentucky and former Florida governor Jeb Bush are making a play to win over the traditionally left-leaning enclave.

But Clinton is not giving them much of an opening, assiduously courting tech leaders as she contemplated another White House run.

One day last July, she tweeted, "In #SiliconValley today visiting @Google, @Facebook, & @Twitter. Looking forward to seeing everyone and answering some questions."

Clinton did not receive any speaking fees from those companies, which she visited as part of a tour promoting her latest book, "Hard Choices."

But about a month later, she scooped up $625,000 in one day from the tech sector — first addressing a conference in San Francisco sponsored by Nexenta Systems, a data storage start-up, and then as a surprise guest at Cisco's sales conference in Las Vegas, where she was interviewed by chief executive John Chambers.

At the Nexenta conference, Clinton addressed several hot-button policy issues in Silicon Valley that the next president will have to confront. She spoke of the need to “rebalance” privacy and security when it comes to government surveillance, an issue viewed as both a business and philosophical matter among tech leaders. And she expressed interest in an idea proposed by Chambers and other chief executives to allow companies to bring profits invested overseas back to the United States at a reduced tax rate.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“It doesn’t do our economy any good to have this money parked somewhere else in the world,” Clinton said, according to the Wall Street Journal.

The event also provided Clinton, who was making few public appearances, a platform to weigh in on an increasingly hot national issue. In her first remarks about the unrest that followed the shooting death of Michael Brown in Ferguson, Mo., she urged Americans not to ignore “inequities that persist in our justice system.”

Allison Darin, director of communications for Nexenta, said that the topic “has nothing to do with what we do.”

But, she added, “it was obviously compelling news which brought a lot of attention to the event, which is exactly what we want.”

Tarkan Maner, the company’s chief executive, sits on the national finance committee of the Ready for Hillary PAC and made a $5,000 donation to the group in September, about a month after Clinton’s speech.

Darin said Maner’s support for Clinton had nothing to do with the company’s invitation to have her speak. Rather, she said, company officials decided Clinton would have broad appeal for the audience of 500 top executives who attended the conference.

“It really wasn’t politically focused at that time,” she said. “It was just good timing.”

Most of Clinton’s paid speeches were closed to the public and the press. But in the few that were open, Clinton appeared to be road-testing themes that would become a part of her upcoming campaign.

In an April 2014 speech at a technology conference sponsored by Marketo, a software branding company, she discussed the growing gap between rich and poor in the United States. According to news reports, she proposed changes to taxation and corporate policies to address the issue.

“Inequality of the kind we are experiencing is bad for individuals, bad for society, bad for democracy,” she said, according to the New York Times. “If you look around the world, this is becoming a bigger issue everywhere.”

Clinton’s latest financial disclosures also highlight the extent of personal support she and her husband have received from organizations and individuals who have donated to their charity, the Bill, Hillary and Chelsea Clinton Foundation.

At least 72 organizations that have paid the Clintons for speeches since 2001 have also donated to the Clinton Foundation.

For example, Cisco, which paid Hillary Clinton $325,000 for her August appearance, has given the foundation between $1 million and $5 million. In 2011, the company paid Bill Clinton $210,000 to speak at an event on Kiawah Island in South Carolina.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

As for eBay, the company's charitable foundation has given more than $50,000 to the Clinton Foundation.

Clinton Criticism of Wealth Leaves Us 1% Convinced // Bloomberg // C. Thompson and Lauren Arnold - ay 18, 2015

"Hillary Clinton sold her soul when they accepted that money."

The speaker here is a Sahrawi Arab from the disputed territory of Western Sahara named Mohamed Lahwaimed, quoted in a Politico story from last Friday. While he's referring to the $1 million (or more) in donations to the Clinton Foundation from a Moroccan mining company with ties to King Mohammed VI, he could be speaking as well to a lot of voters in the U.S. today.

Wonder if she's listening.

"Let's finally do something about the growing economic inequality that is tearing our country apart," she said in 2007 during her campaign for the 2008 election, according to the New York Times. "The top 1 percent of our households held 22 percent of our nation's wealth." We're not sure of the time frame to which she's referring, but it doesn't matter. We get it already.

How difficult will it be to run a campaign on a platform of tackling wealth inequality, which she is reprising for this run (probably because she has to), when we have all just learned that she and her husband can pretty much just burp money?

A haul of $30 million or so from talking to Rotarians in the past 16 months, revealed in a financial disclosure filed to the Federal Elections Commission on Friday, has got to be some weight around her neck now. As Jennifer Epstein and Richard Rubin reported over the weekend, that's not even everything—notably, the almost $105 million Bill Clinton pulled down from 2001 to 2013.

The once-and-perhaps-future first couple's net worth, Epstein and Rubin write, is somewhere between $11.3 million and $52.7 million (our range is narrower), and this excludes homes in New York and Washington, retirement savings accounts and other personal effects, as if those would tip the scale even more—from, say, astounding to astonishing.

The Clintons may have been "dead broke" when they left the White House in 2001, but it doesn't look like they stayed that way for very long.

So, what is it about her that is supposed to resonate with the middle-class voters? This will be the talking point from the other party for some time to come, one could reasonably assume, and of course it's a layup for them. But the Republicans might want to watch where they step because there are still steaming piles of Romney and Bush and, hell, even McCain money out there on the trail.

The bigger issue probably is that this information is going to be wielded against her by her own party.

So, again, what is it? Where's she coming from, when she's taking in money so fast and from so far afield, when she says she's a champion of the poor? Is it some kind of noblesse oblige thing? Does wealth not have its place?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

At Forbes magazine, the argument goes that the inequality Clinton claims to attack is, in fact, what's made it possible for her to be in this position in the first place.

"[T]he Clintons are rich for having been wise enough to make a profession of politics in what is the richest, most innovative country on Earth," John Tamny writes.

They're rich because people care about them, and people care about them because they're rich, he suggests:

"What's most bothersome is that Hillary would bash the very inequality that has made it possible for her and Bill to be prominent global figures, and by extension wildly rich global figures. If not for the immense taxable wealth in the U.S., and the Clintons' ability to influence its direction around the world, very few would give them the time of day.

"In short, the Clintons are nothing without the wealth inequality they claim to disdain. It's the sole source of their power," Tamny writes. "The swagger of the world's foremost political couple was taken from someone else."

Will it be taken from her?

CNN commentator: Hillary Clinton's 'strong point' is her last name, husband // WaPo // Erik Wemple – May 18, 2015

CNN commentator Tara Setmayer today identified what Hillary Clinton has going for her. "Hillary Clinton — she's her own worst enemy … she's not her husband, she's not the consummate politician, campaigner … warm and fuzzy person. … That is not her strong point," said Setmayer, who is also a contributor to The Blaze TV.

So what is her strong point? Setmayer: "Her strong point is that her last name is Clinton and that she has a husband that people adore and that she's a woman."

Fellow CNN commentator Marc Lamont Hill had a problem with all that: "That's sexist, that's absolutely sexist. … I reject completely the idea that Hillary Clinton has nothing going for her but her last name and her husband," said Hill, in a segment moderated by CNN's Carol Costello.

At which point, Setmayer pressed Hill on Clinton's accomplishments as secretary of state. Hill stumbled a bit on that one: "Opening up Myanmar, resetting Russia, having some of the most important, I think, sanctions intensified on Iran that we've seen in decades. I think all of those things that this secretary of state has done that have been effective," he responded.

The discussion broke out into a very brisk, occasionally boisterous, face-off over Clinton's record. Charges of sexism went back and forth, but get ready, viewers: The question of just what Clinton accomplished as secretary of state will get a great deal of rotation on cable news in the coming year and a half. Clinton defenders, prepare your lists!

Politics More: 2016 Elections Hillary Clinton Media // Business Insider // Colin Campbell – May 18, 2015

Compared to her rivals, former Secretary of Hillary Clinton has barely talked to the media since launching her presidential campaign on April 12.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And the media has responded by heavily criticizing Clinton's campaign for ducking the issues of the day.

On Monday, The New York Times announced Clinton's upcoming tour of swing states with the backhanded headline: "Hillary Clinton's Busy Week Presents More Opportunities for No Questions."

The Times story noted that there are still a number of controversial topics that Clinton has yet to personally address, including new questions about her family's foundation and last Friday's disclosure from her campaign indicating she and her husband made more than $25 million in paid speeches alone since 2014.

Also last week, The Washington Post unveiled a new clock to track the minutes — roughly 40,000, as of Monday — since Clinton last answered a question from a reporter. That question came on April 21.

Meanwhile, a wide range of outlets have gone out of their way to document every question Clinton has answered from the press since announcing her campaign. That total reportedly stands at 13 questions, depending on who's counting. The Daily News, National Journal, and Politico reported that she has answered only eight inquiries from reporters.

One of President Barack Obama's closest former campaign advisers, media consultant David Axelrod, said it would be a "terrible mistake" for Clinton not to reverse course and open up to the media.

Axelrod, whose team beat Clinton in the 2008 Democratic primary, argued that Clinton doesn't want "a major news event" every time she answers a routine question.

"She has to answer questions, and she has to do it routinely, so it's not a major news event when she takes a few questions from the news media," Axelrod said on NBC's "Meet the Press," according to a transcript. "It would be a terrible mistake to not do that."

For her part, Clinton's campaign and supporters have dismissed the criticism as media navel-gazing.

A campaign spokesman declined to comment to Business Insider for this story, but another spokesman, Jesse Ferguson, reacted last week on Twitter by pointing to Clinton taking questions at length during town hall events: "Philosophical Q: If a candidate answers hours of questions from real people on camera but they didn't come from press, did they happen?"

Perhaps seeking to counter potential criticism on the issue, the pro-Clinton super PAC American Bridge on Monday released a lengthy list of questions Clinton has both asked and taken from "everyday Americans while on the campaign trail."

"While other candidates are using the media to further their own agendas and attack each other, Hillary Clinton is displaying the qualities of a true leader by meeting with the people she hopes to champion as the next President of the United States," the PAC said in a statement to reporters.

Hillary Clinton Paid by Jeb Bush's Education Company // First Look // Lee Fang – May 18, 2015

Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton received nearly a quarter of a million dollars last year for a speaking engagement on behalf of Academic Partnerships, a for-profit education company in which Jeb Bush held an ownership stake and on whose board he served.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton's newly-filed personal financial disclosure shows that she was paid $225,500 on March 24, 2014 by Academic Partnerships. At the invitation-only event in Dallas, Texas, Clinton reportedly said, "today a student doesn't need to travel to Cambridge, Mass., or Cambridge, England, to get a world-class education."

Academic Partnerships assists universities in converting their academic degree programs into online versions that can be taken by students around the world.

In 2011, Bush joined Academic Partnerships as an investor and as a paid advisor. He helped the company host multiple conferences and has appeared in online videos encouraging others to consider the Academic Partnership business model. Though he did not share the stage with Clinton, Bush spoke at the same conference.

Preparing for an expected bid for the Republican nomination for president, Bush resigned from Academic Partnerships in December.

Rand Paul: Bill Clinton put 'generation' of black men in prison // The Hill // Alexander Bolton – May 18, 2015

PHILADELPHIA — Republican presidential candidate Rand Paul says he will bash Hillary Clinton over her husband's record of putting "a generation of black men in prison" if he is the nominee.

Paul, a freshman senator from Kentucky, says he will compete with Clinton in Philadelphia, where Democrats have a 7-to-1 registration advantage, and other impoverished cities by highlighting his support for criminal justice reform.

"If I were the nominee, we will compete in Philadelphia," he told CBS radio talk show host Dom Giordano at the National Constitution Center.

"I'll ask Hillary Clinton, what have you done for criminal justice. Your husband passed all the laws that put a generation of black men in prison. Her husband was responsible for that," he said.

"She's changing her tune now. She's changing her tune because people like me have been speaking out against these injustices," he said.

As president, Clinton signed the 1994 Violent Crime Control Act, which gave sentences fiscal incentives to enact tougher sentencing laws.

Paul noted that in some predominantly African-American communities such as Ferguson, Missouri, there are substantially fewer black men than women because so many black men are incarcerated.

He touted bills he has introduced with Democratic support that would give judges more discretion in handing out sentencing and reduce penalties for non-violent drug offenses.

Paul said he would also challenge Clinton about her vision for reinvigorating blighted urban centers.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"I'll also ask her what she's going to do for poor people in Philadelphia. I have a specific plan that would dramatically lower the taxes for people who live in zip codes of poverty and high unemployment. I would leave billions of dollars in Philadelphia over ten years. What's Hillary Clinton going to do?" he said.

Bill Clinton signals he can be Hillary's second fiddle // The Hill // Niaill Stanage – May 19, 2015

Bill Clinton is going out of his way to suggest he can play second fiddle to Hillary Clinton in the 2016 campaign.

The former president, considered one of his party's greatest campaigners and political minds, has implied he will play the wallflower when it comes to his wife's presidential bid.

Appearing on David Letterman's "Late Show" last week, Bill Clinton jokingly suggested that if his wife wins the presidency, he'd only move back to the White House "if I'm asked."

He's happy to give Hillary Clinton advice "if his advice is asked for," his chief of staff, Tina Flournoy, told The Washington Post the same week.

Bill Clinton is "not directly engaged in the campaign," Flournoy added.

But many political observers doubt that Bill Clinton can hang back. In fact, some find the idea preposterous.

On Sunday, NBC's "Meet the Press" host, Chuck Todd, declared that the former president had become "the face of the Clinton campaign, in an odd way," because he had answered 39 on-camera questions since his wife formally declared her candidacy, compared with nine answered by Hillary Clinton.

On the same show, David Axelrod, a former senior adviser to President Obama, said that Hillary Clinton would be making "a terrible mistake" if she did not quickly get into the rhythm of fielding media questions herself.

Veterans of recent presidential campaigns, such as Axelrod, need no reminding of the assets and liabilities Bill Clinton brings to the trail.

In 2012, Bill Clinton's speech at the Democratic National Convention was hailed as one of the most effective of the presidential campaign.

In 2008, by contrast, his appearances often backfired on his wife, most notably when he compared Obama's performance against her in the South Carolina primary to that of civil rights leader Jesse Jackson in earlier presidential races. The remark was widely seen as racially insensitive.

The issue faced by Hillary Clinton's campaign is how to take advantage of her husband's prodigious skills while steering him around potential pitfalls.

Strategists on both sides of the political divide agree that one vital issue is the extent to which the former president can be kept focused.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“When I was at the White House, so long as there was a bull’s-eye, he would invariably hit it,” said Chris Lehane, who worked in the Clinton administration before going on to serve as press secretary for then-Vice President Gore’s 2000 presidential campaign. “If there isn’t a bull’s-eye, then it’s harder to know where you’re supposed to be going.”

“Bill Clinton has tremendous speaking skills and the ability to motivate voters,” Republican consultant Ron Bonjean acknowledged. “But he eventually acts of his own accord, and there is a significant possibility that he can take the campaign off message.”

The former president has already displayed that downside to some extent, drawing unflattering headlines in recent months on donations to the Clinton Foundation and on the massive fees he can command for speeches — around $500,000 per appearance.

Bill Clinton’s response when asked by NBC News if he would continue making such lavishly rewarded speeches — “Yeah, I gotta pay our bills” — only deepened the worry on the part of some of his wife’s supporters that he has, in political terms, lost a step.

“Bill Clinton could be well-used in 2016, but even if you are as good a politician as he is, your skills atrophy, you get a little bit rusty,” said Cal Jillson, a political science professor at Southern Methodist University. “Bill in a set piece, like a speech to a convention, is always masterful. But out on the stump, and particularly when he is ad-libbing, he can get himself in a little bit of trouble.”

Still, it could be easier for the Hillary Clinton campaign to keep Bill Clinton on message this time than it was in 2008.

While it has never been a secret that there are separate camps of advisers and confidants around each of the Clintons, many of the former secretary of State’s aides now are too young to bear the baggage accrued during Bill Clinton’s White House years.

Her campaign manager,

Robby Mook, is 35 and a member of a different generation than 2008 campaign aides such as Mark Penn or Bill Clinton loyalists such as James Carville.

“I think her campaign will be careful not to let him do whatever he wants,” said Princeton University public affairs professor Julian Zelizer. “You need to contain him, and I think no one knows that better than his wife.”

Bill Clinton is viewed positively by a majority of the public.

A Gallup poll released last week found that 59 percent of adults in the U.S. viewed him favorably compared with 38 percent who viewed him unfavorably. Opinions of his wife were more evenly split: 50 percent favorable to 46 percent unfavorable.

Lehane argued that Bill Clinton is the Babe Ruth of politics, adding that the 42nd president might be used sparingly until Hillary Clinton’s campaign is well underway but that he could be vital in big moments.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"If you are the manager of a baseball team, you're in the World Series and you see on the bench Babe Ruth, to me you put Babe Ruth in the starting lineup," he said. "There is more of a question about whether you put Babe Ruth in spring training."

But the former president proved once again on Monday that he might get a little restless as a benchwarmer. After President Obama debuted a new Twitter account with the handle @Potus, Clinton responded.

"Welcome to @Twitter, @POTUS!" the tweet read. "One question: Does that username stay with the office? #askingforafriend."

Bill Clinton's Hud Secretary: Julian Castro Team Hillary's Top VP Choice // Breitbart News // May 18, 2015

Bill Clinton's Secretary of Housing and Urban Development (HUD) Henry Cisneros believes that Hillary Clinton's campaign is intent on picking current HUD secretary Julian Castro as her running mate.

"What I am hearing in Washington, including from people in Hillary Clinton's campaign, is that the first person on their lists is Julian Castro," Cisneros said in an Univision interview that aired on Sunday. "That they don't have a second option, because he is the superior candidate considering his record, personality, demeanor and Latin heritage. I think there is a very high possibility that Hillary Clinton may choose Julian Castro."

As The Hill noted, "Castro has followed a political path similar to the one Cisneros traveled in the 1990s" when "Cisneros served as Mayor of San Antonio and was then HUD secretary under President Bill Clinton." But Cisneros "ultimately left the Clinton administration in the shadow of a scandal about payments he had made to a former mistress. He later pleaded guilty to one count of lying to the FBI and was pardoned by Clinton."

Castro, who appeared at a March Center for American Progress event with Clinton, essentially ruled out running for Texas governor in 2018 in a recent interview with MSNBC, saying that was not on his radar screen. When host Jose Diaz-Balart asked him about the vice presidential rumors, Castro said he had "no comment."

Clinton is reportedly running as "the most liberal Democratic front-runner in decades" because she is projecting that minorities will comprise 31% of the 2016 electorate compared to 28% in 2012 and 26% in 2008.

House liberals play hard-to-get with Hillary Clinton // Politico // Lauren French – May 19, 2015

More than 30 members of the House Progressive Caucus still aren't ready to back Hillary Clinton's campaign, saying she has a ways to go to show she would champion their agenda as president.

The resistance comes even as they acknowledge she'll likely be the party's nominee, and her campaign has mounted an early, aggressive courtship of lawmakers.

"Ultimately, she simply needs to ... not [be] a Republican for me to endorse her," said Rep. Keith Ellison (D-Minn.), co-chairman of the 70-member House Progressive Caucus. "I will support the Democratic nominee, there is no question about that. The real question is: What is going to make me get excited? I want to hear her talking about the most pressing issue in America today, which is the concentration of wealth at the top."

Ellison and other House liberals hope that by holding out on a formal endorsement, they can nudge Clinton to the left, not only on income inequality but poverty, trade, criminal justice and college affordability — essentially, the Elizabeth Warren agenda. Progressive Caucus members have asked to meet with Clinton aides soon to discuss their policies.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

So far, there are close to three dozen House progressives who already have endorsed Clinton. But most House liberals want to see a stronger commitment to their platform.

“I want her to declare a war on poverty,” said Rep. G.K. Butterfield (D-N.C.), chairman of the Congressional Black Caucus. For Rep. Raúl Grijalva (D-Ariz.), co-chairman of the Progressive Caucus, it’s climate change and the role of government and trade. “Progressives are looking for definitive positions on the issues,” he said.

Both have withheld their endorsements, at least for now.

The resistance to her among liberals isn’t a direct threat to her campaign so much as another reminder of the wariness among the party base toward its presumed nominee. The lawmakers aren’t so disillusioned that they would get behind Martin O’Malley or Bernie Sanders. In the end, they’re all but sure to come around to Clinton, but like other activists on the left, they want her to earn it.

Still, their lack of enthusiasm for Clinton has practical implications. If she fails to energize progressives, it could depress turnout and hurt Democrats’ chances of eating into the GOP’s 245-seat House majority — a major priority for the party in an election year that should favor Democrats.

And as of now, progressives say they aren’t seeing enough from the Clinton campaign.

The former secretary of state has, for example, refused to weigh in on the controversial battle over “fast-track” authority for trade deals — raising the suspicions of some progressives as Clinton was a key player in the Trans-Pacific Partnership currently being negotiated by the Obama administration.

The fast-track bill is the procedural first step Obama needs to complete the largest trade agreement in American history and a large bloc of Democrats in the House and Senate has been working for months to defeat it. The Senate is set to vote on the bill this week, but the measure’s fate in the House is still uncertain.

Clinton gave a tempered response on trade in April but has refused to answer questions from the media about her concerns or thoughts on the issue since.

That, Grijalva said, is not acceptable for a candidate seeking favor with progressives.

“That is critical,” he said. “The campaign and the secretary have to … tell us where they stand on it.”

A spokesman for Clinton’s campaign, Josh Schwerin, said Clinton appreciates the support she’s seen from the left.

“Hillary Clinton appreciates the support of so many members of the Progressive Caucus and looks forward to continuing to work with them throughout the campaign,” Schwerin said. “She will build on the proposals she’s laid out on issues like criminal justice reform, immigration and helping everyday Americans get ahead and stay ahead.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And the campaign has signaled in recent weeks that Clinton is eyeing the populist base that helped elect President Barack Obama. Campaign manager Robby Mook excited liberals when he said on CNBC that voters are seeking out a candidate who is a "champion" for progressive issues like "debt-free college."

Clinton also gave a speech in April on the need to end "mass incarceration" that many progressives lauded.

Still, there's pressure on lawmakers' in progressive districts to stay out of the endorsement game until later in the election. Grijalva, who represents the Tucson and Phoenix areas, said liberal voters in his state would question his judgment if he got out early in favor of Clinton.

"I hear more about Sen. Warren than anybody else, people saying that she should be an alternative ... but if there is any person being talked about Secretary Clinton sounding more like, it's Elizabeth Warren," he said.

"If I were to endorse Hillary Clinton, if someone like Elizabeth Warren was in the race, there would be a lot of questions [from progressives.] A lot of questions," Grijalva added.

To be sure, many progressives have already endorsed Clinton. Rep. Karen Bass (D-Calif.), a member of the Progressive Caucus, tweeted her endorsement in the days after Clinton announced. And Rep. David Cicilline (D-R.I.) said at the time of the announcement that he "can't wait" to see her elected to the White House.

But the majority of the Progressive Caucus isn't ready to jump on board yet. And congressional sources say that while endorsements are inevitable for Clinton, progressives want to see her work to woo them first, especially when one of their own, Sanders, has jumped into the race.

Even senior leaders in the Democratic Party haven't given Clinton their formal nod. Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, who helped recruit then-Sen. Obama to challenge Clinton in 2008, was asked about the 2016 Democratic field during an interview earlier this month on MSNBC.

"I have a few friends out there," Reid said. But he didn't offer an endorsement of Clinton and touted the benefits of a competitive primary.

"Everybody — everybody knows I love the Clintons," Reid said. "And I don't need to say more."

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelsoi hasn't formally endorsed Clinton, either. She said in January that Clinton would likely win the general election if nominated, even though the party isn't "devoid of other voices."

"Well, your question was, do I believe she's the presumed nominee and will she win if she runs," Pelosi said at the time. "If the secretary runs, I believe that she will win and she will be one of the best-prepared people to enter the White House in a long time in terms of her experience and her knowledge."

5 Things You Might Not Know About Hillary Clinton // NYT // Amy Chozick – May 19, 2015

She is not exactly an open book, though she has written six of them. Most presidential candidates would count themselves lucky to finish their campaigns as recognized as Hillary Rodham Clinton started this one (excluding Chipotle restaurants near Toledo, at least). Here are some things you may still not know about her.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A Formative Experience With Slime

Fresh out of Wellesley, she worked in a salmon cannery in Valdez, Alaska, wearing hip boots and an apron. The fish would be slit open, and young Hillary Rodham's job was to "slime" them, or "to take a spoon and clean out the insides," she told David Letterman in 2007. "Best preparation for being in Washington that you can possibly imagine."

She's Bounced Back Before

She failed the Washington, D.C., bar exam in 1973 — but passed the Arkansas one.

'Drink Your Wine With a Merry Heart'

She has been known to enjoy a drink or two — though she grew up in the Methodist Church memorizing passages from the Bible and still calls it "the biggest influence on my thinking."

Comedy With an Edge

She may be stressing sunny earnestness in the early going of her presidential campaign, but Mrs. Clinton has a funny and sarcastic side, with a streak of biting wit. Ask Dick Armey. Or Barack Obama.

No, Ella No Puede

She will not win many votes with Latinos for her Spanish accent. (Then again, Jeb Bush — who makes a habit of speaking Spanish — doesn't have this song.) "I'm barely monolingual," she said last month, making light of her language skills while recalling how Spanish-speaking parents worried about being unable to talk to their children in English.

What Young Feminists Think of Hillary Clinton // National Journal // Molly Mirhashem - May 16, 2015

Alexandra Svokos was six years old, growing up in Franklin Lakes, New Jersey, when she became a Hillary Clinton fan. It was 1998, and Clinton had published Dear Socks, Dear Buddy, a collection of children's letters addressed to the first family's pets. Svokos became so obsessed with the book, she recalls, that she wrote her own letter—not to Socks the cat or Buddy the Labrador, but to Clinton herself. When she got a reply on official White House stationery with the first lady's signature, Svokos was thrilled.

Clinton was an early feminist icon for many women of Svokos's generation—long before they even began to think of themselves as feminists. Svokos, who's now 23 and a fellow at The Huffington Post, grew up with parents who called themselves feminists and practiced gender equality in the house, balancing household responsibilities and encouraging Svokos and her two sisters to "fight for what we deserved." Mostly, she says, feminism meant "girl power" to her—and that meant, in turn, rooting for Clinton when she made her first run for the presidency in 2008. Svokos was in high school then, and her ideas about feminism were still pretty simple; she admired Clinton "because she was a woman, rather than knowing much about what she stood for."

Eight years later, Svokos's notion of feminism has evolved—and the prospect of Hillary Clinton becoming president no longer fills her with unbridled excitement. Svokos says her ideas about feminism began to change when she studied economics at Columbia University, beginning in 2010. As she learned about economic inequality in the United States and around the world, she says, she began to see how gender, race, and class were intertwined—how, for instance, expanding access to birth control can stimulate an economy by enabling women to pursue their own careers.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Feminism came to mean something very different from girl power. And Hillary Clinton came to look like the symbol of an older generation of women more concerned with female empowerment—in particular, with white, middle-class, American female empowerment—than with broader issues of social and economic justice. Svokos says she'll vote for Clinton in 2016, but she's not expecting her to make social justice and inequality true priorities if she makes it to the White House. "I find her lacking, in that I realize she's not likely to push for the kind of change I'd like to see," Svokos says. "At the same time, though, I believe she knows how to manage politics and will be more than capable in the position."

Among feminists of her generation, Svokos is hardly alone in her lukewarm feelings about Hillary Clinton's presidential bid. I recently interviewed 47 young women, most in their early to mid-20s, who call themselves feminists; they talked about what feminism means to them and shared their thoughts about Clinton's candidacy and public image. While the overwhelming majority of these women said they would likely vote for her in 2016, only about a quarter of them were enthusiastic or emphatic in their support. Jennifer Schaffer, a 22-year-old weekend editor at Vice, summed up a common sentiment among these women: "I'm glad we have a female presidential candidate," she told me, "but it's incredibly difficult to get excited about something that should have happened decades ago." A vote for Clinton, many said, would be a vote by default, because no other viable progressive alternatives—female or male—are in the offing.

While it's not exactly news that Clinton is a less-than-ideal candidate for many on the Left, the critique of her from those on the vanguard of contemporary feminism is more surprising—and potentially problematic for her presidential effort. To win in 2016, Clinton doesn't just need half-hearted support from young women; she needs them to be a base of her grassroots efforts, as fired up as young people were for Barack Obama in 2008 and 2012. But even as more and more young women are embracing the "feminist" label—with pop-culture icons like Beyoncé making it central to their public personas—the feminism that Clinton represents seems increasingly outmoded. While her campaign banks on young feminists like Svokos and Schaffer being "Ready for Hillary," these women say they're ready for more.

HILLARY CLINTON came of age during the peak years of second-wave feminism. The first wave began in the mid-1800s, with women's suffrage as the goal; the second stretched from the 1960s to the early 1980s, and focused on reproductive and workplace rights. Writer and activist Betty Friedan is usually credited with catalyzing the second wave with The Feminine Mystique. Published in 1963, the landmark book called for women's liberation from housework, with Friedan famously writing: "We can no longer ignore that voice within women that says: 'I want something more than my husband and my children and my house.' "

As the feminism of Friedan and second-wave stalwarts like Gloria Steinem moved into the mainstream, some began to criticize it as a movement tailored to white women of means. Who, they asked, would clean the homes and care for the children of Friedan's liberated middle-class housewives? Where was their liberation? Such questions fed into a larger critique of second-wave feminism: that it saw white American women's concerns as representing those of all women.

In 1989, a term emerged for a feminist philosophy that would include women of color and other marginalized groups: "intersectionality." To the uninitiated, the word might sound like unwieldy academic jargon. But without my bringing it up, many of the women I spoke to said intersectionality was the foundation of their feminism—and of their skepticism about Clinton. First coined by legal scholar and professor Kimberlé Crenshaw, the word refers to the connections (the "intersections") between different systems of oppression—not just sexism, but also racism, homophobia, transphobia, and classism. It's a recognition that a black woman, for instance, is not affected independently by racism and sexism—those forms of discrimination are inextricably linked, which makes her experience sexism differently from a white woman and racism differently from a black man.

The concept itself was far from new; it stretched as far back, at least, as Sojourner Truth's famous "Ain't I a Woman?" speech in 1851, in which she highlighted the dramatic differences between the ways black and white women experience sexism. "That man over there says that women need to be helped into carriages and lifted over ditches, and to have the best place everywhere," Truth said. "Nobody ever helps me into carriages, or over mud-puddles, or gives me any best place! And ain't I a woman?"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Now the idea had a name. But in the 1990s, as intersectionality was gaining popularity in academic circles, Hillary Clinton was bringing her own, more traditional brand of feminism to her role as first lady. Her domestic initiatives included adoption, foster care, and child care. In 1995, Clinton gave her famous Beijing speech to the United Nations' Fourth World Conference on Women, declaring that "women's rights are human rights." She helped to form the Justice Department's Violence Against Women Office and partnered with then–Secretary of State Madeleine Albright to found the Vital Voices Democracy Initiative, a series of conferences devoted to promoting female leaders and involving women around the globe in politics.

In the early and mid-2000s, after she left the White House and took up residence in the U.S. Senate, Clinton largely shifted away from a women-centered agenda as she worked to bolster her presidential résumé. At the same time, young bloggers like Lauren Bruce (Feministe) and Jessica Valenti (Feministing) were bringing feminist theory out of the Ivory Tower. "Each month seemed to bring a new site with feminist content," Rebecca Traister writes in her 2010 book, Big Girls Don't Cry. "At various points there were about six sites calling themselves The F-Word."

Social media changed the landscape of feminism. Young women who might not learn about feminism in their schools or communities could find primers on Tumblr blogs with names like intersectional feminism 101. Their feminist awakenings thus involved, from the start, debates about second-wave feminism's perceived failures of inclusivity. "Anyone who entered the feminist conversation in the Internet age has immediate access to not only research about those failures, but also to a lot of the conversations about them," says feminist organizer and writer Shelby Knox, who's 28. "The barriers are a lot lower for participation in the movement."

Young women could now do more than read about feminist issues and discuss them in class; they could find communities of women on Twitter or Tumblr whose experiences they could relate to—or who could open up new vistas for them on what other women's lives are like. They could participate in the creation of a new feminism—one that would be a far cry from Friedan's. By 2011, the writer Flavia Dzodan was famously declaring on her blog: "My feminism will be intersectional or it will be bullshit." Her words became a rallying cry.

As young women's notions of feminism evolved and broadened, so did their idea of what constitutes "women's issues" in the political arena. "If you're taking intersectionality as the foundation of this kind of feminism, you wouldn't just be concerned with how any particular policy issue is affecting women," says Gwendolyn Beetham, director of the Global Village at Douglass Residential College, the women's residential college affiliated with Rutgers University. "But you would be asking, 'Which women, and how?' And you would be asking this whether or not you are a member of one of those groups."

To young women like Sylvie Edman, a 20-year-old student at the University of Massachusetts, Amherst, Clinton embodies "corporate feminism," which Edman defines concisely: "It's empowering women who are already powerful." Clinton and Sheryl Sandberg, the Facebook COO and author of Lean In, are often name-dropped in this context; while they experience sexism, the thinking goes, they've been able to dare greatly because of their race and class—while being helped along the way by working-class women and women of color who didn't have the same opportunities.

Some of the concerns raised by the women I spoke to about Clinton were traditional "women's issues" like reproductive justice and equal pay. But just as many brought up police brutality, criminal-justice reform, and environmental issues as primary concerns—and as integral to what they mean by "feminism." Some of the most commonly expressed critiques of Clinton echoed those of many left-of-center Americans: She's "hawkish" on foreign affairs, "part of a political dynasty," and simply "not very progressive." Collier Meyerson, who writes for the website Fusion, told me that her ideal candidate "wouldn't be part of a legacy, and wouldn't be a career politician." A candidate more like Barack Obama—"somebody who is rooted more in community-organizing"—would fit the bill better, Meyerson says.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Ayesha Siddiqi, the 24-year-old editor-in-chief of the online magazine The New Inquiry, says that this range of concerns should be no surprise. "Feminist issues," she says, "are no more complicated than the issues of people's lives." But that philosophy makes young women's views of Clinton—and her campaign's efforts to galvanize them behind her—very complicated indeed.

AT THE ANNUAL Women in the World Summit in New York this April, Sam Viqueira stuck out from the crowd. The summit, a high-powered gathering of leaders and activists launched by former New Yorker and Daily Beast editor Tina Brown in 2010, this year featured a keynote address by Hillary Clinton. Most of the women in attendance looked like Clinton's crowd, her generation: Dressed business casual, the mostly middle-aged women flocked to the free coffee and Luna bars on offer, chatted in small groups, and snapped selfies in front of a Dove-sponsored backdrop. The 17-year-old Viqueira and her high school friend stood off to the side in a small lounge, looking like they were dressed for a regular day of school. They'd taken the train in from Maplewood, New Jersey. "To me, feminism isn't only about wanting equality for all genders," Viqueira told me later, "but wanting and advocating for the equality of all oppressed groups, which can and do intersect."

In some respects, Viqueira exemplifies the rising generation of feminists—and their conflicted feelings about Clinton. She grew up with three sisters and parents who were big on women's empowerment, encouraging the girls to play sports and study math and science. But she credits social media with teaching her about the intersection of race and gender, and the issues women face outside of the United States; she first read the term "intersectionality" online when she was just 15 and now follows a lot of young women on Twitter who help broaden her perspective.

This spring, she's taking the first gender-studies class ever offered at her public high school. Next fall, Viqueira will be old enough to cast her first vote. That has led her, like so many other young feminists, to think long and hard about what Clinton would—and wouldn't—represent as the first woman president. "It's nice to see a strong female candidate running for president," Viqueira says, but she can't help wishing it were a woman with a different track record. She's particularly troubled by Clinton's support of the 1996 welfare-reform bill her husband signed and of the Clinton-era crime-fighting legislation that, among other things, lengthened prison sentences for drug offenses. At best, she says, Clinton has been inconsistent on social-justice issues; at worst, she has been a hypocrite.

While Viqueira is hesitant to say she'll vote for Clinton, she acknowledges that the limited options for progressive-minded voters will probably push her in that direction. But it bothers her to see Clinton held up as a model feminist: "I think it's problematic to assume that just because she's a woman, she's the best spokesperson for all women."

Clinton's first presidential campaign relied heavily on that assumption. An internal campaign memo from March 2007, written by the campaign's chief strategist and pollster, Mark Penn, and published in The Atlantic the following year, advised Clinton thusly:

1) Start with a base of women.

a. For these women, you represent a breaking of barriers.

b. The winnowing out of the most competent and qualified in an unfair, male-dominated world.

c. The infusion of a woman and a mother's sensibilities into a world of war and neglect.

2) Add on a base of lower- and middle-class voters.

a. You see them; you care about them.

b. You were one of them, it is your history.

c. You are all about their concerns (health care, education, energy, child care, college, etc.).

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

For young feminists, Penn's memo, and Clinton's campaign, represented the antithesis of intersectional thinking. The problem isn't merely the assumption that women would be Clinton's primary base because of their gender alone; it's also the fact that lower- and middle-class voters are itemized as a separate group, with a different (and far more specific) set of concerns from those of "women." "With strategies like this," Traister writes, "it was not unjust to suggest that one serious problem with the Clinton campaign leadership was that it did not think much of the women with whom it was supposed to be making history." Traister notes that "Penn assured Hillary that internal polling showed that 94% of young women would automatically vote for the first female president. It was perhaps this confidence that led him to shrug off concerns about reaching them." In the end, according to a CBS News poll, Penn's initial estimates were way off: 53 percent of young women backed Obama over Clinton.

Far from a high-water mark for feminism, Siddiqi, The New Inquiry editor, sees Clinton's presidential campaigns as "the nadir of the 'Lean In' feminism moment. This is what you get when that's what your feminism looks like," she says. "You don't get a victory that all women can celebrate."

OF COURSE, plenty of young women will be celebrating next November if Hillary Clinton wins the presidency—including some who see themselves rooted in "intersectionality." Gabriel Clarke, a 20-year-old musician and student at Oakwood University in Alabama, says she had a wake-up moment during protests over the shooting of Michael Brown last summer in Ferguson, Missouri. "A young woman grabbed the microphone and said, 'I am a woman, but before I am a woman, I am black.' And I was thinking, that's not how we have to look at these things. That's not how we have to be. We have to understand that we are both of those things simultaneously."

Women of color like herself have long been "on the back burner in the movement," Clarke says. It's a welcome change that "people are starting to see that you can't have a social movement about equality and leave out everyone else who's not a white woman." But intersectional thinking hasn't dimmed her passion for electing Clinton. The first time Clinton ran, Clarke was just 13. She had a hard time taking the candidate seriously, she says, because of the media's relentless focus on her hair, clothes, and manner of speaking. But the summer before Clarke went off to college in 2013, her impression was changed by watching the documentary Miss Representation, which shines a critical light on the way women leaders are portrayed by the media. "It really opened my eyes and made me see Hillary in a totally different way," Clarke says. "They talked more about her pantsuits than her policies!"

Like most of the one-quarter of these young women who told me they're gung ho for Clinton, Clarke cites the candidate's extensive experience—the same experience others use to knock her as a "career politician"—as a prime factor in her support. Clinton, says Clarke, is obviously the most-qualified candidate in the race. "But that's the story of being a woman," she says. "You have to be ten times better than everyone else to even get your foot in the door." Clarke realizes that many feminists of color are "very skeptical" of Clinton, wondering "whether she will really be a champion or a voice for them, or only for white women"—and she gets the skepticism. But to her, there's something more fundamental at stake: "I think that even her as a symbol for women, that a woman can be president, is powerful enough."

This time around, the Clinton campaign isn't taking that kind of solidarity for granted. Young feminists' social and economic views may have been overlooked in 2008, but in the early stages of Clinton's second run, they've been front and center. You could hear it in her keynote at the Women in the World Summit, where Clinton talked about inequities in what women are paid, taking care to note the "even wider gaps for women of color." You could hear it in another speech she recently gave in New York calling for police reform and in her frequent invocations of income inequality. "Americans have fought their way back from tough economic times," Clinton said in the April video announcing her campaign. "But the deck is still stacked in favor of those at the top."

Such talk is welcomed by Clinton skeptics like Viqueira, the 17-year-old, who sees the candidate "redefining her feminism to be all-inclusive." Collier Meyerson says that Clinton's announcement video—which, as pundits noted, took pains to feature just about every group of "marginalized" people in America—was a clear attempt to reach people ignored during her 2008 campaign. "My hope is that she continues with this thread," Meyerson says, "and goes on to pull in people from different socioeconomic classes, backgrounds, and races."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

By and large, these women say they'll need to see more evidence of Clinton's new inclusiveness before their ambivalent support morphs into enthusiasm. "So far, she's hit on a lot of the things I'm passionate about," says Laura Brown, a 26-year-old fashion designer and seamstress in Los Angeles. "I want to see her prove it. I want to know it's genuine and not just part of the game."

OTHER DEMOCRATS NATIONAL COVERAGE

Why Not Martin O'Malley? // Harvard Political Review // Quinn Mulholland - May 18, 2015

On April 10, Elizabeth Warren joined Jon Stewart on the Daily Show and declared, "Powerful corporations [and] rich people have figured out that if you can bend the government to help you just a little bit, it's a tremendous payoff, and if you can bend it to help you just a little bit more and a little bit more, the playing field just gets more and more tilted, and the rich and the powerful just do better and better." A week later, Martin O'Malley stood before a packed crowd at Harvard's Institute of Politics and proclaimed, "Concentrated wealth has accumulated concentrated political power in the halls of our Congress, and also in many, many, many of our state houses, making it harder than ever to get things done."

Both of these quotes are emblematic of a nascent populist movement in the Democratic Party. Both reflect a deep concern that all Americans don't have an equal shot at prosperity. Both demonstrate a growing opposition to the centrist Democratic policies of the Clinton era—the trade policies and the welfare reform—that seemed to mostly benefit the wealthiest Americans.

Yet it is Martin O'Malley, not Elizabeth Warren, who has a proven record of accomplishing real progress on these issues on a state level. It is Martin O'Malley, not Elizabeth Warren, who became the first major Democratic politician to endorse a national $15 minimum wage at the Institute of Politics on Thursday. And it is Martin O'Malley, not Elizabeth Warren, who is seriously considering challenging Hillary Clinton for the Democratic nomination for president in 2016.

So why have political pundits come to the consensus that Elizabeth Warren is the only one who could give Hillary a run for her money in the Democratic primary? Perhaps it is O'Malley's lack of name recognition. He is currently polling at around 0.3 percent in the Iowa Democratic Caucus, compared to Clinton's 58 percent, and Warren's 17 percent. But that number is increasing, and O'Malley received a warm reception in recent trips to New Hampshire and Iowa.

Perhaps it is because O'Malley is not a woman. While a first female president would certainly be a symbolic victory for women, it is unclear that a Clinton presidency would produce many tangible benefits for women. In fact, in terms of policy, O'Malley seems to have proposed just as many, if not more, policies to help women as Clinton has. At the Harvard Institute of Politics, O'Malley declared, "We must recognize that policies that are good for women and families, like paid leave and safe and affordable child care, are also good for our national economy, and for economic growth, because when women succeed, our American economy also succeeds."

O'Malley also proclaimed his support for a federal $15 minimum wage, which would give a much-needed raise to the 3 million Americans who work at or below minimum wage, 62 percent of whom are women. Clinton has voiced her support for fast food workers striking for a higher wage, but she has yet to establish how much of an increase in the minimum wage she would support. Despite his gender, O'Malley could be the candidate that would make the biggest difference for women.

O'Malley's possible candidacy seems to already be pushing Clinton towards the left. She recently declared her support for a Supreme Court decision guaranteeing the right to gay marriage nationwide, which she previously thought should be dealt with on a "state by state" basis, and she switched her position on driver's licenses for undocumented immigrants. O'Malley chided Clinton for these flip-flops, telling the HPR at a press conference, "I'm glad Secretary Clinton has come around to the right position on these issues ... I believe that we are best as a party when we lead according to our principles, and not according to the polls."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Yet Clinton's campaign has challenged the notion that she is a newcomer to the populist themes her candidacy is centered around. Close friends and advisers insist that she has championed populist causes long before Elizabeth Warren or Martin O'Malley ascended to the national stage. Even so, there is no denying her many ties to Wall Street, which make it hard for statements like "the deck is still stacked in favor of those at the top" to ring genuine.

Clinton will be nowhere near as "inevitable" in the general presidential election as she was in the Democratic primary, assuming—perhaps prematurely—that she wins it. She will have to face voters on the left concerned with her ties to Wall Street and her flip-flopping on gay marriage and immigration, as well as voters on the right who will have been inundated with anti-Hillary attacks for months. Perhaps America is ready for a genuinely populist Martin O'Malley campaign. O'Malley certainly appears to be ready.

Bernie Sanders Wants to Be President, but He's Already Facebook Royalty // NYT // Nick Corasaniti - May 18, 2015

WASHINGTON — The quotes he posts are rarely pithy, and often sayings he thinks up in the shower. The photographs he puts up sometimes show him frowning, while others show him gazing oddly into the horizon. And he does not seem to care about the importance of videos.

But somehow, Bernie Sanders, the 73-year-old senator from Vermont, has emerged as a king of social media early in the 2016 presidential campaign, amid a field of tech-savvy contenders.

His Facebook posts attract tens of thousands of likes and shares, and threads about him often break through to the home page of Reddit, where the cluster of topics rarely focuses on presidential election politics.

"I'm a grumpy old guy," Mr. Sanders joked when explaining his approach to posting online. "I know that people talk about their cats and 'I'm walking to the grocery story and getting a can of chicken soup' and 'this is so exciting.' By and large, we have not done that."

Mr. Sanders's prominence online is all the more improbable given that he does not do many things the way social media experts say they should be done.

He has not shied away from posts of 300 words or more, with a "continue reading here" link to his personal website.

Mr. Sanders, an independent who describes himself as a socialist, has stuck to an idiosyncratic method: posting images that share a quote, which he has either written himself or dug up from a historical figure and then burned onto a photograph. (President Theodore Roosevelt and President Dwight D. Eisenhower are among those he has recently cited.)

Social networking sites like Facebook recommend that when users post text, they do so with searchable words that would be attractive to newsfeed algorithms and search engines.

But Mr. Sanders's team rarely uses buzzy introductory text when sharing his posts, leaving the chances of their going viral to users who stumble upon them. Fortunately for Mr. Sanders, who is seeking the Democratic nomination, he has loyal followers who somehow always know how to find his latest musing.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Take, for example, a block quote advocating making Election Day a national holiday. The quote is posted atop a stock photo of ballot boxes. And it contains no searchable text. Still, it received nearly 100,000 likes and 22,000 shares. By comparison, Hillary Rodham Clinton's video announcing her presidential candidacy received over 79,000 likes and 41,000 shares.

"He can post a quote graphic or a long text-only Facebook status, and it doesn't really matter what the algorithm favors," said Laura Olin, who was in charge of the much-praised social media strategy for President Obama's 2012 campaign.

"If it sounds like him," she said, "his people will find it and spread it."

And the reason Bernie Sanders posts sounds like him is that, for the most part, they are from Bernie Sanders. He often comes to his Senate office with quotes at the ready.

"Usually, it's in the shower where something pops into my head," Mr. Sanders said, adding, "I play a very, very active role in writing, literally writing, what goes up there on Facebook."

And unlike many candidates, he does not share warm details of his daily life. "People don't need to know what I buy in the grocery store or what the name of my dog is — I don't own a dog, by the way — but they do need to know why billionaires are getting richer and the poor getting poorer."

A former journalist who began sending newsletters to his constituents in the early 1990s, Mr. Sanders relishes writing. He carries yellow legal pads with him wherever he goes, "for a little jabbering," and their contents are often turned verbatim into a posting.

A typical quote from him on his Facebook page, which often deals with income inequality, says, "We must rebuild American manufacturing and rewrite our trade agreements so that our largest export is not our jobs."

"I think the people that have the most success on Facebook, they're developing an authentic method and sticking to it," said Anton Vuljaj, director of advertising at IMGE, a consulting firm. "He's matching what he's saying online to what he's doing offline."

While Mr. Sanders's popularity cuts across social media platforms, it appears most pronounced on Facebook. He did not start his campaign with a big announcement event, and he did not enjoy the explosion of interest that Senator Ted Cruz of Texas and Senator Rand Paul of Kentucky experienced when they declared that they were seeking the Republican nomination.

Mr. Sanders had 1.3 million Facebook interactions, compared with 5.6 million for Mr. Cruz and two million for Mr. Paul, according to data provided by Facebook.

But since their announcements, the popularity of Mr. Cruz and Mr. Paul on Facebook has tempered, while Mr. Sanders's has risen. In a seven-day stretch leading up to May 3, Mr. Sanders had 5.3 million interactions, compared with 1.2 million for Mr. Paul and 1.7 million for Mr. Cruz.

On Reddit, he is similarly popular. The site's home page, which is powered by the so-called upvotes of users on a topic thread, is often filled with viral news and esoteric, humorous discussions; politics is often found only on a subreddit. But Mr. Sanders is one elected official who has on occasion leapt over the barrier.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Among politicians, he is one of the most frequent posters to the site, and nearly a quarter of the top most-voted politics posts of all time on Reddit are about or by Mr. Sanders.

But Mr. Sanders has not eclipsed everyone else in the 2016 field on the social media front. Mrs. Clinton's videos are viewed by hundreds of thousands, Mr. Paul and Mr. Cruz have large and dedicated armies of supporters, and Jeb Bush has built a following by making most of his major announcements online.

But for a candidate who performs poorly in the polls, Mr. Sanders appears to be everywhere. And like many of his positions over the years, his social media tactics are unlikely to change with the times.

"I'm not some kind of tech nerd, I really am not," Mr. Sanders said. "But I have always believed in communication, and not just photo ops and stuff, but educating people, and communicating with people about the real work that we're doing."

Sanders: Make Wall St. pay college tuition // Burlington Free Press // April Burbank – May 18, 2015

Sen. Bernie Sanders says he's about to introduce a bill that would provide free tuition at public colleges and universities by using Wall Street stock transfer fees.

The independent senator from Vermont and aspiring Democratic presidential candidate said Monday that unaffordable college education and high student debt hinders the United States economy.

"What we're going to be introducing tomorrow is legislation which says two things, that tuition in public colleges and universities will be free, and that we're going to substantially lower interest rates on student debt," said Sanders, I-Vt., following an unrelated event at the University of Vermont Medical Center.

Tuition-free public higher education would cost about $70 billion per year, Sanders said.

"The program that we're offering will be a grant program by which the federal government puts in $2 and the states put in $1," Sanders said. "Now, $70 billion is a lot of money, but in a nation in which we lose $100 billion every year because corporations stash their money in tax havens around the world, that's one way you can approach it.

"What we are going to be dealing with tomorrow is a transaction fee on large stock transfers," Sanders continued. "So we're going to ask Wall Street, whose greed and recklessness drove us into the recession that we're climbing out of right now, to start helping us fund college education."

A spokesman for the Republican National Committee responded to the potential cost of the proposal.

"We need to work to make college more affordable," said Republican spokesman Raffi Williams, "but if Clinton and Sanders were truly interested in helping students achieve the American Dream, they would fight to reduce our $18 trillion national debt instead of adding to it."

Sanders expects to file the bill Tuesday with more details on the plan.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Elizabeth Warren Details Obama's Broken Trade Promises // Huffington Post // Zack Carter - May 18, 2015

WASHINGTON -- Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.) issued a report Monday morning detailing decades of failed trade enforcement by American presidents including Barack Obama, the latest salvo in an ongoing public feud between Warren and Obama over the Trans-Pacific Partnership.

Obama is currently negotiating the major trade pact with 11 other nations. While the text of the TPP agreement remains classified information, it is strongly supported by Republican leaders in Congress and corporate lobbying groups including the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. The deal is opposed by most congressional Democrats, along with labor unions, environmental groups and advocates of Internet freedom.

Obama has repeatedly insisted the TPP will include robust labor protections, and has dismissed Warren's criticisms as "dishonest," "bunk" and "misinformation." On Monday, Warren fired back, showing that Obama simply has not effectively enforced existing labor standards in prior trade pacts. According to the report, a host of abuses, from child labor to the outright murder of union organizers, have continued under Obama's watch with minimal pushback from the administration.

"The United States does not enforce the labor protections in its trade agreements," the report reads, citing analyses from the Government Accountability Office, the State Department and the Department of Labor.

Of the 20 countries the U.S. currently has trade agreements with, 11 have documented reliance on child labor, forced labor or other human rights abuses related to labor, according to the report. The violations are not confined to exploitation. Since Obama finalized a labor action plan with the government of Colombia in 2011, 105 union activists have been murdered. Obama called the Colombian deal "a win-win for workers" at the time.

Despite these trade violations, none of these countries have faced significant consequences from the United States government.

Warren's report undercuts an Obama public relations offensive that has repeatedly characterized TPP as "the most progressive trade deal in history." The Senate is currently considering legislation that would grant Obama "fast track" authority, barring Congress from amending any trade pact he negotiates, including TPP. Liberals are concerned TPP will exacerbate income inequality and undermine key regulations.

But while much of the TPP controversy has concerned the legal language involved in the agreement itself, Warren's report highlights a broader concern among progressives. Regardless of what the final TPP deal looks like, presidents Bill Clinton, George W. Bush and Obama himself, have all failed to effectively enforce promises to protect workers, even as rogue regimes have continued to benefit from other provisions of the agreements.

"We have two decades of experience with free trade agreements under both Democratic and Republican Presidents. Supporters of these agreements have always promised that they contain tough standards to protect workers," the report reads. "The rhetoric has not matched the reality."

The Obama administration has said it takes labor violations seriously and has pushed countries to improve conditions.

“The Obama Administration is taking unprecedented actions to promote and protect fundamental labor rights and ensure acceptable conditions of work,” reads a joint report from the Department of Labor and the Office of the U.S. Trade Representative from February. Those commitments include “bringing the first-ever labor dispute under a free trade agreement"-- in Guatemala.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But labor unions and other critics say these measures have been ineffective. The AFL-CIO has been pressing for action on Guatemalan violations for Obama's entire term in office, and the dispute remains unresolved. Meanwhile, as Warren's report documents, Guatemala remains one of the most dangerous places in the world for union workers. In 2013 and 2014, according to the AFL-CIO, 17 labor activists were murdered in Guatemala while the Obama administration pursued diplomatic action. Three of the slain union workers were reportedly killed during a dispute with a local government over unpaid back wages.

Much of Warren's trade critique has focused on the capacity for free trade pacts to undermine financial regulations. Last week, Canadian Finance Minister Joe Oliver gave a speech arguing that a key tenet of Obama's 2010 Wall Street reform law violates the North American Free Trade Agreement.

Snoop Dogg: I'll be voting for Hillary Clinton // The Hill // Judy Kurtz - May 18, 2015

Snoop Dogg is high on Hillary Clinton.

The "Gin & Juice" rapper said he'll be supporting the former secretary of State and Democratic candidate in her 2016 White House bid.

"You know I like to be politically correct, but sometimes I'm politically incorrect," Snoop Dogg said when asked about his political pick on Bravo's "Watch What Happens Live" on Sunday. "But I'll say that I would love to see a woman in office because I feel like we're at that stage in life to where we need a perspective other than the male's train of thought."

"And just to have a woman speaking from a global perspective as far as representing America, I'd love to see that. So I'll be voting Ms. Clinton," he added.

Snoop Dogg is the latest high-profile entertainer to throw his support behind Clinton in the last few days. In similar remarks to ITK last week, R&B star Ne-Yo called Clinton "a favorite of mine."

GOP

In Philadelphia, Rand Paul Talks Privatized Amtrak and Criminal Justice // Bloomberg // David Weigel - May 18, 2015

One day before Philadelphia's Democratic primary for mayor, an event usually tantamount to election, Kentucky Senator Rand Paul told an audience at the city's National Constitution Center that his brand of Republicanism could make urban politics competitive again.

"If I am the nominee, we will compete in Philadelphia," Paul told radio host Dom Giordano. "I'll ask Hillary Clinton, what have you done for criminal justice ... I'd ask her, what's your plan to help poor people in Philadelphia?"

Philadelphia has not elected a Republican to the mayor's office since 1951; no Republican candidate has come particularly close to the top job since the near-miss 1999 run of businessman Sam Katz. The city's strong Democratic vote has kept Pennsylvania in the Democrats' Electoral College–in 2012, the Obama-Biden ticket's 492,339 margin out of the city overwhelmed a Romney-Ryan edge from the rest of the state.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Paul, who spoke first in what the National Constitution Center hopes to be a series of candidate events, tried to front the issues where he could run to Hillary Clinton's left. (The crowd, which frequently interrupted Paul with applause, included more than a dozen college-aged volunteers wearing shorts and campaign T-shirts.) He retold the story of Christos Sourovelis, a Philadelphian whose home was briefly seized in a drug raid that targeted his son, and who subsequently found legal representation from the libertarian Institute for Justice.

"A lot of us don't understand it, but a lot of people who are poor live on the edge," said Paul, describing visits to urban centers that had been "decimated" by over-incarceration. He walked through the scenario of a poor man with $2,000 to his name being shaken down by police over contraband they'd claimed to have found on him. "The government will sometimes say to the people in the car, we'll let you keep a thousand," Paul said. "They negotiate on the side of the road."

In a Q&A that included suggestions from the crowd, Paul tried to focus on libertarian-liberal synergy more than traditional conservative politics. He quickly dispatched a question about abortion rights, saying laws should be left to the states, averring that he "didn't run for office because of this issue." (One of Paul's first acts as a newly elected senator, in 2011, was the introduction of an amendment that would have defined personhood as starting at conception.) But he talked more about police militarization that he had in some time.

"I see no reason to have a 20-ton, mine-resistant, ambush-protection vehicle in the streets of any country," Paul said. "We've found that a third of this military surplus is brand new... is this some kind of churning? It's not a great idea to show up everywhere with a grand military presence, like an army."

Paul also went long on fiscal policy, saying that Amtrak would be better off in private hands. "You would think after having commercial railroads for over 100 years, we could do a better job than that," he said, referring to last week's derailment just miles north of Philadelphia.

"They've lost money every year they've been existent. I'm looking at the easement and thinking, 'Man, we should sell that.' [Imagine] if we could sell that and let a real company put up a fast train."

Rand Paul Vows to Filibuster to Block Patriot Act // ABC News // Steve Peoples, Associated Press - May 18, 2015

Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul vowed on Monday to "everything possible" to block renewal of the terrorism-era Patriot Act, but the Republican presidential hopeful conceded it may not be enough.

Speaking in front of Philadelphia's Independence Hall, Paul lashed out at the National Security Agency's bulk collection of American citizens' phone records, which many in his own party say are needed to prevent terrorism.

"We will do everything possible — including filibustering the Patriot Act to stop them," Paul said, acknowledging that a filibuster likely wouldn't be enough to block the program. "They have the votes inside the Beltway. But we have the votes outside the Beltway, and we'll have that fight."

The Patriot Act, which authorizes the surveillance program, will expire on June 1 unless Congress acts.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Government surveillance could play prominently in the GOP presidential primary contest, which is heating up just as Congress debates surveillance programs initiated by President George W. Bush's administration and continued under President Barack Obama.

Supporters of the surveillance law, including presidential candidate Sen. Marco Rubio, R-Fla., say it's critical to anti-terrorism efforts. Paul and fellow Sen. Ted Cruz, R-Texas, see the law as a privacy infringement.

Neither Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker nor former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush has yet to take a formal position on the program, although Bush recently praised the Obama administration's use of big metadata programs that began under Bush's older brother, former President George W. Bush.

Paul has promised to sign an executive order to end such government surveillance programs on his first day in office, should he win the presidency.

On Monday, Paul said he also opposes a House bill that would end the government's bulk collection of phone records and replace it with a system to search the data held by telephone companies on a case-by-case basis. Paul said he feared the bill would transfer too much power to phone companies and could jeopardize a related lawsuit.

Paul's comments on Monday also put him at odds with Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell, who has introduced a separate version that would keep the program as is.

"We do not have the votes to ultimately defeat the Patriot Act," he said. "I can delay it. I can force them to debate it so the public at large can know what they're doing."

R and Paul Cites Questionable Benghazi Reporting In Forthcoming Book // Buzzfeed News // Molly Ward – May 18, 2015

Republican presidential candidate Rand Paul cites information that has been disputed or found to be baseless by the House Select Intelligence Committee about the 2012 Benghazi attack in his new book Making a Stand: Moving Beyond Partisan Politics to Unite America.

In a chapter titled “Libya: A Jihadist Wonderland,” Paul writes at length about the attack on the Benghazi compound and the ensuing political debate over who is responsible for the tragic events.

“A story in Forbes magazine said that President Obama, Defense Secretary Leon Panetta, and other high-ranking officials watched a live video feed of the attack from a drone that hovered overhead, and did nothing,” Paul writes. “The White House denied that gathering ever happened.”

The Forbes piece Paul cites, written by opinion contributor Larry Bell, includes the same claim.

“Just one hour after the seven-hour-long terrorist attacks upon the U.S. consulate in Benghazi began, our commander-in-chief, vice president, secretary of defense and their national security team gathered together in the Oval Office listening to phone calls from American defenders desperately under siege and watching real-time video of developments from a drone circling over the site,” Bell writes. “Yet they sent no military aid that might have intervened in time to save lives.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Reporting from CBS News cited by Bell states only that a real-time audio feed of the attack was monitored by a diplomatic security official in Washington at the time. While the attack was captured on security cameras at the compound, the footage was only recovered 20 days later.

The Daily Beast reported that there was also footage of the attacks taken by a U.S. surveillance drone, but there is no reporting to suggest that it broadcast live.

Paul also writes, “Another report stated that the embassy made three urgent requests for military back up during those hours and were denied. The administration refuted that report also.”

That statement was also featured in an article by Bell another piece by Bell, in which he cites reporting by Fox News that two Navy Seals “were ordered to stand down three times following calls during the attack.”

The report on the Benghazi attack released by the Republican-led House Select Intelligence Committee later found that there was no evidence “that there was either a stand down order or a denial of available air support.”

Paul cites an article by Seymour Hersh in the London Review of Books, in which he reported that the CIA annex also attacked that night was part of an operation to ship guns through Turkey into Syria to assist in arming the Syrian rebels.

“It’s hard to imagine, should there be any legitimacy to the reports, that the Secretary of State would be kept out of such a loop,” Paul writes. “If the gunrunning operation in Benghazi existed, then Mrs. Clinton and the very upper reaches of our government had to be aware and perhaps even complicit.”

The House Select Intelligence report on the attack “found no evidence that the CIA conducted unauthorized activities in Benghazi and no evidence that the IC [Intelligence Community] shipped arms to Syria.”

An aide to Paul’s presidential campaign said the senator noted the two allegations from Bell’s Forbes articles in an attempt to lay out the narrative following the event.

In addition, the aide noted that reports on documents released on Monday by the conservative watchdog group Judicial Watch provide support for Hersh’s gunrunning story ahead of the attack.

Why We Must Reform the VA // Medium // Jeb Bush – May 18, 2015

When veterans come home and leave active service, we have a duty to provide care for them for the rest of their lives. This is an obligation we hold dear, as President Lincoln made clear in his Second Inaugural: “With the firmness in the right as God sees us to give to see the right,” he said “let us… care for him who shall have borne the battle, and for his widow, and his orphan.”

Unfortunately, the recent scandals at the Department of Veterans Affairs demonstrate that some in Washington do not take this responsibility seriously. Americans are rightly upset.

A new report out last week showed that every year there was about $6 billion in waste, fraud, and abuse in our VA. This has been a systemic problem. Last year, in Phoenix, a whistleblower came forward to show that while the facility publicly reported on-time delivery of care, in actuality, veterans were made to wait on a secret wait list to see doctors.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

One such veteran was Thomas Breen, who had served in the United States Navy. He was so proud of his service, he would only seek treatment at one of the VA's hospitals. After spotting blood in his urine in the fall of 2013, Thomas was seen by the Phoenix VA hospital and then released to be seen at a later date. The wait list for an appointment was months long. As his condition worsened, his family called and called again, insisting on an appointment. In December, the VA hospital finally called to schedule an appointment. There was no need. Thomas Breen had passed away a month earlier, waiting for care that never came.

Soon after, the VA found that 120,000 veterans nationwide were either left waiting for care or never received care. This came even after the VA's budget had been increased significantly for years. Where has the money gone?

This is a failure of the local VA hospital, but it is also an indictment of the way Washington works. Too many Washington bureaucrats have treated our veterans like they are just another line item in a budget, wedged between the Department of the Interior and Department of Commerce.

We can do better.

It starts with accountability. As of February, only 8 employees out of 75 cited for disciplinary action in the wake of the VA scandal have been fired. We can't expect the culture of the VA to change until employees are held responsible for failure to deliver what the taxpayers expect and veterans deserve.

And it's time we look at fresh approaches to providing health care to veterans.

More vets should be able to take advantage of a Congressionally authorized "choice" card, designed to give veterans a choice in where they receive care. We can expand their access to neighborhood clinics, instead of making them wait months to see a VA doctor or travel 200 miles to a VA hospital. This would also ease the long queues of veterans waiting to see VA doctors.

The VA bureaucracy has been reluctant to change and slow to implement reforms that passed in rare bipartisan fashion in 2014 that would bring more veterans choice and increased accountability to the process.

We have to approach any reforms to the VA with humility before their sacrifice, respect for their service, and reverence for the obligation we owe them. When a service member concludes their active duty service, they should know that we are ready to take on the responsibility of their care.

Jeb Bush's GOP Rivals Keep Him Front and Center // WSJ // Reid J. Epstein - May 17, 2015

DES MOINES, Iowa—Attacks on Jeb Bush are ramping up even before he enters the 2016 presidential race, with fellow Republicans questioning everything from his conservative bona fides to whether he is prepared for a long campaign to become the party's nominee.

Mr. Bush's rivals, 10 of whom joined him for a Saturday night fundraising dinner for the Iowa Republican Party, have latched onto the former Florida governor's shaky responses last week about the wisdom of his brother's entry into the Iraq war, ensuring the issue will dog him for the foreseeable future.

It highlights the core challenge of Mr. Bush's expected formal entry into the campaign: a family name that has given him outsize attention and access to an unparalleled fundraising network that at the same time could make it difficult for him to forge a political independence.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It also shows that even though Mr. Bush's political standing is weaker in Iowa than elsewhere, he remains the focus of the race, with the other presidential hopefuls implicitly defining themselves against him.

Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul, who has positioned himself as the only likely GOP candidate not presenting an aggressive overseas military posture, suggested to the audience of 1,300 Republicans at the state party's Lincoln Day dinner here that Mr. Bush would mount another unpopular war.

"The question was asked of one of our candidates this week, was the Iraq war a mistake? Was it a good idea? Would you do it again?" Mr. Paul said. "It's a valid question, not because we're just talking about history, but we're talking about the Middle East, where history repeats itself."

The other White House contenders spent last week explaining that they wouldn't have started the Iraq war. By the time they arrived in Iowa, the critique expanded to suggest that Mr. Bush, who is expected to raise far more money than anyone else in the field, isn't prepared to be the party's standard-bearer.

"Whoever we nominate as a Republican Party has got to be ready to answer the tough questions," Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal, who is planning a June presidential announcement, said in an interview.

In a hallway outside the state party dinner, former Pennsylvania Sen. Rick Santorum said the episode illustrates the need for the party to choose someone who has been through the rigors of a national campaign.

"It just goes to show you, don't try this at home, it's hard," said Mr. Santorum, who placed second to Mitt Romney for the GOP presidential nomination in 2012 and is planning to announce his intentions for a second presidential campaign on May 27. "There's a reason the Republican Party has gone back to folks who have gone through it before, because they tend to be a little better at doing it the next time around."

Only hawkish Sen. Lindsey Graham (R., S.C.) defended the Iraq war. But in doing so, he made an implicit reminder of mistakes made by President George W. Bush. "President Bush, W., had the same information everybody else in the world did and made the best decision he could," Mr. Graham said. "Bush made mistakes, but he corrected his mistakes."

The issue has proved to be tricky territory for other GOP contenders. In an interview broadcast Sunday on Fox, Florida Sen. Marco Rubio struggled to deliver a straight response to the question of whether the Iraq invasion was worth it.

Mr. Bush's new political problem began early last week when Fox News broadcast an interview in which Mr. Bush said that, knowing what is known now, he would have launched the Iraq war his brother began. During the course of four days, his position evolved, beginning by saying he misheard the question to making a categorical statement that he wouldn't have launched the Iraq war, given today's information.

When he arrived in Iowa, Mr. Bush had no choice but to own the mistake. "I answered the question wrong," he told reporters in Iowa City. "We're all going to make mistakes."

Robert Gates, who was defense secretary under both Mr. Bush's brother and President Barack Obama, said in a CBS interview broadcast Sunday that while he wasn't impressed by the foreign-policy experience of any of Mr. Bush's potential 2016 rivals, the former governor should have been ready for questions about Iraq.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“It was an inevitable question that would be asked,” Mr. Gates said in the interview. “And I think that the way to deal with it, frankly, is to say, you don’t make policy by going back and reliving old decisions.”

Mr. Bush begins every campaign speech by noting his love for his father and brother. He told a Republican National Committee gathering in Arizona last week that he wouldn’t be “going out of my way” to criticize either previous President Bush.

Tim Miller, a Jeb Bush spokesman, said he “was the most successful conservative big state governor in the country and he is prepared for the rigors of the campaign should he decide to run.”

Also weighing on Mr. Bush’s standing in Iowa is his plan, announced by aides last week, to skip the August state straw poll, a major quadrennial fundraiser for the state GOP.

State GOP Chairman Jeff Kaufmann and Iowa Sen. Chuck Grassley on Saturday night made explicit pitches to the other candidates to attend the straw poll.

Now, even Iowa Republicans who figure to support Mr. Bush after he formally declares himself a candidate said they were baffled by his Iraq stumbles.

“It’s been hard,” said Zach Nunn, an Iowa state representative who said he is leaning toward backing Mr. Bush and with whom he had his third one-on-one meeting of the year on Saturday. “It’s great to be popular. It’s great to raise money. But for me what’s going to determine who’s the best candidate is, do you have the leadership capability to run the country?”

Jeb Bush stands by opposition to same-sex marriage // CNN // Alexandra Jaffe - May 18, 2015

Washington (CNN)Jeb Bush stood by his opposition to same-sex marriage in a new interview, saying he doesn't believe it's a constitutional right and that traditional marriage is central to Catholicism.

"It's at the core of the Catholic faith, and to imagine how we are going to succeed in our country unless we have committed family life, a child-centered family system, is hard to imagine," he said on Christian Broadcasting Network's "The Brody File."

"So, irrespective of the Supreme Court ruling — because they are going to decide whatever they decide, and I don't know what they're going to do — we need to be stalwart supporters of traditional marriage."

The Supreme Court is expected to rule next month on the constitutionality of same-sex marriage, and many observers — even opponents of gay marriage — believe the court will in some way expand marriage rights to gay men and lesbians. Many in the GOP are split over how to tackle such a ruling, as Evangelical Christians make up a significant subset of the GOP base and are adamantly opposed to gay marriage.

Those Evangelical Christians remain some of Bush's biggest skeptics as he moves towards a presidential run.

Bush didn't offer his own prescription for how to respond to the decision, but he again reaffirmed that he doesn't believe same-sex marriage is a constitutional right — "but I'm not a lawyer, and clearly this has been accelerated at a warp pace."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The expected presidential contender then took aim at his likely Democratic opponent in the race, Hillary Clinton, who surprised many in recently calling for the Supreme Court to back gay marriage, a shift from just two years prior when she said marriage was a matter best left to the states.

"What's interesting is that four years ago Barack Obama and Hillary Clinton had the same view that I just expressed to you. It's thousands of years of culture and history is just being changed at warp speed. It's hard to fathom why it is this way," Bush said.

Jeb Bush Says Christian Business Owners Can Refuse To Serve Gay Weddings // Huffington Post // Marina Fang - May 17, 2015

Likely Republican presidential candidate Jeb Bush said that Christian business owners should not have to provide services for gay weddings if it goes against their religious beliefs.

“Yes, absolutely, if it’s based on a religious belief,” he said when asked by the Christian Broadcasting Network in an interview Saturday if businesses should be able to decline services to same-sex weddings.

The former Florida governor justified his position by claiming that not providing a service does not count as discrimination if business owners feel that it violates their religious rights.

“A big country, a tolerant country, ought to be able to figure out the difference between discriminating someone because of their sexual orientation and not forcing someone to participate in a wedding that they find goes against their moral beliefs,” he said. “This should not be that complicated. Gosh, it is right now.”

The blurry distinction has become a controversial topic, as many wedding-related businesses around the country, like florists and bakeries, have turned down gay customers, citing religious freedom. The issue became politically charged in March, when Indiana Gov. Mike Pence (R) signed the Religious Freedom Restoration Act into law, which allows businesses to cite religious rights as a reason for refusing service. Many in the GOP presidential field, including Bush, defended the law. “Once the facts are established, people aren’t going to see this as discriminatory at all,” he said in March.

After widespread backlash, Pence was forced to sign a revised version of the law, which delineated that businesses could not discriminate against customers and clients on the basis of sexual orientation or identity. But gay rights advocates argued that the revised law did little to amend the original one, and that it still leaves much room for interpretation and opens the door for discrimination.

In Saturday's interview, Bush also reiterated his opposition to marriage equality, saying that gay marriage is not a constitutional right and that "we need to be stalwart supporters of traditional marriage." He did say last month that he would attend a gay wedding if asked.

Bush insists he's not writing off Iowa // Politico // Eli Stokols - May 18, 2015

DES MOINES, Iowa – His brother won the caucuses here in 2000. His likely campaign manager is a veteran Iowa campaign strategist. And as he stumped around the state this weekend, Jeb Bush repeatedly insisted he’s going to compete hard in next year’s caucuses.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Even so, skepticism runs high about Bush's intentions for next February's caucuses.

Between his low standing in state polls, the socially conservative bent of the Iowa GOP base and his decision to skip the state's straw poll in August, Bush has lots of incentives to give up on Iowa next year. Republicans here know it, which is why the former Florida governor spent his weekend reassuring them he hasn't already written off the state as a lost cause.

"I'm going to be here. I'm here right now!" Bush told reporters Saturday after appearing at a fundraiser in Iowa City for Sen. Chuck Grassley. "Why would I be here if I wasn't going to compete in Iowa?"

From Dubuque to Iowa City to the state GOP's Lincoln Dinner in Des Moines on Saturday night, Bush threw everything he had into the effort to convince Iowans that he doesn't plan to blow off the state. His intensely private wife, Columba, and his son Jeb Jr., both accompanied him to Dubuque, where he held an hourlong town hall. He took 11 questions from the crowd there, and then a few dozen "selfies" with attendees before leaving. He met privately with several top donors, county chairs and elected officials — some of whom have been alarmed by Bush's laissez-faire approach thus far to Iowa — prior to his speech at the Republican Party dinner; when it was over, he greeted a long receiving line of supporters in his hospitality suite.

The decision to do a full day of in-state events — not just the dinner — wasn't lost on Republicans here. David Kochel, the top Iowa strategist now working for Bush in Miami, was happy with Bush's day introducing himself to Iowa Republicans.

"They don't know him yet, but there's time for us to let people get to know him," he said. "When they get to know him, they're going to like him."

Bush has much more work to do to convince Iowans that he's truly invested. After being absent from the state since early March, he felt the lash of state GOP chairman Jeff Kauffman on Twitter last week after reports first surfaced that Bush was planning to bypass the Iowa straw poll in August and attend another event outside the state.

"We hope Governor Bush rethinks his decision and realizes that grassroots will only grow in Iowa if he waters them," Kauffman wrote. "We don't buy this excuse and neither will Iowans."

When reporters asked Bush on Saturday about his reasons for skipping the Aug. 8 straw poll, he hinted at a broader strategy that doesn't hinge on the Hawkeye State.

"It's not relevant," Bush said of the straw poll. "What's relevant is running a campaign, creating a strategy, building a good team towards success, which is in the primaries, and doing it in a way that makes it possible to win the general, which is the whole point of this."

According to a number of people close to the candidate, Bush's strategy rests on simply doing well enough in February's earliest contests to come out of South Carolina as one of the two or three leading candidates — in other words, a first-place finish in Iowa isn't essential.

When Bush met the traveling press in Iowa City on Saturday afternoon, the second time he got a question about the straw poll and his seriousness about the caucuses, he turned it back around at the reporter.

"Would you aspire to fourth place in anything? Or sixth place?" Bush asked. His point: His own competitive nature wouldn't allow him accept such a weak performance. Besides, a win for Bush might be defined as a finish anywhere in the top three.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

As long as Bush doesn't get embarrassed in Iowa and potentially can win in New Hampshire, the campaign's anticipated financial advantage could be the difference-maker, especially in March, when crowded primary days take place and only the best-funded campaigns will be able to compete across the map.

To get to March, Bush still must deliver a respectable performance in Iowa in February, and that'll mean investing the kind of resources here to ensure a win, place or show finish.

"He'll signal with his time how much of a priority Iowa is," said Zach Nunn, a Republican state legislator. "Any time he comes to Iowa is a serious indicator that he sees Iowa as a place he needs to do well."

The most recent polling shows Bush in seventh place among likely Republican presidential hopefuls with just 5 percent support among Iowa primary voters — a sign that Bush, who'd made just one trip here before last weekend, has a lot of work to do here. Bush's father and brother both had campaigned far earlier and more frequently than Jeb Bush at this point in the election cycle.

"Does he have a one- or two-state strategy like some other candidates? Of course not," said former Iowa GOP chairman Matt Strawn. "The challenge is to make sure those activists who are predisposed to support Bush are seeing him here. They want to see a candidate making a commitment to Iowa before they make a commitment to Gov. Bush."

In the end, the size of the GOP field could work to Bush's advantage. With as many as 19 potential candidates, it's possible that evangelicals won't coalesce around one clear choice and the vote will be splintered — which would open the door for a steady and solid establishment candidate like Bush to finish near the top in Iowa.

"If the evangelical vote gets split up, it's possible that someone can win the Iowa caucuses with 20 percent of the vote," Strawn said.

When he opened his town hall meeting Saturday morning at Loras College in Dubuque, Bush spoke to those who doubt his prospects in Iowa — or the depth of his commitment to playing here — by pointing to his father's 1980 come-from-behind win in the Iowa caucuses.

"I'll just remind everybody that's interested in political history," Bush said. "He started here in Iowa as an asterisk, literally an asterisk, and he won the Iowa caucuses."

Team Jeb: He's held to 'different standard' than Hillary // Washington Examiner // Byron York - May 18, 2015

Jeb Bush first stumbled on the Iraq if-you-knew-then-what-you-know-now question in an interview with Fox News' Megyn Kelly. He stumbled again the next day in a radio interview with Sean Hannity. He stumbled yet again in a town hall taking questions from unscreened voters in Nevada, which was followed by taking questions from the press. And, after four days of trying, Bush finally answered the question in another session with voters and the press in Arizona.

Notice anything about that? Of course Bush took plenty of deserved criticism for the substance of his answers. But give him this: All of Bush's missteps took place in open, unscripted exchanges with the press or with voters in full view of the press. And when Bush messed up on a serious question, he did not withdraw or limit access to his events. Some voters who attended really let him have it, like Ivy Ziedrich, the Young Democrat who told Bush, "Your brother created ISIS!" Still, Bush didn't subject anyone to any sort of pre-questioning. He didn't cancel events. He was available the whole time, even as he struggled to find an answer to a question that clearly troubled him.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The contrast between Bush's openness and the airtight seal around Hillary Clinton could not have been greater.

"Jeb doesn't fear taking risks or making mistakes," close Bush associate Sally Bradshaw told me via email. "He's always believed public service is about actually serving the public, and doing so on a very personal level requires putting yourself in the arena." The result of that belief, Bradshaw continued, is that "He engages. He doesn't back away. He doesn't worry about the impact of having an honest conversation or thinking something through and taking a thoughtful approach."

In the aftermath of the Iraq mistakes, Bush has taken to mentioning Clinton at events. "I asked someone to kind of add up the questions that I've been asked by people who can ask whatever they want, and of course the press that follows me around from time to time," Bush said at a town hall in Dubuque, Iowa over the weekend. "And we're probably around 800 to 900 questions asked and hopefully answered."

"Just as an aside," Bush added, "Hillary Clinton has been a presidential candidate for a month maybe, and she's had 13 questions asked by the press."

As the Iraq controversy built, Bush aides increasingly focused on Clinton and the contrast between her reclusiveness and Bush's openness. "It continues to be interesting, the extent to which every single verb, noun, adverb, and adjective that he utters is psychoanalyzed," one Bush aide said of the former Florida governor. "There's clearly a different standard from Hillary Clinton. It's remarkable how little she has engaged with the public and the press since she became a candidate."

"Yes, he is held to a different standard," the aide continued. "And that's okay. But it's stunning that she is allowed to evade the press and evade the public in the way that she is being allowed."

One example. At the same time Bush was going through the Iraq questioning, Annie Karni, a Politico reporter covering Hillary Clinton, tweeted a photo of a man in a suit — apparently someone associated with Clinton — standing in front of a drape concealing some sort of hallway. Karni's tweet said: "My view of @HillaryClinton entering her finance meeting in Red Hook." Clinton was behind that drape somewhere, but the press — much less the public — could forget about having any sort of interaction with her.

It is literally impossible to imagine Clinton — besieged by questions about the Clinton Foundation, her secret email system, trade, and other hot issues — making herself available to voters and the press the way Bush has. The 13 questions Clinton has taken over the course of more than a month — one of which was "How are you liking Iowa?" — told the public nearly nothing about her, her campaign, or any issue of the moment. Before that, it has been more than two months since her brief "Guernica" news conference in which she took a few questions about the email system. Clinton is under increasing pressure from the press — journalists are suggesting questions they would ask if they only had the chance and others are calculating the time since Clinton last answered any question at all — but the fact is, she is getting away with it.

So yes, Bush had difficulties answering a straightforward question about Iraq. But voters, and journalists, too, should remember that it only happened because he is out there, making himself available every day. When is the Democratic frontrunner going to do the same?

Why Marco Rubio could beat Jeb Bush // CNN // Julian Zelizer - May 18, 2015

(CNN)Florida Sen. Marco Rubio poses a major threat to former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush in the 2016 Republican primaries. Rubio, the affable politician who has been steadily and quietly rising in the polls, has been making an impression these days as the parties are starting to sense that he could be a very viable presidential candidate.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Rubio's emergence runs counter to the thinking of many observers that Jeb Bush would command a decisive and virtually insurmountable advantage in this campaign, as a result of his fundraising prowess and many endorsements from members of the party elite.

In many respects, Rubio is the perfect candidate for the party at this particular moment in history. Though the 43-year old has flaws, including very limited experience, he brings to the table a number of assets that can help him through the caucuses and primaries.

The most important of his strengths is that he contradicts the image that many Americans now have of the Republican Party: a party of older white males who are not happy about the direction of American society in the past few decades.

In part, Americans formed this opinion based on the way that Republicans have handled the issue of immigration. As the nation has become more pluralistic and diverse, with growing public support for liberalizing immigration policy, hardline conservatives in the GOP have stood in the way of progress.

Putting forth a candidate who comes from a family of immigrants will have tremendous appeal to many in the GOP, including conservatives, who want to show that their party is different than the image many have of it. This can have immense power at this crossroads moment when Republicans do have a chance to capture the White House after eight years of a Democrat in control.

Rubio's rags- to-riches story is the kind that campaign staffers love to tell.

Even one of Rubio's greatest failures, his effort to push a comprehensive immigration bill, can be interpreted as a virtue. Rubio backed a bill in the Senate that would have resolved the ongoing standoff on immigration. But he vastly underestimated the level of opposition among his House counterparts.

While the failure of the bill deprived him of a major victory, he can use his action as evidence of his commitment to resolving this key issue and his desire to govern, not just grandstand. In an era of gridlock and polarization, this will hold appeal, assuming he can get past opponents of immigration reform among GOP primary voters.

Rubio's effort to move forward on immigration can help him sell his candidacy to more moderate elements in the party at the same time that he can easily stress his credentials as a true conservative.

There is a reason that the Tea Party loved him in 2010. His opposition to Common Core standards, his deregulatory zeal, and his tough positions on Iran will allow primary voters in states like South Carolina to see that they would not be electing a moderate. He might be one of the few candidates who can sell himself in both ways, as a conservative, but also a leader who could govern.

Rubio also can project a hawkish vision of foreign policy, which still resonates in the Republican electorate, without being susceptible to the unfavorable connection people make between Jeb Bush and the controversial legacy of his brother, former President George W. Bush.

Balancing inexperience and energy

In recent weeks, the former Florida governor stumbled in response to questions about whether he would have invaded Iraq. Saying that he would have invaded, just like his brother, was definitely the wrong answer, and even Bush acknowledged as much in follow-up comments.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Bush's family connections assure that the Iraq War will continue to plague him as he contends with the more isolationist Rand Paul wing of the GOP on foreign policy.

In contrast, Rubio can more comfortably advance the three pillars of his foreign policy vision -- strong defense spending, moral clarity, and the protection of the world economy. He can do so because he doesn't stand in the shadow of the former Republican president.

Rubio is young. Born in 1971, Rubio would bring Generation X into the White House as a 45-year-old president -- younger than Obama was when he took office -- and this would be significant for both parties. The fact is that the leadership of the Republicans and Democrats is graying.

There is a need to infuse younger voices and the ideas of those born after the turbulent divisions of the 1960s into the political arena. Until now, Democrats have done a better job engaging younger voters than Republicans.

Nominating Rubio would send a strong message that the party is moving in a new direction. The senator could speak to generational questions in way that his competitors could not.

The flip side of youth, is that opponents could tag Rubio as inexperienced, suggesting he would make some of the kinds of mistakes that people have argued took place with Obama. Yet in caucuses and primaries, as Obama learned, the energy of youth can go a long way in campaigns.

This a nation that thirsts for what is around the corner, not always what's been around for a long time. In a general campaign, Democrats would be hesitant to go too far in making an issue of Rubio's age given the age of our most recent president when he was elected.

A maverick, but not an outsider

Besides being young, the fact that Rubio did slip in recent years outside of the "frontrunner" status for the party will end up generating even more excitement about him. Even though he is in Congress, the bastion of establishment politics, he can present himself as something of an upstart and a maverick. The media loves a come-from-behind story, and so do voters.

While he can present himself in certain respects as anti-establishment, he is not. And this matters, too. Rubio has demonstrated that he can attract serious money from Super Pacs which are the new power brokers of American politics.

While he has not reached the point of Bush in terms of a network of donors he has demonstrated some pretty serious legs when it comes to campaign finance. This will be essential in the contest against the war chest that Bush is amassing. Ironically, the very positive words and support that Jeb Bush has given Rubio in the past will be extraordinarily helpful in his credibility with donors.

None of this is to diminish the weaknesses that Rubio has, including the lack of experience, or to overstate the chances that he would have of defeating Hillary Clinton. His friendship with former Rep. David Rivera, who has been under investigation, could be an issue on the campaign trail. The fact that he and Bush are both from Florida might divide the primary electorate and open the door for another Republican to win.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But in many respects, for Jeb Bush, and for the Democrats, Rubio is the most dangerous man in the room.

Marco Rubio has listed himself as 'white' instead of 'Hispanic.' News flash: He's both. // Miami Herald // Patricia Mazzei - May 18, 2015

Marco Rubio has listed himself as "white" instead of "Hispanic" in applications to renew his Florida driver's license, according to records obtained by the Miami Herald.

That might sound a little like Rubio made a mistake akin to when Jeb Bush incorrectly checked off "Hispanic" in his Miami-Dade County voter registration. But it's not.

Here's why: Rubio is white. He's also Hispanic. And being forced to pick between the two is a false choice.

"White" refers to Rubio's race. "Hispanic" refers to his ethnicity. There are, for example, white Hispanics, black Hispanics, Asian Hispanics and Hispanics of indigenous descent. Rubio is a white Hispanic.

Most government forms, however, are not enlightened enough to discern between a person's race and their ethnicity. When the Florida Highway Safety and Motor Vehicles Department asks license applicants to fill out an optional race field, the choices are Asian, Black, Hispanic, Native American, Other and White -- as if a person couldn't be more than one of those things at the same time.

The information isn't mandatory -- it doesn't appear on a driver's license card -- and some of Rubio's transactions with the HSMV over the years don't list any race. His 1998 and 2004 renewal applications list "white," as shown in the partial 1998 application above (the Miami Herald redacted Rubio's license number as a courtesy; other information was redacted by the HSMV). His latest renewal, from 2014, shows a blank space under "race."

Of course, there's no confusion as to Rubio's lineage. His name gives away his Hispanic roots, and he has made it part of his political narrative to tell the story of how his parents left Cuba seeking a better life for their children.

A Rubio spokesman said the Florida senator "doesn't recall" how he renewed his license.

"But this looks like a glitch since he considers himself an American of Hispanic descent," Alex Conant said in an email. "The fact that he is of Hispanic descent has been hard to miss since his first campaign given the fact that he's made his family's story a centerpiece of his public life."

The race-versus-ethnicity question is far from unusual in Rubio's diverse hometown of Miami. Some Hispanics have a personal policy of listing their race rather than their ethnicity, since that's really what is being asked. Others choose without giving it much thought, depending on the form and their mood on any given day. Since the options show a lack of understanding about what makes a person Hispanic, why bother taking it too seriously?

The U.S. Census has separated race and ethnicity, specifically over the question of Hispanic origin, since 1997. Perhaps it's time for all government agencies to do the same.

Supreme Court Won't Block Probe of Scott Walker's Recall Campaign ' // Bloomberg // Greg Stohr - May 18

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

2015

The U.S. Supreme Court refused to end a state investigation into Wisconsin Governor Scott Walker's 2012 recall campaign, rejecting an appeal from a conservative group that says its constitutional rights are being violated.

The rebuff leaves the future of the investigation in the hands of the Wisconsin Supreme Court, which is considering a separate bid to stop the probe. The criminal investigation, on hold during the court fight, might complicate Walker's potential campaign for the Republican presidential nomination.

A court-appointed special prosecutor, Francis Schmitz, is tasked with investigating whether Walker and his operatives violated state campaign-finance laws by coordinating their efforts with Club for Growth, an advocacy group.

The Wisconsin chapter of Club for Growth and its director, Eric O'Keefe, are fighting subpoenas they received from Schmitz seeking financial records. The group and O'Keefe sued in federal court to block the probe, and a federal trial judge said the First Amendment bars the state from trying to learn whether the organization coordinated with the Walker campaign.

A U.S. appeals court overturned that ruling, saying federal judges shouldn't entangle themselves in state criminal proceedings.

Walker survived the recall vote, which was sparked by his efforts to curb the power of public employee unions, and then won re-election last year. Walker and his campaign aren't directly involved in the Club for Growth case.

The case is O'Keefe v. Chisholm, 14-872.

Scott Walker's Long History of Dirty Tricks // The Daily Beast // David Freedlander – May 18, 2015

It has been more than a decade, but when David Riemer talks about Scott Walker, his voice still shakes with anger and exasperation.

"He thinks that God is on his side and so that gives him the right to lie, to dodge, to make promises and not keep them," said Riemer, now a senior fellow a the Community Advocates Public Policy Institute, a think tank dedicated to reducing poverty in Wisconsin.

Back in 2004, Riemer ran against Walker, then a first-term county executive of Milwaukee who had ridden into office on the back of a pension scandal, pledging that any of his office's hires would sign a waiver forgoing recently enacted lavish benefits and sweeteners.

Riemer, an adviser to two Wisconsin governors and a former budget director of the city of Milwaukee, filed an open records request in an effort find out if that promise had been kept. Turns out, it hadn't; in response to the open records request, a handful of top staffers hastily added their name to a list stating that they had signed the waiver. The list didn't have a date on it, though, and wasn't an official waiver anyway, merely a piece of paper indicating that signatories had signed a wavier previously.

In a letter to the attorney general's office after the election, and after Walker's office had eventually complied with the open records request, Riemer wrote that Walker's intention had been "to fool me, as Mr. Walker's primary opponent in the political campaign for County Executive; to fool the Milwaukee Journal-Sentinel; and to fool the voters and the public. The deception worked. We were all fooled."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The attorney general declined to prosecute but accused Walker of "chicanery."

And that was not all.

In the course of the campaign, Walker's team ran a radio ad accusing Riemer of engineering a pension settlement to a series of lawsuits that cost the county millions of dollars. In fact, the lawsuits predated Riemer's tenure with the county, and his reforms helped save the city up to $25 million a year. When pressed, according to the Milwaukee Journal-Sentinel, Walker conceded that "the ad's assertion is not correct as stated," but he refused to stop running it.

"I have never in my life seen anything like it," Riemer, who ended up losing the election by nearly 15 percentage points, said. "What kind of person admits that what they are doing is wrong but won't change it? There is a fundamental character flaw here."

"I couldn't believe what a jerk he was. I was new to politics. I didn't think it was fair game for them to say anything about you whether it was provable or not."

Walker is now on the cusp of announcing a run for president, and early polls show him as a front-runner to become the Republican nominee. And part of his appeal to the Republican faithful is his record of success in political campaigns and in public office. This is someone, after all, won four consecutive terms in the state legislature before winning three county executive races in the Democratic-leaning Milwaukee County and three races for governor in blue-hued Wisconsin. He also became the first governor in American history to survive a recall. And unlike some Republicans in Democratic territory who hew to the center after Election Day, Walker tacked sharply to the right while in office, winning him plaudits from conservative leaders as a true believer.

But longtime Walker-watchers in Wisconsin say that behind Walker's success is a long record of bending campaign laws just to their breaking point.

"Scott Walker is politics incarnate, with an unslakable thirst for political power and an eye on the next election," said Mike Browne, the deputy director of One Wisconsin Now, a liberal advocacy group. "Throughout his nearly quarter-century career running for office, he's shown he'll do whatever he thinks he needs to do to win, letter or spirit of the laws be damned."

Most notably, Walker has been ensnared in a pair of so-called John Doe investigations. In the first, while looking into missing funds from a veterans' charity run out of Walker's county executive office, investigators discovered that his staff had set up a secretive Internet system in his government office to allow them to do political work on the taxpayer's dime. Investigators also found that a railroad executive with business before the state had set up a straw donor scheme enabling his employees to donate to the future governor.

The investigation didn't touch Walker, but a deputy chief of staff was sentenced to six months in jail. Another was convicted of embezzlement after it was discovered that he used funds stolen from the veterans' charity to set up Walker for Governor campaign websites. Another top staffer received one year of probation and a $1,000 fine after cooperating with investigators.

The second John Doe investigation is ongoing and focuses on whether Walker's campaign illegally coordinated with the Club for Growth during his 2012 recall campaign. According to heavily redacted documents released this week, Walker's defense argues that such coordination was not illegal because Walker was not an official candidate until April of that year—a mere two months before voters went to the polls and while Walker was raising and spending millions of dollars to ward off his Democratic opponent.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Walker's trouble with campaign rules began even before he embarked on a political career in earnest. As a sophomore at Marquette University in Milwaukee, he lost a bid for student body president in a race that was marred by allegations that Walker improperly campaigned before officially registering his campaign, that he failed to properly register his campaign workers, and that he went door-to-door to hand out fliers in violation of campus policy. More seriously, after the school paper endorsed Walker's opponent, stacks of newspapers went missing, and the Walker operation was accused of engineering the theft.

Walker dropped out of Marquette just before he was set to graduate and promptly mounted a campaign against Gwen Moore, a one-term state assemblywoman. In an interview, Moore, now a member of Congress, said her Republican colleagues at the time told her that the reason Walker was running was that even though the district was majority Democratic, "the majority voting-age population was white.

"He would say his hero was Ronald Reagan. Lee Atwater, Ronald Reagan, that was the regime he looked up to, and he ran a perfect racial dog whistle campaign," Moore said.

The campaign literature, she recalled, featured "guns, gangs, drugs, and urban unrest."

"I cried," she said. "I thought I was being associated with the worst elements of the community. I couldn't believe what a jerk he was. I was new to politics. I didn't think it was fair game for them to say anything about you whether it was provable or not."

Walker lost decisively, moved to a new district, and served nearly a decade in the legislature before running for county executive. While in office, he was repeatedly dogged by failures to properly file campaign finance reports, including leaving off the occupation of more than 50 donors who gave more than $100 in violation of state laws.

Failure to list a donor's occupation is a problem that Walker's numerous campaigns have encountered frequently. When he first explored a run for governor in 2006, the Wisconsin Democracy Campaign, a nonpartisan watchdog group that pushes for clean elections, found that 114 donations totaling more than $75,000 failed to list the occupation or employer. In 2008, Walker's office stopped filing its campaign finance reports electronically, which made life harder for watchdogs, but still in 2009, One Wisconsin Now found that $170,000 worth of contributions were not listed properly, including two contributions of $10,000, the maximum amount allowed by law. The next year, the group found that more than $500,000 in contributions was improperly reported.

In 2005, two Democratic county supervisors filed an ethics complaint with the elections board against Walker for using his campaign arm, Friends of Scott Walker, to robo-call against them on behalf of his budget without disclosing who was beyond the calls.

The elections board ended up fining Walker $5,000, then the second largest such fine in state history.

But it was not the first time Walker's name would appear before the state elections board. Since 2010, when he first began exploring a gubernatorial run in earnest, the state Democratic Party has filed seven ethics complaints against him.

The earliest cites a series of motorcycle rides Walker would take around the state while county executive, ostensibly to promote tourism to Milwaukee but which critics said was little more than a way for Walker to introduce himself to voters around the state (or beyond—Walker twice traveled to Minnesota on his annual

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Harley ride and once to the early caucus state of Iowa).

Twice the ride was sponsored by AirTran Airways, a low-cost air carrier that at the time had a request pending before the county commission for concourse space at the Milwaukee airport. The sponsorship led critics to accuse the candidate of extracting an in-kind donation from a corporation. According to the complaint, “It was not Milwaukee County logos…that lavished and marked everyone of the three dozen stops on the tour. It was signs, flags and standards of Air Tran that dominated every single venue on Walker’s tour.”

The claim that the trip was just for Walker to promote Walker and not Milwaukee County was given credence, the complaint alleges, when in 2010 it was rescheduled to coincide with the date and location of the state Republican convention, allowing Walker to roar in to the convention on the back of his Harley. Plus, the complaint notes that Walker was accompanied by Tim Russell, a longtime Walker insider—and the one who ended up going to prison for stealing from the veterans’ charity—who frequently moved between campaign and governmental positions. At the time of the 2010 ride, Russell was the administrator of the county’s housing department.

“Any reasonable person would conclude that Housing has nothing to do with tourism—Russell’s presence indicates that the ride was in fact illegal campaign activity,” the complaint states.

Another complaint alleges that right-wing outside groups like the Koch brothers-backed Americans for Prosperity were illegally coordinating with Walker’s recall campaign. The CEO of one such group, the Bradley Foundation, was Walker’s campaign chairman, and the chairman of the board of the MacIver Institute for Public Policy, a conservative think tank, had given $16,500 to Walker’s various campaigns.

A third complaint asks the Government Accountability Board to look into Walker’s legal defense fund, one that he has poured $60,000 of his campaign money into, though state law says such funds can be used only for a candidate or public official who is being investigated or who has an agent who is being investigated. Walker has denied repeatedly that he is a target of the John Doe investigation.

A fourth complaint alleges that in the spring of his recall campaign, in the wake of a federal Bureau of Labor Statistics release that showed that Wisconsin was the only state to post “statistically significant” job losses in the previous 12 months, the Walker administration expedited the release of its own jobs figures, which used a different metric from the widely used BLS metric. Walker’s numbers showed that the state added jobs, and moments after releasing the numbers, his recall campaign launched a blitz of television and radio ads touting them—proof, the complaint alleges, of coordination between the government and political side of Walker’s office.

A fifth complaint, filed just this year, accuses Walker of dissembling when he claimed that his recent trip to the United Kingdom was for official business and used public funds to promote trade between Wisconsin and the U.K. The visit was widely seen as a chance for Walker to bolster his foreign policy credentials, and Walker refused to answer media questions while in the United Kingdom.

According to a Democratic Party official, five of the complaints are still pending. Two more were dismissed. One alleged that Walker brought Republican super pollster Frank Luntz into the state capitol during the protests against the governor’s efforts to end collective bargaining for public employees in the state. Another alleged that Walker tried to coordinate with the Koch brothers directly by discussing by phone how he was handling the protesters, including planting “troublemakers” within their midst. (That call turned out to be a prank.)

“The blatant disregard for campaign finance and ethics laws we’ve seen from Scott Walker over the entirety of his career in elected office is unprecedented in Wisconsin politics,” said Melissa Baldauff, communications director for the Wisconsin Democratic Party. “Never before has a Wisconsin governor required a criminal defense fund, the donors to which still haven’t been disclosed, or been alleged by prosecutors to be at the center of a nationwide ‘criminal scheme.’"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In a statement, Kirsten Kukowski, a spokeswoman for the governor, said, “Governor Walker has championed big, bold reforms that the left clearly doesn’t like, but he’s won three times in four years because of his results for the people of Wisconsin.”

Few in Wisconsin think Walker will somehow be brought down by any of the complaints. To the exasperation of state Democrats, none of these allegations seem to have much slowed his steady ascent through the political ranks. Now that he is running for president, Walker finds himself facing a new set of campaign finance regulations.

In a presidential campaign, many would-be candidates who are exploring a run take great pains not to admit that they are candidates for office. To do so would mean that they could run afoul of fundraising laws that forbid coordination between candidates and the outside groups supporting them. Jeb Bush, for example, has dismissed questions about what he would do as president by noting that he is not yet a candidate and wouldn’t want to suddenly trigger a campaign. When he did acknowledge that he was running, Bush promptly backtracked.

Walker has no such apparent qualms, referring to himself several times as “a candidate” and talking about how his sons may take time off from college to campaign with him, even though no such campaign officially exists.

Democrats have filed complaints to the Federal Election Commission. They are unlikely to go anywhere.

Records indicate Scott Walker was copied on letter promising loan to donor // Journal Sentinel // Jason Stein and Patrick Marley – May 18, 2015

State records say that Gov. Scott Walker received a copy of a 2011 letter pledging a $500,000 taxpayer loan to a now-defunct Milwaukee construction company headed by a Walker donor, seemingly contradicting statements by the governor and his aides that he was not aware of the award.

A spokeswoman for Walker said that, in spite of the records, a copy of the letter from the Wisconsin Economic Development Corp. was never delivered to the governor's office.

The Sept. 9, 2011, letter from Paul Jadin, WEDC's chief executive officer at the time, was sent to William Minahan, owner of Building Committee Inc., a company that is now being sued by WEDC for defaulting on the unsecured loan without delivering the promised project and the jobs it was supposed to create.

Jadin said in his letter of intent that he was writing "on behalf of Governor Scott Walker" and noted "cc: Scott Walker, Governor" at the bottom.

Walker's top cabinet appointee, then Administration Secretary Mike Huebsch, urged WEDC officials to provide the loan, and Walker's then-chief of staff Keith Gilkes attended an initial meeting on it, according to records provided to the Milwaukee Journal Sentinel by the Walker administration.

"In closing Governor Walker and I are firmly committed to doing everything possible to expedite the processing and awarding of this incentive award," Jadin wrote in the letter.

Walker, who with lawmakers created WEDC in July 2011, serves as the chairman of the agency's board.

While in New Orleans Monday to speak to a school voucher lobbying group, Walker said he played no direct role in the loan to foster energy efficiency projects for bank and credit union buildings and that Democrats are on a "partisan witch hunt."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Spokeswoman Laurel Patrick said the GOP governor and likely 2016 White House candidate didn't know about the loan and that Walker did not receive a copy of Jadin's letter even though it stated that he did.

"As we said, Governor Walker was not involved in or aware of any part of the loan process concerning The Building Committee Inc.," Patrick said. "That was template language WEDC used initially for award letters. A review of our files from that time indicates that we were not receiving copies of those letters."

Patrick said Walker would hold an "open, thorough, and transparent discussion" of the loan at WEDC's next board meeting.

Democrats seek probe

Also Monday, two Democratic lawmakers on the WEDC board called for a federal criminal investigation of WEDC and the loan to the Building Committee, which is headed by a donor who made the maximum $10,000 donations to the campaigns of both Walker and former Democratic Gov. Jim Doyle. There is no evidence so far that the loan led to the promised construction projects or jobs.

It's the latest in a string of troubles facing the state's main jobs agency, which earlier this month faced a tough audit saying it had failed to follow state law and its own procedures in its work.

"The problems at Gov. Walker's WEDC appear to go beyond simple mismanagement," said Assembly Minority Leader Peter Barca (D-Kenosha), who appeared alongside a fellow WEDC board member, Sen. Julie Lassa (D-Steven Point). "As board members we are deeply concerned and call for immediate action."

The offices of John Vaudreuil, the U.S. attorney in Madison, and James Santelle, the U.S. attorney in Milwaukee, had no comment.

Patrick responded that an October 2014 report to the WEDC board, which includes Barca, Lassa and Walker, included the Building Committee in a list of past due loans. She said the Democratic lawmakers should have asked for more details on the bad loan at the time, while Barca said it was never specifically flagged to board members in their meetings.

Walker asked lawmakers on Friday to scrap WEDC's loan programs, which in 2014 ended up deferring payments on 42 out of 220 active loans — or nearly one in five.

Barca said he was skeptical of a statement by Patrick that the governor didn't know about the last-minute $10,000 donation that Building Committee owner Minahan made to Walker's 2010 gubernatorial campaign on election day.

The 2011 loan, which was first reported on by the Wisconsin State Journal, was among several WEDC loans noted by state auditors in their recent report on the agency.

The documents provided to the Journal Sentinel show that in June 2011, Minahan and Eric Petersen, a lobbyist who represented the business, met to discuss the loan with Gilkes and Huebsch. At the time, Huebsch also served on the WEDC board.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Jadin did not respond to a phone message seeking comment.

Patrick said the project was presented to Huebsch by Building Committee as a way to create 150 jobs, draw in larger private investment and help many businesses in the state save money on energy.

In a statement made through Administration spokesman Cullen Werwie, Huebsch said he was approached for help on the project because of several energy programs run out of the Department of Administration, but none of them could help Building Committee. Huebsch, who has since been appointed to a $129,000-a-year job at the Public Service Commission, then looked to WEDC as another way to help the construction firm, he said in a statement.

"As the secretary of DOA, I often worked to connect small businesses with resources that could lead to job creation," Huebsch said.

WEDC awarded the unsecured loan only after Huebsch and other agency officials were unable to find funding from state or federal energy programs, the records show.

El Sellers, who worked as a salesman for Building Committee in the Southwest, said years before the company faced its financial problems, it was having difficulty getting a building permit in a suburb of Phoenix.

He said Monday that company official David Jaeckels told him to make a political donation to a local elected official and then have the company reimburse him for it on his expense report.

Matt Roberts, a spokesman for Arizona Secretary of State Michele Reagan, a Republican, said that under Arizona law individuals cannot make political donations in the name of another person and that corporations cannot make political contributions. Violating these laws can constitute a felony, according to lawscited by Roberts.

Sellers said the donation was $600 to $800, but he could not remember who received it.

"I didn't think about it twice. I'm not a child. It's money that makes the world go round," Sellers said, adding the company got its building permit soon afterward.

Jaeckels categorically denied the allegation and called Sellers a "disgruntled employee."

"I knew we were involved in talking to a variety of people, but I don't know anything about anything like that," he said of having the company reimburse Sellers for a donation. "That's ludicrous."

Scott Walker touts charters, vouchers in charter-heavy New Orleans Monday // NOLA // Jessica Williams - May 18, 2015

Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker's two sons attend public and private universities. Matt Walker is a rising senior at the Roman Catholic, Jesuit Marquette University. And Alex Walker is a rising junior the University of Wisconsin-Madison.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The young men made different decisions, based on what best suited their needs. That's typical for many high school graduates heading to college.

But introduce choice in public and secondary schools, and you start to shock people, the Republican governor told a room of school choice advocates Monday (May 18) in New Orleans.

Walker, a likely 2016 presidential candidate, has been championing choice and his other Wisconsin initiatives a lot lately. He's spoken at dinners, conferences and summits all across the nation in recent months, and the American Federation for Children's Policy Summit in New Orleans Monday was no exception. In his 20-minute keynote speech at the Hyatt Regency New Orleans, Walker praised charters, vouchers and Wisconsin's efforts to promote the same. The federation is a strong supporter of both, and -- like Walker -- has been no friend to labor unions.

"School choice" typically encompasses a liberation from public school attendance zones. Advocates tend to argue that public money should finance additional options, both public and private. It was perhaps fitting, then, for the federation's gathering be in New Orleans, where the vast majority of public schools are boundary-free charters, and where still other students attend private voucher schools.

Choice is controversial: critics say it affords private entities autonomy with little accountability and can lead to the demise of traditional public education systems, while advocates say innovators need room to do what must be done and public education needs a facelift, anyway.

For Walker, however, choice is both a moral and economic imperative. Moral, he said, because every child deserves a great education. Economic, because on one Wisconsin public agency's website alone, there are more than 84,000 job openings, he noted.

"That means we can't afford to have anybody on the sidelines," he said. "That means we need to have people, young people, with access to a great education, in a traditional public school, charter school, choice school with a voucher, private school with a tax benefit, in a virtual school, or even a home school."

Importantly, advocates should remember that strong traditional public schools are important, Walker continued. If those systems aren't given the proper tools -- which he deems are freedom from "big government labor union bosses" -- then you risk cases such as Wisconsin teacher Megan Sampson, who was received an outstanding first year teaching award from the Wisconsin Council of Teachers of English, but who was laid off because of budget cuts and the union contract's "last-in, first-out" policy.

He's frequently touted the Sampson story in speeches around the country. She's been the face of his signature bill, Act 10, that restricted collective bargaining for most Wisconsin labor unions. "You open the door to say... seniority and tenure is gone," he said, to applause from the crowd. "Schools can hire and fire based on merit."

Walker also has pushed to lift the enrollment cap for vouchers while keeping budgets flat for public schools, moves that have sparked ire in his home state. Still, choice supporters tout his work.

While Walker was the first governor and possible GOP candidate to address the crowd Monday, he wasn't the only one. In what appeared to be a late addition to the agenda, Gov. Bobby Jindal also was slated to give remarks at 5 p.m. Jindal is eyeing the presidency, and announced the creation of an exploratory campaign committee Monday.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Chris Christie Now Opposes Creating a Pathway to Citizenship for Undocumented Workers // Bloomberg // Terrence Dopp – May 18, 2015

The New Jersey governor says he has changed his mind on the question.

By his own admission, New Jersey Governor Chris Christie has changed his tune.

On Monday, Christie said that he now opposes providing a pathway to citizenship for undocumented immigrants, something he supported as recently as 2010.

"I think that's an extreme way to go," Christie said in an interview on FOX News Channel's The Kelly File scheduled to air Monday night. "And I think that, quite frankly, what Hillary Clinton's doing right now is pandering. That's pandering. We need to have an intelligent conversation about this and bring the American people along to where we can find consensus."

"Well, I think I've learned over time about this issue and done a lot more work on it."

New Jersey Governor Chris Christie

Christie, who opted not to run four years ago, is traveling as honorary chairman of his political action committee, Leadership Matters for America, even though he's said he won't make a formal announcement on a White House run until later this month or in June.

He had a packed day in New Hampshire, starting with a noon speech on foreign policy in the waterfront Prescott Park, where John McCain announced in 2008. He next held his fifth town hall meeting in three weeks at a VFW hall in Hudson.

The former federal prosecutor conceded during the interview that the stance on a pathway to citizenship is a shift from his previous position on the matter. In recent weeks, he has stated that immigrants won't "self-deport," adding that there aren't enough law enforcement resources to force an estimated 11 million people here to leave.

During the interview Christie also knocked President Barack Obama for his executive action on immigration and said his own shift on the question of providing a pathway to citizenship is an evolution.

"Well, I think I've learned over time about this issue and done a lot more work on it," he said. "And I think everyone has to do what you need to be able to get educated on these issues and learn, and back in 2010 I was in my first couple of months as Governor, I've now learned some of the ramifications of some of these things and what I am saying now is we've got to come up with a solution for it. "

Gov. Christie: American exceptionalism isn't a punchline — it's a set of principles. // Medium // Chris Christie – May 18, 2015

Thanks Renee and thanks Paul for that kind introduction. It's great to be here.

Today I'm going to talk about America's place in the world and how we can create a new American century — and I couldn't think of a better place for us to have that conversation. Right across this park is the house of John Paul Jones, a proud Irishman and father of the US Navy. And across the water, and over the decades, so many ships have sailed from the great Portsmouth Naval Yard in the service of freedom — and continue to do so. This is a place of history and one that has shaped history at so many pivotal moments.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

With that, I want to tell you about another story from history — a story about a proud son of New Hampshire with a New Jersey connection.

John Winant was a Republican governor of this great state back in the 1930s. His New Jersey connection? He attended one of New Jersey's great schools, Princeton University. He was the first man to serve more than one term as Governor here. And since he was tough enough to survive the politics of Concord, in 1941 the President asked him to take on another difficult job — US ambassador to Great Britain.

As Ambassador Winant, he arrived in London at Britain's darkest moment. London was being pounded round the clock by Hitler's Luftwaffe. German U-boats were strangling the country's food supply. Many people thought that a German invasion was weeks away.

Faced with those circumstances, a lesser man might have asked for another assignment. Talk about a bad promotion, right? In fact, there were plenty of people who thought this was a fool's errand. The outgoing ambassador, Joseph Kennedy — — thought Britain's days were numbered and flew home as soon as he could. He declared that appeasement was the right course of action for America. A lot of opinion polls agreed with him.

Well the new ambassador took a different approach.

He flew to England. And the first thing he said when he got off that plane was "I'm very glad to be here. There's no place I'd rather be at this time."

And he meant it. He rallied the morale of the British people, and promised them that America would stand by them. He went out on the streets of London and asked people what he could do to help. He counseled President Roosevelt not to give in to appeasement, but to prepare to confront the German menace.

So why am I telling you this story? For two reasons.

First, this is a story of New Hampshire's impact on the course of history, at the moments when our country faced choices that would determine the course of our future. In this election season, as our country faces new choices and new challenges, you're going to be asked to play that role again.

But the other reason? For me, this is a story that embodies the qualities that make our country exceptional.

Now, American exceptionalism is something that politicians love to talk about. It's a punch line in a speech that makes you feel all warm and fuzzy.

But American exceptionalism isn't a punch line — it's a set of principles.

When the world faces its darkest moments, we use our strength and resolve to light a fire.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

When our allies stand up to fight the darkness, we find a way to stand with them.

When a threat appears from over the horizon, our country gets ready — not when that threat arrives on our doorstep or when it's popular.

America has never been a member of the league of ordinary nations. We have never ignored the crises in the world around us. Because throughout history, leaders in both parties have based our foreign policy on these principles — strength, leadership and partnership with the people and nations who share our values. And it's served the world and us pretty well. That's what saved the world 70 years ago. That's what defeated Soviet tyranny. That's what kept the peace.

Now, fast forward to today.

For the first time since World War Two, Russian troops march across the lands of a sovereign European state.

In the streets of Baghdad and Damascus, Aden and Tripoli, terror has become a permanent way of life — and the sinister black flag of ISIS looms larger every day.

In the South China Sea, Chinese vessels raise islands and military bases from the sea, in disputed waters where they have no right to do so — seizing strategic footholds across the region.

And in the holy land, Israeli citizens live their lives in the shadow of the Iranian menace — while our diplomats toast the promises of the ayatollahs.

So how did this happen? How did it come to this?

All these things are happening because American power is in retreat — and we've backed away from the principles that made us a source of strength and stability.

No one understands any longer whom America stands with or against.

No one understands exactly what we stand for and what we are willing to sacrifice to stand up for it.

No one understands if we're prepared to face the challenges of tomorrow — while we lurch from crisis to crisis today.

Instead of consistent, principled policies that made our country respected by our allies and feared by our adversaries, we have an intellectual and strategic mess. Once, America sought to lead the world. Now, our President leads from behind.

Well if we want to lead from behind, we're going to be left behind.

We give up our claim to be the leader of the free world. We give up the partnerships for peace that defined the

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

American century. And we give up the chance of another American century. The world will be more dangerous and less prosperous.

For six years, a lot of people in our country have been worried about the path we're on. And I don't want to feel like that anymore, and I bet you don't either.

So I think we ought to take a different approach.

We need to change course as a country and embrace a foreign policy based on the timeless principles that helped America to lead the world.

Let's talk about what a policy agenda looks like for a truly exceptional nation, at a time of extraordinary global challenges — and how we get the strength, tools and partnerships to lead the world

Stronger defense

Under our Constitution, the first and most important job of our government is to protect every American and our way of life. That means keeping our military strong must be at the heart of any global agenda.

A strong military doesn't just help us to deal with the threats we face. It helps eliminate them before we even see them.

Over the last 70 years, our world has entered an unprecedented era of peace and prosperity. Nations have risen from the ashes of war; new industries have reshaped the world. Europe became free and united, and democracies multiplied across Latin America, Asia and Africa. And all of this took place only because a strong America served as the anchor and organizer of global stability. We didn't have to be a global policeman who solved every problem, but it was enough for our allies to know we had their back — to give them a zone for peace in which to choose a future for themselves.

Now, our country reaped the rewards of this strategy for decades because we had responsible leaders in both parties who ensured that the military never become a partisan plaything. Partisanship is a fact of life in our political system, and a price worth paying to keep our democracy accountable, strong and vibrant. But our armed services were beyond this — because keeping our country safe should never be up for debate.

But lately, things have changed.

Over the last few years, Washington has grown more and more dysfunctional. And instead of reaching sensible compromises over spending, the President and Congress have made decisions that have compromised our military.

Last year, the National Defense Panel, a bipartisan commission chartered by Congress, concluded that cuts in defense spending imposed by sequestration have been a "serious strategic misstep." By forcing deep, across-the-board cuts in military spending since 2011, Congress and the President have tied the hands of our commanders and created a readiness crisis in our armed services. Now we have fighter pilots who can't get enough hours in the skies to train, ships that can't patrol the routes we need to, and only a handful of Army brigades ready to deploy at a moment's notice.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

If we want to effectively deliver on our entire national defense strategy, then we need to fix this.

We need ground forces that can respond to crises on multiple fronts, without compromising our capacity for deterrence. The Army and Marines should not be reduced below their pre-9/11 strength, and our active duty forces should be at 500,000 Army soldiers and 185,000 Marines.

Our Navy should have more ships. In this century, to secure our global interests our Navy will be called upon to assume even greater challenges and responsibilities. But even as our maritime needs grow, we're cutting back and right now are on a budgetary path to 260 ships or less. That's just wrong. Our Navy bears the greatest burden of our forward-presence missions, and shouldn't be equipped to do the bare minimum. We should have at least 350 ships — and our Navy should be an armada without equal.

And we need a larger Air Force. Our Air Force now has the oldest and smallest combat force in its history, and we're on track to reduce our inventory of bomber, fighter and surveillance forces by 50% over the next 4 years. Well, when it comes to maintaining our air supremacy, winging it won't do. We should modernize the Air Force and build up to 2,500 combat coded aircraft as part of a total force of 6,000 aircraft capable of carrying out all the missions we know our pilots will face in the years ahead. Americans were the first to conquer the skies — let's not concede them.

So we need to give our men and women in uniform the resources they need to get the job done — and we owe it to them. That's why Congress and the President should repeal the 2011 Budget Control Act as soon as humanly possible, get back to regular order in budgeting and restore funding levels to what Secretary Gates proposed in his fiscal 2012 budget — modest increases in defense spending through the end of the decade that will make a massive difference to our troops. It's the right thing to do — and we should do it now.

But that's just the start. We also need to innovate to fight the battles of the future.

For a long time our military has led the world not just through the skill and the courage of our troops, but the ingenuity of our scientists and engineers. Our forces are the envy of the world because they're also the best equipped in the world.

But the world is catching up — and our rivals are working hard to copy and steal our best-kept secrets. Today, Russia has stealth fighters, a new generation of battle tanks, and a growing military presence in the Arctic. China has its first aircraft carrier, with more on the way, double digit increases in military spending every year, and cutting-edge cyber warriors always, seemingly, one step ahead of our own. And in just the last few months, we've seen North Korean hackers targeting Hollywood and the Russians reading President Obama's email. That's just embarrassing.

So we need to work harder to keep our edge. We need to invest in building the military of the future. We need to build a new generation of weapon systems to protect our interests on every front — on the ground, on the seas, in the air or new frontiers even further out. We need to invest in unmanned aviation, directed energy weapons and space. We should continue to be leaders in undersea warfare, and that's why we should speed up the build rate of our Virginia-class attack submarines and support the replacement of the Ohio class. And when it comes to cyber warfare, we need to be ready not just to defend against threats to our vital national systems, we need the offensive capabilities to deter our enemies — or strike back if they don't take the hint. To keep our country safe in this century, we need to maintain the digital balance of power.

And if we want our armed forces to get the right tools at the right time, in a way that doesn't waste taxpayer money, we need to fundamentally reform our entire DoD procurement process.

Between 2001 and 2011, the DoD spent around $44 billion dollars on weapon programs that were eventually cancelled. Weapons that have overrun their budgets by hundreds of billions of dollars and failed to live up to expectations. And across the board, military officials spend millions of dollars every year dealing with red tape and byzantine reporting requirements just to get the weapons we need.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clearly, something isn't right here in our procurement process. Business-as-usual bureaucrats in Washington aren't taking care of business. So we need to adopt real world, private sector practices across our procurement system, and remove wasteful, overlapping functions. Bureaucracy shouldn't burden our troops, and we should attack it with the same energy as any other threat to our defense.

Stronger intelligence

So a strong defense needs to be the first cornerstone of our foreign policy.

The second is strengthening our intelligence efforts.

This is something very close to my heart. Because I've seen up close just how important our intelligence community is to defending our way of life.

On the morning of September 11, my wife Mary Pat was working just two blocks from the World Trade Center. She got evacuated from Manhattan by ferry, and I was so unbelievably grateful and relieved that she was all right. But like many of you, there were other people in our lives — friends, colleagues, loved ones — who didn't make it. A friend from our church. The brother of one of Andrew's teachers. Parents of their classmates. And for New Jersey as a whole, we lost so many people on that terrible day — the second most deaths of any state other than the State of New York.

Those weeks after the attacks were such a scary and unpredictable time for everyone. But it was also in that time that President Bush nominated me to be US Attorney for the District of New Jersey. I was informed by the White House on September 10, 2001 that I would be nominated for US Attorney for the District of New Jersey, and I was confirmed to that post on December 10, three months later. And by then it was clear what I was going to be working on for the next few years.

In early 2002, John Ashcroft called all the US Attorneys into the Justice Department. And he gave us a message from the President. What happened on 9/11 must never happen again — and it was up to all of us to prevent it. We had a responsibility to go after the terrorists with every legal instrument at our disposal.

Well I took that to heart. Because I remembered what it felt like to be waiting for a phone call from Mary Pat, hoping and praying that she was safe. I know what it feels like to lose people when they should be safe — at work, on our streets. This is not theoretical to me. I lived it in my home. Everything changed that morning in September.

So for the next seven years of my life, my office focused on fighting terrorism every day.

We started by bringing the first post-9/11 terrorism case in the country. This was a case against a man called Hemant Lekhani, an Indian-born British citizen who tried to buy and sell shoulder-fired missiles on the black market, that could take down a plane. He thought he was dealing with a terror organization, but he was actually dealing with a joint operation between the FBI and the Russians. We investigated that case using tools including the Patriot Act — and we ended up getting him convicted and sent to jail for the rest of his life.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Another case was the Fort Dix Six. These were six radical Islamists who were conspiring to attack soldiers at Fort Dix in New Jersey. They tried to buy weapons and explosives from an underground weapons dealer who was actually an FBI informant — the result of a 16-month operation with the FBI and Justice Department to infiltrate the group. It was incredible coordination, and we got the entire group behind bars.

So I've used all the tools we had to go after terror. I've used the Patriot Act myself and personally reviewed the applications. I've prosecuted terrorists, and sent terrorists to jail. And I've seen what happens when our intelligence community, legal system and law enforcement work together. We can use information to save lives.

That's why intelligence matters. At the simplest level, intelligence helps us prevent the next attack. But at its best, intelligence is a force multiplier for all our national capabilities. If we want to manage events — and not have events manage us — then we need superior knowledge of the world around us.

Strength and knowledge go hand in hand — and should always be at the core of our strategy.

Now, we've seen some good successes over the last few years. The way Bin Laden was caught shows exactly how our intelligence efforts should work. That took ten years of investment in building our human intelligence capabilities. It took an immense effort to track individual cell phones across Pakistan and Afghanistan. And it was the payoff for years of training and equipping our SEAL teams to get the job done. President Obama and President Bush deserve credit for laying the foundations for that operation, and most of all, the brave troops and operatives on the ground who made this happen.

But we need more efforts like that. We need to be constantly building those foundations for the threats over the horizon, and the next set of challenges we need to solve.

Today, we're not seeing that progress. Instead, Washington is debating the wrong question entirely — which intelligence capabilities should we get rid of?

Too often, the loudest voices in the debate about how to keep our country safe are driven by some purist, theoretical vision of how we should manage our intelligence efforts.

When Edward Snowden revealed our intelligence secrets to the world in 2013, civil liberties extremists seized that moment to advance their own narrow agenda. They want you to think that there's a government spook listening in every time you pick up the phone or Skype with your grandkids. They want you to think of our intelligence community as the bad guys, straight out of the Bourne Identity or a Hollywood thriller. And they want you to think that if we weakened our capabilities, the rest of the world would love us more.

Let me be clear — all these fears are exaggerated and ridiculous. When it comes to fighting terrorism, our government is not the enemy. And we shouldn't listen to people like Edward Snowden, a criminal who hurt our country and now enjoys the hospitality of President Putin — while sending us messages about the dangers of authoritarian government. And, frankly, we don't need advice from Hollywood, the guys who made our intelligence agencies the villains in practically every movie from the last twenty-five years.

But instead of taking on the ideologues, the Obama administration and the Democrats have taken the path of least resistance. They've apologized for our intelligence collection, promised that we will collect it only in ways that protect the privacy of foreign citizens, and cut back on vital funding for our intelligence services.

They've politicized intelligence oversight and demoralized our intelligence community. Last year, Democrats on the Senate Intelligence Committee released a one-sided and inaccurate attack on our intelligence services. Democrats behind that report should be ashamed for putting partisanship above genuine oversight in the way they released this. And it's just disgraceful the way there are folks on the Hill who want American intelligence weaker and less informed just to drive their own personal political agendas.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

So instead of support, our intelligence services get condemnations. Instead of resources, they get regulations. Instead of building a community that's trusted and equipped to go after the hard targets, we have a risk-averse intelligence service. The watchword from this administration isn't, "Collect all the information you can about a dangerous world," but "collect only what you have to have."

The next time there's a phone call to a terrorist safe house in Yemen from San Diego or New Jersey, would our agents dare to listen in?

Well, we've never had a risk-averse military. And I don't think we want a risk-averse intelligence service. So we need to fix this.

We need to treat intelligence as a practical issue, not a theoretical one. We need to be practical about preventing real civil liberties abuses wherever they occur. That's what a vigilant, responsible Congress, not a partisan one, would accomplish with vigorous oversight. That's what a truly apolitical Justice Department would do by pursuing real legal violations by any member of our intelligence community who steps over the line. Protecting our homeland must be an uncompromising priority.

The vast majority of Americans aren't worried about the government listening in on them, because it hasn't happened. But they are worried about what happens if we don't catch the bad people who want to harm our country.

Here's how we catch them.

We need to toughen our anti-terror and surveillance laws to give our intelligence services the legal mechanisms to do their job.

Over the last couple of years, most of our allies including the UK, France, Canada and Australia, have announced plans to toughen their laws to better detect and prevent terrorism and extremism. Now we're the only major country talking about going in the opposite direction.

We should begin by passing a clean extension of the Patriot Act. At the end of May, vital pieces of that legislation are going to expire, including Section 215 — essential for our intelligence agencies to access the data they need to stop suspected terrorists. I used this tool extensively, aggressively and legally as US Attorney and I can tell you this: it works. This is a big debate in Congress right now, and different courts have expressed their views on the program too. But right now, that debate is dominated by the intellectual purists worried about theoretical abuses that haven't occurred — instead of the real threats that we've already seen from Garland, Texas, to Ft. Dix, New Jersey.

If you're an ordinary, law-abiding American, this legislation has absolutely no effect on you — except it could prevent the next attack from taking place in our country, killing our fellow citizens. Absolutely no one has a single real example of our intelligence services misusing this program for political or other nefarious purposes. And we have incredibly stringent oversight of these provisions. I wish I could say the same about the Internal Revenue Service in this administration. The critics have chosen the wrong target. But if they had a leg to stand on, they would ask for greater oversight of Section 215. But they don't want to because that would mean more responsibility and accountability for them. Simply put, they're on the wrong side of this debate.

So let's move beyond this. Let's give our people the tools they need to get the job done.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Part of that also means properly funding our intelligence services and allowing them to keep innovating and improving their capabilities. We need to invest in new technologies and infrastructure to support our signals intelligence, so that we can actually interpret all the data we're gathering. Today's problem isn't having too little information; it's having too much. So we need to invest in turning noise into understanding.

One of the ways we can do that is by building a stronger and more productive relationship with Silicon Valley. Our entrepreneurs and innovators are some of our strongest assets as a country, and the work they're doing to connect the world helps to improve all our lives. So we should be clear that we have no interest in reading the Facebook messages and tweets of ordinary Americans. We want a strong and secure internet. But we need the tools to find the people who would hurt our country so that people can carry on enjoying the benefits of Facebook and Twitter and Google. Our government should treat our tech community as our partners, not our enemies. And when foreign governments try to use the Snowden leaks to justify protectionism and attacks on our companies, we need to fight for them — and with something more than apologies.

At the same time, we need to strengthen our human intelligence capabilities in the parts of the world where they're weakest. Our country has reacted too slowly to the return of Moscow's aggression and the rise of ISIS partly because of our lack of investment in human intelligence. America should never be caught napping because we chose not to invest in dealing with the hard targets — Russia, Iran, North Korea.

And closer to home, we can do more to strengthen our cooperation and intelligence sharing with our neighbors, as well as our allies in Europe. We face common challenges and enemies, so we ought to have common solutions. With Canada and Mexico we should be sharing more information about overseas travelers to both countries, and greater cooperation with Mexico to police their side of the border. And with Europe, in particular the countries in the visa waiver program, we should be doing more to encourage the sharing of digital data and information about extremist threats. Ensuring the collective security of our allies should be something they welcome, and it's the price for all our partnerships.

Stronger alliances

With that in mind, let's talk about the final pillar of our stronger foreign policy — building stronger alliances.

As Governor, I've had the chance to meet with a lot of foreign leaders and partners from overseas. Over the last couple of years I've met with the leaders of our closest allies, from Canada and Mexico, to Israel and Great Britain.

Everywhere I go, I hear the same thing from our allies — we want America to be a strong global leader. We want you to step up and lead.

Because that's who we are. It's not just our strength and intelligence that defines us as a country; it's our willingness to stand with those who share our values and interests. We became the leader of the free world because we also chose to become the arsenal of democracy. And when we make a commitment to stand with our allies, our word is our bond. Or at least it used to be.

Throughout history, our leaders and diplomats have lived their lives to extend that bond. Our soldiers have died to defend it.

But right now, we have a government that doesn't seem to care about all the blood and sweat and treasure that it took to build those alliances. Because we've broken our word.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In 2013, President Obama talked about defending a red line for our nation if the Syrian dictator Bashar al-Assad used chemical weapons against his own people. Well, he used chemical weapons on his people. President Obama's response? Never mind. His unwillingness to stand behind his own words has made America weaker and less reliable in the world. He damaged the credibility of the Presidency.

And when the world saw that our word was not our bond, are we surprised at what happened next?

Are we surprised that Vladimir Putin chose to annex Crimea and invade eastern Ukraine?

Are we surprised that Iranian-backed militias are rampaging across Yemen?

Are we surprised that Bashar al-Assad continues to butcher thousands of men, women, using barrel bombs and conventional munitions dropped out of Russian helicopters? Or that with Iranian support, the moderate Syrian opposition has been sidelined by extremists and ISIS?

So whoever is going to be our next Commander-in-Chief is going to make restoring America's word a priority. We need to make it clear to our friends and allies that we stand with them in the cause of freedom, and against all the gathering threats. We will stand together, because we cannot stand alone. And we must return America to the leadership role the world needs and expects.

In Europe, our first task is to defend the Western alliance against Russian aggression.

We have spent 70 years of blood and treasure, first to defeat Nazism and then to defeat Soviet totalitarianism to establish and maintain a free and united Europe. Now President Obama and Secretary Clinton are giving this sacred investment away for nothing with their inane reset button.

In March, the Polish government started offering military training to any civilians between the ages of 18 and 50 who wanted it. On the very first day they opened up that program, 1,000 people signed up. And then they kept coming.

When Polish civilians are drilling to defend the streets of Warsaw once again, you know our Europe policy is a scary failure to our allies. And we need to have our allies' backs. And we need to do it now.

We need to stand up to Russian aggression together, and make clear that our commitment to our NATO allies in Eastern Europe is absolute. And if Putin's Russia wants to rejoin the community of civilized nations, then they're going to have to behave like one.

We need to bolster our allies by helping them get access to the weapons systems and training they need to defend themselves. We should strengthen NATO's military presence in the Baltic states, and make clear to all our Eastern European allies that we will not allow the freedoms they've won since the Cold War to be reversed. We should give Ukraine the weapons it needs to defend itself.

We should also put the pressure on all our NATO allies to invest more in their own defense. After the Cold War, too many of our European allies rushed to cut their military spending and enjoy the dividend of peace. Well now they need to invest, and fulfill their NATO commitments to spend at least 2% of GDP on defense annually. It's not because we're not going to have their backs — Europe just needs to watch their front as well, and close the big and increasing capabilities gap that we saw between our forces and theirs at moments like Kosovo in 1999 and

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Libya in 2011. And even as Europe increases spending, we should work with them to avoid duplication in capabilities across the alliance. They don't all need to rush out and buy tanks, but they might benefit from investing more in cyber warfare, missile defense, precision weapons and artillery — the things we need more of.

And as for Russia — until Putin chooses the path of peace, we should keep applying pressure.

Just a couple of months ago, the head of Russia's FSB — the old KGB — was invited to the White House for a summit on "countering extremism." We didn't just invite the fox into the hen house, we let in the bear. That just seems crazy to me. Instead, we should immediately put travel bans and asset freezes on every member of the Russian parliament and Putin's entire circle — including Putin himself. We know who holds the leash on the dogs of war. So let's not mess around on this. And if that still isn't enough, we should look at tougher sanctions on Russia's energy and financial sectors — and hit them where it really hurts.

How we deal with Russia is a test for how we stand with all our allies everywhere. We cannot back down, and we need a leader who won't back down.

But there are other places we're going to be tested too, and other allies we need to defend.

At the top of the list is Israel. I'm going to be short and sweet here. Our commitment to Israel must be absolute.

Israel is a beacon of freedom in a sea of autocracy, and our friendship should be unshakable. Over the last few years, the Obama administration has taken our Israeli partners for granted and it's just shameful the way the President has treated them. When the President is barely on speaking terms with Prime Minister Netanyahu, and waited two days to call and congratulate him after his election, that's just immature. If we can't be respectful to our best friends in the world, then we're not going to get very far with anyone else — and it's no surprise this administration has such an abysmal record on diplomacy.

Finally, Israel and its people must be supported by the United States and the American President. Its existence and security is non-negotiable. The Iranians and others who think otherwise must be reminded of that simple fact.

Also damaging to our partnership with Israel, is just the staggering strategic incompetence and disinterest in countering the rising threats across the Middle East and North Africa — threats that if left unchecked, will compromise Israel's security and future. If we truly care about defending Israel, then we need to consider what the region will look like tomorrow — and then take action today. President Obama seems unwilling to stand up to anyone in the Middle East — except for Prime Minister Netanyahu. It is embarrassing and dangerous.

We have a lot of work to do.

With Iran, the President's eagerness for a deal on their nuclear program has him ready to accept a bad deal. The framework we've negotiated here seems pretty flimsy, and I have grave concerns over how we're going to make the Iranians live up to their end of the bargain and how we can ensure proper, verifiable compliance. So until we get that, we should have the strength to keep our guard up and keep our sanctions up. The deal as structured will lead to a nuclear Iran and, then, a nuclearized Middle East. That not only threatens Israel. It threatens the United States and turns 70 years of nuclear policy on its head.

Iran has also been pretty busy across the region, and almost everywhere Iran opposes US goals. In Yemen, they've launched a proxy war that has devastated our ally and represents a clear and present danger to world. And while Iran has supported Iraq in fighting back against ISIS, their motives are hardly benign, and we know they have a long-term interest in building a power base in Iraq.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Iran might not have the bomb right now — but their influence is absolutely radioactive to the world. So we need to contain it with our moderate Sunni Arab allies, while at the same time rolling back the shadow of ISIS. We need to do more to organize our allies into a strong coalition on the ground in Yemen, and to train and equip the moderate opposition to Assad in Syria and the tribal elements in Iraq that are a threat to peace. We should develop new tools to blunt Iran's regional influence, including ways to fight the flow of cash to their puppets: Hezbollah, the Houthis, Syria and Iraqi militants. We should link our sanctions regime to the threat Iran poses to the region, and treat all these threats as connected, which the Obama Administration doesn't — and come up with a real coherent strategy with our Sunni partners.

The price of inaction is steadily rising. Just last week we saw the embarrassment of almost all the Gulf leaders, including the Saudi King, pulling out of President Obama's summit at Camp David. Our allies want policies, not photo ops, and we're not listening to them. And as we fail to confront Iran's shadowy nuclear program and undisguised quest for regional power, we raise the likelihood of states taking unilateral actions or seeking extreme solutions. If we're not going to stop Iran getting a nuclear capability, then why would the Saudis or Egyptians or Emiratis choose not to follow? If we don't have a plan to stop Bashar al-Assad in Syria, or Iraq in Yemen, what's to stop governments lending support to proxy forces like Al Qaeda and ISIS?

In August the President announced a campaign to degrade and destroy ISIS. But right now they seem to be getting stronger every day, and we've just witnessed ISIS taking full control of Ramadi, the capital of Iraq's largest province. So right now our piecemeal strategy to deal with ISIS doesn't inspire confidence.

When allies lose confidence in us, they take matters into their own hands. I think it's better for America to extend a helping hand — and help manage events.

And that's why we also need to strengthen our alliances across the Asia-Pacific region.

This century, more than any other, will be defined by the Pacific. So I think it's important we work to build on our relationships with our core allies in the region, Australia, Japan, the Philippines and Korea, as well as newer partners, India, Indonesia, Malaysia, Burma and Vietnam.

Now, the President has talked about leading a pivot to Asia in our foreign and security policy. We've taken some of the right steps, like working to strengthen our economic ties with our Asian partners through the Trans-Pacific Partnership. But generally, we haven't matched strategy with capabilities, particularly in terms of our defensive deployments. 2,500 marines in Australia, a couple of Littoral Combat Ships in Singapore, and exercises in Philippines are a start. But compare that to China's double digit growth in military spending every year, with thousands of missiles pointed across the Taiwan Straits, next generation fighter jets and soon, likely a full blue water capable fleet with aircraft carriers. And we still face an unpredictable and dangerous regime in North Korea, and extremist threats across the region.

If we don't upgrade our presence in the region, then we won't be able to keep our commitments to our allies. The President's pivot to Asia might just be a pendulum to Asia. So I think we should match words with deeds, and alliances with strength. We need to reposition more of our fleet and our forces across the region, and give our allies the capabilities they need to respond to the threats of the future. We don't want to fuel a regional arms race, but there's no reason we can't help our allies upgrade their capabilities with stronger coastal defenses, submarines, maritime reconnaissance equipment and other defensive equipment.

Nothing about these policies is about treating China like a foe. China is a great nation, and we want them to be a partner. Our countries have so much to learn and to offer one another, and if we can work together, we can create a century of greater prosperity and security. But we must never shy away from demanding that China live up to the rules of the global community, and respect the human rights of its own people and the sovereignty of our allies — and we should make clear that the United States will always stand by its allies, no matter what.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Let me be clear. Strengthening America's defenses and our intelligence community, and sending clear and resolute signals to allies and adversaries alike will not lead to war. It will build the foundations of peace. It will lead to fair negotiations, not one-sided ones. It will lead us towards stability and away from indecision and chaos. It will strengthen existing alliances and build new ones. It will reestablish American credibility in the world — with everyone.

America's word will once again be our bond — as it always should have been.

A great generation

So that's how I see an American foreign policy designed for the times we live in — and for an exceptional country. We need a stronger defense, stronger intelligence and stronger alliances. When we add strength to knowledge, and work with partners who share our interests and values, we can create a world that is safer, stronger and more prosperous.

But there's one more thing we need to do. We need to banish cynicism.

Today there are plenty of voices that say that America's time as a global leader has passed. We can't change the world. We shouldn't change the world. The challenges we face are too great — and our power too small.

That might be true of an ordinary nation. But that's not us.

President Reagan once said that "above all, we must realize that no arsenal or no weapon in the arsenals of the world is so formidable as the will and moral courage of free men and women. It is a weapon our adversaries in today's world do not have. It is a weapon that we as Americans do have."

He was right. And that will and courage will lead us forward.

Today, we live in cynical times with cynical politics. If we're going to keep making progress as a country, we're going to have to fix that and get our domestic house in order. That's a longer discussion — and one that I'm looking forward to having with all of you in the weeks and months ahead.

But none of us should doubt our ability to lead in this new century. This can be the second American century. It must be. We shouldn't fear that challenge.

Our forefathers' generation was called "the greatest generation" because they put their lives on the line to protect our way of life — and because they overcame the greatest challenges. They didn't achieve greatness because the challenges were too few. It was because they faced many, and they dared to confront them.

It's only when we dare to face the big challenges that we can achieve greatness. Courage is not the absence of fear — it is the presence of fear, but with the will to go on fighting.

Well we have a chance today to face big challenges and to overcome them. We have a chance to follow in the footsteps of giants like our grandparents' generation, and leaders like New Hampshire's John Winant. He went to London in the service of his country. Now, we've been blessed with the strength and resources to go out and defend our way of life once again. And if we dare to do that, then we have a chance to be a great generation too.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It's time for us to get to work, and to find our greatness again. Let's go do the big things that lead America to another century of exceptionalism, and not a century of settling for second place. The world is waiting, and together we can lead it forward. Thank you.

Christie to Call for Larger Military, More US Intervention // ABC News // Jim Colvin, Associated Press - May 18, 2015

Making the case for a more active U.S. presence overseas, New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie will call for a larger military and a boost in defense spending while defending the government's intelligence-collection efforts, in a speech Monday setting forth his foreign policy approach.

The likely Republican presidential contender will also use an appearance in New Hampshire to criticize President Barack Obama's handling of the surging Islamic State group and the emerging nuclear deal with Iran.

"Iran might not have the bomb right now — but their influence is absolutely radioactive to the world," the New Jersey governor says in prepared remarks released by his political action committee. "So we need to contain it with our moderate Sunni Arab allies, while at the same time rolling back the shadow of ISIS," he said, using another acronym for Islamic State.

Christie, who served as a U.S. attorney before he was elected governor, will also seek to distance himself from the crowded Republican field by offering an unapologetic defense of the U.S.'s intelligence-collection efforts.

He will specifically take aim at former National Security Agency contractor Edward Snowden, who in 2013 leaked thousands of documents to journalists. Among Snowden's revelations: NSA had for years been secretly collecting millions of Americans' phone records. Christie has previously said that program should continue.

"When Edward Snowden revealed our intelligence secrets to the world in 2013, civil liberties extremists seized that moment to advance their own narrow agenda," he will say, according to the excerpts. "They want you to think that there's a government spook listening in every time you pick up the phone or Skype with your grandkids. They want you to think of our intelligence community as the bad guys, straight out of the Bourne Identity or a Hollywood thriller. And they want you to think that if we weakened our capabilities, the rest of the world would love us more."

"Let me be clear — all these fears are baloney," he said.

"When it comes to fighting terrorism, our government is not the enemy," Christie says in his prepared remarks.

The House voted last week to end the bulk phone records collection program and replace it with a system to search the data held by telephone companies on a case-by-case basis

The speech will be the third that Christie has delivered in recent weeks in the early-voting state as he lays the groundwork for an expected campaign. His previous speeches focused on overhauling Social Security and lowering taxes on individuals and corporations.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Christie has been working to try to re-establish his place in the top tier of likely candidates after the fallout from the George Washington Bridge scandal.

Chris Christie, Rand Paul Bring Patriot Act Debate to Campaign Trail // WSJ // Heather Haddon and Janet Hook - May 18, 2015

New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie faulted Washington lawmakers for debating the merits of the Patriot Act and said there were no substantiated examples that the post-Sept. 11 security law has abused the civil liberties of American citizens.

In a foreign-policy speech delivered in New Hampshire Monday, the potential 2016 presidential candidate called for a reauthorization of the Patriot Act as it currently stands and criticized any attempts to scale back the bulk collection of American phone records by the National Security Agency.

“The next time there’s a phone call to a terrorist safe house in Yemen from San Diego or New Jersey, would our agents dare to listen in?” said Mr. Christie, during the 45-minute speech in Portsmouth, N.H. “I don’t think we want a risk-averse intelligence service.”

Mr. Christie’s defense of the NSA phone-data collection program puts him squarely at odds with Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul, a presidential candidate who Monday reiterated his threat to mount a Senate filibuster over the issue.

“We will do everything possible, including filibustering the Patriot Act, to stop them,” Mr. Paul said, according to the Associated Press, acknowledging that he might not have enough allies to succeed in blocking the program. “They have the votes inside the Beltway. But we have the votes outside the Beltway, and we’ll have that fight.”

Mr. Paul has made the issue a centerpiece of his campaign, where one of his signature applause lines is to slam the NSA by telling audiences, “What you do on your cellphone is none of their damn business.”

The issue is being joined on the presidential campaign trail just as Congress is debating reauthorizing key provisions of the Patriot Act, with sections of the far-reaching law set to expire at the end of May.

Lawmakers are considering scaling back the bulk collection of phone records authorized under Section 215 of the act, with the House of Representatives voting last week to allow monitoring on a case-by-case basis.

The prospects for action by the June 1 deadline are uncertain because of differences between the House and Senate and the prospects of a filibuster. Asked if the White House supported a two-month extension of the Patriot Act, spokesman Eric Schultz said that Congress should act now.

“Our strategy on these important security matters is to not kick the can down the road,” said Mr. Schultz before the president’s afternoon visit to New Jersey on Monday. “Congress has known of this impending deadline for months and months.”

Mr. Christie directed most of his fire at Washington Democrats, but also said that there were leaders from parties “who want American intelligence weaker and less informed just to drive their own personal political agendas.” He called those criticisms “disgraceful.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Other presidential candidates who have weighed in on the issue are Sen. Ted Cruz, who has criticized the blanket metadata collection, while Sen. Marco Rubio has defended it.

Mr. Paul said, speaking at a round table in Philadelphia Monday, that he didn't want to abolish the NSA or domestic surveillance entirely, but that he wanted the government to seek individual warrants not just authorize bulk phone monitoring.

He took a swipe at "some Republicans running for office," who suggested not seeking a warrant from a judge, but instead "just drone them." That was an apparent reference to Sen. Lindsey Graham, who at a candidate forum in Iowa Saturday said if there was someone was thinking of joining al Qaeda or Islamic State, "I'm not going to call a judge, I'm going to call a drone and we will kill you."

Mr. Christie, who is a former U.S. Attorney for New Jersey, spoke Monday about specific instances when he used Section 215, and his prosecutions of suspected terrorists who attempted to buy weapons on the black market.

"I've prosecuted terrorists, and sent terrorists to jail," said Mr. Christie, who was appointed to the role by former President George W. Bush. "I've seen what happens when our intelligence community, legal system and law enforcement work together."

He also criticized civil liberty advocates criticisms of the bulk phone surveillance programs as "exaggerated and ridiculous."

He said that the current debate over the act in Washington was "dominated by the intellectual purists worried about theoretical abuses."

"Absolutely no one has a single real example of our intelligence services misusing this program for political or other nefarious purposes," Mr. Christie said.

In his first major foreign-policy address this year, Mr. Christie also called for more investment in the U.S. military, including research to prevent cyberattacks and funding for unmanned aircraft commonly known as drones.

Mr. Christie said the Obama administration wasn't fully supporting Israel and America's allies in the Middle East, and faulted the president for not taking a firmer stance on Syria.

"He has damaged the credibility of the American presidency," Mr. Christie said.

Mr. Christie also said that the U.S. should ramp up pressure on Russia until it stops acts of military aggression in the region, and called for an asset ban on President Vladimir Putin, members of the country's parliament and the president's inner circle of advisers.

Chris Christie Now Opposes Creating a Pathway to Citizenship for Undocumented Workers // Bloomberg // Terrence Dopp - May 18, 2015

By his own admission, New Jersey Governor Chris Christie has changed his tune.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

On Monday, Christie said that he now opposes providing a pathway to citizenship for undocumented immigrants, something he supported as recently as 2010.

"I think that's an extreme way to go," Christie said in an interview on FOX News Channel's The Kelly File scheduled to air Monday night. "And I think that, quite frankly, what Hillary Clinton's doing right now is pandering. That's pandering. We need to have an intelligent conversation about this and bring the American people along to where we can find consensus."

Christie, who opted not to run four years ago, is traveling as honorary chairman of his political action committee, Leadership Matters for America, even though he's said he won't make a formal announcement on a White House run until later this month or in June.

He had a packed day in New Hampshire, starting with a noon speech on foreign policy in the waterfront Prescott Park, where John McCain announced in 2008. He next held his fifth town hall meeting in three weeks at a VFW hall in Hudson.

The former federal prosecutor conceded during the interview that the stance on a pathway to citizenship is a shift from his previous position on the matter. In recent weeks, he has stated that immigrants won't "self-deport," adding that there aren't enough law enforcement resources to force an estimated 11 million people here to leave.

During the interview Christie also knocked President Barack Obama for his executive action on immigration and said his own shift on the question of providing a pathway to citizenship is an evolution.

"Well, I think I've learned over time about this issue and done a lot more work on it," he said. "And I think everyone has to do what you need to be able to get educated on these issues and learn, and back in 2010 I was in my first couple of months as Governor, I've now learned some of the ramifications of some of these things and what I am saying now is we've got to come up with a solution for it. "

Christie cites experience running against female opponent // Philly // The Associated Press - May 18, 2015

HUDSON, N.H. (AP) - New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie says his 2013 race against a female opponent has helped prepare him for a potential campaign against Hillary Rodham Clinton.

The likely Republican presidential contender was asked during a town hall event in New Hampshire Monday evening why he believed he would be well-suited to run against the favorite for the Democratic nomination if he chooses to run and wins his party's nomination.

Among his reasons, Christie cited his commanding victory over Democrat Barbara Buono during his re-election campaign.

"Everybody thought, 'Oh no, no ... look at this ... this is going to be bad. Christie's gonna lose his cool. This woman's yelling at him all the time. He's going to yell back at her. It's going to ugly really fast and he's going to lose,'" Christie recalled.

"I think that experience of campaigning under that kind of stress, in that atmosphere, against that type of opponent, prepares you extraordinarily well to be able to run against Secretary Clinton, if that's what I chose to do," he said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Christie, who has been working to move past the George Washington Bridge scandal, also suggested that he'd been held to a different standard that Clinton, who has come under scrutiny for using a private email server when she was secretary of state. He said that, as a Republican, he believes he would have faced far greater scrutiny had he done the same thing.

Chris Christie will be in New Hampshire when Obama visits NJ: Chris Christie in the news // Cleveland // Sabrina Eaton - May 18, 2015

Today's Chris Christie news: When President Barack Obama visits Camden, N.J,, today to applaud the city's police reforms, New Jersey GOP Gov. Chris Christie will be out of state, campaigning to be Obama's successor. Lt. Gov. Kim Guadagno is scheduled to be in Camden to welcome the president: Cherry Hill Courier Post

Christie will be in New Hampshire to deliver a major foreign policy speech on "America's Role in the World" at noon at Prescott Park in Portsmouth. He will also hold a town hall at 5 p.m. at the Hudson VFW: WMUR

On Friday, Christie appeared in Georgia along with Texas Sen. Ted Cruz and Florida Sen. Marco Rubio. Christie told told about 350 people at a GOP breakfast, "You'll be seeing a lot of people." He lingered afterward for hugs and photos, including from delegates wearing stickers for other candidates: Associated Press

At the Victory Breakfast for the Georgia Republican Party State Convention in Athens, Christie talked himself up as someone who can work across political lines. "In a state like mine, I don't have the luxury of having a Republican legislature," he said. "You don't have the option to stand in the corner ... You've got to make the world turn:" Athens Banner-Herald

He also told the Georgia event that entitlements — which, he said, now consume 71 percent of federal spending, compared to 26 percent under JFK — prevent the federal government from making other choices, from cutting taxes to investing in infrastructure or defense: Atlanta Journal Constitution

Sen. Lindsey Graham on White House bid: 'I'm running' // Politico // Katie Glueck - May 18, 2015

Sen. Lindsey Graham said Monday that he will announce his decision about whether to run for president on June 1 in his hometown of Central, S.C., but left little doubt about his intentions by saying “I’m running.”

“I’m running because of what you see on television, I’m running because I think the world is falling apart, I’ve been more right than wrong on foreign policy,” he said on “CBS This Morning,” when asked if he was running because he was unimpressed with the rest of the field (and appearing to dispense with the pretense that he hasn’t decided whether to jump in). “It’s not the fault of others, or their lack of this or that that makes me want to run, it’s my ability in my own mind to be a good commander-in-chief and to make Washington work.”

Graham, who is one of the Senate’s leading national security hawks, would be a longshot in the crowded Republican presidential field but could be influential in pressuring the other contenders on foreign policy issues. In recent weeks, the chances of his running, according to Graham, have gone from 91 percent to “98.6 percent” to 99.9 percent. He has also staffed up his exploratory committee.

“You’re all invited to come, spend money when you do, and I will tell you what I’m going to do about running for president,” he said about the June 1 event.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Graham was also asked whether he would have gone into Iraq if he had known of the intelligence failures that are widely known now. It's a question that has tripped up several other 2016 contenders, including Jeb Bush and Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.).

"Going into Iraq, if I'd known...then what I know now, would I have launched a ground invasion? Probably not," he said, adding that if he knew the "intelligence was faulty," he would have "reconfigured" his approach to taking on Saddam Hussein, who "needed to go."

"But at the end of the day, he is gone," Graham said. "And I'm worried about an attack on our homeland."

Graham, a media fixture, is well-known for his assertive national security posture and for working with Democrats on issues like immigration reform. But hosting the June 1 event in the town where he grew up allows Graham to highlight his personal story, which isn't widely known. He was raised in the back of a pool hall and bar owned by his family, and when his parents died young, he brought up his sister while in college and in the military (Graham is trained as an Air Force lawyer). That tough background, his team believes, better positions him to connect in a compassionate way with voters.

The senator added that he was also weighing a run both because he wanted to take on "radical Islam" and because he wanted to promote more bipartisanship.

"In my view, Democrats and Republicans work together too little," he said. "And I would try to change that if I got to be president."

Sen. Lindsey Graham Is 'Having A Blast' As He Preps Presidential Run // NPR // Jessica Taylor and Don Gonyea - May 18, 2015

Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., is ready to join the crowded 2016 presidential race — and he's having a blast in doing it.

The defense hawk and pragmatic Republican said Monday morning on CBS's This Morning that he would make an announcement on June 1 about his plans, but he went on to dispense with all pretense of what that decision would be.

"I'm running because I think the world is falling apart," Graham said.

His 10-minute address at the Iowa Republican Party's annual Lincoln Day Dinner on Saturday was heavy on foreign policy, promising to be a tough hand on national security if elected.

He took an implicit shot at libertarian-leaning Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul, an already-announced presidential candidate with whom he's often sparred. In his speech, Paul decried the NSA wiretapping programs designed to stop terrorist attacks.

But in his folksy manner, Graham took a firm shot while also mixing humor.

"If I'm president of the United States and you're thinking about joining al-Qaida or ISIL — anybody thinking about that?" he asked to laughs. "I'm not gonna call a judge. I'm gonna call a drone and we're gonna kill you."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It was Graham's largest appearance before Iowans so far, and he told NPR in an interview ahead of his speech that he knows he'll have to work to introduce himself to voters, despite his long tenure in politics. He was elected to the House in the 1994 GOP revolution and succeeded GOP Sen. Strom Thurmond to the Senate in 2002.

He also acknowledged that he'll have some work to do with some GOP voters, who know him as an ally of 2008 Republican presidential nominee, Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., and one of the principal architects of the Senate's bipartisan immigration reform bill.

"I've got people who are fans ... I've got people who are critics ... and I've got people who say 'I think I know him but I really don't know him,' " he told NPR.

Graham says he worries that the debate in the GOP primaries will pull the party too far to the right. He says he wants a real debate on immigration, saying reforms are necessary for the economy and for national security. He added that GOP hard-liners on the issue hurt the party's chances of ever winning Hispanic votes.

"I worry that we'll marginalize ourselves once again with the fastest growing community in America, the Hispanic community," he said.

Graham also defended both former President George W. Bush and Jeb Bush — a likely opponent of his in the 2016 GOP race. Last week the former Florida governor gave a series of sometimes conflicting answers as to whether he supported his brother's decision to launch the war.

"When it comes to blaming people about Iraq, the person I blame is Barack Obama and not George W. Bush," Graham thundered.

The South Carolina senator is taking lessons from McCain, his closest friend in the Senate, in his own all-but-certain bid, and he told NPR he learned from McCain's primary victory eight years ago that anything can happen in a White House race, particularly one that's shaping up to be as large as this year's field.

"Because you're the front-runner doesn't mean you're gonna stay the front-runner. Because you're fifth in a four-person race, doesn't mean you're out of it," he said. "I've learned never give up. Have a message. Stick to it, and be yourself."

Part of that authenticity is telling voters about the hard road that brought him to the Senate. He touched on his back story in his Lincoln dinner speech — how his mother died when he was 21 from Hodgkin's disease, his father passed just months later, and he was left to care for his younger sister.

"The bills wiped us out because we were underinsured. So I don't need a lecture from Democrats about health care. Fifteen months later my dad died. I'm 22, my sister is 14. My world came to an end upside down. If it wasn't for family, friends and faith I wouldn't be standing here today," said Graham.

Graham alternated between serious and humorous throughout his speech, which was one of the best received of the evening. Barely a minute into it, he told the crowd that he's an attorney — including for the military where he still serves in the Air Force Reserve. Then he joked about his first client as a young lawyer in a divorce case.

"He asked me a question I didn't know the answer to. He said, if we get divorced are my wife and I still cousins," he said, laughing as the crowd howled. "The answer is yes in South Carolina ... I don't know about Iowa."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The off-beat humor went over well with the crowd, though. His hospitality suite after the event was one of the most-trafficked of the night, with Iowans who knew little about Graham previously lining up to meet the senator. He gladly stood by for photos and to chat, pushing cookies and drinks on visitors.

Iowa Clinic CEO Ed Brown was one of the Republicans who knew only about Graham from his frequent TV appearances, but walked away heavily impressed.

"He brought a little bit of levity at the right time, in the course of the evening, and frankly he hit a lot of issues right on point," said Brown.

John Chesser, a lawyer in Des Moines, also said he was blown away, and given Graham's experience in the Senate and the military, he would make a good president.

"He seems like a real human being, He was very natural ,and he had a grasp of issues. He went from being funny, but at the same time when it was time to be serious, he was serious."

Graham is fine with being serious on the trail, but he's also going to enjoy the ride.

"I'm having a blast," he said, laughing at the end of his interview with NPR.

Bobby Jindal forming exploratory committee for White House run // Politico // Jonathan Topaz - May 18, 2015

Bobby Jindal announced Monday that he’s forming a presidential exploratory committee for a potential run for the 2016 Republican nomination.

The Louisiana governor, a fierce social conservative who has been active in the early nominating states, will make a decision after the state’s legislative session ends on June 11.

“For some time now, my wife Supriya and I have been thinking and praying about whether to run for the presidency of our great nation. We’ll make a final decision in June,” Jindal said in a statement sent to reporters.

“While other Republican leaders are talking about change, I’ve published detailed plans to repeal and replace Obamacare, rebuild America’s defenses, make America energy independent, and reform education for our nation’s children,” Jindal added, in a jab at his potential opponents in a crowded GOP field.

Jindal was one of eleven candidates to visit Iowa this weekend for the state Republican Party’s Lincoln dinner. The governor, dealing with low approval numbers back home, would be a long shot to win the nomination, but is popular among social conservatives and evangelical voters in Iowa.

Connecting the Dots Behind the 2016 Candidates // NYT // Gregor Aisch and Karen Yourish - May 17, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Presidential candidates change, but the people who run the campaigns often remain the same. Here is how the teams behind some likely and announced candidates are connected to previous campaigns, administrations and organizations close to the possible nominees.

Hillary Rodham Clinton

Mrs. Clinton is relying on a mix of Clinton loyalists, seasoned Obama operatives and other key strategists to modernize and force discipline on her campaign (in other words, to avoid many of the mistakes of her 2008 primary race). At the top are John D. Podesta, a Clintonite with strong ties to President Obama; Robby Mook, known for his no-drama approach to managing Virginia Gov. Terry McAuliffe's 2013 campaign; and Huma Abedin, Mrs. Clinton's longtime aide. Campaign veterans loyal to Mr. Obama and Mrs. Clinton are running Priorities USA Action, the super PAC supporting Mrs. Clinton, which operates outside the official campaign.

Jeb Bush

The former Florida governor is building a sizable political operation in anticipation of a likely campaign announcement. His team includes longtime advisers, key operatives from Mitt Romney's presidential races, and a few veterans of George W. Bush's campaigns. Sally Bradshaw and Mike Murphy form the core of Jeb Bush's inner circle. Ms. Bradshaw and David Kochel are expected to head the campaign, and Mr. Murphy will oversee Right to Rise, the pro-Bush super PAC.

Ted Cruz

The Texas freshman firebrand senator has recruited several operatives with ties to conservative politicians and former presidential contenders, as well as a handful of Senate aides. Jason Johnson, the architect of Mr. Cruz's 2012 Senate victory; Jeff Roe, a strategist known for his aggressive tactics; and Chad Sweet, a former investment banker, are in charge of Mr. Cruz's campaign effort. Dathan Voelter, an Austin lawyer and friend of Mr. Cruz, is treasurer of three of the four super PACs supporting the senator.

Rand Paul

The libertarian-leaning junior senator from Kentucky is trying to shape his own political identity. Most of the influential members of his team have little or no connection to his father, Ron Paul, a former Texas congressman who twice sought the Republican presidential nomination. Doug Stafford is the senator's closest political adviser. The campaign manager, Chip Englander, ran Illinois Gov. Bruce Rauner's 2014 campaign. Vincent Harris, a GOP digital star, was poached from Ted Cruz's camp. And strategists Mike Biundo and John Yob learned the arcane world of delegate math while working for Rick Santorum in 2012. Advisers with connections to both Pauls are running America's Liberty PAC, the super PAC supporting Rand's campaign.

Marco Rubio

Mr. Rubio's inner circle includes several strategists with strong ties to early primary states and the Bush family. Terry Sullivan headed Mitt Romney's 2008 primary in South Carolina, and Heath Thompson and J. Warren Tompkins helped George W. Bush win the state's 2000 primary. Jim Merrill directed both of Mr. Romney's New Hampshire primaries. And Todd Harris, who was the chief spokesman for the 2002 re-election campaign of Jeb Bush, is familiar with Iowa after serving as a news media consultant for Joni Ernst, the state's newly elected senator.

Scott Walker

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mr. Walker, the governor of Wisconsin, who has not officially announced his candidacy, is supported by people who helped him win three statewide elections, as well as a crew of national strategists. His campaign-in-waiting is housed in Our American Revival, a 527 group that can accept unlimited donations. Rick Wiley, the executive director of the group, is expected to be Mr. Walker's campaign manager. Two advisers who have been with the governor since his first gubernatorial bid are running Unintimidated, the super PAC supporting Mr. Walker.

TOP NEWS

DOMESTIC

Obama to Limit Military-Style Equipment for Police Forces // NYT // Julie Hirschfeld Davis - May 18, 2015

WASHINGTON — President Obama on Monday will ban the federal provision of some types of military-style equipment to local police departments and sharply restrict the availability of others, administration officials said.

The ban is part of Mr. Obama's push to ease tensions between law enforcement and minority communities in reaction to the crises in Baltimore; Ferguson, Mo.; and other cities.

He is taking the action after a task force he created in January decided that police departments should be barred from using federal funds to acquire items that include tracked armored vehicles, the highest-caliber firearms and ammunition, and camouflage uniforms. The ban is part of a series of steps the president has made to try to build trust between law enforcement organizations and the citizens they are charged with protecting.

Mr. Obama planned to promote the effort on Monday during a visit to Camden, N.J. The city, racked by poverty and crime, has become a national model for better relations between the police and citizens after replacing its beleaguered police force with a county-run system that prioritizes community ties.

Mr. Obama is expected to hold up Camden as a counterpoint to places like Ferguson, where the killing of a young black man by a white police officer last summer and the violent protests that followed exposed long-simmering hostility between law enforcement agencies and minorities in cities around the country.

The trip and the action on military-style equipment are to coincide with the release on Monday of a report from a policing task force that Mr. Obama formed late last year in response to the crisis in Ferguson. The 116-page report calls for law enforcement agencies to "embrace a guardian — rather than a warrior — mind-set to build trust and legitimacy both within agencies and with the public." It contains dozens of recommendations for agencies throughout the country.

"We are, without a doubt, sitting at a defining moment in American policing," Ronald L. Davis, the director of the Office of Community Oriented Policing Services at the Department of Justice, told reporters in a conference call organized by the White House. "We have a unique opportunity to redefine policing in our democracy, to ensure that public safety becomes more than the absence of crime, but it must also include a presence for justice."

After the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, the federal government sharply expanded its efforts to provide police departments with automatic weapons, armored vehicles and other military-style gear through grant programs at the Homeland Security and Justice Departments and transfers from the Defense Department. The programs have enjoyed widespread popularity among lawmakers eager to take steps to protect their communities and constantly in search of ways to steer federal money to their districts and states.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The report from the task force on military equipment cited the police response to the Ferguson unrest as an example of how the "militarization" of police departments can lead to fear and mistrust. In addition to prohibiting some equipment outright, officials said, Mr. Obama accepted the group's recommendation to impose new restrictions on other military-style items, such as wheeled armored vehicles, pyrotechnics, battering rams and riot gear, and more stringent requirements for training and information collection for departments that acquire them.

"The idea is to make sure that we strike a balance in providing the equipment, which is appropriate and useful and important for local law enforcement agencies to keep the community safe, while at the same time putting standards in place," said Cecilia Muñoz, the director of Mr. Obama's Domestic Policy Council.

The report to be released on Monday represents a two-pronged response to a problem that has emerged as a central predicament for Mr. Obama in recent months. He has struggled to acknowledge the sense of fear, grievance and victimization by the police that dominates many minority communities without seeming to forgive violence or condemn law enforcement with a broad brush.

In doing so, he is grappling with the limits of his power to force changes in police departments around the country, where practices and procedures are varied and the federal government's ability to influence change can be minimal. The equipment task force stems from an executive order, and its conclusions affect only the material supplied by the federal government, while the policing recommendations are merely a blueprint for what Mr. Obama would like to see happen in jurisdictions throughout the country.

Mr. Obama on Monday will announce $163 million in grants to encourage police departments to adopt the suggestions. The administration also will launch a "tool kit" for the use of body-worn cameras; the Justice Department created a grant program for law enforcement agencies to purchase them.

Ms. Muñoz said the task force's report was "not just a blueprint for us and for local law enforcement agencies, but also for community leaders and others and stakeholders," giving them "some very specific things to be asking for and, frankly, insisting on in order to improve policing practices."

That is why Mr. Obama made plans to visit Camden, where he wants to highlight a policing model that emphasizes a collaborative approach. Camden is also one of 20 cities participating in a new White House initiative to enhance the use of police data, by releasing detailed information on such things as traffic stops, officer-involved shootings and the use of force.

Obama foundation brings in $5.4 million // Politico // Josh Gerstein - May 18, 2015

The foundation set up to raise money for President Barack Obama's presidential library in Chicago brought in $5.4 million in donations and pledges during its first year in operation, according to a tax form made public Monday.

Obama's foundation has not announced a specific fundraising goal, but it is expected to seek to raise in excess of $500 million to build the library. They money will funding an endowment to be turned over to the federal government along with the facility, and money for the foundation's educational and charitable work.

The foundation's largest donor in its first year was Chicago publisher Fred Eychaner, who ponied up $1 million. The next largest was a $666,666 donation from Chicago hedge fund operator Michael Sacks and his wife Cari.

The Joyce Foundation was listed as contributing $1 million, but a detailed accountant's report and a statement from a foundation official said that amount was a pledge disclosed for tax purposes and only one-third of the money was actually transferred in 2014.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The exact donation amounts were reported in a portion of the tax form the foundation is not required to make public, but posted on its website Monday afternoon.

The foundation's largest expenses in its first year in operation were lease payments to Jones Lang Lasalle Midwest for $615,523 and veteran Obama fundraiser Julianna Smoot's firm Smoot Tewes Group for $476,551.

Documents obtained separately by POLITICO Monday show the foundation agreed to pay Smoot's firm an escalating monthly fee over the next six years — ranging from $18,000 a month in the last half of 2014 to $30,000 a month in 2020.

The foundation also handed over to Smoot's firm a "lump sum engagement bonus" of $144,000 and agreed to consider bonuses of up to $100,000 last year and this year, with a possibility of up to $250,000 a year by 2020, the agreement shows.

The agreement doesn't detail a fundraising target overall or year-by-year but says the organization is seeking to raise $6 million per year from sources in Illinois.

Last week, Obama and his wife library announced that the library will be built in Chicago, although two separate sites on the Windy City's south side remain in play for the facility.

"All the strands of my life came together, and I really became a man, when I moved to Chicago," Barack Obama said in a web video. "We'll be able to now give something back and bring the world back home after this incredible journey."

The library will operate in cooperation with the University of Chicago and the University of Illinois, foundation officials said.

The foundation turned down bids from Hawaii and New York City to build the library, but announced plans for a presence in both places, including a partnership with Columbia University — Obama's undergraduate alma mater.

By comparison, the Clinton Foundation - the charity linked to former president Bill Clinton and his wife, Hillary - took in just over $3 million in donations in 1998, its first year of operations. It also brought in $3.1 million the following year.

The Obama Foundation voluntarily discloses its donors each quarter, providing broad ranges in which each donor contributed. As a result, it was known in January that the foundation raised between about $3 million and $6.2 million in 2014, although a precise total was not released at that time.

Obama served on the board of the Joyce Foundation from the summer of 1994 through 2002, earning more than $70,000 in directors fees. He remained on the board as he served in the Illinois State Senate, and at one point he considered leaving politics to become the group's full-time president, he later acknowledged. Instead, he stepped down from the board as he was gearing up for his 2004 U.S. Senate bid.

Feds Project Lake Mead Below Drought Trigger Point in 2017 // ABC News // Ken Ritter, Associated Press - May 18, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Federal water managers released a report Monday projecting that Lake Mead's water levels will fall below a point in January 2017 that would force supply cuts to Arizona and Nevada.

The effects could be serious. Arizona's allocation of Colorado River water could be cut 11.4 percent, or by an amount normally used by more than 600,000 homes. Nevada's share could be reduced 4.3 percent. Think 26,000 homes.

But officials heading water agencies in the two states and California took a wait-and-see approach to the projections posted by the U.S. Bureau of Reclamation.

They pointed to fluctuations in precipitation levels just since January. They added that more will be known in August when the bureau knows how much runoff in the upper-basin states of Colorado, New Mexico, Utah and Wyoming reaches the Lake Powell reservoir.

That will determine how much water the agency controlling a Colorado River water system crucial to about 40 million residents in seven Southwest U.S. states will release from Lake Powell through the Grand Canyon to Lake Mead near Las Vegas.

"A lot is going to depend on precipitation and flows from the tributaries," said David Modeer, general manager of the Central Arizona Project, the main water agency in the lower-basin state that would be affected the most.

"We don't think it means a whole lot right now because we have another couple of months to determine the release out of Lake Powell," he said.

The so-called interim guidelines issued Monday by the Bureau of Reclamation predict water levels will be just 2 feet above a key trigger point next January on Lake Mead, the reservoir behind Hoover Dam.

The lake was 37 percent full on Monday, said Dan Bunk, the Bureau of Reclamation's water operations manager. Its water surface level of 1,077 above sea level was 2 feet above the crucial 1,075-foot line.

The so-called interim guidelines chart a wobbly series of historically low water levels at Lake Mead — dropping to as much as 1,054 feet next summer and 1,052 feet in April 2017. But it would be about 1,077 this coming January, the point in time when a declaration of water shortage for 2016 would be made.

Lake Powell, behind the Glen Canyon Dam straddling the Utah-Arizona border, was 45 percent full on Monday. Bunk said that if Powell remains above its own trigger point, water releases to Lake Mead could remain robust and Lake Mead could remain above 1,070 feet through 2016.

"We haven't made any shortage projection. That would be done in August 2016," Bunk said.

Lake Mead reached its high-water capacity in 1983 at 1,225 feet. It reaches so-called "dead pool" at just under 900 feet, meaning nothing would flow downstream from Hoover Dam.

Las Vegas and its 2 million residents and 40 million tourists a year get almost all their drinking water from Lake Mead.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

John Entsminger, general manager of the regional Southern Nevada Water Authority, said he believed conservation efforts like those now being adopted in California have put Las Vegas in a position to handle any initial shortage reductions "without significant impact."

"There is no doubt that this drought is serious," he said, "and the projections from the Bureau of Reclamation continue to reaffirm that reality."

William Hasencamp, Colorado River resources chief for the Metropolitan Water District of Southern California, said he saw reason to prepare, not panic.

Drought-stricken California will continue to be able to draw its 4.4 million acre-foot allocation of Colorado River water even if Arizona and Nevada are affected.

"But we lose flexibility, which is a pretty big deal because we serve just under 19 million people," Hasencamp said. "We know a shortage is coming at some point."

INTERNATIONAL

Kerry, in Seoul, slams North Korea // WaPo // Carol Morello - May 18, 2015

SEOUL — Secretary of State John F. Kerry on Monday accused North Korea's government of committing crimes worthy of referral to the International Criminal Court and urged it to end its isolation by dismantling its arsenal of nuclear weapons.

Using strong language, Kerry said during a stop in Seoul that the Pyongyang government led by Kim Jong Un had shown a "flagrant disregard for international law while denying its people fundamental freedom and rights."

"The world is hearing increasingly more and more stories of grotesque, grisly, horrendous public displays of executions on a whim and a fancy by the leader against people who were close to him and sometimes for the most flimsy of excuses," he said, referring to a report from South Korea's spy agency that the North Korean defense minister was publicly executed with an antiaircraft gun after he fell asleep during a meeting led by Kim.

Kerry vowed to speak out against "North Korea's atrocities against its own people" and warned that Kim's mercurial behavior is likely to lead other nations to press for charges against North Korea and its leader at the International Criminal Court in The Hague.

Kerry's visit, though planned weeks ago, comes in the wake of fresh concern about Pyongyang's behavior.

Earlier this month, North Korea fired what it claimed was a ballistic missile from a submarine, though some analysts doubt that anything more lethal than a balloon was shot into the air.

Kerry's Seoul stop was designed to underline the United States' "ironclad" commitment to South Korea's security and to ramp up pressure on Pyongyang to return to denuclearization talks it abandoned three years ago.

Since then, Kerry said, North Korea had rebuffed overtures from the United States, Russia, Japan and China to return to the negotiating table and instead is showing greater belligerence.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“They have grown the threat of their program and have acted with a kind of reckless abandon,” he said at a news conference alongside South Korean Foreign Minister Yun Byung-se.

Kerry said he hoped the negotiations over curbing Iran’s nuclear program, now entering their final stretch, could serve as a model for North Korea to follow if the hermit kingdom wanted to end its isolation.

“We are more determined than ever to find ways to convince Kim Jong Un and North Korea that all they are doing now is isolating themselves further and creating greater risks to the region and to their own country,” he said.

He, however, added a caveat: “We have to have some indication from the leader of North Korea that they’re serious about engaging on the subject of their nuclear program.”

At the news conference, Kerry also expressed gratitude to South Korea for the care and concern shown to U.S. Ambassador Mark Lippert recently when he was attacked in central Seoul by a suspected North Korea sympathizer and required hospitalization. Lippert, with bandages still on his cheek and left hand from injuries he suffered in the attack, has accompanied Kerry to the meetings and joined him for lunch at a Seoul taco place run by Koreans who had lived in the United States.

“I want to take the opportunity to thank all the people of South Korea for the remarkable outpouring of concern about his health and their affection for him and for our country,” Kerry said.

He also said that the Islamic State militant group’s capture of Ramadi in Iraq, although a setback, would prove temporary.

“Notice what they’ve done,” he said. “Huge numbers of vehicle-born IEDs, big trucks, massive explosions. They’ve destroyed the place. That’s hardly a future. I’m convinced, as forces are redeployed and days flow in weeks ahead, that’s going to change.”

Kerry blamed the end of a five-day cease-fire in Yemen, where Saudi-led airstrikes resumed after the truce expired Sunday night, on Shiite Houthi rebels. He said that they had taken advantage of the pause in fighting to move missile launchers to the border with Saudi Arabia and that the Saudis acted to take them out.

“Under the rules of engagement, it was always understood if there were proactive moves by one side or another, it would be in violation of the cease-fire agreement,” he said. “Saudi Arabia, under the rules of engagement, took action to take out the missile launchers.”

In a speech later in the day at Korea University, an elite school with a cyber law center, Kerry said everyone in the world should have the right to Internet access. He condemned repressive governments that silence critics by restricting Web access and singled out North Korea as the polar opposite of South Korea, one of the most wired countries on the planet.

“It is no coincidence many governments that have a poor record on Internet freedom also have a questionable commitment to human rights,” he said.

Bombing and clashes resume as Yemen heads for ‘catastrophe’ // WaPo // Ali al-Mujahed and Erin Cunningham - May 18, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

ANAA, Yemen — Warplanes from a Saudi-led coalition struck targets in Yemen on Monday and ground clashes resumed, bringing a sharp end to a five-day cease-fire in the conflict and raising fears that a humanitarian disaster would deepen.

More than 1,600 people have been killed in the war between the Houthi rebels and supporters of the country's ousted president, who are backed by the Saudi-led military alliance. The five-day "pause" was intended to allow aid to reach Yemenis suffering from dangerous shortages of medicine, fuel and food. But many Yemenis complained Monday that supplies had not reached their areas.

"Now we are at the edge of a big catastrophe" in the humanitarian situation, said Cédric Schweizer, who headed the International Committee of the Red Cross delegation in Yemen until last week.

The temporary cease-fire was "a good first step, but it will not solve the humanitarian crisis," Schweizer said in an interview with Washington Post reporters in Washington.

"All hospitals are lacking basic medicines now," he added. Yemenis are running out of money to buy ever-more-expensive food, he said.

U.N. and U.S. officials had hoped the cease-fire would be extended. But on Monday, airstrikes hit several locations in the southern city of Aden, as well as in the Houthi-dominated Saada province near the Saudi border, local media reported. Houthis and their opponents clashed in the city of Taiz and other areas.

Saudi Arabia launched the airstrikes in March in a bid to push Houthi fighters, who are Shiite, from territory that they seized in recent months. Saudi officials have said they want to restore to power Yemeni President Abed Rabbo Mansour Hadi, who has fled the country. They have accused Iran of backing the Houthi militias.

Local media reported multiple raids Monday on the airport in Aden, which would jeopardize plans to bring in aid on humanitarian flights to the city.

The Saudi-led coalition has imposed an air, land and sea blockade on Yemen, according to aid groups. International aid agencies scrambled to move assistance into Yemen during the five-day cease-fire that took hold May 12.

"Everything you can imagine is needed: drinking water, shelter, food, medicine," said Mohammed Abu Asaker, a communications officer with the U.N. refugee agency who is based in the United Arab Emirates. "The situation there is extremely dire."

Purnima Kashyap, the World Food Program's Yemen country director, said that the agency's first goal was to get fuel to trucks to transport aid to the agency's warehouses, scattered across the country and which would be hubs of further distribution.

In Sanaa, Yemen's capital, a small amount of gasoline became available, but residents had to wait in lengthy lines to get it.

Ridwan Mohammed, a 40-year-old employee at a pharmaceutical company, said he had waited in line for two days for gas.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Now that the cease-fire is over, I feel more tense,” he said. “I am worried that an airstrike could happen at any time. And I am out here waiting.”

OPINIONS/EDITORIALS/BLOGS

Christine Quinn on Hillary Clinton & Marriage Equality // Out // Christine Quinn - May 18, 2015

Today, we have a woman running for President of the United States who fully supports marriage equality. She is also likely to be the only nominee running for president that does. That is something all Americans should be thrilled about. Her position is clear and rock solid, and they way she came to that conclusion is the same way most people do, including some of my own family members. Like most Americans, her position is one that evolved and developed from personal interactions with LGBT Americans and their families, and through a long and deep soul searching. I know a little bit about this process: It's how my father came to support my right to marry and then eventually walk me down the aisle when I married my wife.

I first met Hillary when she was running for U.S. Senate. At that time, same-sex marriage didn't have nearly the public support it has today. As a community, we still had a great deal of work to do. Like it was yesterday, I remember a small meeting of LGBT leaders in Jeff Soreff's apartment with the then-First Lady. The goal of the meeting was for the leaders to better understand her positions on LGBT issues and to push her to take up more pro LGBT positions and champion more LGBT issues. The meeting was noteworthy and remarkable for a number of reasons. It was not a large meeting. It was intimate and informal and people were very frank in their dialogue — as was Hillary. She spoke in a deeply personal way about a gay couple that profoundly opened her eyes and her mind regarding LGBT families. There were two men who moved into the house next to her parents' home in Arkansas and became surrogate sons, helping care for her father when he was dying.

Of course, Hillary has written about this couple in her book. But to hear it in her owns words so long ago and to see the look in her eyes as she described her love and respect for this couple spoke volumes about what she had learned — that families were defined by love and selflessness not sexual orientation. As I have seen Hillary’s work with the LGBT community grow, I have often seen her go back to what she learned from that couple as a guide.

Much has been made of Hillary’s support of marriage with some claiming it is a poll-driven position. The fact is she came to this position the same way most Americans did, through conversations with those of us in the community, by getting to know people who were deeply committed and in love with one another, and by recognizing that every couple in American has just as much right to happiness as the next person, regardless of sexual orientation.

While the movement toward equality in the LGBT community has moved rapidly over these last few years, we have never had a major party candidate on the ballot for president of the United States who was willing to state so unequivocally her support for marriage equality, long before any votes were cast or elections were won. When Hillary Clinton receives the Democratic nomination, she will not only be the first woman to receive a major party nomination for president of the United States, she will be the first major party nominee to publicly articulate that position before she assumes office. And as a gay American, who has fought for women’s rights and LGBT rights my entire life, I couldn’t be more proud.

Why is Hillary Clinton Tacking Left? // National Journal // Ron Fournier - May 18, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton 2.0 is far more liberal than the centrist who ran in 2008 because: a) her views have evolved with time; b) she's long been a closet liberal and this is her authentic self; c) she's an opportunistic phony.

As somebody who has known and observed this complex public figure for nearly 30 years, I am open to being convinced that any one of those rationales are true.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But not all three.

For some inexplicable reason, her advisers are talking openly with reporters about the political rational behind her policy shift (aka: flip-flops), giving credence to the most cynical interpretation of her motives. "Advisers do not dispute that Clinton has a finger to the wind of the national mood," writes my former colleague Anne Gearan in the Washington Post, "but they insist her positions are not driven by polling."

Gearan could have put a period after "mood." The rest of the sentence is patently false. How do I know? I read the rest of her story, which had the full cooperation of Clinton's political network and included this extraordinary paragraph:

Clinton's advisers want us to believe that her liberal shift is equally the result of politics and principle – that deep inside their crosstabs resides, conveniently, "the real Hillary."

"Her approach to this really is not trying to take a ruler out and measure where she wants to be on some ideological scale," Clinton campaign chairman John Podesta told Gearan. "It's to dive deeply into the problems facing the American people and American families. She's a proud wonk, and she looks at policy from that perspective."

I can attest to the fact that Clinton is a wonk. She loves the nitty-gritty of policy, particularly those policies that influence the lives of women and children.

I can also confirm that the former first lady is ideologically more liberal than her husband. Bill Clinton's advisers in Arkansas and at the White House constantly complained about the friction between his triangulation and her absolutism.

And, like most voters, I'm willing to give any politician some leeway to "evolve" on issues, particularly one like gay marriage that has rapidly gained acceptance in the public square.

But is she really this progressive?

"Clinton's full embrace of same-sex marriage in the first days of her campaign was followed by clear statements in favor of scrapping get-tough immigration and incarceration policies — many of which took root during her husband's administration," Gearan writes.

She has also weighed in with liberal takes on climate change, abortion rights and disparities in income and opportunity between rich and poor.

All are issues that have been divisive in the past for both Democrats and Republicans. But none are now judged to be radioactive for Democrats, which gives Clinton more elbow room.

By taking such positions, aides and advisers hope Clinton will not only inoculate herself against a serious challenge from the left in the primaries, but that she also will be able to push on through the general election. Her campaign believes American public opinion has moved left not only since Bill Clinton won election in 1992 on a centrist platform, but also since Barack Obama won on a more liberal one.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Indeed, polls show that while the United States remains a center-right country, liberals are on the ascent. Whether or not Clinton strategists are betting too heavily on this trend won't be known until November 2016.

Even after all these years, I don't know whether her full-throated liberalism is a genuine reflection of her views or an echo of the polls. I guess the answer could be "both," but I doubt it. That just seems to be too neat of a coincidence.

I suspect she'll try to explain herself, but when? She's refuses to talk to the media in any great detail.

I suppose voters could take her at her word, but why? Trust is an issue. Legitimate questions about her government email and family foundation were met with disingenuous responses.

I imagine she can get over the authenticity hurdle, but how?

If you don't want to deal with reporters, don't run for president.

You won't believe Hillary Clinton's spin on avoiding the press // WaPo // Chris Cillizza – May 18, 2015

With Hillary Clinton rapidly approaching a month since she answered a question from a reporter, her allies are working to push back on the idea that she is ducking the press.

"PUTTING THE VOTERS FIRST, HILLARY ASKS THE QUESTIONS THAT REALLY MATTER," read the subject line of an e-mail -- ALL CAPS in the original! -- that arrived in my inbox this morning courtesy of Correct The Record, a pro-Clinton super PAC directly coordinating with the presidential campaign on rapid response.

The missive lays out the facts aimed at putting lie to the "she won't answer questions" narrative.

First, Correct The Record notes that Clinton has answered 20 questions from "everyday Americans": seven during her first trip to Iowa (she's back in the state today), five during her New Hampshire excursion and a whopping eight when she visited Nevada.

Then the group notes that Clinton has ASKED 117 questions of "everyday Americans." And, yes, it lists every one of those questions -- from "Give me a sense of your experience with that?" (Iowa) to "Do you want to share your story?" (Nevada).

I mean, where to start with this?

1. The vast majority of the people who have asked Clinton questions in Iowa, New Hampshire and Nevada were part of a pre-selected group who sat with her around a roundtable. That's not exactly like hosting a town hall event in which none of the questions are pre-screened. And if you look at the questions "regular" people are asking Clinton, they are not exactly the most probing of queries. A sampling: "I'm just wondering, what can you do to bring that heart back to education in the United States?" (Iowa), "What are your plans to help my community and help us not live in fear anymore?" (Nevada) and "I would like you to elaborate on what you think you might do for childcare in the future if you're elected?" (New Hampshire) None of those questions are bad, per se, but they also aren't pushing Clinton in any way, shape or form on any issue.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

2. It makes zero difference how many questions Clinton has asked average Americans. Like, none. If those people were running for president, then I would be super-interested to know how they responded to some (or maybe all) of Clinton's 117 questions. But, they aren't. She is. Citing the number of questions Clinton has asked of people to rebut the idea that she isn't taking enough (or any) questions from reporters is sort of like saying you aced a job interview because you answered every question asked of you with another question. That wouldn't make sense, would it?

3. At issue here is that Clinton is avoiding taking questions from reporters. And nowhere in the Correct The Record memo does it have anything to dispute that fact. In total as a candidate, Clinton has answered 13 total questions from reporters. It's been 39,000 minutes since she last answered a reporter's question. And, while I think it is absolutely of value for Clinton to hear from regular folks about their concerns and hopes, it's hard to argue from the list put together by Correct The Record that the questions those people have asked Clinton are the same as the one reporters would have if given the chance.

No, they're better, you say! They're about policy and not dumb reporters' obsessions, you say!

To all of which, I respond: Do you not think it is of value to know how Hillary Clinton spent her time since leaving the State Department? And how the Clinton Foundation handled its business with various donors who would, undoubtedly, still be in the picture if she was elected president? Or what she thinks of the Trans-Pacific Partnership and the fight currently happening in Congress? Or Iran? Or the Middle East?

You get the idea. The role of the media in this process is to show voters who these people are, really, and to explain how these people would govern the country if elected. Like the media or not, that's a very important role -- and one that is essential to a functioning democracy.

So, no matter how many Iowans' questions Hillary answers or how many questions she asks them, it doesn't justify her current unwillingness to stand before reporters (or even a single reporter) and take their questions. Not even a little.

--
Alexandria Phillips
Communications | Press Assistant
Hillary for America
https://www.hillaryclinton.com

--
You received this message because you are subscribed to the Google Groups "HRCRapid" group.
To unsubscribe from this group and stop receiving emails from it, send an email to hrcrapid+unsubscribe@googlegroups.com .
To post to this group, send email to hrcrapid@googlegroups.com .
For more options, visit https://groups.google.com/d/optout .

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Burns Strider" <burns.strider@americanbridge.org>
To: CTRFriendsFamily <CTRFriendsFamily@americanbridge.org>
Date: 1/27/2015 1:29:39 AM
Subject: Correct The Record Tuesday January 27, 2015 Morning Roundup

Correct The Record Tuesday January 27, 2015 Morning Roundup:

Articles:

MSNBC: "In Iowa, GOP women take aim at Hillary"

"For their part, Clinton allies say the attacks are a sign Republicans may feel threatened. 'Republicans are rattled by the energy and excitement shown by Americans across the country for Hillary Clinton's potential candidacy and her vision for our future,' communications director Adrienne Elrod of Correct The Record said in statement. 'It is clear Republicans have nothing of substance to say and that they'd like nothing more than to distract from the GOP's disunity.'"

The Hill: "Pelosi: With Hillary Clinton, Democrats can win the House"

"Rep. Nancy Pelosi says Democrats can recapture control of the House in 2016 by riding Hillary Clinton's coattails."

Politico: "Democrats criticize GOP handling of Benghazi committee"

"The issue is expected to come to a head on Tuesday during a hearing reviewing the committee's outstanding document requests where Neal Higgins, the CIA's director of congressional affairs, and Joel Rubin, deputy assistant secretary of state for legislative affairs, will testify."

Mother Jones: "Democrats Accuse Republicans of a Benghazi Cover-Up"

[Subtitle:] "And they say GOPers on the Benghazi committee are holding secret meetings with witnesses."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Politico: IT'S ON! Hillary Clinton rival ramps up in Iowa

"And Jake Oeth, who until recently served as political director to former Rep. Bruce Braley's failed Iowa Senate campaign, was brought on board as a consultant to O'Malley's O'Say Can You See PAC after the November midterm elections."

New York Times: "Koch Brothers' Budget of $889 Million for 2016 Is on Par With Both Parties' Spending"

"Allies of Hillary Rodham Clinton, who appears to be preparing for a likely presidential campaign in 2016, expect that she will need to bring in more money than President Obama, the most successful fund-raiser in presidential history, and a 'super PAC' supporting her is seeking to raise as much as $300 million in the coming months."

Los Angeles Times column: Robin Abcarian: "Hey, GOP: Using Carly Fiorina to attack Hillary Clinton could backfire"

"If Fiorina plans to use her business record to bash Clinton, let alone as a rationale for a presidential campaign, expect to hear more about her stormy tenure at Hewlett-Packard."

The Hill: "Sanders heading to Iowa, NH"

"Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) is heading to a pair of key early-primary states as he ramps up consideration of a potential presidential run."

Articles:

MSNBC: "In Iowa, GOP women take aim at Hillary"

By Anna Brand

January 26, 2015, 12:10 p.m. EST

At Saturday's Iowa Freedom Summit, the men in the ever-widening pool of potential 2016 GOP presidential candidates used their speeches to call for the best ways to crush Obamacare and immigration reform. But the women focused on one target: the likely 2016 Democratic standard bearer, Hillary Clinton.

Former Hewlett-Packard CEO Carly Fiorina, though relatively unknown in a field of thunderous voices, is actively exploring a 2016 run – and in Iowa she made it clear she'd be running as the anti-Hillary.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Like Hillary Clinton, I too, have traveled hundreds of thousands of miles around the globe," Fiorina said of the former secretary of state, drawing cheers. "But unlike her, I have actually accomplished something. Mrs. Clinton, flying is an activity not an accomplishment."

Only six of 24 speakers at the event were women – and none of them have made waves as big as their male counterparts like Texas Sen. Ted Cruz and New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie. (Missing from the event were notable 2016ers former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush and former presidential candidate Mitt Romney.)

Fiorina lost the only political campaign she's run so far when she challenged Democratic Sen. Barbara Boxer of California in 2010. But she made headlines last summer when she launched a Super PAC, Unlocking Potential Project, aimed at teaching her male Republican counterparts how best to speak to women.

But in her speech at Iowa's crowded Hoyt Sherman Place, it wasn't about raising women, it was about tearing one woman down.

Sneaking Benghazi into her address (another topic glazed over by the male candidates who took the stage) Fiorina said: "Unlike Hillary Clinton, I know what difference it makes that our ambassador to Libya and three other brave Americans were killed in a deliberate terrorist attack on the anniversary of 9/11."

Sarah Palin joined Fiorina in the Hillary-hating. The 2008 Republican vice presidential candidate, who recently said that she's "seriously interested" in running for president in 2016, delivered a bizarre and often incoherent speech, but one aspect was clear: she's got her sights on Hillary.

"I'm ready for Hillary, are you? Are you coming?" Palin said, raising a Time magazine from last year with a headline "Can Anyone Stop Hillary."

Palin said she doesn't feel there's a rush to make a decision about 2016. Fiorina might have an opinion about whether Palin runs too, whether they compete for the party's 2016 nomination or not. Back in 2008 as one of John McCain's economic advisers, Fiorina said that Palin, McCain's VP pick, would not be qualified to be CEO of a corporation like Hewlett-Packard. She tried to salvage her comments on msnbc.

Longtime Republican pollster Kellyanne Conway also dug into Hillary Clinton at the Freedom Summit. "Don't worry about being called mean. Let's talk about Hillary Clinton," she said. "Hillary Clinton is the second most influential person in her own household. I would say Hillary Clinton has the wrong vision for America, but I don't know what it is."

Tennessee GOP Rep. Marsha Blackburn also jumped on the bandwagon, mocking several TV networks for their coverage of Clinton. "ABC: All About Clinton network; NBC: Nothing But Clinton; CNN: Clinton News Network; CBS - - just think about it!" Translation: Clinton b.s.," she said.

For their part, Clinton allies say the attacks are a sign Republicans may feel threatened. "Republicans are rattled by the energy and excitement shown by Americans across the country for Hillary Clinton's potential candidacy and her vision for our future," communications director Adrienne Elrod of Correct The Record said in statement. "It is clear Republicans have nothing of substance to say and that they'd like nothing more than to distract from the GOP's disunity."

The Hill: "Pelosi: With Hillary Clinton, Democrats can win the House"

By Mike Lillis

January 27, 2015, 6:00 a.m. EST

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Rep. Nancy Pelosi says Democrats can recapture control of the House in 2016 by riding Hillary Clinton's coattails.

"Yes, we can win the House," the California Democrat said during a sit-down interview in her Capitol office.

"If she runs, she will win the nomination. And if she's our nominee, she clearly — I mean, the campaign, the joint effort — would be one that could not only take her into office but would [pull Democrats to victory]," Pelosi said.

"There's opportunity, all kinds of statistics now about if the Democrats have a presidential candidate who … wins by 52 percent — that's over 20 [House] seats," Pelosi added. "And so 53 [percent] is a victory [for House Democrats]."

The minority leader acknowledged the headwinds facing House Democrats, who would need to pick up a whopping 30 seats to win the chamber, and she emphasized that the party's presidential nominee is a long way from being decided.

Bold predictions are nothing new for Pelosi, who, among many other duties, has a responsibility to appear unwavering about the party's election odds in order not to dissuade donors.

In 2010, Pelosi predicted the Democrats would keep the House, only to see the Republicans pick up 63 seats and seize the chamber. She also made rosy forecasts in 2012 and 2014 that proved inaccurate — a dynamic that hasn't been overlooked by GOP operatives, who are scoffing at Pelosi's latest prophesies.

"Needless to say, we get the distinct feeling that Nancy Pelosi literally has no idea what it actually takes to win back the House and is living in Fantasyland," Ian Prior, spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Committee, said Monday in an email.

Pelosi pointed out that Democratic turnout tends to spike in presidential years and has repeatedly said the GOP's refusal to pass a comprehensive immigration reform bill will doom its chances of winning the White House next year and beyond.

The 2016 posturing arrives just a few days before the Democrats will huddle in Philadelphia for their annual issues retreat, where the party's messaging strategy — and its failure to excite voters in recent cycles — will surely be discussed in depth.

Pelosi is in the middle of that storm.

The San Francisco liberal has led House Democrats since 2003, the longest run since Sam Rayburn's tenure more than 50 years ago. After Republicans picked up 13 seats in the 2014 midterm election cycle, there was open grumbling within the caucus that it might be time for some new faces atop the leadership ranks.

"This party has to look internally as to where the hell it's going," Rep. Bill Pascrell (D-N.J.) said in the aftermath of the elections.

Since then, however, Pelosi has attracted praise from her colleagues for taking on both Republicans and President Obama in her staunch opposition to December's government spending package. She's been hailed for launching several new Democratic panels designed to get the party's message to voters. And she's been buoyed by the struggles of Speaker John Boehner (R-Ohio) and Republicans, whose start to the 114th Congress has been plagued by highly public infighting on issues like deportations, abortion and border security — issues that have largely united the Democrats.

"Bless their hearts, they act upon their beliefs," Pelosi tells reporters, almost weekly.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Hill's interview touched on a wide range of topics. Other highlights include:

Gay marriage

Pelosi said she is "very confident" the Supreme Court will uphold the constitutionality of state laws allowing same-sex couples to wed. The court may lean to the right, she acknowledged, but its 2013 decision striking down key portions of the Defense of Marriage Act foreshadows a similar ruling this summer on state-passed gay marriage laws.

"Why would they take this up? In order to reverse the decisions in the states and stop … that progress toward equality?" she asked. "I don't see that happening."

Trade

Pelosi downplayed long-standing Democratic divisions over whether to grant the administration "fast-track" authority to approve trade pacts, as Obama has requested. She emphasized that liberals' concerns about food safety, currency manipulation and worker protections must be addressed, but said those hurdles are not insurmountable.

"I'm trying to say to the members, 'Let's turn a page on trade; let's try to find a path to yes,' " she said.

Pelosi said she was recently asked if 50 Democrats would support Obama on trade and responded it could be as high as 150 — if handled the right and "transparent" way.

The debt limit

In the wake of large Republican gains in the Senate and House, Pelosi is once again pushing for a "clean" hike to the debt ceiling later this year. In 2014, only 28 House Republicans voted for such a measure.

Immigration

Pelosi hammered Republicans for including "juvenile" language undoing Obama's executive actions halting deportations as part of legislation funding the Homeland Security Department. But she also suggested GOP leaders, having made a statement to their base, would cave before the department is threatened with a shutdown.

"The Speaker probably figured, 'Let them do their stuff; the Senate's going to reject it; and then we'll come to some place that the president will sign,' " Pelosi said.

The 74-year-old is notoriously evasive about her future. But she did open up a bit to suggest that the number of retiring liberal Californians — including former Reps. George Miller and Henry Waxman, who retired this year, and Sen. Barbara Boxer, who won't run for reelection in 2016 — have made it more important that she stay.

"When George was leaving and Henry was leaving, people were saying, 'Oh, now you're going to leave.' But actually, their supporters and our supporters for the agendas that we care about were saying, 'Now you can't leave,' " Pelosi said, laughing at the thought. "And now with Barbara Boxer, and our community is like, 'Oh my gosh, Barbara Boxer.' "

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The congresswoman, who is serving her 15th term, says she comes to work with as much energy as ever. As Speaker, she said she slept about four hours a night. Now, it's more like five-and-a-half hours, but no more than that.

"I don't know how my family or staff would cope if I ever got eight hours," Pelosi said with a laugh.

Pelosi stopped short of committing to another term if Clinton were to win the White House in 2016, saying she takes life "one day at a time." But the first female Speaker didn't disguise her marvel at the thought of serving in Congress alongside the nation's first female president.

"It would be a wonderful thing," she said.

Politico: "Democrats criticize GOP handling of Benghazi committee"

By Lauren French

January 26, 2015, 8:09 p.m. EST

Democrats on the House committee tasked with investigating the 2012 terrorist attacks in Benghazi, Libya, are harshly criticizing the panel's chairman, South Carolina Republican Rep. Trey Gowdy, accusing the GOP lawmaker of locking them out of interviews with witnesses.

The discord is unusual for the select committee. Gowdy and Maryland Rep. Elijah Cummings, the top Democrat on the panel, have enjoyed a cordial relationship since the committee was created last May, with the two often meeting off the House floor to discuss the investigation.

The issue is expected to come to a head on Tuesday during a hearing reviewing the committee's outstanding document requests where Neal Higgins, the CIA's director of congressional affairs, and Joel Rubin, deputy assistant secretary of state for legislative affairs, will testify.

Ahead of the hearing, Cummings released three letters complaining about Gowdy's handling of the committee, including a December letter signed by all five Democrats investigating the attacks. The lawmakers are charging that Republicans have interviewed at least five witnesses without a Democrat in attendance, including Ray Maxwell, a former State Department deputy who alleged he was told to scrub documents relating to the 2012 attacks.

"You have had different standards for Republicans and Democrats participating in this investigation, secret meetings with witnesses, and — perhaps most importantly — withheld or downplayed information when it undermines the allegations we are investigating," Cummings wrote.

Gowdy's office dismissed the Democrats' concern in a statement late Monday as an attempt to politicize the investigation. Select Committee on Benghazi Communications Director Jamal Ware said Democrats are allowed to interview witnesses without Republican staffers present.

"Chairman Gowdy will talk to Benghazi sources with or without the Democrats present just as they are welcome to talk to sources with or without Republicans present," Ware said. "[N]o congressional select committee has ever had a requirement that sources meet with both sides at the same time, and the Benghazi Committee is no exception."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Ware added, “[T]he Democrats have released correspondence that attempts to politically characterize sources’ private discussions with the committee without proper context goes to the exact heart of why the chairman will not require sources to talk to both sides.”

When he was tapped to lead the probe, however, Gowdy repeatedly stressed that the bulk of the committee’s work would be done privately, as he questioned the effectiveness of public hearings on controversial topics.

Cummings first wrote to Gowdy in November, with another letter sent earlier this month, but the private correspondence between the two lawmakers was first released Monday.

In the letters, Cummings accuses Gowdy’s staff of barring Democrats from key interviews with witnesses and deemphasizing information that disproved some of the lingering theories on Benghazi, including the allegation that the State Department purposefully destroyed documents to protect then-Secretary of State Hillary Clinton.

Maxwell, according to Cummings’ letters, repeated the claims about State Department documents during interviews with Republican staff and offered up a second witnesses to corroborate his allegation. But that unnamed witness refuted Maxwell’s story, Cummings wrote. Democrats were left out of both interviews, despite willingness ny Maxwell and the second source to be interviewed by representatives from both parties, according to Cummings.

“In some of our conversations in the past, you have suggested that whistleblowers might be willing to come forward to provide information only to you. That was simply not the case here,” Cummings wrote. “When my staff spoke with Mr. Maxwell and the additional witness he identified, both were willing to talk to Democrats, but your staff excluded them nonetheless.”

The criticism is notable as Gowdy and Cummings have worked hard to be respectful of one another in public. Cummings gave Gowdy high praise late last year for running a thorough investigation, and Gowdy even help convinced Democrats to participate in the committee after taking the Maryland Democrat to dinner shortly after the committee was first announced.

But that relationship has soured in the months since, with Democrats accusing Republicans of not agreeing to subpoena rules that would allow for a public vote if there is disagreement.

“We have spent months trying to resolve these problems privately, but they’ve exhausted our patience and we can no longer remain silent,” said California Rep. Linda Sanchez. “This isn’t the fact-based or fair investigation that Gowdy promised it would be and that the American people deserve.”

Now Democrats are complaining that the investigation has devolved into a partisan fight reminiscent of how Darrell Issa (R-Calif.) probed the terrorist attacks when he was chairman of the House Oversight Committee.

The five Democrats on the committee are also complaining that despite a multimillion budget, the panel is moving slowly, with only a handful of public hearings.

Staff for the South Carolina Republican said earlier this month that the committee has met with officials from the State and Justice departments on embassy security and document production.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

[Mother Jones: "Democrats Accuse Republicans of a Benghazi Cover-Up"]

By David Corn

January 26, 2015, 8:02 p.m. EST

[Subtitle:] And they say GOPers on the Benghazi committee are holding secret meetings with witnesses.

It's back. Actually, it never left. Benghazi. That is, the GOP's never-ending Benghazi crusade. Last year, after Rep. Trey Gowdy (R-S.C.) was tapped by House Speaker John Boehner to lead yet another Benghazi probe, he promised to helm an inquiry that would "transcend politics." But now, eight months into this latest investigation, Democrats on the House Select Committee on Benghazi have hit Gowdy with a sharp charge: that he and his Republican investigators have conducted secret meetings with witnesses without informing their Democratic colleagues on the committee. And they say that some of these interviews have yielded information that undercuts anti-Obama Benghazi allegations promoted by conservatives. In other words, the Democrats are suggesting that Gowdy has been mounting a Benghazi cover-up of his own.

In November, Rep. Elijah Cummings, the senior Democrat on the Benghazi committee, sent Gowdy a private letter noting that though Gowdy had assured him that the committee's work would be conducted in a bipartisan manner, the five Democratic members of the panel and their staffer had been excluded from at least five witness interviews. Moreover, Cummings said these interviews had produced testimony that failed to corroborate key allegations.

Cummings' letter pointed out that in September conservative media outlets had promoted the supposed revelation that Hillary Clinton loyalists at the State Department had vetted documents to prevent material damaging to senior State Department officials from being handed to an independent investigation of the Benghazi tragedy. According to Cummings, Gowdy's Republican staff interviewed the source of this allegation, a former State Department official named Raymond Maxwell, without notifying the Democrats on the committee or inviting them to be part of the interview, and Maxwell identified a person who could confirm his account. In Cummings' telling, Gowdy's GOP gumshoes interviewed this person, again without telling the Dems, and this supposed witness did not back up Maxwell's story. This second witness said he was not aware of an effort to hide or destroy Benghazi-related documents. "I did not discover any of this information from you or your staff but from the witnesses themselves," Cummings wrote Gowdy.

Cummings accused Gowdy and his staff of essentially smothering information that undermined an allegation aimed at Barack Obama and Hillary Clinton:

"Although your staff stated [to the Democrats] that they learned nothing 'of note,' in fact they learned that this claim was not substantiated by a key witness. If our goal is the truth and not a preconceived political narrative, these interviews should have been conducted jointly, with both Democrats and Republicans present."

In his letter to Gowdy, Cummings contended this Republican effort to keep the Dems in the dark was part of a pattern. He noted that when he shared his concerns with Gowdy, the chairman informed him that he had spoken to at least three other witnesses without the participation of Democrats and that two of them had provided information that helped debunk other allegations of Benghazi wrongdoing. As a remedy, Cummings proposed in his letter that the committee adopt rules ensuring that all members of the panel are allowed to participate in witness meetings and interviews.

According to a subsequent letter all five Democratic members on the Benghazi committee sent Gowdy in December, Gowdy rejected Cummings' demand for Democratic participation in all witness interviews and meetings. In that missive, the Democrats also dissed the committee's work, noting that it was proceeding at a snail's pace and was plowing over much of the same territory previously examined by other congressional committees.

Last week, Cummings sent Gowdy another letter reiterating his complaints: "Democrats have repeatedly been excluded from core components of the investigation, and we have been proceeding with no rules to prevent this from occurring in the future. You have…withheld or downplayed information when it undermines the allegations we are investigating." And Cummings provided another example: The GOP staff interviewed a witness who confirmed there was no illegal transfer of weapons from Libya to Syria (one of the many Benghazi conspiracy theories). Cummings wrote, "Instead of crediting her testimony to help put this previously investigated and debunked allegation to rest, you followed up your private, Republican-only interview of this witness by requesting a broad set of documents from the State Department on this debunked allegation. In addition, your staff has now informed us that they do not intend to use this individual as a factual witness in the Committee's investigation."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A spokesman for the Benghazi committee did not respond to a request for comment.

When Rep. Darrell Issa (R-Calif.) was overseeing the main Benghazi investigation in the House as chair of the House government oversight committee, his inquiry became as politicized as it could be, with Issa often acting unilaterally and frequently making claims and charges unsupported by the information the committee had gathered. Meanwhile, other House committees led by Republicans conducted and completed serious investigations—without any internal partisan discord—and discredited the wild theories of the right. But to undo the damage done by Issa and to placate the party's conservative base, Boehner set up a special committee on Benghazi and appointed Gowdy, a more temperate fellow, to take another stab at it. Yet the newest Benghazi inquiry now appears to be heading down a similar path, as the GOP appears no closer to giving the right's Benghazi truthers what they seek: proof that Obama or Clinton can be blamed for the horrible murders that happened that night.

UPDATE: After Republicans on the committee learned that reporters had obtained copies of the letters sent by Cummings and the Democrats to Gowdy, Gowdy on Monday evening released a statement noting he was "disappointed by the minority's decision to release their letters." His statement also noted:

“Chairman Gowdy will talk to Benghazi sources with or without the Democrats present just as they are welcome to talk to sources with or without Republicans present…Further, that the Democrats have released correspondence that attempts to politically characterize sources’ private discussions with the committee without proper context goes to the exact heart of why the Chairman will not require sources to talk to both sides.

“Chairman Gowdy has operated the Benghazi Committee in a more-than-fair and fact-based manner, going so far as to allow Democrats absent due to personal matters to participate in Committee hearings via conference call and allowing the minority to claim time not utilized by their absent Members.

“The Chairman has worked over the last several months to accommodate the minority with regard to their concerns, including offering a rules package that is much more generous than current standing committee rules and that of rules adopted by previous select committees.”

After Gowdy's statement was issued, a Democratic staffer on the committee countered:

“[Gowdy’s] response confirms that he has in the past and will continue to exclude Democrats from discussions with material witnesses.

“We have never asked the Chairman to ‘require’ witnesses to meet with Democrats. Our request was that when witnesses are willing to meet with Democrats that the Republicans include us. They have not done that—even with witnesses who were willing all along to speak with Democrats.

“Chairman Gowdy claims that our letters ‘politically characterize sources private discussions with the Committee without proper context.’ This is incorrect. Democratic members tried to resolve these issues privately for months before we were forced to go public. None of the witnesses told us that they wanted their information to be confidential or private, and we only released the portions of their statements that were necessary to explain our concerns…..

“Chairman Gowdy’s rules package does not fix the problems we have identified with excluding Democrats from witness interviews. He has also refused to permit a Committee vote on any rules unless Democrats agree to vote for his language – thereby denying Democrats a public debate and vote on the issue.”

This bitter and partisan back-and-forth suggests that this committee could go the full Issa.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Politico: IT'S ON! Hillary Clinton rival ramps up in Iowa

By Ben Schreckinger
January 27, 2015, 5:39 AM EST

The first rustlings of a Martin O'Malley presidential campaign can be heard faintly in Iowa.

Surrogates for the former Maryland governor, who is publicly mulling a presidential run, have begun talking up O'Malley and scheduling meetings with officials and activists, according to several Iowa Democrats. And Jake Oeth, who until recently served as political director to former Rep. Bruce Braley's failed Iowa Senate campaign, was brought on board as a consultant to O'Malley's O'Say Can You See PAC after the November midterm elections. He is doing political outreach for the former governor in the state, according to the PAC's spokeswoman, Lis Smith.

"Obviously [Braley's] wasn't a successful campaign, but they're people who've been traveling around the state for two years," said one Iowa state Democratic official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity, adding that multiple former Braley campaign staffers were maneuvering on O'Malley's behalf.

"They are doing some organizing and contacting," said Jack Hatch, the 2014 Democratic nominee for governor. "I will be meeting with them [this] week. It's all under the radar."

O'Malley is considered one of the most credible potential opponents to former secretary of state Hillary Clinton, the presumed frontrunner for the 2016 Democratic nomination. But the low-key tone of early efforts on his behalf marks a contrast with previous presidential cycles, when numerous Iowa Democrats said there was significantly more activity a year out from the Iowa caucuses.

Ready for Hillary, the super PAC laying the groundwork for a Clinton run, has two staffers in Iowa and says it has begun organizing in every county. The liberal group MoveOn.org, has hired five staffers in Iowa and is planning to open an office in Des Moines as part of its campaign to draft Sen. Elizabeth Warren to enter the race, though Warren has said repeatedly that she is not running.

Last year, O'Malley devoted significant resources to the campaigns of Iowa Democrats and visited the state several times. His PAC sent Hatch's unsuccessful gubernatorial campaign $10,000 and three staffers. O'Malley campaigned for Braley last year in the former congressman's failed bid for Iowa's open Senate seat, and his PAC gave Braley's campaign $7,500.

O'Malley also attended more than 20 fundraisers and political events in the state in 2014, according to information provided by his PAC, which sent a total of 14 staffers to aid Iowa Democrats during the midterms.

O'Malley left office Jan. 21 and said recently that he would spend the next couple months resettling his family in Baltimore as he contemplates a presidential run, making any announcement of a run before early spring unlikely.

In November, the Washington Post reported that O'Malley's PAC had hired Sarah Miller, a veteran of Clinton's 2008 campaign, as policy director, and Megan Adams, formerly of the Center for American Progress, as a communications staffer. The PAC also hired Bill DeBlasio's campaign manager Bill Hyers late last year. Many observers believe O'Malley is hoping to use a presidential run to raise his profile and secure a spot as Clinton's running mate or a cabinet secretary.

"He's seriously considering running for president, and that's his only focus," said Smith.

The former governor currently has no plans to travel to Iowa, according to Smith, who said he will appear March 7 at a Democratic event in Topeka, Kanasas. She said no one is working on his behalf in New Hampshire.

New York Times: "Koch Brothers' Budget of $889 Million for 2016 Is on Par With Both Parties' Spending"

By Nicholas Confessore

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

January 26, 2015

The political network overseen by the conservative billionaires Charles G. and David H. Koch plans to spend close to $900 million on the 2016 campaign, an unparalleled effort by coordinated outside groups to shape a presidential election that is already on track to be the most expensive in history.

The spending goal, revealed Monday at the Kochs' annual winter donor retreat near Palm Springs, Calif., would allow their political organization to operate at the same financial scale as the Democratic and Republican Parties. It would require a significant financial commitment from the Kochs and roughly 300 other donors they have recruited over the years, and covers both the presidential and congressional races. In the last presidential election, the Republican National Committee and the party's two congressional campaign committees spent a total of $657 million.

Hundreds of conservative donors recruited by the Kochs gathered over the weekend for three days of issue seminars, strategy sessions and mingling with rising elected officials. These donors represent the largest concentration of political money outside the party establishment, one that has achieved enormous power in Republican circles in recent years.

Now the Kochs' network will embark on its largest drive ever to influence legislation and campaigns across the country, leveraging Republican control of Congress and the party's dominance of state capitols to push for deregulation, tax cuts and smaller government. In 2012, the Kochs' network spent just under $400 million, an astonishing sum at the time. The $889 million spending goal for 2016 would put it on track to spend nearly as much as the campaigns of each party's presidential nominee.

The Kochs' efforts will put enormous fund-raising pressure on Democrats and liberal outside groups. Allies of Hillary Rodham Clinton, who appears to be preparing for a likely presidential campaign in 2016, expect that she will need to bring in more money than President Obama, the most successful fund-raiser in presidential history, and a "super PAC" supporting her is seeking to raise as much as $300 million in the coming months.

"It's no wonder the candidates show up when the Koch brothers call," said David Axelrod, a former senior adviser to Mr. Obama. "That's exponentially more money than any party organization will spend. In many ways, they have superseded the party."

The group's budget, disclosed by a conference attendee, reflects the rising ambition and expanded reach of the Koch operation, which has sought to distinguish itself from other outside groups by emphasizing the role of donors over consultants and political operatives.

While the Koch's expansive network houses groups with discretely political functions — a data and analytics firm, a state-focused issue-advocacy group and affinity groups aimed at young voters and Hispanics — it also includes groups like Freedom Partners, a trade organization overseen by Koch advisers that plans the retreat and helps corral contributions; Americans for Prosperity, a national grass-roots group; and Concerned Veterans for America, which organizes conservative veterans

While almost no Republican Party leaders were invited to the Koch event, it has become a coveted invitation for the party's rising stars, for whom the gathered billionaires and multimillionaires are a potential source of financing for campaigns and super PACs. Officials said this year's conference was the largest ever.

At least five potential presidential candidates were invited this year, and four attended, including Gov. Scott Walker of Wisconsin. On Sunday evening, three of them — Senators Marco Rubio of Florida, Rand Paul of Kentucky and Ted Cruz of Texas — took part in a candidate forum on economic issues.

The Kochs are longtime opponents of campaign disclosure laws. Unlike the parties, their network is constructed chiefly of nonprofit groups that are not required to reveal donors. That makes it almost impossible to tell how much of the money is provided by the Kochs — among the wealthiest men in the country — and how much by other donors.

The two brothers and their aides have begun to take steps to relax the strict secrecy that has long surrounded much of their political efforts. After spending the 2012 campaign as the Democrats' favored punching bags, Charles and David Koch have each granted a series of interviews to explain their views and philosophy. Their privately held firm, Koch Industries, has mounted a soft-focus advertising campaign called "We Are Koch," featuring the company's employees.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Last summer, Freedom Partners established the network's first super PAC, allowing it to run more openly political advertising in the run-up to the 2014 midterm election. The move also required disclosing some of the network's other donors. Trusts controlled by the Kochs provided about $4 million of the super PAC's $25 million budget.

This year, Koch aides also provided — for the first time — limited access to the winter conference events and allowed reporters to view live video of the candidate forum on Sunday night.

As the three senators addressed the audience of rich donors — effectively an audition for the 2016 primary — they dismissed a question about whether the wealthy had too much influence in politics. At times they seemed to be addressing an audience of two: the Kochs themselves, now among the country's most influential conservative power brokers.

Mr. Cruz gave an impassioned defense of his hosts as job creators and the victims of unfair attacks by Democrats, while Mr. Rubio suggested that only liberals supported campaign finance restrictions, so as to empower what he said were their allies in Hollywood and the news media.

Los Angeles Times column: Robin Abcarian: "Hey, GOP: Using Carly Fiorina to attack Hillary Clinton could backfire"

By Robin Abcarian

January 26, 2015, 5:57 p.m. EST

After watching some of the speeches delivered by would-be Republican presidential contenders over the weekend at Iowa Rep. Steve King's conservative confab in Des Moines, I got to wondering how long it will take Republicans to field a female presidential candidate who actually has a shot at winning.

Women seem to be tokens in the GOP presidential stakes, serving the party's strategic needs more than anything else. For 2016, it's become an article of faith that the GOP needs a woman to immunize the party against charges that attacks on presumed Democratic candidate Hillary Clinton are sexist. ("The most effective way to criticize a woman is to have another woman do it," a California GOP strategist told Time's Jay Newton-Small in November.)

So who can help?

Not Sarah Palin.

The former Alaska governor and 2008 vice presidential candidate trekked to King's inaugural Freedom Summit to deliver a disjointed speech that focused mainly on settling scores with people who have attacked her for, among other things, letting her son step on his service dog. Her rambling remarks were entertaining -- she is always that -- but hardly presidential. (Even her longtime fans were turned off. One conservative columnist called her speech "barely coherent.")

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It seems that the job is falling to Carly Fiorina, who gave a well-received speech noteworthy mainly for its broadsides against Clinton.

Fiorina has never held political office, but the former Hewlett-Packard chief has been toiling away in Republican political trenches ever since she lost the U.S. Senate campaign against Barbara Boxer in 2010. Despite Fiorina's lack of name recognition, Iowa conservatives liked what she had to say.

"She came across as a highly intelligent woman and a strong leader," one GOP party official told the Washington Times. "She did herself the most good."

Her biggest applause lines were the whacks she took at Clinton.

"Like Hillary Clinton," she said, "I too have traveled hundreds of thousands of miles around the globe. But unlike her, I have actually accomplished something…. Having done business in over 80 countries and having served as the chairman of the external advisory board at the CIA for several years, I know that China and Russia are state sponsors of cyberwarfare and have a strategy to steal our intellectual property. I know Bibi Netanyahu and know that when he warns us that Iran is a danger to this nation as well as his own, that we must listen."

Leaving aside the issue of what Clinton accomplished as secretary of state in the first Obama term, the problem for Fiorina, should she become a serious candidate, or even a high-profile surrogate, is the business record she accumulated while visiting all those countries.

Her six-year tenure at Hewlett-Packard was marred by extensive domestic layoffs. She insisted that sending jobs to other countries was not offshoring but what she dubbed "right shoring." ("There is no job that is America's God-given right anymore," she once told a congressional committee.)

Also, she was forced to defend charges that Hewlett-Packard violated the spirit of a trade embargo against Iran on her watch.

In 2010, I wrote about Fiorina's business record during her campaign against Boxer.

She was rightfully heralded as a pioneer when she became the first woman to lead a Fortune 20 company in 1999. But a couple of years after she took the reins at HP, she engineered a controversial merger with Compaq Computer Corp. that sparked a corrosive fight with the families of HP's founders, who accused her of ruining Hewlett-Packard's famously collegial culture.

"To be fair to Carly," David Woodley Packard told me in 2010, "the HP board should have known better when it hired her. If you have a pet bunny and get a pet ferret, you can't really blame the ferret for eating the bunny. That's what ferrets do."

Fiorina has insisted that she created more jobs than she eliminated while running HP, a claim that is almost impossible to verify as the company merged with Compaq, acquired many smaller firms but laid off tens of thousands of workers.

"I would say she has created a lot of jobs," a Hewlett-Packard engineer named Dan Dove told me in 2010. "But they are not in the United States."

As for the trade embargo, Fiorina was accused during her Senate race of allowing Hewlett-Packard to sell hundreds of millions of dollars in printers to Iran at a time when American companies were forbidden to engage in such trade. Fiorina said the company did nothing illegal, which was technically true, as the sales were made by a Dutch subsidiary of the company, which HP owned but did not control.

Trade experts said that HP did not break the law, but rather circumvented it using a loophole that other companies also exploited. Two years after Fiorina was fired by HP's board of directors, however, the company amended its policy and announced it would prohibit its distributors from selling products in Iran.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Having recently examined the situation," the company announced, "we believe it's important to go beyond the letter of the law."

If Fiorina plans to use her business record to bash Clinton, let alone as a rationale for a presidential campaign, expect to hear more about her stormy tenure at Hewlett-Packard.

The Hill: "Sanders heading to Iowa, NH"

By Cameron Joseph

January 26, 2015, 6:17 p.m. EST

Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) is heading to a pair of key early-primary states as he ramps up consideration of a potential presidential run.

Sanders is heading to New Hampshire on Saturday for a house party, and has a three-day swing planned through Iowa in late February.

He's also heading to Pennsylvania to keynote a local progressive event and meet with liberal activists in the state.

Sanders has said he's giving a serious look to running for president as a Democrat and could emerge as the liberal alternative to challenge Hillary Clinton, though Clinton would start out as a heavy favorite against any of the candidates considering a run against her.

Calendar:

Sec. Clinton's upcoming appearances as reported online. Not an official schedule.

· February 24 – Santa Clara, CA: Sec. Clinton to Keynote Address at Inaugural Watermark Conference for Women (PR Newswire)

· March 4 – New York, NY: Sec. Clinton to fundraise for the Clinton Foundation (WSJ)

· March 19 – Atlantic City, NJ: Sec. Clinton keynotes American Camp Association conference (PR Newswire)

· March 23 – Washington, DC: Sec. Clinton to keynote award ceremony for the Toner Prize for Excellence in Political Reporting (Syracuse)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "American Security Project" <info@americansecurityproject.org>
To: john.podesta@gmail.com
Date: 12/9/2015 7:30:44 AM
Subject: Latest News from the American Security Project

ASP Newsletter: Chuck Hagel on climate change; DoD action on climate change; Hill briefing

View this email in your browser

December 09, 2015

Facebook Twitter
Website
YouTube
Google Plus

ASP in the News

Christine Todd Whitman Quoted in Politico Article
Christine Todd Whitman, Politico

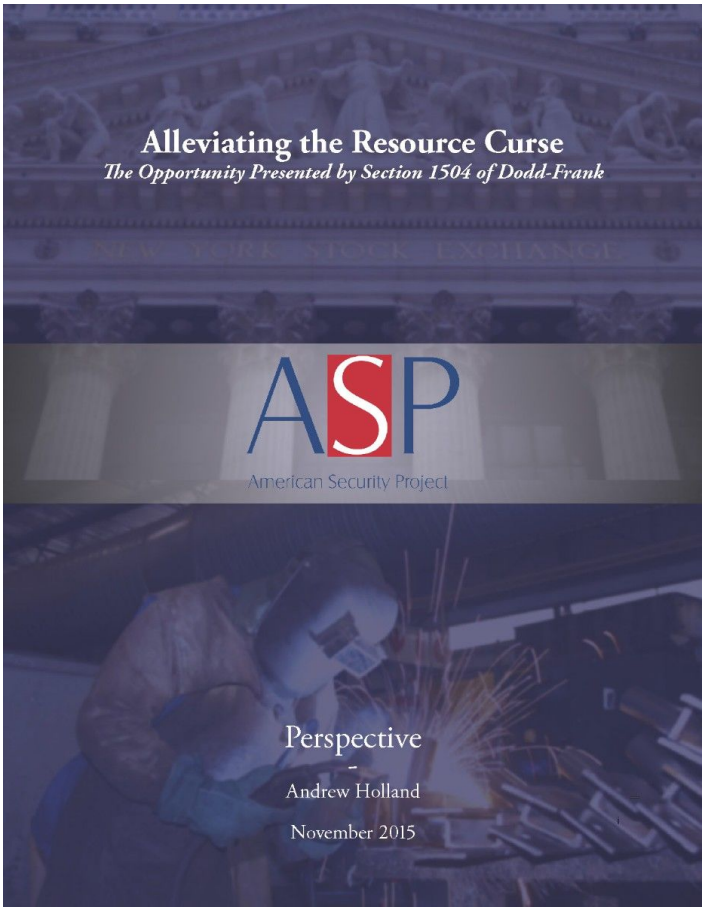
Top Stories

Chuck Hagel: Climate Change is a National Security Problem

ASP Board Member Secretary Chuck Hagel, writes in an Op-Ed in Time Magazine about the the UNFCCC climate negotiations in Paris. He emphasized that "Climate change is a national security problem."

Click here for more.

Andrew Holland and Ricky Gandhi Featured in The Hill



This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

ASP's Andrew Holland and Ricky Gandhi recently published an op-ed editorial in The Hill in support of the Nuclear Energy Innovation Capabilities Act. In it, they discuss the various provisions of the bill, as well as their implications on the nuclear energy sector.

Click here for more.

Perspective - Alleviating the Resource Curse

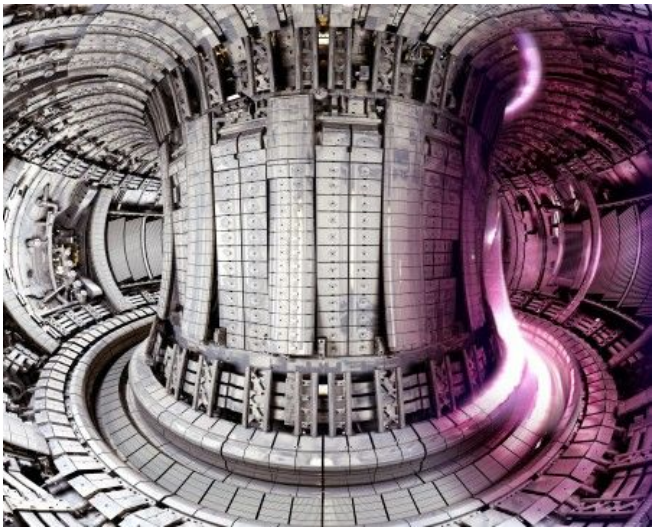
The goal is to increase transparency and provide the public with greater access to information related to the payments that U.S.-listed companies make to foreign governments to extract oil, gas, and mineral resources. The rulemaking has been delayed by lawsuits and SEC inaction. But now the SEC has an opportunity to put in place a policy for disclosure that is accessible and effective.

Click here for more.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Upcoming Events

Department of Defense Action on Climate Change



On Friday, December 11, ASP will host Maureen Sullivan, Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense for Environment, Safety & Occupational Health, responsible for overseeing the implementation of the Department's climate change adaptation efforts. She will give an update on DoD efforts around Climate Change.

Friday, December 11, 12:00 pm - 01:30 pm

1100 New York Avenue, NW - 7th floor - West Tower
Washington, D.C

Click here to RSVP

Hill Briefing: Understanding What's Next in Fusion Energy

This event will be an opportunity for leaders in fusion energy from the private sector and research labs to discuss the significant progress made in advancing fusion and what this clean, safe, and abundant energy source means for America's national security and energy future. Leading experts in fusion from the public and private sector will discuss the new developments that have been featured over the last several months in major media outlets.

Tuesday, December 15, 12:00 pm - 01:30 pm

385 Russell Senate Office Building

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Washington, D.C 20515

Click here to RSVP

On Our Blog

Climate, Energy, and National Security

BCAS Member Fortinet: Fast and Secure Tour 2015

Anil Powers

Join Business Council for American Security member Fortinet at their Reston, VA offices December 7 – 11 for their 2015 “Fast and Secure Tour 2015,” lead by the 18-wheeled FortiExpress.

Click here for more...

Christine Todd Whitman Quoted in Politico Article

Anil Powers

The article discussed the challenge the president faces in leading the fight on climate change as well as terrorism, as well as the obstacles posed by congressional and partisan pushback. Christine Todd Whitman, a chairperson for the American Security Project and former administrator of the EPA under the George W. Bush administration, was quoted in the article.

Click here for more...

American Security Project’s most recent Perspective Paper on Resource Extraction Cited by E&E News and Bloomberg BNA

Spencer Shweky

Both E&E News and Bloomberg BNA recently published articles on an American Security Project Perspective Paper entitled Alleviating the Resource Curse. The Paper is principally concerned with how best to design new Dodd-Frank regulations on transparency in resource extraction.

Click here for more...

What's Wrong with Venezuela

John Bugnacki

The roots of Venezuela’s economic misfortunes are rooted in five factors: corruption and authoritarianism, the resource curse, the decline of Venezuela’s state oil company, state control over the economy, and drug gangs and violence.

Click here for more...

The Relationship Between Climate Change and Terrorism: Reigniting the Debate

Anil Powers

E&E published an article about the relationship between climate change and terrorism. In it, E&E reporter Jean Chemnick discussed the “rekindling of an old feud” regarding the dangers of climate change, renewed partisan pushback, and policy strategies. Andrew Holland, senior fellow for energy and climate at the American Security Project, contributed to this article.

Click here for more...

Climate Change, Paris, the Rise of ISIS, and What "Causes" Terrorism

Andrew Holland

Over the past few days, there have been a number of discussion in the press around the country and around the world on the links between climate change and terrorism. Let us be clear – no act of terror is due to climate change, but climate change has helped to create the conditions from which terrorist groups can plot and plan.

Click here for more...

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Nuclear Security

Nuclear Pakistan
Sam Hickey
Pakistani officials have maintained that their nuclear program's only utility is countering the nuclear and conventional military threat posed by India, but Pakistan's nuclear program is not lagging dangerously behind India.
Click here for more...

Improving the Relationship Between the U.S. and Iran with Ambassador Thomas Pickering
Sam Hickey
On Monday November 2, 2015, Ambassador Thomas Pickering visited American University to address Improving the Relationship Between the U.S. and Iran.
Click here for more...

American Competitiveness

Business Council for American Security President and CEO of Risk Cooperative Dante Disparte on Understanding Social Risk Insurance
Steffen Westerburger
Traditional insurance coverage acts as a passive mechanism to protect against an unlikely but extreme financial loss. Particularly in emerging markets where historical loss information is limited, insurance underwriting requires multinational corporations to view risk through a different lens.
Click here for more...

National Security Strategy

Turkey Shoots Down Russian Warplane: Possible Consequences for the Turkey – Russia Relationship
Steffen Westerburger
Subsequently, the plane was downed with an air-to-air-missile. The two pilots successfully ejected from their plane, and one of them was then killed by Turkmen rebels while still parachuting down. These actions can have serious consequences in the relationship between Moscow and Ankara, and can further complicate the broader conflict in Syria and the Middle East.
Click here for more...

Low Turnout at Polls Challenges Legitimacy of Egyptian Government
Anil Powers
In spite of the government's insistence that these elections were part of Egypt's democratic transition, the low turnout indicates an erosion of political participation that has challenged the legitimacy of the nascent government.
Click here for more...

Asymmetric Operations

Global Security Forum 2015
Sam Hickey
On Monday, November 16th, the Center for Strategic and International Studies (CSIS) hosted the Global Security Forum 2015 in Washington, DC. The event featured panels of government officials, think tank fellows, and business professionals to discuss the major national security issues facing the nation and the possible solutions to these bedeviling quandaries.
Click here for more...

Paris Terrorist Attacks Aftermath: The EU Mutual Defense Clause

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Steffen Westerburger

An unexpected move followed, the French President announced that his country for the first time in history intended to invoke article 42.7 of the EU Lisbon Treaty – the EU Common Defense and Security Policy. This move gives us an interesting insight into France's foreign policy strategy.

Click here for more...

About the American Security Project

The American Security Project is a non-profit, nonpartisan public policy and research organization dedicated to fostering knowledge and understanding of a range of national security issues, promoting debate about the appropriate use of American power, and cultivating strategic responses to 21st century challenges.

American Security Project

1100 New York Avenue, NW • Suite 710W • Washington, DC 20005
Phone: 202.347.4267 | Fax: 202.470.6631
unsubscribe from this list update subscription preferences

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Jacob Roberts" <jroberts@progressivemediausa.org>
To: bigcampaign@googlegroups.com
Date: 6/11/2008 3:05:05 PM
Subject: [big campaign] Media Monitoring Report - Evening 06/11/08

Main Topics: McCentury (troop withdrawal isn't 'too important'), McCan't rally the base, Oldy McOlderson

Summary of Shift: Cable news programs covered Obama vetter, Jim Johnson heavily with little to no mention of McCain's lobbyist ties. Amidst escalating Mexican drug violence, fears spread that the US could soon become involved in violent conflict at its southern border, CNN reports. All television news outlets report the democrats are likely to try to pass the failed unemployment bill (over which McCain and Bush are split, Wolf Blitzer says) tomorrow. Reporters say Chinese espionage raised alarm amongst government officials across the board. Severe weather in Iowa and Nebraska took up a significant amount of airtime.

Highlights

1. Troop withdrawal 'not too important'
    a. McCain surrogates hit the airwaves in defense of Today Show turmoil
        i. Mitt Romney: oil companies don't make the big money ii. Ridge invokes McCain's family in defense of 'not too important'
    b. VoteVets' Friedman: McCain's remarks crush morale
    c. Democrats respond
        i. Reid reminds Americans of McCain's explosive temper
        ii. Kerry says McCain is out of touch
    d. Reporters respond
        i. Embedded Iraq reporter finds McCain's remarks out of step with troop sentiment
        ii. Slater reminds viewers this statement is symptomatic of larger problem
2. McCain's troubles with the GOP base persist
3. Leno reminds viewers that McCain is comically old
4. Lou Dobbs airs the Obama response to McCain's Jim Johnson attacks and includes this 2004 Fiorina quote: 'There is no job that is America's God-given right anymore.' [no clip]
5. Cavuto asks Tancredo if he'll endorse McCain, Tancredo responds, 'Nice talkin' to you.' [no clip]
6. John Kerry on McCain's Today Show Appearance: John McCain Doesn't Have a Strategy For Victory, Doesn't Have a Strategy For Ending the War, He Just Has a Plan on Staying in the War. [No Clip]
7. Dan Tarullo, Obama Senior Economic Advisor, on McCain's Economic Plan: "It Will Blow an Enormous Hole in the Budget" [No Clip]
8. On Election Center Rowland suggests NV Jim Gibbons' controversy may hurt McCain [no clip]
9. Senator Dick Durbin: McCain is an extension of Bush policies on economy and Iraq, on CNN [no clip]
10. Iraqis want America out of their country, CNN reports [no clip]
11. Al-Qaeda material leaked to CNN reveals that al-Qaeda in Iraq infiltrated Iraqi bases and American bases in Iraq [no clip]
12. As part of farewell portion of Bush's Europe trip, he admits regrets that he did not sell the war in Iraq better [no clip]
13. Bill O'Reilly reports that David Bossie plans to release a documentary critical of Obama [no clip]

Clips

Highlight #1

Romney Tells Blitzer McCain's Plans Won't Benefit Exxon-Mobil and They Don't Make Big Money (CNN 06/11/08 4:22pm)

WOLF BLITZER: A little commotion over Iraq today. Senator McCain was on The Today Show early this morning. He had this exchange with Matt Lauer. I'm going to play the whole thing and we'll talk about it.

[Clip]

BLITZER: All right, governor. The democrats, including Senator Obama's campaign and a lot of the democratic leadership in congress, they're really irate. They're saying—they're saying McCain is certainly out of touch when he says—quote—'that's not too important' when U.S. troops, 150,000 or so, still in Iraq, would be coming home. I wonder if you'd want to go to bat for senator McCain right now.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

MITT ROMNEY: Pretty straightforward. He's pointing out the exact date when all of our troops come home is a lot less critical than whether we can stop casualties and whether we can stabilize the government in Iraq and make sure Al Qaeda doesn't have a safe haven from which they can launch attacks.

He's already indicated he'd like to have most of our troops home by the end of his first term. That's the goal that he has in mind. It's a goal he's pursuing. Clearly the key here is as John McCain predicted that the surge would work and Barack Obama said, 'No, it wouldn't. The surge is working.

That's the benefit of experience. Barack Obama's lack of experience is, I'm afraid, showing here. By the way, any time we're talking about Iraq and the fact John McCain was right and Barack Obama was wrong, that's helping the McCain story.

BLITZER: They're also pointing out—Senator Obama and other democrats, critics of the war, the Iranians seem to be the big winner in all this. They look at the most recent pictures of the Iraqi Prime Minister, Nouri al-Maliki going once again to Tehran, kissing the Iranian president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad as he's done before.

They say, 'What's going on?' the democrats accusing bush and McCain, for that matter, of allowing Iran to be the big strategic winner in that region as a result of the U.S. invasion. You want to respond to that charge?

ROMNEY: Once again you point out the peril of Barack Obama's inexperience. If we were to withdraw our troops in a precipitous manner we would leave the Iraqis no choice but to cozy up to Iran because Iran would become the superpower in the region. By stabilizing Iraq, making sure it's government and now it's 500,000 strong military, is independent and capable of protecting their own borders, that Iraq is able to follow its own course.

Of course they'll talk to their neighbors as they're doing now and have diplomatic outreach and see if they can't keep Iran from interfering with what's going on in Iraq but there's nothing more dangerous in the region than our withdrawing and having Iraq have nowhere to turn but to Ahmadinejad.

BLITZER: The U.S. is negotiating with the Iraqi government right now, the Bush administration, before the end of the this year, what's called a Status of Forces Agreement for a permanent or a long-term—let me say just a long-term, not necessarily a permanent, a long-term U.S. military presence in Iraq and apparently the Iraqi government, Nouri al-Maliki not very happy with what the U.S. is seeking. A close aide, if you will, to the prime minister saying this in the Washington Post today, 'The Americans are making demands that would lead to the colonization of Iraq. If we can't reach a fair agreement, many people think we should say, 'Good-bye, U.S. troops. We don't need you here anymore.'

If that's what the position of the Iraqi government, why should the U.S. force itself on them if they say better—we're better off, get out of here?

ROMNEY: There's no question we won't be forcing ourselves on them and the individual quoted does not speak for the prime minister or for the government. We will obviously work out an agreement as to what role we'll have on an ongoing basis and this is a, if you will, a post-conflict basis in that country to help secure their stability long term and to make clear to their neighbors that you don't come into Iraq and try and destabilize matter.

What the requirements are and what the final agreement will be is something that'll be worked out between both parties and I wouldn't add a lot of energy at this stage to what some people who are part of the negotiation are trying to leak for their benefit.

BLITZER: Let's make the turn to the economy, which is issue number one right now for American voters. Obama makes the point that, under the new tax cuts, that senator McCain is proposing, cut corporate tax rates out there, Exxon-Mobil and some of the other big oil companies, they'd reap a bonanza of additional tax breaks right now. Explain why it's appropriate at this time of rising gas prices for Exxon-Mobil, for example, to get additional tux cuts.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

ROMNEY: No one is interested in giving additional tax cuts to Exxon-Mobil. Everybody's interested in giving additional tax cuts to people who are beginning businesses, particularly small business, and one thing we've learned by watching a nation like Ireland that was an economic basket-case is that when they lowered corporate tax rates it meant more corporations moved to their country or corporations grew and added jobs in their country. They're now the shining star of the European Union.

Lowering tax rates helps create jobs. I know the democrats fundamentally don't believe that but I think almost every economist will tell you that taxes slow down an economy and kill jobs. Lowering taxes adds jobs, adds businesses, adds employment. Right now, again, Barack Obama's inexperience is showing when he says let's raise taxes right now. That's the last thing you do in an economic slow down. Even he said maybe we ought to wait a while until the economy is stronger to raise taxes. I think he's pointing out, he knows raising taxes hurts growth, hurts jobs and that's the wrong way to go.

BLITZER: He says there should be a windfall profits tax on Exxon-Mobil and some of the other big oil companies. Would it be appropriate, do you think, that Senator McCain should have an exemption for Exxon-Mobil and other oil companies so they won't benefit from a reduction in overall corporate tax rates?

ROMNEY: I guess there is the politics of blackballing and scape-goating and trying to go after one company. Look, in the oil world, the people that are making the big money are not the oil companies. There's some of them out there, I'm sure, making a lot of money. The people making the big money are Russia, Iran and Venezuela. The people who have the oil. That's where the big oil is.

BLITZER: Exxon-Mobil had huge record profits.

ROMNEY: I'm not going to defend their profit other than it's the same as their profit in the past. it's a percentage of their sales. They're a bigger and bigger company. They have more profit.

If we're going to build our whole tax policy for the hundreds of thousands of corporations in America based on one company's tax posture, that's a little silly. We want to create jobs in this country. By the way, in the energy sector I want to see those guys investing in new refineries, new drilling.

I'd like to see Barack Obama say, 'You know what? We need more drilling in this country. We need more natural gas.' He said yesterday he wants to tax natural gas and coal in this country. Those are our sources of energy; other than the oil that we have to buy from other people. Let's have economic policies here that help America as opposed to try to scapegoat one or two companies.

Ridge Defends McCain, Invokes Family (FNC 06/11/08 5:10pm)
MEGYN KELLY: A firestorm is brewing tonight over John McCain's comments about our troops in Iraq. McCain was asked today if he could estimate when our troops can come home from Iraq saying in part quote 'that's not too important, what's important is the casualties' meaning how many casualties take place. Now democrats are blasting John McCain calling him quote 'confused, and unbelievably out of touch'

[...]

TOM RIDGE: It is totally out of context, totally unfair but in the existing political climate probably predictable. There is no other presidential candidate that has a personal experience in terms of understanding appreciating and experiencing the burden on military families. John McCain's grandfather, his father John, and his two sons all get it, and John gets it.

Perhaps even more importantly and I happen to agree whole heartedly with John the democrats want to talk about time tables for withdrawal Johns interested in a success of the surge and doing whatever we need to bring stability to that government so that it doesn't become a heaven for terrorist he said very clearly very distinctly. Again showing a lack of understanding from the Obama campaign you have to see what the situation is before you make any determination with regard to any withdraw schedule and you do rely on your commanders in the field to help you with that assessment so again predictable understandable out of context but we are going to see a lot more of this distortion in the days and months ahead in the campaign.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

VoteVets's Brandon Friedman: McCain's Statements Are a Troop Moral Crusher, Doesn't Get a Free Pass (MSNBC 06/11/08 8:02pm)
KEITH OLBERMAN: How do veterans, how do veterans families feel when they hear that the man who wants to be the next commander in chief does not think it's too important when they come home?

BRANDON FRIEDMAN: Keith, this is a moral crusher. If you can imagine, say a sergeant, who's on his third tour and he's in the 13th month of that tour, and he hears the potential president saying something like this. It kills moral. The troops are over there, and you know, I've been there, I've had to deal with this. But the troops over there hang on every word they hear from a leader, especially the commander in chief, but also someone who could be the commander in chief. And when they hear something like this, it really kills them on the inside, because their families want them home, they want to come home, or focus on the real global war on terror elsewhere. But this is really killer when you hear something like this.

OLBERMAN: When I hear from servicemen or when I talk to vets, more than anything else, is their astonishment when generals or veterans like McCain, or the brass to use the general term there, don't get it. That of all people, these were the ones they naively thought would understand their risk and sacrifice. Does it matter more that they are abandoned by a John McCain who did serve, as opposed to a George Bush who did not?

FRIEDMAN: Absolutely Keith. We've come to not expect a whole lot from George W. Bush. But when you have a veteran like John McCain, who has gone through so much in Vietnam, you really expect a lot more out of him, because the way you see it as a soldier, or an airman, or a marine, or whatever, is that John McCain should know better. You know, he's been in our shoes, he's had it worse than most of us. But he should know better. For those of us that have been there, that have lived through this, we just would expect a lot more and it really saddens us to see this happen. Because there are thousands and thousands of veterans who just disagree with him on this.

OLBERMAN: And the Lieberman reaction, or the reaction to his reaction, where basically he referenced McCain's status as a veteran, as POW, as war hero as carte blanche for an excuse for this. McCain is immune to military criticism simply because he was a POW. That the merits can't even be discussed. Then that reminds me of every bit of army red tape I've ever heard of. Of every bit of censorship that the military sometimes invokes in times of war relative to its own personnel.

FRIEDMAN: Absolutely. We all respect John McCain's service. But he's not the only person who's suffered in war. We have troops coming home from this war who are quadriplegics, who've been maimed, who've have to go through so much. It doesn't give him a carte blanche reason to say something like that. He doesn't get a free pass. We've been over there too, we've been in war too, and we know what it's like. And he doesn't get a free pass, especially from us, because we hold him to a higher standard. All I can say is we respect John McCain's service, all we ask in return is that he respect ours. And for many of the people that I talk to, who are on active duty or have just come back from active duty but who have served over there, we don't feel like we are getting that a lot of the time.

Reid Responds to McCain's Today Show Comments, Says McCain is "Explosive" (MSNBC 06/11/08 3:39pm)
(clip of McCain on 'Today Show')

HARRY REID: This is in keeping with his prior statement that troops should be there and likely will be there for the next 50 or 100 years. I am sure he is not really concerned about when the troops are going to come home. We are. And that's a promise that Barack Obama has made to bring the troops home. He will bring them home soon.
[…]
NORAH O'DONNELL: You said about Sen McCain that his "temperament" is wrong.
[…]
REID: Anyone that's worked with John McCain knows about his temperament. I don't think we need to go any further than that. John McCain doesn't have the proper temperament to be President of the United States. He is wrong on the war, he's wrong on the economy

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

O'DONNELL: When you say temperament, do you mean that he gets angry?

REID: Everyone that has worked with John McCain knows of his temper. He gets upset and is explosive, to say the least.

Andrea Mitchell Leads with 'Not Too Important,' Finds It Reminiscent of '100 Years' (MSNBC 06/11/08 1:03pm)
ANDREA MITCHELL: […] the McCain and Obama camps are dueling today over what exactly John McCain meant when he answered a question about a timetable for troops to come home from Iraq […]. His answer—quote—that it wasn't 'too important' compared with casualties. It's what's fueling the uproar over [at] the Obama campaign today. […]

['That's not too important' clip]

MITCHELL: Of course John McCain had said something similar, not even this precise back in the New Hampshire primary and got himself into some difficulty. It's clear from that entire clip what the context was. He does talk about withdrawal. He does talk about his claim that the surge is working and the evidence on the ground that the surge is working […]. [H]ere's what Senator John Kerry said on a conference call with the Obama camp earlier today.

JOHN KERRY: It is unbelievably out of touch and inconsistent with the needs and concerns of Americans and particularly the families of the troops who are over there. To them it's the most important thing in the world when they come home and it's the most important thing in the world that we have a commander-in-chief who understands how you can bring them home.

ANDREA MITCHELL: […] Isn't it clear, though, though, the politics aside, but isn't it clear from what John McCain said that he was speaking more completely in the context of, yes, the troops will come home, but we got to get the casualties down?

LEE COWAN: I think you're right. I mean, the issue here isn't really all that different, as you said, than what McCain has said in the past. He's long said that what really matters to the country is reducing the number of casualties that are in Iraq, and its not so much the deployment of those troops that people are so worried about. It's the number of casualties, the level of violence. That's what he seemed to be indicating. It was sort of an awkward choice of phrase, i think would be fair to say at best, that it's not too important when they come home. You know, I think he said in the past obviously he wants to get as many people home as he can. Certainly he knows better than most what coming home means. So, it's one of these things -- and i think what's interesting, Andrea, at a time when both campaigns are trying so hard to focus on the economy, because they really think that's what's going to resonate with voters the most, something like this comes up and takes all the energy away from the economy and puts it right back on Iraq again.

MITCHELL: And, in fact, the Obama people clearly felt it was too good an opportunity to miss up, because it was as you most kindly put it, not as artful as it could have been. He could have not used the term "it's not too important." This is what helps them say he's out of touch, right?

COWAN: Right. And I think it's just those three words that got him into trouble today. And I think, you know, this -- this may be what we see for the next, you know, five months, Andrea. We're talking about a flurry of e-mails and conference calls and press avails later on about essentially half a sentence of something that might have been as you said not particularly artfully said, but it's going to be this sort of tit for tat, because these are the clear distinctions, it just emphasizes again just how different both sides are, and what the choices are that voters have. When it comes to Iraq, when it's something like this, when it's something that the Obama camp thinks is clear-cut, when it's something that the McCain campaign thinks is clear-cut, they're going to pounce on it. I think we'll see a lot more of this in the coming months.

MITCHELL: And as we've been talking, Joe Lieberman on a conference call, the McCain campaign has been saying that Barack Obama has been wrong on Iraq all along, that this is an attempt by the democrats to distract Americans from the fact that John McCain was courageous about the surge. This is what Joe Lieberman is saying, in having advocated the surge long before the Bush White House took his advice and did put more troops in, and that this is just partisan politics. And so the contest goes on. As you point out Lee, they are talking about Iraq, they aren't talking about the economy right now, despite the attempts by Democrats to keep all the focus on the economy.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Embedded Iraq Reporter Richard Engel Says McCain Isn't Speaking For The Troops Correctly (MSNBC 06/11/08 5:35pm)
CHRIS MATTHEWS: Well reconcile, or put together, what John McCain just said on the Today Show with Matt Lauer about really having an indefinite commitment to staying there, with their concern that we have an indefinite commitment to staying there. Isn't John McCain saying the very thing their afraid of, that we're never going to leave?

RICHARD ENGEL: What John McCain said about the troops, uh, it isn't always, it's not what I'm always hearing from the troops themselves. He said that the most important thing for them is when they come back. Obviously it's very important for the troops and their families to know how long this commitment is.

McCain's Statements on Iraq Are Part of Bigger Issue Concerning Ideas For War With Iran (MSNBC 06/11/08 5:46pm)
CHRIS MATTHEWS: Let me ask you a question, it seems to be that if we can elect a general Eisenhower who had won World War II, that we could have some confidence that he could end this war and end the casualties. But there's John McCain talking about becoming president, and basically reducing to almost none the casualties we face over there. How do you do that with a war still going on?

WAYNE SLATER: Well look, there's no way that any Democrat is going to seriously challenge John McCain and make people think that he doesn't care about the troops. There was something about the tone in what he said that suggested that that won't fly. But American's do care about when the troops come back. The rest of the statement about the casualties I think most Americans agree with. It's that business about how long are we going to be there, Americans do think it's important. I think the way it works against McCain is if Democrats are successful between now and November in tying that idea about staying there 100 years, 8 years, or it's not important, to the bigger idea, are we going to get mired down in something in Iran. We're going to hear a lot about Iran between now and November, to the extent that the people, on the Democratic side, can say McCain has these neo-cons around him who are likely to move us aggressively and bullishly in Iran. That's when it hurts.

MATTHEWS: Well in that point, George Woo was just in that chair, Tucker, the other night. And he said, if you vote for McCain you're voting for war. Because there's going to be a war with Iran. Because Iran wants a nuclear program, if they try to get one, we'll blow them up. We're going to war.

Highlight #2
Lack of Enthusiasm for Campaign and Lack of Support Among Conservatives Still a Major Issue for McCain (MSNBC 06/11/08 6:34pm)
STEPHEN HAYES: There are a lot of Republican, I think if you talk to Republicans out in the country today, there's a general lack of enthusiasm among conservatives for John McCain. This is not a secret, this is something the McCain campaign has been dealing with since actually in the primaries. And I think that question, the anticipated victor, reflects that concern.

DAVID GREGORY: Is this still grassroots support? Because, you know, if you look within, not particularly this poll, but in some other polls I've seen, he's still polling very high. I think about 95% of republicans with him. But that doesn't necessarily reflect enthusiasm to get out and vote.

HAYES: Yeah, I think that's right. What I think, basically, what you're talking about, what this question measures, is enthusiasm. And look, conservatives have said, some conservatives have said quite publicly that they're not enthusiastic about McCain, that they don't even intend to vote for him. So I think this is one issue that the McCain campaign is going to have to really focus in the coming weeks and months if they hope to turn out conservatives in the way that Rachel pointed out, in the way the Bush campaign did so successfully in 2004.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Highlight #3
Leno Lampoons the GOP, Pokes Fun at McCain's Age (NBC 06/11/08 11:39pm)
JAY LENO: […] and you know John McCain, you know what a competitive guy he is.

KEVIN EUBANKS: Oh, yeah.

LENO: Well, yeah. Well, he wanted to show he could still ride. He pulled his old bike out of the cellar to prove he—here, show McCain.

[footage of man on giant, out-dated bicycle]

LENO: Here's McCain. There he is coming down.

[laughter]

LENO: Coming down the road.

[Man crashes]
LENO: Oh, oh, oh! oh, that's—[applause] and over the weekend, Barack Obama spoke with John McCain on the phone. I don't want to say McCain is getting old, but halfway through the conversation, McCain said to Barack, "Can you put your mommy on?"

So I think—[light laughter] and in his new blog—you know, he's got a blog. McCain has a blog now. He announced he is a huge Abba fan. Abba! Well, that will bring in the young voters, huh? [laughter] Come on, who isn't Abba-crazy these days? "Dancing queen!" Thank you.

EUBANKS: Oh, Jay—Jay, don't do that again. Don't—[laughter] don't do that.

LENO: And John McCain has a new slogan, "A leader we can believe in." That's a good slogan. Don't confuse that with President Bush's slogan, "We can't believe he is our leader." That's a totally different—[laughter] that's a totally different slogan. I don't want to go there.

And you may have heard, former republican presidential candidate, Mike Huckabee [is] being called a hero. He saved a man's life over the weekend, really, by performing the Heimlich maneuver. Saved a man from choking and, in a related story, senator Larry Craig performed the Heimlich maneuver on three men, none of whom were choking. [laughter]

EUBANKS: Oh, yeah?

LENO: And they were very surprised.

EUBANKS: Oh, really? [laughter]

LENO: You don't want to leave that stall door open. That's what can happen.

--
Jacob Roberts
Media Analyst
PMUSA
(c) 208.420.3470
--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~
You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail ryan@campaigntodefendamerica.org with questions or concerns

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.
-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Ryan Anderson" <ryaneanderson@gmail.com>
To: bigcampaign@googlegroups.com
Date: 5/8/2009 5:30:58 AM
Subject: [big campaign] NO EXIT: Congressman Seeks to Fill Gap in Afghanistan War Funding Bill http://www.huffingtonpost.com/tom-andrews/no-exit-congressman-seeks_b_200028.html

NO EXIT: Congressman Seeks to Fill Gap in Afghanistan War Funding Bill

Tom Andrews
May 08, 2009

Congressman Jim McGovern (D-MA) is bothered by what's missing in the Supplemental Appropriation for Iraq and Afghanistan: an exit.

His modest proposal to fill that gap? Include a provision that requires the administration to develop an exit strategy for its military escalation in Afghanistan and report that strategy to Congress by the end of the year.

But this sensible requirement did not see the light of day when the House Appropriations Committee passed the war supplemental yesterday. The next stop for the bill–before the full House of Representatives can vote on it–is the Rules Committee. And, as a member of that Committee, Congressman McGovern is asking his colleagues to allow him the chance to offer this proposal as an amendment to the war supplemental on the floor of the House next week. The Committee will consider this request next Wednesday.

Congressman McGovern and this proposal deserve the support of his Committee and the House Democratic Caucus. To get that support, he needs us. Call your Member of Congress at (202) 224-3121 and urge them to support Rep. Jim McGovern's Afghanistan Exit Amendment.

Congressman McGovern is as worried as many of us are that the $94.2 billion war supplemental is going to fuel our nation's descent into a disastrous quagmire. He, like us, agreed with President Obama when he told the nation on 60 Minutes that when it comes to the war in Afghanistan: "There's got to be an exit strategy".

Many of our NATO allies agree as well. The leader of Canada's Liberal Party told me last week that the only way Canada citizens would support sending any troops was if there was a clear exit strategy with a date certain for their withdrawal. As a result, all Canadian soldiers will be on their way home by 2011.

And we've already seen how the lack of an exit strategy is making things worse in Afghanistan . Not only does the presence of foreign troops unite our opponents , but our seemingly endless presence also hurts our ability to elicit the support of key regional players like Russia and China . Maybe that's why over 80% of Afghans oppose an escalation of American troops in their country.

The good news from yesterday is that the Appropriations' Committee voted in an amendment from Congressman Sam Farr (D-CA) that pushes back on mission creep in Iraq. The amendment put Congress on record in support of President Obama's policy to withdraw all US combat forces from Iraq by August 2010 and all of the remaining US forces by the end of 2011. It also orders the Pentagon to provide Congress with a detailed month-by-month report on how the troops, contractors and equipment are being removed.

But we still need an exit strategy for US military action in Afghanistan. Luckily, there is still time to fill this dangerous gap. We must let Members of Congress know that Congressman McGovern should be allowed to offer his Afghanistan Exit Amendment on the floor of the House. And, once it's there, it should be passed overwhelmingly.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Rules Committee takes up Congressman McGovern's modest proposal next Wednesday. Call your Member of Congress at (202) 224-3121 and urge them to support Rep. Jim McGovern's Afghanistan Exit Amendment. Let's help Congress take this modest step forward to prevent "Obama's War" from becoming Endless War in Afghanistan.

--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~
You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail dubois.sara@gmail.com with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.
-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Eizenstat, Stuart" <seizenstat@cov.com>
To: "Jacob (Jake) J. Sullivan (Jake.Sullivan@gmail.com)" <Jake.Sullivan@gmail.com>
Date: 7/2/2015 12:08:01 PM
Subject: Israeli Ambassador Ron Dermer--NOT FOR CIRCULATION

Dear Jake,

I met with Israeli Ambassador Ron Dermer just now to brief him on our JPPI meeting with the Prime Minister and the Cabinet this past Sunday in Jerusalem, and on another matter.

Let me premise this summary by telling you that we are so personally close to him that my late wife Fran and I went to his Bar Mitzvah in Miami (tragically, his father, the Mayor of Miami Beach died of a heart attack two weeks before the event). We have been close ever since, although our politics are far apart. Also, I am fully and painfully aware of his role in the Romney-Obama election. That having been said, what he said to me after I briefed him on the report Dennis Ross and I gave to the Prime Minister and Cabinet on the JPPI Annual Assessment of the State of the Jewish People, is worth considering.

1. IRAN

He told me the following:

(1) He understands that Hillary will have to support the Iran nuclear deal. He is concerned that for the balance of Obama's term, Iran could "blackmail" the Administration by threatening to withdraw from the agreement if the U.S. contends they have violated some provision of the agreement.

(2) It is important that even as Hillary endorses the agreement, and says she would vote for it if she was in the Senate, she "should not get too invested in it".

(3) She should "list the concerns "she has with it, while saying that "it is better than no deal".

(4) In addition, she should commit:

(a) That as President she will confront Iran's challenges in other areas (terrorism, Syria, Iraq);
(b) That she will maintain all the non-nuclear sanctions on Iran (human rights, terrorism, etc.);
(c) Join her support for the nuclear deal with a "strong statement that as President she would strengthen all of the US allies in the region, starting with Israel", and will "redouble efforts to work closely with Israel".
(d) Oppose the UN Resolution.

(5) He is "worried that things will get off the rails" when an agreement is reached. He noted with greater concern, saying "it was embarrassing" that Jack Lew was booed during a recent speech at a Jerusalem Post forum, when he was defending a nuclear deal. Hillary should avoid being put in that position. He is concerned the coming Iran battle will "shift downward the American-Israel" relationship.

(6) The Administration is "tone deaf" about the "existential threat" to Israel from Iran. Hillary should recognize and empathize with Israel's concerns with the Iran deal.

(7) He thought three weeks ago that there was only a 10% chance of a congressional veto override; now he feels there is a 30% chance, as opposition is building and the gaps in the agreement are becoming clearer.

2. BDS

(1) They will shortly expose the funding base for the main BDS group on campus, Students for Justice in Palestine, which tie it with terrorist funding.

(2) He agrees there should be a "big tent" to combat BDS of all pro-Israel, anti-BDS groups. But he distinguishes between liberal groups like Peace Now, which he supports, and JStreet, which he does not. The reason, he said, is that although they are officially anti-BDS, they actively lobby against Israeli positions supported by a democratically elected government in Israel, and are constantly critical of Israel, rather than the Palestinians. By lobbying Congress and the Administration against Israeli positions they are "denying Israel's right to self-determination." They are lobbying to change what the popularly elected government of Israel supports.

(3) He is doubtful the position Dennis and I took before the Cabinet, that not expanding settlements outside the established blocs would have much effect on BDS followers.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(4) The key is to expose BDS as anti-Semitic and anti-Israel. There is no other country where there is a BDS campaign to change their policy. Israel is being held to a double standard. If those who supported BDS also supported against other countries (Saudi Arabia, China, et al) then at least there is some consistent principle. But by singling out Israel, it exposes an anti-Semitic basis for their efforts.

Perhaps some of this will be helpful. Please do not circulate this beyond the immediate people I have copied.

Best wishes,

Stu Eizenstat

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Tony Carrk" <tcarrk@hillaryclinton.com>
To:	hrcrapid <HRCrapid@googlegroups.com>
Date:	4/23/2015 8:50:30 AM
Subject:	FW: Quick roundup of media tweets about the Medium post

H/t Jesse L for compiling

Gabriel Debenedetti, POLITICO @gdebenedetti
Team Clinton's aggressive response, in 3 @brianefallon notes:
1. http://politi.co/1zK4vyk
2. http://politi.co/1I0F1nk
3. http://bit.ly/1I0EYrH

Dan Merica, CNN @danmericaCNN
Brian Fallon, the Clinton campaign's spokesman, uses @Medium to push back against today's NYT/Clinton Cash story. https://medium.com/@brianefallon/clinton-cash-nyt-fail-to-prove-connection-between-clinton-russian-purchase-of-uranium-assets-797a71cb40b0

Alex Seitz-Wald, MSNBC @aseitzwald
Clinton spox @brianefallon gives lengthy rebuttal to NYT uranium story on @Medium. https://medium.com/@brianefallon/clinton-cash-nyt-fail-to-prove-connection-between-clinton-russian-purchase-of-uranium-assets-797a71cb40b0

Liz Kreutz, ABC News @ABCLiz
Clinton team fights back on NYT story & "Clinton Cash" (on Medium)
[Retweeted Brian Fallon]

Zeke Miller, TIME @ZekeJMiller
.@brianefallon takes to Medium to challenge NYT reporting on anti-Clinton book https://medium.com/@brianefallon/clinton-cash-nyt-fail-to-prove-connection-between-clinton-russian-purchase-of-uranium-assets-797a71cb40b0

Emily Schultheis, National Journal @emilyrs
Clinton camp responds to NYT story, via spokesman @brianefallon on Medium: https://medium.com/@brianefallon/clinton-cash-nyt-fail-to-prove-connection-between-clinton-russian-purchase-of-uranium-assets-797a71cb40b0

Mark Murray, NBC News @mmurraypolitics
Clinton campaign issues rebuttal to NYT article, arguing there was no quid-pro-quo in Russia uranium deal https://medium.com/@brianefallon/clinton-cash-nyt-fail-to-prove-connection-between-clinton-russian-purchase-of-uranium-assets-797a71cb40b0

Jose DelReal, Washington Post @jdelreal
Summary of Clinton statement on NYT story:
1) HRC wasn't direclty involved in review
2) one donor actually had no stake in the company 1/3
…
Jose DelReal, Washington Post @jdelreal
3) another key donor says he didn't speak to the clintons about it,
4) the state dept was just 1 of 9 agencies involved in review (2/3)
…
Jose DelReal, Washington Post @jdelreal
5) and Clinton was no longer sec state when the deal was finalized (3/3) https://medium.com/@brianefallon/clinton-cash-nyt-fail-to-prove-connection-between-clinton-russian-purchase-of-uranium-assets-797a71cb40b0

Katherine Miller, BuzzFeed @katherinemiller
Brian Fallon push back on NYT https://medium.com/@brianefallon/clinton-cash-nyt-fail-to-prove-connection-between-clinton-russian-purchase-of-uranium-assets-797a71cb40b0

Phil Mattingly, Bloomberg @Phil_Mattingly
.@brianefallon gets into the @Medium game, launches Clinton campaign pushback on Foundation story https://

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

medium.com/@brianefallon/clinton-cash-nyt-fail-to-prove-connection-between-clinton-russian-purchase-of-uranium-assets-797a71cb40b0

Paul Lewis, The Guardian @PaulLewis
Hillary Clinton's spokesman's five-punch retaliation against the New York Times over its foundation reporting: https://medium.com/@brianefallon/clinton-cash-nyt-fail-to-prove-connection-between-clinton-russian-purchase-of-uranium-assets-797a71cb40b0

Justin Sink, The Hill @justinsink
Clinton campaign spox @brianefallon is pulling a @danpfeiffer and using @Medium to push back on NYT story https://medium.com/@brianefallon/clinton-cash-nyt-fail-to-prove-connection-between-clinton-russian-purchase-of-uranium-assets-797a71cb40b0

--
You received this message because you are subscribed to the Google Groups "HRCRapid" group.
To unsubscribe from this group and stop receiving emails from it, send an email to hrcrapid+unsubscribe@googlegroups.com.
To post to this group, send email to hrcrapid@googlegroups.com .
For more options, visit https://groups.google.com/d/optout .

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Robby Mook" <re47@hillaryclinton.com>
To: "Dan Schwerin" <dschwerin@hillaryclinton.com>
Date: 7/3/2015 5:15:22 AM
Subject: Re: Hillary Clinton to Jewish donors: I'll be better for Israel than Obama - POLITICO

Do we need to push it harder over the next few days? Get something written? I feel like we're going to want something to point to. Or maybe even just content on the website?

On Jul 3, 2015, at 12:12 PM, Dan Schwerin <dschwerin@hillaryclinton.com > wrote:

That's basically the goal of the BDS letter.

On Fri, Jul 3, 2015 at 12:11 PM, Robby Mook <re47@hillaryclinton.com > wrote:

I was just thinking: has she made a clear statement on Israel yet? I get this question from donors all the time. Does she need to state her principles on Israel before Iran? Or do both at the same time?

On Jul 3, 2015, at 10:00 AM, Oren Shur <oshur@hillaryclinton.com > wrote:

This article seems to make the case for the Mook approach - clear, direct and principled.

Sent from my iPhone

Begin forwarded message:

From: Ian Sams <isams@hillaryclinton.com >
Date: July 3, 2015 at 9:31:09 AM EDT
To: Clips <clips@hillaryclinton.com >
Subject: Hillary Clinton to Jewish donors: I'll be better for Israel than Obama - POLITICO http://www.politico.com/story/2015/07/hillary-clinton-jewish-donors-israel-119705.html

Hillary Clinton to Jewish donors: I'll be better for Israel than Obama

But the former secretary of state is sending mixed signals on the president's Iran deal.

By Kenneth P. Vogel and Tarini Parti
7/3/15 6:33 AM EDT
Updated 7/3/15 6:33 AM EDT

Hillary Clinton is privately signaling to wealthy Jewish donors that — no matter the result of the Iranian nuclear negotiations — she will be a better friend to Israel than President Barack Obama.

But, even as donors increasingly push Clinton on the subject in private, they have emerged with sometimes widely varying interpretations about whether she would support a prospective deal, according to interviews with more than 10 influential donors and fundraising operatives.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Story Continued Below

Clinton's private responses in some ways resemble a foreign policy Rorschach test; donors who see a deal as important to world peace have come away thinking that Clinton shares their perspective, but so, too, do donors who oppose any prospective agreement as compromising Israeli security.

Publicly, she's expressed support for the negotiating process, which she secretly initiated during her time as secretary of state, but has also said "no deal is better than a bad deal."

With the talks heading into the home stretch in Vienna, the issue is emerging as an early test for Clinton's presidential campaign. She's already struggling to balance two of her biggest strengths as a candidate — her deep foreign policy track record and her vaunted fundraising ability — and that balance could become even trickier if there's a deal.

"Whatever way you go, there will be some people who won't like it," said Sarah Kovner, a prominent New York donor who is a leading bundler for Clinton's campaign and worked in Bill Clinton's presidential administration. "You can't have everybody with you. You've got to do what you think is right for the country."

The negotiations are of intense interest for some Jewish donors whose political giving is animated by their support for Israel. They're being counted on by Clinton's allies to donate huge sums for a campaign and a pair of supportive super PACs that, taken together, are expected to raise $2 billion or more.

Clinton's campaign rejected any suggestion that she's trying to have it both ways on Iran.

"Her support for the negotiating process and touting support for Israel are not contradictory," said Clinton spokesman Nick Merrill. "A strong deal is good for Israel in her view."

And several people who've heard her address the issue say the fact that different people can come away with such different interpretations is a testament to her nuanced approach to the issue and her skill as a politician, rather than any vacillation on the subject.

"That's just smart politics," said one donor who supports the negotiations and recently talked to her about them. "Because, right now, you have the freedom to say all those things, so why would you commit and box yourself in until you saw what the deal was?"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton recently told another pro-deal donor that she was “very supportive of the negotiating process,” the donor recalled, while a third funder said she boasted of her role in starting the talks. “So it seemed like she was supporting it,” recalled the funder.

And, at a Manhattan fundraiser last week featuring a largely Jewish group of donors, Clinton defended Obama against charges he had weakened the U.S.-Israel relationship, asserting that such criticism stemmed from a “perception” problem, according to a donor who was present. But she also suggested that if she were elected president she could correct that problem and bring the two nations closer.

“Diplomacy is all about personal relationships, and I’ve got my own relationships,” she said, referencing her two-decade association with Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, an ardent opponent of the Iran deal and, occasionally, of Obama. Clinton even cited her rapport with former Israeli ambassador to the U.S. Michael Oren, who last week published a book that was brutally critical of the Obama administration and was timed for release to try to stymie the Iran deal. “I know Michael well, but I haven’t read the book,” she said.

At a fundraiser last month at the Long Island home of Democratic donor Jay Jacobs, Clinton was asked by an Orthodox rabbi about threats to Israel’s security. “She did stress in no uncertain terms her full and fervent support of the state of Israel and the defense of the state of Israel,” recalled Jacobs. “And the people in the audience who heard it seemed to be comfortable with her answer.”

Likewise, donors at a different New York fundraiser seemed to fully accept her answer to a slightly different question about the U.S. interest in the deal, said billionaire hedge fund manager Marc Lasry, a leading Clinton donor. “She said ‘I’m going to do what’s in the best interest of the U.S.,’ and that was the end of it,” Lasry said.

Dan Berger, a Philadelphia lawyer and major Democratic donor who supports the framework of a deal, cautioned that the interests of the U.S. and Israel, “although close, are not identical. It might not be in the best interest of American Jews, but it’s got to be in the best interest of the majority of the people.” He urged Jewish donors “to take a step back and look at the complexity and judge the agreement based on its merits,” adding: “I’d hope Hillary would judge it based on its merits and not on political support.”

Lasry rejected the suggestion that Clinton would even consider the fundraising implications when assessing any deal.

But Clinton’s senior foreign policy advisers have briefed interested wealthy donors on both the negotiations over the deal and its prospects for congressional approval, according to one donor who recently talked to a top Clinton aide.

“It’s a tricky issue for her,” said the donor who was briefed, arguing that Jewish donors who oppose a deal and favor military intervention in Iran “are going to put her in a box."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton's allies are carefully monitoring the sensitivities of a handful of hawkish Democratic mega-donors for signs that the Iran talks may be influencing their willingness to write million-dollar super PAC checks. Chief among that group is billionaire Hollywood entrepreneur Haim Saban, who sources say has spoken multiple times with Clinton and her top aides about the deal.

In April, he strongly suggested that Clinton opposed the deal. "I know where she stands, but I can't talk about it," Saban told an Israeli television news channel, adding under questioning, "She has an opinion, a very well-defined opinion. And in any case, everything that she thinks and everything she has done and will do will always be for the good of Israel. We don't need to worry about this."

He soon backtracked, saying "I have no idea what Hillary thinks about the Iran deal."

And multiple prominent Jewish donors who joined Saban at a White House meeting with Obama in April to discuss the Iran negotiations said Saban expressed open-mindedness about supporting the deal, though one participant suggested his opinion shouldn't hold as much weight as those of foreign policy professionals.

"Haim Saban is a very smart businessman who has a tremendous amount of love for the Clintons, but I don't think he is the most sophisticated policy analyst that there is," said the donor.

Saban's representatives did not respond to questions about his interactions with Clinton.

But on Thursday, POLITICO reported that he donated $2 million this year to a super PAC supporting her presidential campaign, which Democratic finance sources interpreted as a sign that Saban's financial support will not be conditioned on Clinton taking a certain stance on the Iran deal.

Steve Rabinowitz, a Democratic consultant who worked in the Clinton White House and was a co-founder of Jewish Americans Ready for Hillary, argued that the Iran deal isn't going to be a deciding issue for either donors or voters.

"Do people in my community talk about the Iran deal? Sure. But is it affecting their support for Hillary Clinton? No," he said. "Iran certainly will — and already has — become a talking point, but it will not move three votes or $3."

Clinton has the potential to bring along donors like Saban who might have been skeptical of negotiating with Iran, argued the Long Island donor Jacobs. "Hillary has a lot of credibility and support in the Jewish community. It's broad and deep. People understand that she has fought and has been there as an advocate," he said. "So when she speaks on the issue, there will be more people in the Jewish community who have perhaps unfairly not appreciated President Obama's support who will at least give her view a more open-minded assessment."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

If Clinton backs any eventual deal, its proponents will be under pressure to step up their giving — both to the Clinton super PACs and to pro-deal groups — because she is likely to come under heavy fire from deep-pocketed groups that oppose the deal.

"If there's a deal, and she comes out in favor of it, you can be sure there will be a great deal of fire trained on her," said Noah Pollak, the executive director of the Emergency Committee for Israel. The conservative group has worked to rally opposition to the talks and this week began airing an ad pressuring New York Democratic Sen. Chuck Schumer, who is considered a key vote on the deal, to oppose it.

The left-leaning Israel advocacy group J Street, which has worked to build support for the deal, is expected to come to the defense of supporters, including potentially Clinton, though on some issues, the group's members regard her as too hawkish for their tastes.

"For people who speak on these Middle East issues on which we have strong positions, we come to their support and defense on those issues, regardless of party, regardless of candidacy," said Victor A Kovner, a Democratic donor who chairs J Street's PAC.

Kovner, like his wife, Sarah Kovner, is backing Clinton, and said he has communicated his support for a deal to the candidate.

"She is familiar with my view, but she has a lot of supporters and advisers on both sides of this question — around the nation, both within the Jewish community and beyond the Jewish community."

Authors:

View Comments

--
Ian Sams
(423) 915-6592

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Kristina Schake" <kschake@hillaryclinton.com>
To: "Jennifer Palmieri" <jpalmieri@hillaryclinton.com>
Date: 4/19/2015 1:26:41 PM
Subject: Re: FOR REVIEW: Statement for NYT story on Clinton Cash

Can people weigh in quickly? To make this into the paper we need to respond right away.

On Sun, Apr 19, 2015 at 8:23 PM, Jennifer Palmieri <jpalmieri@hillaryclinton.com > wrote:

Thanks Brian - looks good

Sent from my iPhone

On Apr 19, 2015, at 8:09 PM, Brian Fallon <bfallon@hillaryclinton.com > wrote:

All,

As you are all aware, Jo Becker from the NYT's investigative unit is one of several reporters at work on stories based on material provided by the publisher of the upcoming Clinton Cash book. Jo's story is scheduled to run in as soon as one week.

Separately, this afternoon, Amy Chozick from the NYT called us to indicate she had obtained a copy of the book on her own and intends to file a separate story tomorrow. Her story will not unpack all of the book's claims -- she will leave that to Jo. Instead, she will do a more process-y story about the book's existence, the fact that the publisher has approached multiple media outlets in advance of the book's publication to spoon-feed them some of the book's research, and also remark on the fact that Rand Paul continues to drop hints about the book's contents such that it appears they may be some coordination with individual Republican campaigns.

We think this story, though it was not originated by us, could end up being somewhat helpful in casting the book's author as having a conservative agenda. Moreover, we think Amy is suspicious of the arrangements that the book's publisher has reached with the various media outlets (including her own paper). In fact, Jo Becker is apparently trying to get this story killed because she thinks it will undermine her investigative piece later this month. But so far it is running in tomorrow's paper.

Amy is seeking a response from us on what our approach is to the looming publication of the book and the apparently well coordinated rollout. We have drafted the below response, and wanted you all to see it and provide feedback before we sent it off. Please note, however, that in order to get the statement into the story, we probably need to provide it by about 8:30 tonight. So apologies for the tight turnaround, but here it is:

> "We always expected that while Hillary Clinton was focused on how to help everyday Americans get ahead, the Republicans would focus their efforts on attacks rather than ideas. It appears that this book is being used to aid this coordinated attack strategy, twisting previously known facts into absurd conspiracy theories. It will not be the first work of partisan-fueled fiction about the Clintons' record, and we know it will not be the last."

Thank you,
Brian

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Emily Klein" <emily@flextimeglobal.com>
To:	john.podesta@gmail.com
Date:	4/6/2015 3:47:41 AM
Subject:	Met at Kafe Leopold in Georgetown

John,

We met the week before last at Kafe Leopold in Georgetown as I was en route back to Boston. I was sitting with two colleagues next to your table when I noticed you were there having lunch with Donna Shalala. Thank you for your willingness to connect and share your email address with me.

I've long held an interest in politics, spent a decade living and working in DC after graduate study at GW, as I had mentioned, in public policy and public administration. I am a registered Independent voter, voted for Obama in the last two elections, and also have voted for Republicans in Gubernatorial races here in Massachusetts.

I am excited about the prospect of Hillary running for the presidency again, yet as a middle-aged (47) professional, I'm not yet convinced she is my candidate. For the first time in my voting history, I know that my vote cast will not be based on gender or social issues alone. Yet at the same time, when my 8 year old daughter turned to me last year to say it would be great to see Hillary the first woman president, I had to agree if for no other reason than seeing in her young eyes the hope and possibility that a statement like that could reveal.

In preparation for a campaign announcement and the months ahead, what I wanted to share with you are a few perspectives on things I believe the Hillary campaign strategy should address:

Congruence:

Hillary is a historical figure, a woman with phenomenal accomplishments, but presents in public with a lot of incongruity. For example, in terms of income inequality, how can Hillary project empathy and humility when the majority of her life, at least the last 25+ years of it, was spent in the 1%? Given campaign finance her relationships with Wall St is understood. Yet what does it mean to have these relationships and campaign for closing the income inequality gap? In what ways will Hillary's goals about addressing income inequality be innovative, realistic and actionable? In what ways can they include Wall St. banks?

How can Hillary's campaign platform focus on advancing women and children's issues when the Clinton Foundation receives donations from countries with blatant disregard for women's rights? In what ways can she explain this publicly and authentically without political spin?

Purple:

The ability to reach across party lines and strive for bipartisanship is a worthy ideal despite the polarizing environment that occupies Washington. Emphasizing how Hillary will work with the Republican congress going forward is as essential as showcasing ways she has done this in the past. What are her views on defense, immigration and healthcare that are not entirely in lock step with President Obama's, for example? How can that appeal to the Independent voter that does not vote party line?

Foreign Policy

Foreign policy is a top campaign issue for 2016. Many Americans have been disturbed about Obama's foreign policy missteps, and have not felt safer in an increasingly dangerous world rife with radical Islamic extremists. The general sentiment about President Obama's earlier statements on ISIS (J.V team, not having a strategy to combat it, not using the verbiage radical Islamists) left the American voting public uneasy about the ability of the Democratic party to execute a muscular approach to military and diplomatic affairs. While I thought the NYT article yesterday on the Obama Doctrine was excellent, many Americans remain skeptical about a successful Iranian deal that cuts off pathways to nuclear weapons with a country unlikely to loosen its grip on extreme religious ideology, the form that teaches hate and destruction to its youngest citizens and sponsors terrorism.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary's depth of knowledge related to world affairs and foreign policy should include a strategy for communicating a forward thinking geopolitical vision in ways that present her unique strengths. This foreign policy strategy needs to convince the voting public why Hillary, why now, (in part, by compare to Obama) and to her Republican challengers who will do everything to associate her with past missteps and perceived party weaknesses.

Engagement

Thriving companies in the private sector are focused on increasing transparency, flattening hierarchies and encouraging employee engagement.

How can Hillary create a digital campaign to engage US citizens in a large-scale dialogue that's unique: social media, video, crowd-sourcing ideas, online events? Engaging the hearts and minds of the American voters in 2015-2016 should be an exercise in transparency, collaboration and one that goes beyond party platform, beyond label and beyond gender alone.

John, thank you for taking the time to read this (long!) note. If there's a chance for us to meet, either here in the Boston/ New England region or in Washington DC, I'd be excited by the opportunity to discuss campaign strategy with you further, especially around ways that will appeal to voters beyond the base.

Sincerely,

Emily

--
Emily Klein
Flextime Global
emily@flextimeglobal.com
Mobile: 617.599.9550
LinkedIn | @flextimeglobal

Co-Author of Workshift: Future-Proof Your Organization for the 21st Century (Palgrave Macmillan, 2013)
Transforming Organizations From The Inside Out

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Oren Shur" <oshur@hillaryclinton.com>
To:	"Joel Benenson" <jbenenson@bsgco.com> "Mandy Grunwald" <gruncom@aol.com> "Jim Margolis" <Jim.Margolis@gmmb.com> "Robby Mook" <re47@hillaryclinton.com> "David Binder" <David@db-research.com> "John Anzalone" <john@algpolling.com> "Jennifer Palmieri" <jpalmieri@hillaryclinton.com> "Kristina Schake" <kschake@hillaryclinton.com> "Jake Sullivan" <jsullivan@hillaryclinton.com> "Dan Schwerin" <dschwerin@hillaryclinton.com> "Tony Carrk" <tcarrk@hillaryclinton.com> "Christina Reynolds" <creynolds@hillaryclinton.com> "John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com> "Mike Vlacich" <mvlacich@hillaryclinton.com>
Date:	6/27/2015 8:22:10 AM
Subject:	RE: NH Primary Toplines and Memo

Couple additional things here. First, a reminder that we'll have Iowa top-lines on Monday.

second, while Brodnitz will walk us through these numbers on Tuesday, flagging this chart that highlights the ideological and gender gaps on the head-to-heads in NH.

PrimB, LeanB, CertB2 Ranked by All	All	Gender		Party Reg		Ideology
		M	F	Dem	Ind	Lib	Mod/ Con
Difference (HRC-Sanders)	+17	-1	+29	+17	+18	-1	+34
Clinton w/leaners	53	44	59	53	53	46	60
Sanders w/leaners	36	45	30	36	35	47	26
O'Malley w/leaners	2	4	1	2	2	2	3
Chafee w/leaners	1	1	1	1	2	1	2
Other w/leaners	3	3	4	4	3	3	3
Don't know w/leaners	4	3	5	4	5	2	7

From: Oren Shur [mailto:oshur@hillaryclinton.com]
Sent: Saturday, June 27, 2015 8:39 AM
To: 'Joel Benenson'; 'Mandy Grunwald'; 'Jim Margolis'; Robby Mook (re47@hillaryclinton.com); 'David Binder'; 'John Anzalone'; Jennifer Palmieri; Kristina Schake; Jake Sullivan; Dan Schwerin; Tony Carrk; Christina Reynolds; 'John Podesta'; Mike Vlacich
Cc: 'Peter Brodnitz'; 'Melissa Bell'
Subject: FW: NH Primary Toplines and Memo

Team –

Attached are the toplines from the NH primary survey and a cover letter from Brodnitz (also pasted below). We're working with your assistants to schedule a call to review these results, likely on Tuesday morning.

Thanks.

To: Hillary Clinton for President Consultant Team
From: Pete Brodnitz
Date: June 27, 2015
Re: Topline Results

Horse-race

The last survey was conducted in February. Now that the race has become more engaged, the ballot in New Hamphsire has tightened considerably, but Secretary Clinton maintains a double digit lead over Sanders (48% support for Secretary Clinton, 34% for Bernie Sanders, 2% for Martin O'Malley, 1% for Lincoln Chafee, 2% "other" and 13% undecided).

Ballot Tracking

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

	Feb 2015	June 2015	Δ
Difference (HRC-Sanders)	+61	+14	-47
Hillary Clinton	73	48	-25
Bernie Sanders	12	34	+22
Martin O'Malley	2	2	n/c
Lincoln Chafee		1
Jim Webb	3
Other	2	2	n/c
Don't Know	9	13	+4

Note: In February Jim Webb was asked. In June, Lincoln Chafee was asked.*

When undecided voters are pushed to make a choice, Clinton's lead breaks the 50% threshold while Sanders' vote share sees little movement (53% Clinton and 36% Sanders).

Sanders has raised his name identification and favorables considerably since we last polled. His name ID has increased from 52% to 77% and his favorability increased from 44% to 70%. Secretary Clinton's overal favorabilitiy is 85% with 12% unfavorable. Currently Sanders' very favorable is 46% while that for Secretary Clinton's is 39%.

The Sanders vote does not appear to be an anti-Clinton vote. Clinton is the second choice of most Sanders voters. Almost seven in ten (66%) of Sanders voters say Secretary Clinton is their second choice preference.

As of now, only about three in ten voters are familiar enough to have an opinion of Martin O'Malley or Lincoln Chafee, respectively.

As shown in the ballot progression below, after voters hear a positive profile of both Sanders and O'Malley, Sanders gains 3% and O'Malley gains 4% support. Once voters subsequently heard a positive profile of Secretary Clinton the ballot reverts to close to initial ballot support. Providing voters negative information about both Clinton and Sanders did not significantly change ballot support. In fact, the final ballot (which comes after negative information about both Clinton and Sanders) is almost identical to the initial ballot – a 13% HRC advantage, compared with an initial 14% advantage.

Ballot Progression

I know it's a long way off, but if the Democratic primary for President were held today, would you vote for…?

Ranked by PrimB	Initial Ballot (PrimB)	Ballot After Sanders/ O'Malley Profile (Q28)	Ballot After HRC Profiles (Q32)			Ballot After HRC Negatives (Q45)	Ballot After Sanders Negatives (Q54)
			All	Heard Values	Heard Policy
Difference (HRC-Sanders)	+14	+7	+12	+11	+15	+8	+13
Hillary Clinton	48	44	48	48	50	46	48
Bernie Sanders	34	37	36	37	35	38	35
Martin O'Malley	2	7	5	5	6	6	6
Lincoln Chafee	1	1	1	1	0	1	1
Other	2	2	2	2	2	2	2
Don't know	13	9	8	8	7	8	8

The Candidates

When asked what words they associate with Clinton, the responses were generally positive and describe Clinton as strong, intelligent and capable. They described Sanders as honest/trustworthy, a liberal/progressive and other generally positive characteristics.

However, when asked about recent coverage of Clinton, we see that the negative coverage has cut through. When asked what they've recently heard, most voters report hearing about the email scandal (32%), contributions to the Clinton Foundation (14%) or stories surronding Benghazi (10%).

When presented with a series of attributes and asked how well it applies to Clinton, voters were most likely to ascribe strength, ability to make tough choices and fights for people like you to Clinton. Clinton performed the worst on holding Wall Street accountable, being in touch with the lives of ordinary Americans and being genuine.

Half of all likely voters (51%) describe Clinton as moderate whereas close to half (46%) describe Sanders as very liberal. Notably, most primary voters describe themslves as liberal (50%) and only 38% describe themselves as moderate.

Message/Policy

While a majority of likely voters (50%) do not hold a position on TPP, among those who do the intensity of opposition is higher than the intensity of support (10% strongly support vs. 19% strongly oppose).

Meanwhile, a majority of voters prefer Clinton's approach to the banking industry of holding top executives accountable compared to Sanders' approach of breaking up the banks (regardless of whether we reference the recovering economy or not). It should be noted that neither candidate's name was associated with the position tested and that Clinton's weakest attribute is her abiilty to hold Wall Street accountable.

After voters hear a positive profile on both Sanders and O'Malley, Clinton's lead dops to a seven point margin (44% Clinton, 37% Sanders, 7% O'Malley, 1% Chafee, 2% other and 9% don't know). However, once voters hear a positive profile on Clinton she re-gains her double-digit lead (+12 points).

- On a topline basis the two paragraphs about Hillary Clinton tested, one focusing on values and the other policy, are comparable. Further analysis will be needed to see if they perform differently among sub-groups.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Secretary Clinton's top vulnerability tested in this poll is the attack that claims as Secretary of State she signed off on a deal that gave the Russian government control over twenty percent of America's uranium production, after investors in the deal donated over one hundred and forty million dollars to the Clinton Foundation. Half of all likely voters (53%) are less likely to support Clinton after hearing that statement and 17% are much less likely to support her after that statement.

After voters heard a battery of negatives on Secretary Clinton, their top concern was that she does not seem honest (16%).

Sanders' chief vulnerability tested is his record on guns. Almost a quarter of all voters (23%) are much less likely and more than six in ten (63%) are less likely to support Sanders after hearing that the NRA helped Sanders win a seat in Congress, that he opposed the Brady Gun Bill, supports allowing guns on passenger trains and supported a bill designed to protect gun manufacturers from lawsuits filed by families of victims of gun crimes like the Sandy Hook parents. As we heard in the recent focus groups, the issue of gun control is particularly salient given the recent shootings in Charleston, South Carolina.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: Tikkun <magazine@tikkun.org>
To: Podesta@Law.Georgetown.Edu
Date: 10/23/2015 7:09:34 AM
Subject: Uri Avnery on Israeli Racism, with a preface from Rabbi Lerner

Tikkun { tē-kün } to heal, repair, and transform the world

You can read this article online at http://www.tikkun.org/nextgen/25311 and circulate it to others!

Uri Avnery on Israeli Racism with a prefatory note from Rabbi Michael Lerner

October 23, 2015

Editor's Note: The sad reality of racism in Israel (the latest incident discussed by Uri Avnery below) has been known to many of us for decades–a tragedy for a people which has suffered so much from the racism directed against us. Its first manifestation was in the early Zionist claim that its attempt to build a Jewish society in Palestine was merely directing Jewish refugees to a "land without people for a people without a land"--making invisible the hundreds of thousands of Arabs who lived there by the early part of the 20th century. Next manifestation was in the scorn and discrimination with which Sepahrdic/Mizrachi Jews escaping from Arab countries were treated by Ashkenazi Jews who shaped the Yishuv (the pre-1948 Jewish settlements in Palestine). It has reached monumental proportions against Palestinians in contemporary Israel, yet most Israelis pretend that their discriminatory treatment of Palestinians is only a reaction to the the insecurity that Jewish Israelis feel in relationship to the Palestinians, denying the other element that is a major part of the psychodynamics of the conflict, namely the guilt that Israelis feel at being oppressors which is then denied, repressed, split off, and manifests in racist portrayals of those they are dominating and hurting. Yet finally in the last few years that racism became harder to deny as it manifested toward African refugees seeking asylum in Israel and the many other non-Jews who Israel imported to fill the menial jobs that would no longer be filled by Palestinians once Israel decided to cut off the Gaza- or West Bank-located Palestinians from working in Israel. Now this latest incident which Avnery discusses below demonstrates the racism ever more clearly, and tragically. For those of us who care deeply about the Jewish people and worry about the tendency in much of the Jewish world to blindly worship the State of Israel (the latest manifestation of the idolatry that has often undermined true Jewish commitment to God), this racism is particularly distressing.

Yet it is a bit problematic for us in the U.S. to get too self-righteous about Israeli racism, without also acknowledging that racism is deep within almost every form of nationalism on the planet (certainly there in Russia, China, the Arab states, the European states turning away Syrian refugees, and the list goes on and on). Most obvious is the racism that continues to shape American society, from its beginnings in the genocide of Native Americans and the enslavement of Africans, but carrying right through to this moment when so much of the appeal of the Republican Party is based on its (sometimes covert signals, but just as often overt policies) racism against African Americans, Latinos, and the list grows. So much of what resonates in the Republican's call for reduced size of government is the covert message that "those people" (the non-white minorities) are getting too much from the government, and "our money" is being given to "them." The huge shift in American politics in the 1970s and 80s came when the Democrats were perceived as having become champions of an anti-racist agenda (a huge exaggeration, to be sure, since Democrats barely touched the economic foundations of contemporary racism), and so the former racists of the South and MidWest who had aligned with the Democratic Party jumped to a Republican Party no longer connected with the legacy of its first president Abraham Lincoln and by the 70s and 80s clearly willing to assault all those who cared for the most oppressed minorities. Their base, ironically, was often white middle income and working class people whose economic interests were better served by the Democrats but who could not withstand the allure of racist hatred offered through the code language of the Republicans (not the whole story, to be sure, as I demonstrate in my 2006 book *The Left Hand of God: Taking Back Our Country from the Religious Right,*in which I offer a strategy to change these dynamics). So we in the West must approach the racism in Israeli society with a bit of humility about our own failure to deal with racism in our own societies. But for those of us who love Israel, it is nevertheless appropriate to express sadness at the way our own people have shut their hearts to "the stranger/the Other/ha'ger" even at the expense of ignoring one of the Torah's most frequently repeated commands: to love and not oppress the stranger/theOther (in Hebrew: ha'ger), reminding us some 2,500 years ago kee gerim hayeetem be'eretz Mitzrahyim (because YOU were the Other, the stranger in the land of Egypt). It is with this sadness that we read (below) Uri Avnery, the leader of Israel's widely respected peace movement Gush Shalom.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

– Rabbi Michael Lerner RabbiLerner.tikkun@gmail.com

****

Uri Avnery

October 24, 2015 Tel Aviv, Israel

Weep, Beloved Country

SOMETIMES, A small incident can pierce the darkness and reveal a frightening picture.

This happened last Sunday in Beersheba, the capital of the Negev.

The picture was frightening indeed.

THE INCIDENT started as a routine attack, one of many we have become used to in recent weeks. Some call it "the Third Intifada", some speak of a "Terror Wave", some are satisfied with "Escalation".

It is a new stage in the old conflict. Its symbol is the knife-wielding lone Palestinian individual – either from East Jerusalem, the West Bank or Israel proper.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It is not connected with any of the Palestinian parties. Before the deed, the attacker had no known connection with any militant group. He or she is completely unknown to the Israeli Security Service. Hence it is impossible to prevent such actions.

One morning the future shahid wakes up, feels that the time has come, takes a large kitchen knife, goes to a Jewish neighborhood and stabs the nearest Israeli Jew, preferably a soldier, but when there are no soldiers around – any Jewish civilian, man, woman or even child.

The attacker knows well that they will probably be killed on the spot. They want to become a shahid – a martyr, literally "witness to the faith".

In earlier intifadas, the attackers were generally members of organizations or cells. These cells were invariably infiltrated by paid traitors, and almost all perpetrators were caught, sooner or later. Many such acts were prevented.

The present outbreak is different. Since they are carried out by lone individuals, no spies are aware of them. The acts cannot be stopped in advance. They can occur anywhere, anyplace – In Jerusalem, in the other occupied territories, in the heart of Israel proper. Any Israeli, anywhere, can be knifed.

To get the whole picture, one must add to this the stone-throwing groups of Palestinian youngsters and children along the highways. The groups form suddenly, spontaneously, generally composed of local teenagers, and throw stones and firebombs at passing cars – first making sure that they are Jewish Israeli. Often they are joined by mere children, who are eager to prove their courage and devotion to Allah. One caught was 13 years old.

Stone-throwing incidents sometimes lead to the death of drivers, who lose control of their cars. The army responds with teargas, rubber-coated steel bullets (which cause acute pain but rarely kill) and live ammunition.

THE OUTBREAK – which does not yet have a definite name – started several weeks ago in East Jerusalem. As usual, one may add.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The center of the Arab Old City is the holy place called by the Jews "the Temple Mount" and by the Arabs "Haram al-Sharif" – the Holy Shrine. It is where the ancient Jewish temples once stood.

After the Second Temple was destroyed by the Romans some 1945 years ago, the place was desecrated by the Christians who turned it into a dunghill. When it was conquered by the Muslims in 635, the humane Khalif Omar ordered it cleaned. Two holy Muslim buildings were erected – the beautiful Dome of the Rock, with its conspicuous golden dome, and the even holier al-Aqsa Mosque, the third holiest mosque in Islam.

If one wants to cause trouble, this is the place to start. The cry that al- Aqsa is in danger arouses every Palestinian, and every Muslim around the world. It excites moderately religious Muslims (as most Arabs are) as well as religious fanatics. It is a call to arms, to self-sacrifice.

This has happened several times in the past. The terrible "events" of 1929, in which the ancient Jewish community in Hebron was massacred, were started by a Jewish provocation at the Western Wall, part of the wall that encloses the Mount. The second intifada broke out because Ariel Sharon led a provocative demonstration on the Mount, with the express permission of the then Labor Party Prime Minister, Ehud Barak.

The present trouble started with visits by Jewish extreme right-wing leaders, including a minister and members of the Knesset, to the Temple Mount. This in itself is not forbidden. (Except by Orthodox Jewish law, because ordinary Jews are not allowed to tread were once the Holy of Holies was located.) The mount is a paramount tourist attraction.

To regulate things, something called the Status Quo is in place. When the Israeli army occupied East Jerusalem in the 1967 Six-day war, it was decided that the Temple Mount enclosure, though now under Israeli rule, would be run by Muslims under Jordanian jurisdiction. (Why Jordanian? Because Israel did not agree to Palestinian jurisdiction.) Jews were allowed to enter the enclosure, but not to pray there.

Binyamin Netanyahu maintains that the Status Quo was not broken. But lately groups of fanatical right-wing Israelis have entered the enclosure, protected by the Israeli police, and prayed. For the Muslims, that was a breach of the status.

Moreover, much publicity has been given to Jewish groups who are preparing to rebuild the Jewish Temple after destroying the Muslim shrines. The clothes and instruments prescribed by the Bible are being prepared by fanatics.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In normal times, at a normal place, this could be settled peacefully. But not on the Temple Mount, and not now, with Jewish settlers starting to secure footholds in the Arab villages surrounding the Shrines. All over the occupied territories and among the Arab citizens of Israel the cry went up: the Holy Places are in danger. The Israeli leaders shouted back that this was all a pack of lies.

Young Palestinians took up the knives and started stabbing Israelis, knowing full well that they would probably be shot dead on the spot. Israeli leaders called upon Jewish citizens to bear arms at all times and shoot at once when they see an attack. There are now several such incidents every day. Altogether, this month eight Jews have been killed, together with 18 suspects and 20 other Palestinians.

This, then, is the background of the Beersheba outrage.

IT HAPPENED in the central bus station of the desert capital, a town of about 250,000 Jews, mostly of Oriental background, surrounded by numerous Bedouin townships and encampments.

Three persons figure in the incident.

The first was a 19 year old soldier, Omri Levi. He got down from a bus and entered the large station building, when he was killed by an Arab attacker, who grabbed his weapon. We know very little about the soldier, just a nice-looking 19 year-old.

The second person was the attacker, 21 year old Muhammad al-Okbi. Surprisingly, he was a Bedouin from the surroundings with no security-risk past. Surprising, because many Bedouins volunteer for the Israeli army, serve in the Police or study at Beersheba University. This does not prevent the Israeli government trying to grab the land of the tribes and re-settle them in crowded little townships.

Nobody knows why this boy of the desert decided, on waking up that day, to become a Shahid and go on a rampage. His extended family seems as perplexed as everyone else. It seems that he had become very religious and and was reacting to the al- Aqsa incidents. Also, like all Bedouins in the Negev, has was certainly upset by the government's efforts to dispossess them.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

So he shot at the bystanders – either with a pistol in his possession or with the weapon he had grabbed from the soldier. After reading tens of thousands of words, I am still not quite sure.

BUT THE person who drew the most attention was neither the soldier nor the assailant, but the third victim.

His name was Haftom Zarhim, a 29 year old refugee from Eritrea – one of 50,000 or so Africans who illegally crossed the border into the Negev. He was completely innocent. He just happened to enter the building behind the assailant, and some bystanders mistook him for an accomplice. He did not look Jewish.

He was shot and wounded. While lying on the floor, bleeding and helpless, the mob surrounded him, kicking him from all sides, several kicking his head. He arrived dead at the hospital. The entire scene was gleefully photographed by a bystander with his smartphone and shown on all TV news programs.

There is no way around it: this was an incident of vicious racism, pure and simple. The barbaric treatment of wounded Palestinian assailants by an excited mob can somehow be understood – not excused, not condoned, but at least understood. We have a conflict that has already lasted more than 130 years, on both sides several generations have been brought up in mutual hatred.

But asylum seekers? They are almost universally hated. Why? Only because they are foreigners, non-Jews. Even the color of their skins cannot provide a full explanation – after all we now have quite a number of dark-skinned Ethiopian Jews, who are accepted as "ours".

